The most noteworthy change in wording between 1549 and 1552 (and later) lay in the closing passage. In the earlier form the advice to seek "comfort and counsel" of the Curate, or "some other discreet and learned priest, taught in the law of God," is so given as to imply a more normal recourse to private confession than at present, and care is taken to mediate between those who "do use, to their further satisfying, the auricular and secret confession to the priest," and those who "are satisfied with their humble confession to God and the general confession to the Church; but in all things to follow and keep the rule of charity."

3. The Exh. "in case he shall see the people negligent to come to the Holy Communion." This first appeared in 1552, and no material alteration has been made since, except that a long paragraph directed against NON-COMMUNICATING ATTENDANCE was deleted in 1662.

4. The Exh. immediately before Communion; Dearly beloved in the Lord. This appeared first in the "Order" of 1548. The only important subsequent change is that the original words (1548-9), "He hath left, in those holy mysteries, as a pledge of His love and a continual remembrance of the same, His own blessed body and precious blood, for us to feed upon spiritually to our endless comfort and consolation," were altered (1552) to precisely the present words, "He hath instituted . . . endless comfort." The almost total disuse of this noble Exhortation is to be regretted.

¹ In fact Exhs. of similar character to those in the PB have formed part of Christian services from the earliest times.

5, 6, 7, 8. The various addresses in the course of Public Bapt. remain practically unaltered since 1549, except that, in the Address before the Questions, the words, "to sanctify him with the Holy Ghost," were added in 1662, and that the closing injunction regarding Confirm. has the same date.

9, 10, 11, 12, 13. The Bapt. of Adults dates from 1662, and the five interesting Exhortations remain, of course, unaltered.

14, 15. The opening and closing Addresses of the Marriage Service date from 1549 and stand almost wholly unaltered to-day.

16. The Exh. in the Office of VS dates from 1549. The Scripture quoted was in 1662 corrected to the AV. Otherwise there is no change of importance. An Exh. à propos of Unction (1549) was deleted, with the provision for the rite, in 1552.

17. The Exh. in the Communion remains practically unaltered from 1549.

18, 19, 20. The Exhortations in the Ordinal (to the men about to be ordained Priests and consecrated Bishops) remain practically unchanged from the first Reformed Ordinal, 1550.

—XI.

HANDLEY MOULE.

EXHORTATION, THE SHORT.—This name is often given to the Invitation, "Ye that do truly," etc., addressed to "them that come to receive the HC." It is first found in the Order of Communion (1548), and was transferred thence into the First PB of 1549 and all subsequent PBs. It usually follows the Long Exh., and always leads up to the General Conf., though the position of the section in which it stands varies in different PBs, being sometimes after the Pr. of Consecr., but oftener before it. Two changes of some importance were made in 1662: (a) the words "with faith" were added after "draw near"; (b) the clause "before this congregation here gathered together in His holy name" (following "Almighty God") was omitted. The final words, "meekly kneeling upon your knees" (altered in the Amer. PB to "devoutly kneeling"), assume that the communicants are standing, as is quite natural after the Long Exhortation. But they are omitted in the Scottish Communion Office, where the Short Exh. is immediately preceded, not by the Long Exh., but by the Lord's Pr., and it may be assumed that the communicants are already on their knees.—12.

J. W. TYRER.

EXORCISM.—The practice of E., that is, the casting out of evil spirits by certain formulæ, as distinguished from our Lord's miraculous power, was common among the Jews (see Luke 11 19; Acts 19 13; Josephus, Antiq. of Jews 8 2), and very naturally passed into the Christian Ch. The early Christians however refused to make use of charms or invocation of spirits, and confined themselves to pr. (Irenæus, Cont. Hæres. ii. 32 4, 5); and there can be no doubt they performed in this manner many wonderful cures. By the middle of the 3rd cent. the work of E. had mainly fallen into the hands of a special minor order of clergy called Exorcists, who are first mentioned in Cyprian's Eps. (75 10, etc.), and in Cornelius' Ep. to Fabius (Euseb., HE vi. 43 11). The idea that an evil spirit dwelt in all heathen caused (in Africa, at any rate, as early as the appointment of Exorcists—see Sententie Episc. at 7th Council of Carthage, A.D. 256, pluries) converts to be exorcised bef. Bapt.; and by the 4th cent. such E. was practically universal. It was retained during the Middle Ages, and in the Sar. Manual several forms of E. were said over each infant. In their place the PB of 1549 contained one E. made up of phrases from those in the Sar.; but this was omitted in 1552 (see BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 9). Canon 72 of 1604 forbids ministers, without the Bp.'s licence, to attempt to "cast out any Devil or Devils."—1b.

J. W. TYRER.

EXPECTATION SUNDAY.—A name sometimes given to the Sunday aft. Ascension Day, as falling within the ten days during which the Apostles were expecting the descent of the Holy Ghost.—CI.

J. W. TYRER.

EXPENSES, CHURCH.—The aspiration for worship is inherent in man's nature. For this purpose places for united worship are built by man, and chosen men are set apart as directors and leaders of united worship. The duty of providing for the support of such ministers and for the maintenance of worship has been universally recognised in all religions as an obligation on the worshippers, cp. as an example Gen. 47 22. In the Jewish Ch. the services of the tabernacle and afterwards of the temple were maintained by a fixed provision (Ex. 30 12-16, Matt. 17 24-27). From the very first constitution of the Ch. of Christ its general necessities were supplied by the voluntary gifts of its members (Acts 4 34, 35), and this natural necessity passed gradually into a recognised obligation which at a later date took the form of CHURCH RATES for the repair of the ch. and the supplying of the requirements of Divine worship. The abolition of Ch. rates threw the Ch. members back to the earlier custom of voluntary offerings, and it is by such offerings that both buildings and worship are now maintained alike in the Ch. of Eng. and throughout the Anglican Communion. It is everywhere recognised that an obligation rests upon Ch. worshippers to provide for the necessities of worship and, though endowments have in a measure obscured the strength of this obligation in England, it is nowhere denied, while it is accepted in the unendowed branches of the Ch. The method, practically universal, of gathering the offerings is by collections at public worship, supplemented by various other means which the circumstances of parish and congregation may suggest.

[It is generally found convenient to restrict the term CE. to the ordinary items of recurrent expenditure involved in the proper upkeep of the services, as distinct, both from repairs to the fabric or replacement of fittings, etc., on a large scale (which can best be met by special efforts or funds), and also from Clergy Maintenance or Sustentation funds. The items of CE. are usually dissected under various heads, so as to appear in the annual statement in a form suitable for comparison with previous years or other chs. The publishers of this work issue an account book enabling this to be done with a minimum of trouble. It is usually advisable that CE., like other departments of parochial finance should be supervised by a Parochial Ch. Council. G. H. J.—A6.

G. R. BULLOCK-WEBSTER.

EXTREME UNCTION.—See UNCTION.

FABRIC (PRESERVATION OF).—Church restoration, however sympathetic, is an evil, and can only be provided against

1. Precautions. by systematic care of the F. Most cathedrals are under the charge of a permanent surveyor; generally in parish churches the chancels are periodically inspected by a diocesan surveyor, the rest of the F. being left to the care of the churchwardens. In directing repairs the chief dangers to be guarded against are those of storm and fire. Careful attention should be paid to the condition of roof coverings, gutters, drains, glazing and ironwork, and timely repairs should be carried out with the best materials as soon as defects are discovered. Internal fittings should not be neglected, for instance, any insecure parts of old screens or seats should be properly secured. Dampness, dirt and bad ventilation will induce dry rot in timber, and an ill-kept and seldom used church will soon fall into disrepair.

The chief risk of fire arises when flue pipes are allowed to get foul or become defective, or when they are taken through a roof without proper insulation. The use of naked lights in or near an organ is another source of danger; and no system of heating can be regarded as really safe, unless the furnace and fuel store are effectively insulated from the church, and unless every precaution is taken to keep any inflammable matter away from all warm air ducts or high-pressure hot-water pipes. In exposed positions an adequate system of lightning conductors should be installed and occasionally examined by competent persons.

Should repairs have been neglected and restoration become necessary, it is essential that the best expert advice should be followed by those responsible for the F. A restoration should never be made an excuse for altering the character of an ancient building, or for substituting sham antiquities for work which may not commend itself to the restorer's taste. Additions which are really necessary are legitimate unless involving destruction of ancient work. In nine cases out of ten a restoration makes an old church look like a new one, and such a process cannot be too strongly condemned.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

FACULTIES, COURT OF.—See article by Mr. Wilfrid Hooper in Eng. Hist. Rev. 25 670-686.—A5.

FACULTY.—The word faculty means, generally, a privilege or special dispensation granted to a person by favour and indulgence to do that which he cannot do under the ordinary law. But the present article only treats of faculties with respect to a church or a churchyard or some other structure or property which is subject to the jurisdiction or control of the ORDINARY. With the exception of any chancels, chapels, aisles, pews or vaults, or any grave spaces in the churchyard, which may be in private ownership, the freehold of the church and churchyard is (a) in the case of an ancient parish in the rector, whether spiritual or lay, or, in some instances, with the exception of the chancel, in the vicar; and (b) in the case of a new ecclesiastical parish in the incumbent. The legal ownership of the movable articles in the church is in all cases in the churchwardens, as a quasi corporation. But all consecrated ground and buildings and their contents are under the care of the Ordinary; and therefore, with certain definite exceptions, no change whether by way of addition, subtraction or alteration can lawfully be made, either by the above-mentioned legal owners or by any other person, in the fabric or contents of a church or in a churchyard or consecrated burial-ground or their contents or the fences surrounding them, without a F. from the Ordinary. This restriction extends to all material additions, removals or alterations, whether of a legal or illegal character, and notwithstanding that they have been made without a F. But it does not apply to mere repairs, effecting simply a restoration to the former state of things, nor to such small matters as movable seats, cushions, hassocks, book-boxes and books, and trifling alterations in pews. Moreover, as regards churchyards, the incumbent is entrusted with a discretion to authorise the erection of tombstones and monuments of ordinary dimensions and to sanction inscriptions thereon, and he may level the mound above a grave without a F. But his discretion, whether exercised affirmatively or negatively, can always be overridden by a F. (Keel v. Smith, 1875, Law Rep., 1 Prob. Div., 73). The construction of a vault under a church or in a churchyard, or of a brick grave in a churchyard, requires the sanction of a F.; and, except to the extent to which the Consecration of Churchyards Acts, 1867, 1868, permit the giver of land as an addition to a churchyard to reserve the exclusive right of burial in a part of such land, no exclusive grave-space in a churchyard can be acquired, nor can any exclusive right in perpetuity to a pew or seat in a church be acquired, without a F. Where a cemetery is provided by a cemetery company, the company has the management and control of both the consecrated and unconsecrated parts of the cemetery; but the bishop can object to unsuitable inscriptions in the consecrated part and require their removal (Cemetery Clauses Act, 1847, s. 51). And as regards the consecrated, as well as the unconsecrated, portion of a burial ground provided under the Burial Acts, the whole control is in the burial authority; except that any question as to the fitness of a monumental inscription in the consecrated portion is determined by the bishop of the diocese (Burial Act, 1852, s. 38). But inasmuch as human remains, both in a churchyard and in the consecrated portion of a cemetery or burial ground, are under the protection of the Ordinary, a F. is necessary to authorise their disinterment whether for removal to another place of burial or for any other purpose. An incumbent or churchwarden or any other person who, except in the above-mentioned cases where a F. is not necessary, makes any change in a church or churchyard or introduces anything therein or removes anything therefrom without a F. commits an ecclesiastical offence for which he may be criminally prosecuted in the ecclesiastical courts, and may be censured and condemned in costs. A person who, without the incumbent's consent, introduces anything into a churchyard for which the incumbent's consent without a F. is sufficient, is guilty of a similar offence and incurs a similar liability.

1. Definition and Scope.

A F. can be applied for either (i) to sanction some proposed change, or (ii) to order the restoration of what existed previously to some change made without a F., or (iii) to sanction a change made without a F.; in which last case it is called a confirmatory F. It is obtained from the CONSISTORY COURT of the diocese, but an appeal lies from the grant or refusal of a faculty by that court to the Court of Arches or Chancery Court of York, as the case may be, and thence to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It is generally applied for by the incumbent and churchwardens, with the addition sometimes of a certain number of the parishioners; but any member of the vestry may also apply for it. It can be opposed by anyone who is similarly connected with the parish. But no one outside the parish—not even the rural dean, or the archdeacon, or the bishop himself—has any right either to promote or oppose the grant. A F. will be granted as a matter of course to remove from a church an illegal ornament or piece of furniture, even though it was in the church at its consecration; and an application for a F. for an illegal ornament or piece of furniture will, as a matter of course, be refused. In other cases the grant or refusal of a F. is in the discretion of the court, which, however, is exercised in accordance with certain recognised principles. If the fabric of the church or soil of the churchyard is to be affected, the rector or incumbent in whom the freehold is vested must either join in the application or be given the opportunity of objecting to it, and his rights as the freeholder will not be set aside except for grave cause. As, however, he holds the freehold not for himself but for the benefit of the parishioners, his rights will not be allowed to override their manifest interests; and, except with regard to monuments, in respect of which they are not consulted, their opinion, as ascertained by a resolution of the vestry, or, in the case of a new ecclesiastical parish, of a meeting in the nature of a vestry, is always taken into consideration. It is not, however, absolutely conclusive; and, if the welfare of the parish appears to require it, the F. will be granted in spite of the opposition of the vestry, or will be refused in spite of their support of the application. Ground which has been consecrated cannot strictly be secularised except by Act of Parliament. But for the convenience of the parish a F. has been granted in suitable cases sanctioning its use for secular purposes. Thus, a F. has been obtained for throwing a strip of a churchyard into an adjoining road for the purpose of widening it, and for the construction in a churchyard of a building intended for purposes not wholly or strictly ecclesiastical, such as a vestry hall, a school, a mortuary, or even an electric lighting chamber. Where a new church is built under the Church Building Acts to take the place of an old church, a F. can be obtained, with the approval of the bishop, for the total or partial demolition of the old church; and in suitable cases a F. will be granted for the removal of a church to another site.

A F. for creating a private right, such as a pew or a vault, which has been obtained without fraud or misrepresentation, cannot be afterwards revoked; but the situation of the pew or vault may be changed by a subsequent F. And when a F. has been granted, the case for granting or refusing it will not be reopened. But, where an article has not been sanctioned by a F., a F. can at a future time, for good cause shown, be obtained for its removal. Where a pew or a vault has from time immemorial been in the possession of a certain family of parishioners or been used by the occupiers of a certain house in the parish, and has been kept in repair by them, a lost F. will be presumed to have been granted attaching it to that family or house. Similar Fs. are occasionally granted in the present day, but only in very exceptional circumstances, where it is clear that the general accommodation of the parishioners as regards sittings in church or grave-spaces in the churchyard will not be interfered with.

The mode of obtaining a F. is regulated by the rules and practice of the Consistory Court of each diocese and varies slightly in different dioceses. The exact procedure of the particular diocese can be ascertained from the annual diocesan calendar or directory or by inquiry at the diocesan registry. But it is everywhere commenced by a petition. If the removal of human remains is desired, it must be accompanied by a certificate of the medical officer of health that the removal will cause no risk to the public health, and the consent of the incumbent and churchwardens must be given. And if the remains are to be moved to unconsecrated ground, but not otherwise, the licence of the Home Secretary must also be obtained. The F. will then be granted in a proper case without any further publication of the proceedings or consent to them. In other cases the presentation of the petition is followed as a matter of course by the issue of a citation, unless the chancellor of the diocese considers that there are grave doubts whether the desired F. should under any circumstances be granted, in which case he hears the application in court before deciding whether or not the citation shall be issued. The citation is served personally on the incumbent and churchwardens, if they are not the applicants for the F., and is published to all the parishioners by being affixed on or near the church door for a definite time, usually including two successive Sundays. If a F. is applied for to remove something which has been introduced into a church or churchyard without a F., a counter-petition may be presented for a F. confirming the introduction without the necessity of a second citation, and a F. for removal or a confirmatory F. will be granted according to the merits of the case. The citation affixed at the church door summons all the parishioners to appear and object to the grant of the F. if they desire to oppose the grant. If they do not appear, and the application is supported by a resolution of the vestry, they will be presumed to be in favour of it. No one can afterwards complain that the alteration has been made without due notice or without ample opportunity having been given for objecting to it. If the incumbent or churchwardens refuse or neglect to give effect to a F., another parishioner may be empowered to carry it out.

3. Procedure.

The fees for a F. for alterations in a church or churchyard are fixed under statutory authority. In the case of an unopposed

4. Fees. F. for an alteration within the category of minor alterations enumerated by the chancellor of the diocese it is £2 2s. In other cases it is £4 14s. 6d. The fees for a private F. for a vault, a brick grave, or the removal of human remains, vary in the different dioceses. Where a F. is opposed, there may also be a court fee to be paid, and the costs incidental to obtaining it will be ordered to be paid by the parties applying for it or opposing it, according to the justice of the case, or they may be apportioned, or each side may be left to bear its own costs.—A4.

P. V. SMITH.

FAIR LINEN CLOTH.—It has been claimed that the covering of the Holy Table with a C. at the Euch. dates from apostolic times; there can hardly be said to be evidence for this, but certain it is that the custom has come down to us from remote antiquity. It is not always easy to be sure, when we read of this covering in an ancient writer, whether he refers to the "fair linen," or to the corporas, or to some other altar C.; at first it would seem that silk, cloth of gold, or some other precious stuff, was permitted to be used as the material of the altar cloths or the corporas, but eventually fine linen came to be considered the only stuff suitable for, at all events, the uppermost C. that covers the altar at the celebration of the Euch. This C. has varied in dimensions and arrangement according to the fashion of the time; no principle is involved in such details.

The direction in our rubric that the Holy Table at the time of HC is to be covered with a Fair Linen C. is in agreement with the use and wont of catholic antiquity.—R3.

T. I. BALL.

FAITH.—The necessity and importance of F. are frequently emphasised in the PB. From the very first the child is taught in the Cat. that he must "believe all the articles of the Christian F.," and our English word "believe" means "to esteem dear," implying that F. must come from the heart as well as from the head (A. W. Robinson); while an open profession of F. is made at the renewal of the Bapt. vows prior to Confirmation. F. is an essential requisite for the right reception of Bapt. and HC; this is taught in the Cat. and emphasised in the Short Exhortation of the Communion Service. In several of the Colls. we are taught to pray for F. and its increase, and the Eps. and Gospels inculcate the need and importance of it. In the VS the minister prays for the sick man that "the sense of his weakness may add strength to his F.," and teaches him that one object of sickness is that his "F. may be found in the day of the Lord laudable, glorious and honourable." Finally, in the Burial Service we pray that "we, with all those that are departed in the true F. of thy Holy Name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in thy eternal and everlasting glory." (Cp. GRACES, THE CHRISTIAN.)—K3.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

FAITHFUL.—The technical name for the baptised (πιστοί, fideles), as distinguished from catechumens who were also called Christians, though that title was denied to heretics. Similar titles are φωτισμένοι (illuminati), μεμνημένοι (initiati), and τέλειοι (perfecti). These alone were allowed to partake of the Euch., hence the latter part of the service after the catechumens were dismissed was called the missa fidelium. Similarly the Lord's Pr. was only allowed to the baptised, and was called the oratio fidelium (numerous quotations in Bingham's Antiquities i. 47). The 13th Art. of 1538, though largely based on the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, distinguished between the invisible Ch. known only to God, and the Congregation of all who are baptised and have not denied Christ nor are excommunicate; and the 20th Art. of 1553 and the 19th of 1563 define the visible Church as the "congregation of faithful men (coetus fidelium)" in this sense.

(DCA, art. Faithful; Ducange, Glossarium, "Fidelis"; Hardwick, Hist. of the Arts., pp. 19, 63, 263, 300, 386.)—A3. CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

FALDSTOOL.—(i) A movable chair for the bishop's use when away from his throne: mentioned as early as the 11th cent. (ii) A folding stool or desk used for prayer, e.g., by the sovereign at coronation. (iii) A low desk at which the Lit. and latter part of Communion Service are said when not read from the ordinary prayer desk. Originally the reader knelt before the Holy Table without support. The faldstool came into use as a matter of convenience, and is usually set at the entrance to the chancel (Joel 2 17). Its introduction for the Lit. dates from about 1600; e.g., the plan of Bishop Andrews' chapel shows the "faldistory."—R5. S. REDMAN.

FALL OF MAN. See ORIGINAL SIN.

FARSE.—Farse is the term used to denote a verbal interpolation into a liturgical text. The origin of farsing probably lay in the practical needs of the ecclesiastical musicians. For many cents. the liturgical melodies (see PLAINSONG) were handed down by oral tradition, such musical notation as was available consisting only of a series of signs (based upon the rhetorical accent marks) which merely served to remind the singer of the phrasing of a melody already committed to memory. The difficulty of memorising a long series of notes coming upon a single syllable seems to have been met by the interpolation of additional words as an aid to the memory. Thus the melody of Kyrie fons bonitatis, which runs thus:

Ky-ri-e e - - - lei-son.
was farsed as follows:

Ky-ri-e, fons bo-ni-ta-tis, Pa-ter in-ge-ni-te, a quo bo-na cunc-

-ta pro-ce-dunt, e-le-i-son a mode of treatment not unlike that involved in setting the same melody to the farsed form of Kyrie in our present PB:

Lord, have mer-cy up-on us:

and in-cline our hearts to keep this law.

Another and more serious type of liturgical interpolation is described under art. TROPE.—Q2.

F. BURGESS.

FAST.—By fasting was meant in ancient times either total abstinence from food, as on the two days bef. Easter, or a partial abstinence.

1. General. The latter usually implied eating nothing until evening, when a slight meal was taken. If this meal was restricted to bread and salt and water, as in Holy Week, the F. was called "xerophagy" (cp. Tertull., De Jej. 11). For the Fs. on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 3, 5. For other regular Fs. see ADVENT, EMBER DAYS, LENT, ROGATION DAYS, VIGIL. (For ethics see FASTING.) We may mention here some other Fs. in addition to these, in different parts of the Church. St. Athanasius (Apol. de fuga 6) refers to a F. immediately aft. Pentecost. In the Apost. Const. (520) this is postponed till after the Octave of Pentecost and lasts a week. In the West, in the 4th cent. we find a F. sometimes bef., but more usually aft., Pentecost (Duchesne, Chr. Wor., p. 285). And this seems to be the same as the Greek "Fast of the Apostles," which at different times has lasted for a week or up to June 29. The E. Syrians call the fifty days aft. Pentecost the Season (shābhū'ā) of the Apostles, but it is not a F. The Greeks have a fortnight's F. in August, called the F. of the Theotokos, Aug. 1-15 (Shann, Euchology, p. 519); this, perhaps, lasted at one time for forty days (DCA 1 662). The E. Syrians have "Rogations" (bā'wāthā) of three days each (Mon., Tues., Wed.), named "of Mar Zaya," "of the Virgins," and "of the Ninevites," respectively, following the second Sunday after Christmas, the first and fifth after Epiph.; but the first two are nearly obsolete. In the Testament of our Lord (122, 31) and the Arab. Didascalia (§ 38), we find special Fs. for bishops, three days a week, during the first year after their consecration, and the Testament gives a similar rule for presbyters. Fasting is often prescribed as a condition of penitence. It was forbidden on Sundays and in Eastertide; see FESTIVAL, § 23, and WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 2.

In the Roman Church at the present time there is a distinction between a F. and a day of Abstinence; on the latter, meals at any hour and in any quantity are permitted, provided meat be not eaten; on the former the quantity of food is restricted, in addition to meat being forbidden. This distinction, in England at least, is modern. In the PB Tables the terms appear to be interchangeable (DCA 19 f.; Staley, Liturgical Year, p. 172).

A F. bef. Bapt. is prescribed in the Didache (c. A.D. 120), for the candidates, for the baptiser, and for others.

2. Fast before Baptism. The principal early references are: Did. 7; Justin M., 1 Apol. 61; Tertullian, de Bapt. 20, de Jej. 8; Clementine Recognitions (4th cent. ?) 7 36; and most of the Church Orders which describe Baptism, appoint at least a one-day's F. (Maclean, Ancient Ch. Ord., ch. 8).

After the separation of Euch. and Agape, a F. bef. Communion was customary. It is implied in Tertullian, 3. Fast before Communion. De Orat. 19, and found in the Church Orders, viz., Test. of our Lord, 220, 23; Can. of Hippolytus 19 150-152, 28 205; Verona Fragm. of Didascalia, ed. Hauler, p. 117; Egyptian Ch. O. 58; Ethiopic Ch. O. 44. The classical passage is in St. Augustine, Ep. 54 8 Ben., ad Januar. (118 6): "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost that for the honour of so great a sacrament the body of the Lord should enter into the mouth of a Christian bef. other foods; for so is this custom kept throughout the world." The rule however had not quite the same stringency as in later times, and Maundy Th. was, in Africa at least, an exception (see HOLY WEEK, § 2); for some other exceptions see DCA 1418. It must also be observed that any difficulty of receiving the sacrament fasting was greatly alleviated as long as the practice of private reservation obtained. For this practice see Tertull., De Orat., 19, Ad Uxor. 25; Ambrose, Orat. de excessu fratris Satyri 143; Basil, Ep. 93, Ad Caesariam; Test. of our Lord 225 (cp. 122 where a daily Euch. is negatived); and elsewhere.

For Bibliography, see under FESTIVAL, § 42, List B.—C3.

A. J. MACLEAN.

FASTING.—By F. is meant, in a religious sense, voluntary abstinence from food rather than mere hunger and thirst (cp. 2 Cor. 11 27). Natural instinct or primeval revelation seems to have established this as a religious practice. The Jews ranked it with almsgiving and pr. Our Lord did not deny its value, nor condemn it as "a tradition of men," but laid down the rules of purity of motive, cheerfulness, and absence of ostentation (Matt. 6 16-18). The use of F. in the Christian Church has usually been referred to Matt. 9 15 (with parallels); F. in Mark 9 29 is probably a gloss.

Christians from the first seem without hesitation to have combined F. with pr. (Acts 13 2, 3, 14 23), and the practice is undoubtedly part of the continuous and universal tradition of the Church. The religious and ethical value of F. has been insisted on both by Catholic and Protestant writers. F. has been felt to be a natural expression of penitence, a tribute to the supremacy of the spiritual over the natural, and a means of checking the bodily desires and subjecting them to the spirit (FLESH); while to some temperaments it has proved a means also of cleansing the mind and rendering the soul more fit for pr. Devotionally it is an imitation of the life of Christ, and practically a help to charity and sympathy with the poor. In modern times F. may supply a much-needed protest against the encroachments of luxury in all classes, and the growing materialism of the age.

The Church of England before the Reformation kept with great strictness the seasons and days of F. which she had inherited from the primitive Church, and which were generally observed throughout Western Christendom, viz., the annual fasts of LENT, ROGATION DAYS and VIGIL, the quarterly fasts of the EMBER DAYS and the weekly fast of FRIDAY; WEDNESDAY being also observed in the East and SATURDAY in the West.

The revolt of Cranmer and his party against mediæval practices led, at the opening of the reign of Edward VI, to an open disregard of the fast-days. It was noted with amazement in 1547 that "the Archbishop of Canterbury did eat meat openly in Lent in the Hall of Lambeth." The period of licence, however, was brief. Statutes of 1549 and 1552 re-imposed, under severe penalties, the rule of abstinence from flesh on the usual fast-days. These enactments, in addition to explaining the religious reasons for F., and the duty of obedience to rulers in matters which in themselves are indifferent, urged the advantage that the use of fish would bring to English fisheries and seaports. The Homily on F. (1562) covers much the same ground.

Without doubt the ancient fast-days continued to be observed in some quarters at least. But it was not till the 17th cent. that they were tabulated and placed in the PB. The present table appears first in the PB of 1636, though it is found with slight variations in Cosin's Devotions (1627). After some discussion of the general question of seasons of religious F. at the Savoy Conference, the Table of Vigils, Fasts and Days of Abstinence was inserted in the revised PB of 1662. It follows the mediæval rule, except that Saturdays have disappeared.

In the 17th and 18th cents. the High Church school, preserving the spirit of the Caroline divines, continued to maintain the obligation of the fast-days. The existence of MS. "dispensations" shows that the duty was to some extent recognised by the laity. On the other hand, such a book as A Method of Devotion (1708), by Elizabeth Burnet, wife of the bishop, while upholding the value of F., limits its formal observance to days of special appointment, "not all those the Rubrick appoints, most of which by general Disuse cease to be of obligation." There are some characteristic allusions to fast-days in Pepys' Diary (e.g., Mar. and April, 1661). The Tractarian movement again drew attention to the rule of the PB. Careful and temperately written disquisitions on F. form Nos. 18 and 66 of the Tracts for the Times.

In the early Church a fast-day involved a literal abstinence from all food or drink till the ninth hour.

But there was no universal practice as to the quantity or quality of the one evening meal. Some ate flesh, others fish only, others again merely dry bread (Socrates, Eccles. Hist. 5 22). In the Middle Ages flesh was entirely forbidden, and in Lent even milk and eggs (St. Thos. Aq., Summa ii. 2 147). Only one meal was allowed, to which the later Middle Ages added a "collation." The modern Roman Church continues this strictness in theory, though in practice many relaxations are allowed. She also distinguishes between "fast-days" and "days of abstinence." On the latter, the quality, not the quantity, of food is restricted, fish being substituted for flesh. It is very doubtful whether such a distinction is intended by the PB Table. Though the difference between a more or less rigorous fast is very ancient, it is not probable that the words "Fasting" and "Abstinence" were discriminated in the 17th cent. None of the great Anglican writers of the period hints at any such distinction.

The practical question, how Churchmen to-day who recognise on fast-days, with George Herbert, that are to fulfil the obligation, is not easy, and often harasses tender consciences. The absence of any continuous use, and the unwillingness of bishops to give instructions, lead naturally to each man being a law to himself. The excessive number of fast-days in the Table, the conditions of modern life, the English climate, the impossibility of abstaining in most cases from flesh, the expensiveness of fish, are all considerations that call for some authoritative guidance, as to how far it is lawful to substitute other forms of self-denial for that physical F. which the Church originally intended. (For liturgical and antiquarian side of subject see art. FAST.)

"The Scriptures bid us fast; the Church says, now,"

DCA, art. Fasting; Collier, Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain; A Catholic Dictionary (Addis, Arnold & Scannell, 1897); George Herbert, The Priest to the Temple, 1630; Jeremy Taylor, Holy Living, 1630; The Whole Duty of Man, 1657; Tracts for the Times, 1833-41; F. W. Puller, Concerning the Fast before Communion; Vernon Staley, Days of Fasting and Abstinence (Transactions of St. Paul's Eccles. Soc.).—PE. A. R. WHITHAM.

FASTING COMMUNION.—That the Euch. was instituted aft. the Last Supper shows that its first recipients were not fasting ; and that it followed the Agape at Corinth when 1 Cor. was written 11 20-34) shows that in the earliest period FC. was neither the rule nor the practice. However, in Ac. 20 7-12, we find a meal (perhaps the Agape) following the "breaking of bread," an order which may have been introduced by St. Paul because of the disorders at Corinth. Thenceforward, as it seems, where the Agape was associated with the Euch., it followed Communion ; an exception being the case of certain Egyptians of the Thebaid in the 5th cent., who used to communicate on Saturday evenings aft. a plentiful meal, a practice mentioned with disapproval by the historian who records it (Socrates, HE 5 22). That the Euch. was celebrated early in the day is indicated in Pliny's Letter to Trajan, c. 112 (ante lucem) ; and an early hour became usual (cp. Tertullian, De Cor. 3, and Cyprian, Ep. 63 16). But on fast days it was postponed to a later hour (cp. Tert., De Orat. 19, and Peregr. Silviæ or Ethiopiæ, p. 61), the practice of communicating late on fast days and early on feasts showing plainly that FC. was the general habit of the Church. The earliest extant rule on the subject is in the Canons of Hippolytus (28 105), viz., "Let none of the faithful taste anything before he has partaken of the mysteries, especially on days of holy fast."

1. Early History.

The practice is alluded to in a famous passage of St. Augustine, Ep. 118 (54), ad Januarium. He had been consulted by Januarius (400) as to the propriety of the custom observed in N. Africa, of celebrating the Euch. on Maundy Thursday post coenam, as a reminder to the faithful of the circumstances of its institution. Augustine refuses to condemn this exceptional practice, on the grounds that rules of discipline vary in different localities, and that for non-fasting communion there was the precedent of the Last Supper. But he adds that the Church is not therefore to be reproached because of her general rule of fasting before reception : "Numquid tamen propterea calumniandum est universæ ecclesiæ quod a ieiuniis semper accipitur ? Ex hoc enim placuit Spiritui Sancto, ut in honorem tanti sacramenti in os Christiani prius dominicum corpus intraret, quam caeteri cibi : nam ideo per universum orbem mos iste servatur" ; and he suggested that this rule might even be traced up to St. Paul (1 Cor. 11 34). That is, Augustine recognises that there is no law of Divine institution on the subject,¹ but he alleges reverence for the Sacrament as the reason for the Church's law and practice (a consideration frequently urged in later times, e.g., by St. Thomas Aq., Summa, pars III, qu. lxxx, art. 8), while he admits the exception of Maundy Thursday. With Augustine's pronouncement should be compared the 29th canon of the 3rd Council of Carthage (397), which however only refers to the celebrant, viz., "ut sacramenta altaris non nisi a ieiuniis hominibus celebrentur, excepto uno die anniversario, quo coena domini celebratur." It is not necessary to rehearse later conciliar decisions (all decisions of local or provincial councils, only valid within their respective jurisdictions ; see Bingham, Antiquities xv. 78), or to illustrate the rule further from the Fathers, e.g., from Chrysostom (Ep. 125, ad Cyriacum) and Ambrose (Serm. 8 on Ps. 119), or to quote the Penitentials of the Anglo-Saxon Church. The general practice of the Church, both East and West, was uniform, and supported by Canon Law for a thousand years bef. the Reformation ; and the custom of FC. is still observed in the Roman and the Eastern Churches.

¹ This is admitted by writers of repute of all schools. Even Liguori lays down that "the natural fast required before Communion is not indeed of divine right, but only of ecclesiastical" (Theolog. Moral. vi. 3 278).

This custom was not avowedly repudiated or abandoned by the English Church at the Reformation.¹

2. In the Church of England.

The communions of the laity were infrequent, and in the 16th cent. people were accustomed to do much more bef. the first meal of the day than they now do before breakfast. It was only gradually, as it seems, that the rule of FC. was relaxed in practice, and the old Canon law fell into desuetude, the reason for relaxation being rather a change in social conditions than in theological preconceptions. In every period of the post-Reformation Church many persons indeed observed for themselves the strict rule, Bishop Jeremy Taylor and Bishop Sparrow being two notable examples in the 17th cent. ; and during the 18th cent. more than one manual of devotion recommends fasting bef. reception. But in the first half of the 19th cent. this rule was infrequently observed, and it was due to the Oxford Tractarians that it again became common. Nevertheless, the Oxford leaders were careful not to prescribe a rigid law. "I believe," wrote Dr. Pusey,² "non-fasting communion comes under our Blessed Lord's rule, I will have mercy and not sacrifice, and I feel sure that, if He were here, He would dispense with the custom Himself in many cases ; as of the weakly."

At the present day, by the stricter school of Anglicans, it is urged that it is not competent for individuals to set aside a custom so long and so widely observed as that of FC., and to ignore the precepts of Canon Law which have never been formally repealed. On the other hand, it is pointed out that canons of discipline are not like canons of faith. The latter may be inviolable ; the former depend upon circumstances. The Faith is matter of revelation : discipline is the enactment of the Church, and what the Church has said in regard to discipline she can unsay, if conditions change. And, for those who hold that Art. 34 covers the case of disciplinary traditions, the English Church is at liberty to relax the rule of fasting as she will. Even those who do not acknowledge that the individual can take the law into his own hands admit that it is legitimate for him to obtain a dispensation from fasting bef. communion, for cause shown, from his bishop. Again, circumstances have changed, and rules of discipline appropriate in the East in the 2nd cent. may not be reasonable in the West eighteen hundred years later. Tertullian speaks of a Christian woman, married to a heathen, who takes the Euch. secretly "before all other food" (ante omnem cibum), and this indicates the practice of FC. in his day. But it is not to be forgotten that at that period the faithful used sometimes to bring home particles of the consecrated species for private reception—a habit which would make FC. an easier matter than it is under modern conditions. Further, it may be reasonably argued that “Disuser” abrogates the obligation of law. Even if it be admitted that FC. was the rule of the English Church in the 16th cent., the widespread neglect of the law—a neglect public and unrebuked by ecclesiastical authority—for 300 years may be taken to indicate that the law is no longer binding. Following out such considerations as these, the Upper Houses of Convocation of Canterbury and York adopted careful Reports on the subject (in 1893 and 1899), in which, while the value to many of the habit as a spiritual discipline is recognised, it is distinctly laid down that to describe non-fasting reception of the Euch. as a sin is contrary to the teaching and spirit of the Church of England.

3. At the Present Day.

¹ Note in The King's Book, put forth in 1543, the reason given for fasting reception is in the words above quoted from Augustine.

² Spiritual Letters, pp. 273, 275 ; cp. also Bishop King's opinion cited in the Life of Archbishop Benson 2 522.

J. F. Keating, The Agape and the Eucharist (useful for the history of the Agape); Bp. John Wordsworth, The Ministry of Grace,

4. Literature. pp. 375 ff. (a valuable summary); Bp. Kingdon, Fasting Communion (a detailed argument against the permanent obligation of the rule); N. Poyntz, The Fast before Communion, and F. W. Puller, Concerning the Fast before Communion (both pleading for the dispensing power of the bishop, but the latter strongly advocating the fast in normal cases); H. P. Liddon, Evening Communions, with a postscript by W. Bright (being an answer to some of Dr. Kingdon's arguments); and the Reports of Convocation on the subject (reprinted in Evan Daniel, The Prayer Book).—pe, He.

J. H. BERNARD.

FATHERS.—Both in ancient and modern times the term “Fathers” has been used with some latitude of meaning. Strictly

1. The Term. speaking, it denotes the Church writers of the earlier centuries, more especially those who were famous teachers or champions of the Catholic faith. The following list contains the names of F. who for various reasons are of special interest to students of the PB, with their approximate dates and most important writings.

1. ANTE-NICENE.—Clement of Rome, c. 95; 1 Corinthians.—Ignatius of Antioch, mart. c. 115; Seven Genuine Epistles.—Polycarp of Smyrna, mart. 155; Philippians (c. 115).—Hermas of Rome, 100–140; Shepherd.—Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (100–130).—Justin, mart. c. 165; Apologies i, ii; Dialogue with Trypho the Jew.—Irenæus of Lyons, fl. c. 180; Against all the Heresies; Preaching of the Apostles.—Hippolytus of Portus, fl. c. 200; Philosophumena.—Clement of Alexandria, fl. c. 200; Protrepticus; Paedagogus; Stromateis.—Origen of Alexandria, fl. 203–254; works exegetical, critical, doctrinal, apologetic (specimens in the Philocalia, cent. iv).—Tertullian of Carthage, fl. 197–220; works apologetic, anti-heretical, ecclesiastical, ascetic and pro-Montanistic.—Cyprian of Carthage, mart. 258; tracts and letters, dealing with the great Ch. questions of the time.—Novatian of Rome, c. 250; De Trinitate.

2. POST-NICENE.—A. (Greek).—Eusebius of Cæsarea, d. 340; Ch. History (a treasury of early fragments and traditions); theological and expository works.—Cyril of Jerusalem, 315–386; Catechetical Lectures delivered at Jerusalem in 348.—Athanasius of Alexandria, fl. 325–373; De Incarnatione; Orations ag. the Arians; Letters to Sarapion; many other treatises bearing on the history and polemics of the Arian controversy.—Basil of Neo-Cæsarea, fl. 370–378; De Spiritu Sancto; Moralia; monastic rules; letters.—Gregory of Nazianzus, Bp. in Constantinople, fl. 378–390; homilies and orations, esp. the Five Theological Orations; poems.—Gregory of Nyssa, fl. 372–395; Catechetical Orations; dogmatic and controversial works. (The last three are known as “Cappadocians,” and hold an important place in the history of doctrine).—Epiphanius of Salamis, d. 403; Anchoratus, Panarion (anti-heretical works).—John Chrysostom (the Golden-mouthed), fl. at Antioch 381–398, at Constantinople 398–404, d. 407; homilies, expository and occasional; letters.—Cyril of Alexandria, fl. 412–444; commentaries; doctrinal and polemical works.—Theodoret of Cyrrhus, fl. 427–455; commentaries; Church History; doctrinal and polemical works; letters.—“Dionysius the Areopagite,” fl. cent. v–vi; anonymous author of mystical works (Heavenly hierarchy, etc., which, in a Latin form, influenced western mediæval thought—cp. SCHOOLMEN).—John of Damascus, fl. cent. viii; De fide orthodoxa (a summary of the dogmatic teaching of earlier Greek Fathers).

B. (Latin).—Hilary of Poitiers, fl. c. 360; De Trinitate; De Synodis; comm. on St. Matthew.—Ambrose of Milan, fl. 340–397; dogmatic treatises, esp. De fide, De Spiritu Sancto, De Mysteriis; comm. on St. Luke; hymns.—Augustine of Hippo, fl. 387–430; expositions, esp. the Tractatus in St. Joannem; sermons; letters; polemical writings, chiefly against Donatism and Pelagianism; De civitate Dei; De Trinitate; Confessions.—Jerome (Hieronymus, “Hierome”), fl. 383–420; commentaries; critical and polemical works; letters; the Vulgate Latin version of the OT and NT.—Leo the Great, Bp. of Rome, 440–461; Sermons; “Tome” on the Incarnation, read at the Co. of Chalcedon.—Gregory the Great, Bp. of Rome, 590–604; Pastoral Rule; Moralia (on Job); letters.—Bede of Jarrow, d. 735; History of the Church of the English race; commentaries.

The English Reformers constantly appeal to the Fathers as witnesses to the doctrine, discipline and practice of the ancient Ch., to which, on the whole, they desired to return. A like appeal was made by them in regard to

Ch. worship. Cranmer, who had been anticipated herein by Card. Quignon (see Quignon's words in Brev. Quignon i, ed. Wickham Legg, p. xx ff.), in his Preface to the PB of 1549 sends his readers to “the ancient fathers” for the original conception of the “Divine Service,” esp. in reference to the reading of Holy Scripture and the recitation of the Psalter. Similarly, in the Communion, the “Godly discipline” of “the Primitive Church” is the ideal at which the reformed Ch. should aim; and in the Ordinal “ancient authors” are cited as witnessing to the antiquity of the Three Orders, and “the ancient canons” as ruling the procedure at the consecration of a Bishop.

Direct reference to the Fathers in the PB are, from the nature of the case, less frequent. But in the 1549 postscript, “Of Ceremonies,” printed since 1552 after the Preface, it is noted that "St. Augustine in his time complained" (Aug., Ep. 55 35) of the multitude of ceremonies; and the same Father is quoted in Art.

4. Direct References.

29. on the incapacity of the wicked to partake of Christ in the Sacrament of His Body and Blood (Aug., Tract in Joann. 26 18, where however the Benedictine editors bracket certain words which were in the text used by the compilers of the Arts.). In Art. 6, Jerome (Prolog. in libros Salom.) is similarly cited to show the manner of acceptance given by the ancient Ch. to the Deutero-canonical books of the OT. The Prayer of St. Chrysostom is not, so far as we know, the work of that Father, nor is it even taken from the liturgy that bears his name, but comes from the liturgy of St. Basil.

Beside references, direct or indirect, to the works of the Fathers, the PB is full of patristic materials and reminiscences, which are recognised without difficulty by the instructed student. Thus the Gloria Patri will carry his thoughts back to Basil's De Spiritu Sancto (68 47); the Te Deum to the baptism of Augustine by Ambrose, with which the old legend connected it. In the A.P. Creed he will recognise the simpler Roman form of Justin's time, which it presupposes; the "Nicene" Creed is full of memories of more than one Ecumenical Council, and of the great Greek Fathers of the fourth century—Athanasius, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, and others; the Quicumque expresses the fervent faith of the Church of South Gaul in days when Arianism was again lifting its head. The Collects connect themselves with Leo and Gregory, and the troubles of their times; the Ember days recall Leo's sermons at Rome; the Rogation days and the Litany remind us of Mamertus of Lyons. In HC many of the features of this great service which were already familiar to Justin can be noted. The Sursum corda, "Preface," and Sanctus, are echoes of words heard in the African churches of St. Cyprian's day: the Gloria in excelsis was sung as a daily morning hymn in the East by the fourth century. This list might be extended almost indefinitely. Scarcely an office in the PB is without some prayer or action which the Fathers of East or West would recognise if they could enter our churches to-day.

5. General Indebtedness.

In two respects, however, the Fathers have found less consideration from the compilers of the PB than could have been wished.

6. Scant Mention: No Commemoration.

(a) They are scantily represented in the Calendar, and are not commemorated by name in the offices. The Calendar of 1549 exhibits no names of any but Biblical saints, and this precedent was generally followed in 1552 and 1559, exception being made in favour of St. George, St. Lawrence, and St. Clement (of Rome). In 1561, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners reinstated a considerable number of non-scriptural names, but without adding their days to the Table of Feasts, or providing any special services for them. The revision of 1662 gave also the names of St. Alban and Ven. Bede, but otherwise left the situation unaltered. Of the "black-letter" saints only eight can properly be called "Fathers" (St. Clement, St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine of Hippo, St. Jerome, St. Benedict, St. Gregory the Great), and not a single Greek Father, with the exception of the unknown

"Dionysius the Areopagite," appears in the English hagiology.

(b) The mediæval service-books of the Ch. of Eng. made use of the writings of the Fathers as lessons. The Sarum Mattins attached three lessons to each nocturn of Psalms, and when there were three nocturns, as on Sundays, the second and third systems of lessons were often drawn from patristic writings. Quignon reduced the number of lessons to the invariable number of three, and greatly diminished the patristic matter, and in this he was followed by Cranmer; the latter, after some fluctuations of judgment, in 1549 adopted the principle of ordering two lessons to be read daily both at Mattins and Evensong, one from the OT and one from the NT. This order had the great advantage of securing that all who attended the Common Prayer should hear the English Bible regularly read, but it did this at the sacrifice of much edifying exposition of Scripture and practical teaching drawn from the great writers of the ancient Church.—K2^a.

H. B. SWETE.

FEAST.—See FESTIVAL.

FEE.—See PROPERTY (CHURCH), § 8.

FELO-DE-SE (a felon upon himself) is one who deliberately destroys his own life. By eccles. law the F. is excluded from Christian burial; and formerly the coroner would direct his body to be buried in a public highway with a stake driven through it. Now, however, the F. may be buried in consecrated ground. (See BURIAL, § 2.)—Oa.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

FERIA.—The word F., in liturgical language, is used to signify any day which is not a Sunday or holy-day. Hence Ferial Office means week-day Office.—c6.

J. W. TYRER.

FESTIVAL.

- I. HISTORY AND MEANING, § 1-3.
- II. CHRISTMAS AND EPIPHANY, § 4-7.
- III. FESTIVALS IN OCTAVE OF CHRISTMAS, § 8-12.
- IV. FESTIVALS BETWEEN EPIPHANY AND EASTER, § 13-15.
- V. EASTER, § 16-20.
- VI. ASCENSION DAY, § 21.
- VII. WHITSUNDAY, WHITSUNTIDE, § 22-24.
- VIII. TRINITY SUNDAY, § 25.
- IX. SAINTS' DAYS, § 26-40.
- X. MICHAELMAS, § 41.
- XI. BIBLIOGRAPHY, § 42.

I. HISTORY AND MEANING. The object of this article is to discuss the history and meaning of the Christian Fs. without touching on the services appointed for them. In examining their history we shall do well to bear in mind that in some cases a day was determined as being the anniversary of an event bef. it was observed as a F. This was notably the case with Christmas. We must also notice that the existence of a Homily on an event in the Gospel story (e.g., on the Annunciation) does not necessarily imply that the event was commemorated by a F. at the time of the Homily. Moreover, it is well to remember that the authorship and date of many festal Homilies are uncertain, and that some of them are much later than their reputed writers. For want of bearing these cautions in mind some scholars have been led to antedate the Christian Fs. by several generations. For the sources of information on the subject see the lists of principal service books, martyrologies and calendars, and of modern works bearing on the subject, at the end of this article. Only those Fs. are treated here which appear in PB as Red-Letter days.

1. Preliminary.

The growth of the number of annual Fs. was at first very slow. Till the beginning of the 4th cent. we read only of Easter and Pentecost; these are the only Fs. known to Tertullian (e.g., De Bapt. 19, De Jejun. 14) and Origen (C. Cels. 8 22). No annual F. is mentioned in the Didache (c. A.D. 120) or in the Apostolic Church Order (3rd cent. ?); and in the older Didascalia (3rd cent. ?) only Easter. The F. of the Nativity (Christmas, Epiph.) was added c. 300. But it was not till towards the end of the 4th cent. that the festal cycle was developed. The Testament of our Lord (c. 350 ?) only knows Easter, Pentecost, Epiphany. But in the Apostolic Constitutions (c. 375) we have Christmas and Epiph. as separate Fs., and also Ascension day, the Apostles' days (pl.), St. Stephen and all Martyrs' day (or days ?), and a festival of St. James the Lord's brother (?) (5 8, 13, 8 33). There is an evident tendency in this book to increase the number of Fs., and to press their acceptance. This festal cycle agrees with that of St. Chrysostom (Hom. de B. Philogon. 3). The Pilgrimage of "Silvia" or of "Etheria" (c. 385) has only one Nativity F. (Epiph.), but adds to the list the Presentation, Palm Sunday, the fortieth day aft. Easter, and the Dedication or Holy-Cross Day; the Ascension, however, is commemorated on the day of Pentecost (see § 21 below). The Cappadocian fathers (represented by St. Gregory of Nyssa, In Laud. Frat. Basilii 1), and a Syriac Martyrology of c. 412, give us festivals aft. Christmas, namely, St. Stephen, St. Peter and St. Paul, St. James and St. John. But on the whole it is clear that annual commemorations grew more slowly than weekly ones (see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN). The method of the growth is illustrated by "Silvia," where we find an increasing desire to celebrate the events of our Lord's earthly life in the holy places themselves. In Jerome also we find an advocacy of the observance of Fs. (Comm. in Gal. 4 10).

When Christmas (or Epiph.) was established certain other Fs. followed in its wake, depending on the great feast for their date. Such were Purification, Annunciation, Nativity of St. John Baptist, and (later) Circumcision. To these we must probably add the Saints' days after Christmas (see below, § 8).

Saints' days other than those just mentioned seem at first to have arisen owing to a desire to commemorate the death day (dies natalis) of a martyr, or the translation of his relics (depositio, burial), or the consecration of a church dedicated to him. The Edessene Canons (c. 350) order a memorial of martyrs on their death days (can. 18). So in the 2nd cent. they commemorated the "birthday" (τὴν ἡμέραν γενέθλιον) of Polycarp (Letter of the Smyrnaeans 18); see also Cyprian, Ep. 12 (37) 2, and Basil, Ep. 93. Apostles' days were at first kept because they were, or were believed to be, martyrs. It is noteworthy that the earliest calendars have very few feasts of Apostles; the Leonine Sacramentary has only June 29 and Nov. 30; Philocalus has only June 29 and Feb. 22 (St. Peter's Chair). Days of Apostles who laboured outside the limits of the Roman Empire were not in the earlier period kept in the West (Kellner, p. 278). In Cal. Carthag. we have only St. John Baptist (June 24 and Dec. 27), St. Luke (Oct. 13), St. Andrew (Nov. 30 ?), St. Stephen (Dec. 26), St. James the Great (Dec. 27), Innocents (Dec. 28), and in June some unnamed Apostles, probably St. Peter and St. Paul; St. Luke is expressly called a martyr. Several of the Saints' days are accounted for by dedication Fs., which were common from the 4th cent. onwards; but the rise of a F. and its observance at a distance from its original home were often separated by a considerable interval. Many Fs. are of purely local origin.

It has been thought that originally groups of saints were commemorated, and that only at a later date individuals had days of their own. The evidence as a whole seems to be against this view; but there are many instances of grouping. The East Syrians commemorate the Twelve Apostles on the 7th Sunday aft. Pentecost (called Nusardél), and the Seventy (or Seventy-two) Disciples on the 7th Friday (formerly also on the 7th Wednesday); the Four Evangelists, the Greek Doctors (esp. Diodore, Nestorius, Theodore), the Syrian Doctors (esp. Ephraim and Narsai), and all the Departed, respectively on the 5th, 7th, 8th, and 10th Fridays aft. Christmas. This Church however provides lessons for some individual Fs. such as those of St. Mary, St. John Baptist, St. Peter and St. Paul, and St. Stephen (respectively the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 6th Fridays aft. Christmas), and a few Eastern saints; also for some Fs. on fixed days of the month—St. George (April 24), St. Thomas (July 3), Transfiguration (Aug. 6), Holy Cross Day (Sept. 13), besides Christmas and Epiph. It is a peculiarity of this calendar that most of the Saints' days fall on a Friday. It sharply distinguishes "feasts of our Lord" and "commemorations of saints." We find some instances of grouping in the Greek calendar also; thus, June 30 is "the Council of the Twelve Apostles." Perhaps this commemorates the building by Constantine of the Church of All the Apostles at Constantinople (Socrates, HE 1 16, 40). So Low Sunday among the Ethiopians is the F. of the Twelve; among the Armenians the 6th Saturday aft. Pentecost (DCA 1 109).

Fs. were in the 4th and 5th cents. marked by a cessation of work and of legal business and public games (see Apost. Const. 8 33; Socrates, HE 5 22; and WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 2).

In the Middle Ages Fs. enormously increased in number, and for convenience were divided into classes. In the Sarum books we have the following division: (1) Double feasts, subdivided into principal, greater, lesser, and inferior; (2) Simple feasts, subdivided into four classes, the first two of which had nine lessons, the last two three. Sundays were divided thus: principal, greater, lesser, and inferior; and ferias similarly had four divisions. The PB has chosen as suitable for proper Collects, Epistles and Gospels, besides Sundays, feasts of our Lord (including the two days aft. Easter and the two aft. Whitsunday), and the Fs. which are based on the NT, as also All Saints'. A Table of "all the feasts that are to be observed in the Church of England throughout the year," that is, of "Red-Letter Days," as they are popularly called, is prefixed to the PB. We notice that two of these were not Doubles in Sarum—the Conversion of St. Paul and St. Barnabas. On the other hand, many Sarum Doubles have been omitted from the Table: the Assumption, the Patronal F., the Dedication F. (Principal Doubles), Corpus Christi, Visitation of BVM, Feast of Relics, the Holy Name, Nativity of BVM (Greater Doubles), Easter Wed., Whitsun Wed., Invention of the Cross, Transfiguration, Exaltation of the Cross, St. Thomas of Canterbury, Conception of BVM (Lesser Doubles); St. Gregory, St. Ambrose, St. George, St. Augustine of Canterbury, St. Augustine of Hippo, St. Jerome, Translation of St. Edward (Inferior Doubles). St. Mary Magdalene (July 22), a Simple in Sarum, was a Red-Letter Day in 1549; it was altogether omitted in 1552, probably because of the erroneous identification in the Gospel for the day of the Saint with the sinful woman of Luke 7 36 ff.; and it was only reintroduced as a Black-Letter Day in 1604. For the classification in the Sarum Brev. see Procter and Wordsworth's edition, 2 462 ff. The 1662 calendar (Sealed Books) prints in red "K. Charles, Martyr" (Jan. 30), "Charles II, Nat. & Ref." (May 29), and "Papists' Conspiracy" (Nov. 5). Services for these days are referred to but are not given in the Sealed Books (ed. Stephens, 3 239). In the Amer. PB the Transfiguration (Aug. 6) is a Red-Letter Day.

SUNDAY. (See WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 2.)

II. CHRISTMAS AND EPIPHANY. These were originally one F., the former being Western, the latter Eastern; both were at first

4. Christmas and Epiphany. intended for the commemoration of the Nativity. The principal names for Christmas are Nativitas (Natalis, Natalitia) Domini; in Ap. Const. ἡ γενέθλιος (5 13) or ἡ τῶν γενεθλίων ἑορτή (8 33); γενέθλια; in Modern Gk. τὰ χριστούγεννα; Syr. Beith Yalda; old Eng. Noél (as Fr.) and Yule; Gaelic Nodhlaic; Welsh Nadolig; Ger. Weihnachtsfest (from the vigil). The principal names for Epiph. are Epiphania, etc.: ἡ ἐπιφάνεια, τὰ ἐπιφάνια, τὰ θεοφάνια (or φανία), τὰ ἅγια φῶτα (from the baptismal ceremonies), etc.; Syr. Denha or Beith D. (also E. Syr. "The new waters"); old Eng. also Twelfth Night; Fr. Le jour des rois; Dutch Drie-koningen-dag; Welsh Ystwyll = Stella.

No tradition seems to have been preserved as to the day of our Lord's birth. The present dates of these two Fs. are due to calculations based partly on the supposed year of the Crucifixion, and partly on a strange exegesis as to the exact length of our Lord's earthly life. The most notable calculation was that of Hippolytus (c. 220), Bishop of Portus (?) near Rome, made in order that the Christians might be independent of the Jewish Paschal computations. Hippolytus used a cycle of 16 years (Eusebius, HE vi. 22). He calculated a lunar year at 354 days or 11½ days less than the average calendrical solar year. He therefore interpolated every eight years three months of 30 days each (for $8 \times 11\frac{1}{2} = 90$), and putting two eight-year periods together produced a cycle of 16 years. He had determined that A.D. 29 was the year of the Crucifixion (as indeed was not improbably the case); and using his cycle he arrived at Friday, Mar. 25, as the day of the Crucifixion. As a matter of fact, the calculation was wrong; the lunar day is approximately 354 d. 9 h., and this alone would have made his cycle at fault. Yet this erroneous calculation is the foundation of our Christmas. For Hippolytus held (by a curious exegesis) that our Lord's earthly life must have lasted an exact number of years. Fractions were held to be imperfections, not to be expected in the life of the Saviour of the world. Hippolytus, therefore, fixed the Annunciation, as the beginning of the Incarnation, at Mar. 25, the Crucifixion having taken place (as he held) on the 32nd anniversary of it; and then, reckoning nine months from this day, he arrived at Dec. 25 for the day of our Lord's birth (see his Commentary on Daniel 4 23, ed. Bonwetsch). But the observance of Dec. 25 as a F. is not found for some considerable time after Hippolytus.

The calculation just described was not the only one in the early Church. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 1 21, in Ante Nic. Chr. Lib. p. 445) gives the 28th year of Augustus on 25 Pachon, according to some, but on 24 or 25 Pharmuthi according to others, for the Nativity; the Egyptian month Pachon began on April 26, Pharmuthi on Mar. 27 (DCA 2 135). The author of the treatise de Pascha Computus, § 18 (A.D. 243), formerly included in Cyprian's works, arrived at Mar. 28. The Acts of Pilate gives Mar. 25 for the Passion (perhaps deriving the date from Hippolytus); and this would lead to Dec. 25 for the Nativity. But the most important calculation for our investigation (next to that of Hippolytus) is that of the sect of Montanists mentioned by Sozomen (HE 7 18), who fixed on April 6 as the day of the creation of the sun, and celebrated Easter on that day if it was a Sunday, or, if not, on the following Sunday. The meaning seems to be that they fixed on April 6 as the day of the Crucifixion. Reckoning on the same principle as Hippolytus, the Annunciation would have taken place on April 6, the birth of Christ on Jan. 6. We thus arrive at the choice made in the East for the day of the Nativity. The links which we do not possess are the name of the originator of this last calculation, and the secret of his influence on the East. It is easy to understand how Hippolytus' date spread in the West, as he was the most learned man of his time. It does not amount to more than a great probability that the calculation of April 6 brought about the Eastern date for the Nativity.

But in the 3rd cent. there is no trace of the observance of any day as the festival of the Nativity. In the 4th cent. the festal observance of Dec. 25 spread in the West, that of Jan. 6 in the 6. Early Observance.

East. The former date is found, probably as a feast, in the Philocalian Calendar, A.D. 354 ("Natus Christus in Bethleem Judae"). The fact that the heathen F. of the sun fell on the same day would probably lead to the Christianising of the occasion, and to the laying of emphasis on Christ being the Sun of Righteousness, though the heathen F. was not the reason for the choice of Dec. 25. We hear of Jan. 6 being observed as a F. earlier. It is mentioned in the Acts of Philip of Heraclea (A.D. 304; Ruinart, Acta Sincera 2, p. 410). It is found in the Testament of our Lord, apparently as of recent introduction (above § 2), in the Edessene Canons, 6 (c. 350), in Epiphanius (Haer. 51), "Silvia" (see above, § 2), and other 4th cent. writers, who do not know any other F. of the Nativity, and who call it by the Eastern names: Epiphany, Epiphanies, Theophanies, Denha. On this day both the birth and the baptism of our Lord were commemorated; see Cassian, Conf. 10 2 (c. 400), who says that in the West the two commemorations were separated. Even in the 6th cent. Cosmas Indicopleustes says that the Nativity and Baptism were commemorated on the same day at Jerusalem (Migne, Patr. Gr. 88 197). There is some indication that Gaul was Eastern in this respect during the 4th cent. (DCA 1 617 b); and probably also Spain (see ADVENT, § 1).

The reason for the celebration of the Baptism and Birth together may probably be found in an exegesis parallel to that of Hippolytus. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 1 21) seems to imply that Jesus was baptised on his 30th birthday; cp. Lk. 3 23. It is curious that we find an earlier instance of the commemoration of the baptism than of the birth of our Lord. The followers of Basilides in the 2nd cent. celebrated the former with a vigil (Clem. Alex., l.c.).

Towards the end of the 4th cent. the West and the East made mutual concessions. The West adopted Jan. 6 (with its Eastern names) in addition to their own date; and the East (but only slowly) adopted Dec. 25 in addition to Jan. 6. Almost the first instance of this accommodation is found at Antioch. St. Chrysostom, writing in 386, says that the Western F. had only been adopted at Antioch less than ten years before (In Diem Natalem 2 355A., ed. Montfaucon). At the same date the Apostolic Constitutions, a Syrian work, gives both days; of Epiph. it says that the Lord then manifested his own Godhead (5 13). At Constantinople both Fs. were first observed by Gregory of Nazianzus in 379. At Alexandria the change took place rather later, but bef. 432, when Paul of Emesa preached there on Dec. 25 (DCB 4 262). Thereafter, the East commemorated the Birth on Dec. 25 and the Baptism on Jan. 6; and this is the present custom. But the Armenians stand alone in observing Jan. 6 only; this is their festival of the Nativity. In the West the adoption of the double F. was universal, except among the Donatists, in St. Augustine's time (see his Sermons on the Epiphany, esp. 102 Ben.). Both are given in Polemius Silvius (A.D. 448) and in the Carthaginian Calendar, c. 500. At the Epiph. however the West laid the chief emphasis not on the Baptism but on the coming of the Wise Men. This may have been due to St. Augustine's influence. His six sermons on the Epiph. are entirely taken up with the latter event. Yet other manifestations of our Lord's glory have, but in a much lesser degree, been dwelt on in the West (and so now in PB)—namely, the Baptism, and the Marriage at Cana as the beginning of miracles and the manifestation of the glory of Jesus (Jn. 2 11). Polemius Silvius mentions both events and also the magi. We also more rarely find the Feeding of the Five Thousand commemorated. In the East Epiphanius speaks of the Miracle at Cana occurring on or about Jan. 6 (Tybi 11) and of its being sometimes repeated on the anniversaries of the day (Haer. 51 29 f.; 1 451, ed. Petavius).

Both the Roman and Sarum missals have three masses for Christmas, as there were three stationar masses said in Rome on that day, at 7. Liturgical Sta. Maria Maggiore, Sta. Anastasia, and St. Peter's. In Sarum the services are headed "At Cockcrow," "At Dawn," "Third Mass." In 1549 two celebrations were provided for, with separate Collects, Epistles and Gospels, and the Irish and Amer. Prayer Books have reverted to this plan.

Epiph. was a season for baptism in the East, though not so frequently as Easter or Whitsuntide; Gregory of Nyssa's Orat. de Bapt. Christi, and Ephraim's Hymns on the Epiphany (Nic. and post-Nic. Fathers, p. 272) are perhaps early instances of this. Both are intended for this F., and in both the newly baptised seem to be addressed. Epiph. was less often chosen for baptism in the West, but see some instances in DCA 1 688. The Russians and Greeks have the custom of blessing the waters on this day, a custom of long standing (ib. 620). The E. Syrians bathe in the middle of the night before the Epiph. Liturgy. Gregory of Tours says that bathing in the Jordan at Epiphany was the custom of those who lived near that river, in memory of Christ's baptism (De Gloria Martyrum, 1 88).

III. FESTIVALS IN OCTAVE OF CHRISTMAS. In a large number of calendars festivals occur in the week

8. Festivals after Christmas. Dec. 25-Jan. 1. It will be convenient to tabulate them as follows:

PB (Roman, Sarum): Dec. 26, Stephen; 27, John Ev.; 28, Innocents; Jan. 1, Circumcision.

Present Greek: Dec. 26, Council of Mother of God; 27, Stephen; 29, Innocents; Sun. aft. Chr., Joseph, David, and James the Lord's brother; Jan. 1, Circumcision.

Old Mozarabic, 10th or 11th cent. (see JTS 11 73): Dec. 26, Stephen; 27, Eugenia and companions; 28, James the Lord's brother; 29, John Ev.; 30, James, brother of John.

Syriac Martyrology, c. A.D. 412: Dec. 26, Stephen; 27, James and John; 28, Peter and Paul.

Carthaginian Calendar, c. 500: Dec. 26, Stephen; 27, "John Baptist and James the Apostle whom (quem) Herod slew"; 28, "the holy Innocents whom Herod slew."

Armenian: Dec. 25, James the Lord's brother and David; 26, Stephen; 27, Peter and Paul; 28, James and John; for the Armenian Christmas see § 6; Jan. 7, Stephen (the double commemoration approximates to the double Christmas-Epiph. observance).

East Syrian: Fridays after Christmas, (1) James the Lord's brother (observance obsolete); (2) Mary; (3) John Bapt.; (4) Peter and Paul; (5) Four Evangelists; (6) Stephen (see above, § 2).

There is other evidence of Fs. connected with Christmas. St. Gregory of Nyssa says that at the time of the funeral of his brother, St. Basil, who died Jan. 1, 379, they were commemorating Stephen, Peter, James, John, Paul (In Laudem Fratr. Basil., ad snit.). In Rome, up to the 7th cent., Jan. 1 was observed as a commemoration of St. Mary (cp. Greek and East Syrian above; in Martyr. Hieron. Jan. 18, at Toledo Dec. 18, were kept as the F. of the Virgin). In the Apost. Constitutions (c. A.D. 375) St. Stephen's Day is mentioned (833) and "Blessed James the Bishop" is associated with Stephen (58); and, though it is not explicitly stated, these commemorations probably followed Christmas. The reason for the association of these Saints' days with Christmas is not very plain. Durandus' explanation that St. Stephen, St. John, and the Innocents represent the three kinds of martyrdom (in will and deed, in will but not in deed, in deed but not in will) does not suit the history of the days as given above, and is clearly an afterthought. It has even been conjectured that the association is purely accidental, as it is found among the Armenians, who do not keep Dec. 25. But this hardly seems probable.

St. Stephen is found in all the authorities tabulated in § 8; also in the Calendar of Polemius Silvius, and in the Coptic 9. St. Stephen, and Ethiopic Calendars; but not in Leonine Sacram., which gives St. John and Innocents. Other dates are found, perhaps commemorating the alleged discovery of relics at Caphar Gamala, near Jerusalem, A.D. 415, and their translation to Jerusalem; or the alleged translation of the relics from Jerusalem to Constantinople, A.D. 312 ('sic,' Gk. Cal., Shann, p. 519). The Armenians and Greeks and the Leonine Sacramentary commemorate St. Stephen on Aug. 2, the Copts on Sept. 12, the Ethiopians on Oct. 14.

In the older authorities some other saints are associated with St. John; in E. Syr. the other three Evangelists; but more usually his brother St. James. There is, however, much confusion between the various Johns and Jameses of the Gospels.

In the Missale Gothicum (JTS 10 590) Dec. 27 is called "Natalis Apostolorum Johannis et Jacobi"; and in Cal. Carthag. John Baptist and James, "whom Herod slew," are commemorated on Dec. 27, an obvious but well-reasoned error. A Sacramentary of the 8th cent. has "John Apostle, and James of Alphaeus the Lord's brother," on Dec. 27; the Senlis Sacram. (9th cent.) has John, Apostle and Evangelist, on Dec. 27, and "Ordination to the Episcopate and death of James the Apostle, brother of the Lord," and John Evangelist on Dec. 28 (JTS 10 591); and the "Ambrosian" has John Evang. on Dec. 27, and "Ordination of James" on Dec. 29; the Mart. Hieron. has both on Dec. 27 (ib., p. 592). For the old "Mozarabic" see above; but as the oldest Mozarabic service book, the Orationale Gothicum, has no service for the two Jameses, these names must have been added to the Mozarabic calendar between the 7th and 11th cent. (W. C. Bishop, in JTS 11 73). The Breviarium Gothicum has James the Lord's brother on Dec. 29, and the son of Zebedee on Dec. 30. In the course of time both the Jameses dropped out in the West; and among the Greeks John also, though they commemorate his decease on Sept. 26. The F. of St. John on Dec. 27 is not connected with the Roman F. of St. John outside the Latin Gate, May 6, which commemorates the story of the Oil (Tertullian, De Praescr. 36), and which is found in the Missale Gothicum but not in the older forms of Mart. Hieron.; the Greeks apparently commemorate the incident in their festival of St. John on May 8.

Innocents (in old Eng. Childermas). This probably took the place of the commemoration 11. Innocents of Peter and Paul in the West, as that was made on June 29 (below, § 34). It is found in Cal. Carthag.; before that the children (Innocentes, Infantes) were commemorated at Epiph. (DCA 1 840a): in the Lectiary of Silos, not on Dec. 28, but on Jan. 9 ("Allisio Infantium").

The Octave of Christmas has commemorated the Circumcision of our Lord, in the Gallican rite from the 6th cent., in Rome from the 7th cent. (see above), in Constantinople from the 8th cent.; it is so found in Charlemagne's Calendar, c. 781. In Gaul it was made a fast, in order to counteract heathen orgies on that day. The rule of the PB that the Coll., etc., is to last till Jan. 5 dates from 1637 (Scottish Liturgy); in 1552 the same rule only applied to an intervening Sunday. In Sarum the intervening days were occupied by the Octaves of St. Stephen, St. John, and Innocents, and by the Vigil of the Epiph., the last having also a memorial of St. Thomas of Canterbury. The present rule is liturgically inappropriate, and might well be superseded by the provision of a special Coll., Epistle and Gospel.

IV. FESTIVALS BETWEEN EPIPHANY AND EASTER. Purification (Feb. 2), also called Candle-

12. Purification. mas, Gk. ὑπαπαντή or ὑπαρτή, lit. "the meeting" (of Simeon and Jesus, and so old Lat. Hypapante (Bede, Usuard); first found in "Silvia" at Jerusalem at end of 4th cent., doubtless due to the wish to commemorate the event on the spot. "Silvia" calls it "Quadragesimae de Epiphania"; it necessarily fell on the fortieth day after the Nativity F. (Lev. 12 2, 4), and therefore in "Silvia," as now among the Armenians, on Feb. 14. It was introduced into Constantinople by Justin, c. 526, or Justinian, c. 541; and probably, c. 600, into the West by the Emperor Maurice, who is said also to have introduced the Annunciation and the Nativity and Departure of the BVM. These festivals came to Rome first and thence passed into the Gallican rite (Duchesne, Christian Worship, p. 273). The Purification and Annunciation are not kept by the East Syrians. The name Candlemas comes from the processions with candles customary on this day, probably in remembrance of Lk. 2 32.

Annunciation (Mar. 25), also called Lady Day; Lat. Annuntiatio BMV. or Ann. Dominica (Sarum); Gk. εὐαγγελισμός. For the date, see § 5 above. It was a Constantinople F., probably introduced into Rome c. 600 (see above, § 13); mentioned in the Paschal Chronicle, c. 620 (?). Up to the 7th cent. Jan. 1 seems to have been the only festival of St. Mary kept in Rome. The Trullan Council (A.D. 692) allowed no other F. than this in Lent (can. 52); mass was only to be said in Lent on Saturdays, Sundays, and on the Annunciation; on other days the Liturgy of the Presanctified was to be used. But the Council of Toledo (656?) fixed it on Dec. 18, so as not to interfere with Lent (can. 1). In the Greek calendar it is as PB. The E. Syrians do not observe it, perhaps because of its clashing with Lent. In Sarum, if this feast fell on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday of Holy Week, it was observed; if later in the week, it was transferred. This may be the annual memorial of St. Mary (μνήμη τῆς θεοτόκου) which the Palestinian monks kept c. 500 (Kellner, p. 227; he thinks that Aug. 15 is referred to).

Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quinquagesima. These are the three Sundays bef. Lent; the last is exactly 50 days bef. Easter, but the other two are named loosely. About the 7th cent. stationary masses for these days were instituted at Rome (Duchesne, Chr. Wor., p. 244). Although the season bef. Lent is not a fast, it has a solemn character as preparatory to the Great Fast. For the Carnival, see LENT. In "Silvia" (6 1, 3) the name Quinquagesima (or "Quinquagesimarum dies") is used for Pentecost, i.e., for the fiftieth day after Easter; and so the Council of Tours, A.D. 567 (can. 17). The Sarum Brev. forbids the Te D. from Septuagesima to Easter (ed. Procter and Wordsworth, 1 493).

MID-LENT SUNDAY, PASSION SUNDAY. See LENT.

PALM SUNDAY. See HOLY WEEK.

V. EASTER. The principal names for the F. are: Lat. Pascha, Dies Paschatis (or Paschae),

16. Names of Easter. Dominica Resurrectionis, Festum festorum; Gk. τὸ πάσχα (whence Fr. pâques; the name derived from Aram. כֶּסֶף, Heb. כֶּסֶף, "Passover," though erroneously thought by many older writers to come from πάσχειν), also ἱερὴ πασχαλῖος, ἡ ἀναστάσιμος or πάσχα ἀναστάσιμος, κυριακή μεγάλη, ἡ πασχαλία or τὰ πασχαλῖα (Procter-Frere, p. 540); Modern Gk. also ἡ λαμπρά; Syr. "Feast of the Resurrection," "the Great Feast," also Peskha (not E. Syr., see below); Germ. Ostern; Gaelic Càisg; Welsh Pasg. "Easter" is from Anglo-Sax. "Eostre" the goddess of spring. The word Pascha in earlier Gk. ecclesiastical writings has more than one meaning. Sometimes it means the season ending on Easter Day, as in several of the Church Orders (Maclean, Ancient Ch. Ord. 8 3). Thus the Testament of our Lord speaks of the "forty days of Pascha," meaning Lent (so some MSS. of Apostolic Canons 69), and of the "end of Pascha" being at midnight of Easter Even (2 8, 18, 12). So in the Apost. Constitutions (5 13, 18) we read of "the holy week of Pascha," "the fast of Pascha," "the days of Pascha." On the other hand, the name often means one day: usually Easter Day; occasionally Good Friday, later called π. σταυρώσιμον to distinguish it (see § 17); and among the East Syrians Maundy Th. Tertullian uses the name both in the sense of a single day (De Cor. 3, De Orat. 18) and of a season (De Jejun. 14).

Tertullian uses the phrase "the day of Pascha" in the sense of "Good Fr." He clearly takes "Pascha" as being derived from πάσχειν, for he says that "the Lord's Pascha is the passion of Christ" (Adv. Jud. 10); the name is connected with "the days when the Bridegroom was taken away" (De Jejun. 13). The principal event commemorated was the death, not the resurrection, of Christ. The "day of Pascha" was a general fast (De Orat. 18) called also Parasceve (De Jejun. 14). Saturday in Pascha was a fast day (ib.). We might have conjectured, were it not for contemporary history, that Tertullian did not observe the Sunday at all. Yet there is inconsistency in his language. For directly "the day of Pascha" is over there is joy and no fasting till Pentecost (De Cor. 3: "a die Paschae in Pentecosten"), though the Saturday was a fast; and Pascha affords the best day for Bapt., aft. which Pentecost (the fifty days) is a most extensive season for it (De Bapt. 19). Bapt. was never administered, as far as we know, on the Friday, but in the night between the Saturday and Sunday (see below, § 19). Hence we may probably draw the conclusion that Tertullian observed both the Friday and the Sunday, that he laid most stress on the observance of the Friday, and that he was inconsistent in applying the phrase "the day of Pascha" to both, though he usually used it of the Friday.

This leads us to ask what was the event commemorated in the F. of Pascha? Although the matter is not quite clear, the evidence seems to point to the custom, at least in some places, of our Lord's death and resurrection being commemorated on the same day in the ante-Nicene period, and even later, the commemoration being preceded by a fast of shorter or longer duration (see LENT). The Quartodecimans (below, § 18) seem to have had this custom. They probably laid stress on the Death rather than on the Resurrection, for Nisan 14, though it might have been the day of the Crucifixion, could not possibly have been the day when our Lord rose. That they did not commemorate the Resurrection on Nisan 16 is seen from the fact that they ended their fast on Nisan 14 (Eusebius, HE v. 231). The Tübingen theory was that they commemorated, not the Death of our Lord but the Last Supper, on Nisan 14. It is quite probable that they commemorated the Last Supper on the same day that they commemorated the Crucifixion and Resurrection; for, according to Eastern reckoning, in which the day begins at sunset, the Last Supper and Crucifixion took place on the same day, namely, on the Friday. We find also some evidence of the double commemoration on one day among those who kept the Sunday. This may be the case with some at least of the Church Orders, where the preparation for the Sunday Paschal observance consists, among other things, of a two-days' absolute fast; for leave is given to sick people who cannot fast two days to omit the Friday fast and to abstain only on the Saturday. This could hardly have been the case if the Friday had been the commemoration of the Passion. And (e.g., in the Testament of our Lord) the description of the Friday tells us of the preparation of the candidates for Bapt., but does not mention the death of our Lord.

On the other hand, Origen (C. Cels. 8 22) speaks of the observance of the two events on two separate days, for we can hardly otherwise understand the words, "We are accustomed to observe certain days, as for example the Lord's Day, Parasceve, Pascha, Pentecost" (note the simplicity of the festal cycle). The "Parasceve" must be Good Fr., for had Origen meant every Friday he would also have mentioned Wednesday, as (if we may trust Rufinus' translation) he does elsewhere (Hom. in Lev. 10 2).

Another still more curious result of historical investigation is the possibility of Easter not having been observed at all as an annual festival in some parts of the Church in the first two centuries. It may be that the weekly commemoration of the Resurrection was thought to suffice (see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 2). Certainly the Apostles continued the observance of the Jewish Passover (Ac. 20 6); but did Gentile Christians at once convert it into the Christian Easter? The Apostolic Fathers and Justin do not mention it. The Didache refers to Sunday and the fasts on Wednesday and Friday and bef. Bapt., but not to Easter; and if it were not for the accounts of the Paschal Controversy we might have suspected that Easter was not kept at all till towards the end of the 2nd cent. This would, however, be a mistake; it was kept at Rome c. 120 (see below, § 18), and the Quartodecimans relied on St. John for their custom. But it is quite probable that the observance of Easter was not universal till the latter half of the 2nd cent., or at any rate that it had not till then attained its subsequent supreme importance.

(a) Many discussions about Easter arose in the 2nd cent., the chief authorities for which are Eusebius (HE v. 23 ff.), Socrates (HE 5 22), and Sozomen (HE 7 19). It was disputed whether Easter should be celebrated always on a Sunday, or always on Nisan 14, whatever day of the week that might be. The latter practice was that of the Christians of Asia Minor, nicknamed 'Quartodecimans,' τεσσαρακαιδεκαίται. There were three stages of the controversy. First, c. 150, Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, and Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, differed on the subject, but (in consequence of Polycarp's visit to Rome) agreed to do so in a friendly spirit, and Anicetus allowed Polycarp to celebrate the Euch. at Rome as a mark of respect; for such is the only probable meaning of Irenæus' words preserved by Eusebius (loc. cit.). We next hear of the dispute as arising at Laodicea in Phrygia, c. 170; for this Melito of Sardis (quoted by Eusebius, HE iv. 26) is our authority. Melito seems to have been a Quartodeciman; he wrote a book On Pascha, which Clement of Alexandria apparently answered in a work with the same title. The controversy culminated in a bitter discussion between Victor of Rome and Polycrates of Ephesus, c. 190. Synods were held to overcome the opposition of the Quartodecimans. Polycrates, on the other hand, with the "Asiatic" bishops, maintained his position, citing the Apostles Philip and John as authorities; his letter is given by Eusebius. Victor excommunicated all "Asia" (the Roman province), as Socrates tells us, but probably the excommunication was ineffectual, for Eusebius only uses the phrase "endeavoured to excommunicate." The other churches, though disagreeing with the "Asiatics," did not approve of Victor's harsh measures. Irenæus, Bishop of Gaul, came forward in a character suited to his name, as a "peacemaker," and it is to his letter to Victor (in Eusebius) that we are indebted for the information about Polycarp and Anicetus. The rule of observing the Sunday gradually spread, and the other practice was latterly limited to a few separate communities, who however (as Sozomen tells us) lingered on till the 5th cent. The Roman usage was confirmed at Nicaea, and the bishops of "Asia" were among those who there agreed to it.

(b) The difficulty of determining Pascha led to varieties of usage not only bef. but even aft. Nicaea. Some, like the authors of the older Didascalia and the Canons of Hippolytus, trusted to Jewish computations. Others enjoined independence (cp. Apost. Const. 5 17); as early as the beginning of the 3rd cent. Hippolytus and others had made calculations so as to make independence of the Jews possible (above, § 5). Before the Nicene Council Antioch represented the former, Alexandria the latter class. The Alexandrian Church probably invented the nineteen-years cycle which, somewhat modified, is still in use. Nicaea decided in favour of the Alexandrians.

(c) Of great interest to us is the controversy in Britain on Easter. The Celtic Church was not Quartodeciman; and bef. Nicaea Rome used the cycle which for long was in use in Britain. But the improvements due to the spread of astronomical knowledge, and especially to the labours of Dionysius Exiguus, whose results were published 527 and were accepted at Rome soon afterwards, did not reach these islands. Hence, when Augustine and his successors arrived, they found that the native Church was observing Easter on a different day from themselves. The evil example of Victor was followed, and the violent accusations of heresy hurled at the head of the Celtic bishops only made them more tenacious of their old method of reckoning. By a historical blunder they adduced St. John's example for their practice. It was only aft. many generations that the truer Roman method of reckoning was accepted.

Whatever other days or seasons might be added, Easter was pre-eminently the usual time for Bapt. in the early Church, though Tertullian (De Bapt. 19) says that every day is fit for Bapt.; if there be a difference in the solemnity, there is none in the grace conveyed. The accepted candidates (competentes) had been prepared in Lent; and after various ceremonies, such as bathing on Maundy Th., being exorcised and signed with the sign of the cross or "seal" on the Saturday, and (as a rule) after a two days' rigorous fast, they were baptised at cock-crow on Easter Day. The Easter Euch. was the occasion of their first communion. On leaving the baptistery they were brought to the bishop in the church for confirmation clad in white, then communicated, and in some churches fed with milk and honey. The white robes were worn for a week, until Low Sunday ("Dominica in albis," sc. depositis; ἡ κυριακή ἐν λευκοῖς). This period of eight days is called by St. Augustine "octo dies neophytorum" (Ep. 55 ³² Ben., ad Januarium). In the 5th cent. the Church in Thessaly would baptise at no other time, and consequently many died unbaptised (Socrates, HE 5 ²²). The Council of Agde or Agatha (South Gaul), A.D. 506, ordered baptisms to be eight days before Easter (can. 13). For a detailed description see the present writer's Ancient Church Orders, c. 6.

18. Paschal Controversies.

19. Baptism at Easter.

The PB of 1549 provided two celebrations for Easter Day and so do the Irish and Amer. Prayer Books.

Sarum provided a mass for each day of Easter Week. But there was a tendency to limit the general holiday to three days, as at the Council of Constance, A.D. 1094; and this perhaps influenced our Reformers in providing special Epistles and Gospels for Monday and Tuesday only, besides Easter Day. The E. Syrians call this octave the "Week of Weeks," and the Sunday aft. Easter "New Sunday." They provide for Eucharists on each day except the Saturday. On Eastertide, see further below, § 23, 24, and OCTAVE. For Easter Even, see HOLY WEEK, § 4.

VI. ASCENSION DAY (ἡ ἀνάληψις or ἡμέρα ἀναλήψεως). This F. is not mentioned till the latter half of the 4th cent., when we find a sermon for it by Eusebius of Emesa (not by his earlier namesake of Caesarea, see DCA 1 ¹⁴⁵); and it is mentioned by Epiphanius (2 ²⁸⁵, ed. Petavius), Ephraim, Chrysostom, Gregory of Nyssa (in the title of whose sermon the day is called ἐπισκοπή, i.e., apparently, "an extra F.") and in Apost. Constit. (5 ²⁰, 8 ³³). It is not found in the Testament of our Lord or in the earlier Church Orders. Augustine says that it was universal in his time, and that, like the anniversaries of the Passion, Resurrection, and Descent of the Spirit, it came from the Apostles themselves or from plenary councils (Ep. 54 ¹, Ben., ad Januar.)—a strange statement in view of its recent introduction. Socrates (HE 7 ²⁶) says that all the people of Constantinople assembled in the church of a suburban village named Elaea to celebrate this F. Antioch had a similar custom (Chrys., Hom. in Ascen. 1). There is evidence that in some places the Ascension was commemorated on the same day as the Descent of the Holy Spirit, on Whit Sunday. This is the arrangement in "Silvia" and in the best reading of the Edessene Canons (can. 9; c. A.D. 350). It is curious that, though in "Silvia" the fortieth day was observed ("quadagesimarum dies"), yet it was on the fiftieth day that the Ascension lection was read. Probably this was like the custom forbidden at Elvira in Spain (c. A.D. 305, can. 43), which ordered all to keep the day of Pentecost, some MSS. adding a gloss, "non quadagesimam." Ephraim says that the Ascension F. coincided with the Feast of the "Champions," i.e. (?) martyrs (Nisibene Hymns 630). In his Hymns on the Nativity 3, Ascension, Easter and the Nativity are called the "three feasts of (our Lord's) Godhead." In his first Epiph. hymn (v. 11) the Epiph. is said to be the thirteenth day since Jesus ascended, a type of Jesus and the Twelve; the meaning is obscure. At Rome there was a custom of blessing beans on Ascension Day (Duchesne, Chr. Wor., p. 183). For the preparatory fast, see ROGATION DAYS.

VII. WHITSUNDAY, WHITSUNTIDE. The principal names for this F. are Pentecoste, Dies (Dominica) Pentecostes; πεντηκοστή; 22. Whitsuntide. Ger. Pfingsten; Gaelic Cuingeis; Welsh Sulgwyn = White Sunday.

The derivation of "Whitsunday" is probably from "White Sunday" (Skeat), and the name is due to bapt. associations (below, § 24); the derivation from "Pfingsten" is unlikely, as is that (found in the 14th cent., Procter-Frere, p. 546) from "Wit-Sunday," suggested by the gift of the Spirit. The PB has only the forms "Whitsunday," "Whit-Sunday," "Whitsun Week." The last probably stands for "White-Sunday Week." "Whitsun Monday" (not found in PB) would then stand for "White-Sunday Monday." In the PB preparatory Tables the name Pentecost is retained. For "Silvia" see above, § 15.

Pentecost is one of the two earliest Fs. of the Church, dating at least from Irenæus, who is quoted by Pseudo-Justin in Quaest.

23. History. et Respons. ad Orthodoxos 115.

It is mentioned frequently in the 3rd cent. and onwards. But the name "Pentecost" is used in two senses: either as the fiftieth day after Easter, when the Descent of the Spirit is commemorated; or as the season of fifty days from Easter to Whitsunday, which we call "Eastertide." Tertullian uses the word in both senses (De Bapt. 19, De Cor. 3). The authorities which forbid kneeling and fasting in Pentecost (see below) use the name in the latter sense; cp. also Origen, C. Cels. 8 ²²; Antioch in encanensis, can. 20 (A.D. 341); Apost. Canons 37. Basil (De Spir. S. 27 ⁶⁶) speaks of "the seven weeks of Pentecost." But at Elvira (c. 305) we read of the "Day of Pentecost" (can. 43), and this seems to have been the usage of Irenæus (as above). In Apost. Const. 5 ²⁰, 8 ³³, both usages are found. Kneeling and fasting were forbidden in "Pentecost" (Eastertide), in contrast to St. Paul's practice recorded in Acts 20 ³⁶, 21 ⁵; the authorities for this are Tertullian, De Orat. 23, De Cor. 3; Nicaea, can. 20; Testament of our Lord 2 ¹² (cp. also 1 ²⁸, 34); Basil (loc. cit.); Apost. Const. 5 ²⁰; "Silvia" 6 ¹; Cassian, Inst. 2 ¹⁸; Augustine, Ep. 55 ³² Ben. (119 ¹⁷) ad Januarium.

Pentecost was one of the favourite seasons for Baptism, especially in the West; Augustine (Serm.

24. Observance. 272 Ben., ad Infantes) has left us a homily preached to the neophytes on the "day of Pentecost" about the Euch. The vigil service had special reference to Bapt. But this is probably merely because the Baptisms at Easter became so numerous that they had to be postponed to Easteride, which, as we have seen, was called Pentecost. The day of Pentecost had at first no special connection with Bapt. Tertullian says (De Bapt. 19) that, after Pascha, Pentecost is a most "extensive space" (read latissimum, not laetissimum) for Bapt., as the season when Jesus appeared to his disciples.

Public games were forbidden in this season by Theodosius II, A.D. 425. Whitsun-week is mentioned in Apost. Const. 520. In the Sarum Missal a mass is provided for each day of it; our Reformers limited the propria to the first three days, as at Easter (see above, § 20). Whitsun Friday is called by E. Syrians "Friday of Gold," and commemorates Acts 3 6.

VIII. TRINITY SUNDAY. The Octave of Pentecost is observed in the West as the feast of the

25. Trinity Sunday. Holy Trinity, summing up the teaching of the preceding half year with its cycle of anniversaries of our Lord. It was so first kept by Stephen, Bishop of Liège, A.D. 902-920; and was enjoined by Pope John XXII for universal use A.D. 1334. Another favourite day for a "votive mass" of the Holy Trinity was the Sunday bef. Advent. The Greeks observe the Octave of Pentecost as All Saints' Day (see below, § 40), and call it αγίαση των Αγίων πάντων. It is not observed by the E. Syrians for either purpose. The Sundays which follow, up to Advent, are named in PB as in Sarum "aft. Trinity"; but in the Roman books they are named "aft. Pentecost."

IX. SAINTS' DAYS. (All these are found in the Sarum and the present Roman Calendars as PB.)

(a) St. Andrew (Nov. 30), a F. of nearly universal observance from the 6th cent., the

26. St. Andrew. traditional day of the Apostle's martyrdom; found in Leonine Sacram. and Cal. Carthag.; Gk. as PB, but not kept by E. Syrians. In the Gothic Cal. (c. A.D. 390?) Nov. 29. The translation of the saint's relics, together with those of St. Luke, to the church of the Apostles at Constantinople took place on Mar. 3, A.D. 357, and was observed there on that day (Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 7, gives the year but not the day); elsewhere on May 9, or (Mart. Hieron.) on Sept. 3. The dedication of his basilica at Rome was on Nov. 3; his "ordination" as Bishop of Patras was commemorated on Feb. 5 (Mart. Hieron.).

(b) St. Thomas (Dec. 21). This F. perhaps began in the East and spread to the West; why this day was chosen is not known.

27. St. Thomas. It is not in Cal. Carthag., or in Leonine, Lctionary of Luxeuil, Miss. Gothicum, Orat. Goth.; but it is found on Dec. 21 in the later Gregorian, the Mozarabic, and in Mart. Hieron. The Greeks commemorate St. Thomas on Oct. 6, the E. Syrians on July 3 (a great F.). The Apostle's relics were said to have been translated to Edessa on Aug. 22, 394

(Edessene Chronicle). Socrates (HE 4 18) says that there was a magnificent church of St. Thomas at Edessa. An extant homily, formerly ascribed to St. Chrysostom, was probably preached in this church c. A.D. 412.

(c) St. Stephen, (d) St. John, (e) Innocents. See above, §§ 8, 9, 10, 11.

(f) Conversion of St. Paul (Jan. 25), a comparatively late F.; not in the Gelasian or in earlier Gregorian; it is found in

28. Conversion of St. Paul. Ado and Usuardus. The two oldest recensions of Mart. Hieron. have on this day, "Translation of St. Paul at Rome," perhaps referring to the carrying of the relics from the catacombs to St. Paul's basilica in the time of Constantine (Kellner, 288). But when the F. spread the Conversion was the idea attached to it (see below § 34 and also § 8 above). Pope Innocent III ordered it to be observed in the diocese of Worms as it was in Rome, A.D. 1198; it was adopted in Cologne by Abp. Conrad von Hochstaden, 1260. The Sexagesima mass in the Sarum and Roman Missals was in honour of St. Paul, who is mentioned as "doctor gentium" in the Collect.

(g) St. Matthias (Feb. 24), not in the Gelasian or in the older Gregorian, but found in the

29. St. Matthias. Mozarabic and in Mart. Hieron., etc.; Gk. Aug. 9 (Shann gives "Matthew" by error), Ethiopic

Mar. 4. Before the Reformation it was kept on Feb. 25 in leap year. The day a.d. vi kal. Mart. was kept twice in those years, which therefore were called "bissextile." A similar rule is found in the 1549 PB, where it is said that Feb. 25 is counted in leap year for two days, and its psalms and lessons are to be used twice; but in that book Feb. 24 is St. Matthias. So also in 1552, 1559; but in 1561 and 1604 St. Matthias was ordered to be kept in leap years on Feb. 25, and Feb. 23, 24 to be duplicated. The present arrangement dates from 1662. On date of St. Matthias see Wheatly, On Book of CP v. 28 5.

(h) St. Mark (April 25). Origin unknown; the Gregorian, Bede, Usuardus, and Gk. as PB, and so the old Byzantine Calendar

30. St. Mark. (which also gives Jan. 11). But the F. was not in the Western or Constantinople Calendars till the 9th cent. The Mart. Hieron. gives Sept. 23 as the day of his death at Alexandria; the Neapolitan, Coptic, Basilean, May 17; the Paschal Chron., Mar. 26. (See ROGATION DAYS.)

(i) St. Philip and St. James (May 1). These two saints are joined together only in the West;

so the Roman books from the 31. St. Philip and St. James. Gelasian onwards; not in the Mozarabic or most ancient Gallican.

This F. commemorates the rebuilding of the church of the Holy Apostles in Rome (originally erected c. 350), and its rededication on this day to these two saints, c. 561. St. Philip had already been commemorated on May 1 (Lib. Pont. 1 306, ed. Duchesne). But it is difficult to say why in the rededication of the church

St. James was associated with him. The Mart. Hieron. mentions a F. of Philip at Hierapolis, in Phrygia; and the Gothic Calendar gives under Nov. 15, "Philip, Apostle in Hierapolis." The F. of May 1 is not in the Gk. Calendar, which commemorates the Apostles separately: (a) Philip, Nov. 14 (Armenian, Nov. 17); we notice some confusion between the two Philips in the calendars as in early Christian literature, largely due to the word "Apostle" being used in a wide sense; (b) James, Oct. 9 ("son of Alphaeus") and Oct. 23 ("the brother of God"). Here these two Jameses are separated, but usually for calendrical purposes the son of Alphaeus may be taken as one with the Lord's brother, however untrue the identification may be from a historical point of view.

(h) St. Barnabas (June 11), probably an Eastern F., brought to the West before the 8th cent. It is in Bede (June 10) and the Neapolitan Calendar; in the Gk. Calendar also (see below, § 36).

There was a tradition that St. Barnabas was stoned by the Jews at Salamis in Cyprus on June 11 (c. 64); but more probably this is the date of the finding of his supposed relics in 488, when the discovery was used to support the ecclesiastical autonomy of Cyprus against the claims of Peter the Fuller. Cyprus had been declared autonomous at Ephesus in 431. This F. was omitted by error in the calendar of the 1552 PB, which nevertheless had the propria for the day.

(i) St. John Baptist (June 24). This F., unlike most other Red-Letter Saints' days in PB, commemorates the Nativity and not the Death. It is found in the Gk., Coptic and Ethiopian calendars. The date depends on Christmas, Dec. 25 (Lk. 1 26), and therefore its origin is probably Western. It is kept on June 24 rather than June 25, because the former date is a.d. viii kal. Jul., while Dec. 25 likewise is a.d. viii kal. Jan. This confirms the Western origin. It certainly was observed at the end of the 4th cent., as Augustine shows that Jn. 3 30 agrees with the astronomical fact that days decrease after June 24 and increase after Dec. 25 (Serm. 287 4, Ben.); it is found in Cal. Carthag., but it is not in Apost. Const. (c. 375), and probably it had not then reached the East. The feast of the Nativity of St. John is mentioned at the Council of Agde or Agatha, in South Gaul, A.D. 506 (can. 21).

Other Fs. of the Baptist are found in several calendars. For the Christmas commemoration see above, § 8; Gk. also on Jan. 7 ("The Council of the Baptist John"); Armenian on Jan. 14, and so probably a Tours calendar of 5th cent. (Perpetuus). The Beheading (decolatio) of the Baptist (Aug. 29) was a F. brought from Constantinople to Gaul and thence to Rome; Gelasian and Gk. as PB. The Mart. Hieron. gives Aug. 30, and so the Coptic and Ethiopic, which however also give a commemoration of the Baptist on Aug. 29. Other days are the Finding of the Head of the Baptist, Feb. 24 (Gk., Copt., Eth., cp. Sozomen, HE 7 21); Conception of John, Sept. 23 (Gk. and some Western martyrologies); Imprisonment of John, Aug. 24, etc.

(m) St. Peter (June 29). This is one of the oldest of the Saints' days, being found in the Philocalian Calendar, A.D. 354; we find against coss." (so Ruinart exactly). Prudentius, c. 405, alludes to the F. of the day of the death of these two Apostles (Peristeph. 12). St. Peter and St. Paul were always associated together on this day till the Reformation (see also above, § 8). The F. undoubtedly commemorates the translation of the bodies of the Apostles to the catacombs in 258. There was a tradition, probably founded on this translation, that they died on the same day, though Augustine and others distinctly say in different years (see Lightfoot, Clement 2 499 f., who remarks that "Ostiense" must be an interpolation by a scribe who knew that in his time St. Paul was buried on the Ostian Way). The F. of June 29 was adopted at Constantinople bef. the end of the 5th cent., and so the Gk. and Armenian calendars now. It is not in the Apost. Const. It was probably in Cal. Carthag. (see above, § 2), and is found in all later Western martyrologies and calendars. In the Roman and Sarum books June 30 is marked as a commemoration of St. Paul. The church of the Apostles at Constantinople was rebuilt and rededicated on June 29 by Justinian in 550, and this increased the popularity of the F. in the East. The E. Syrians (who do not keep June 29) have an obsolete F. of the two Apostles on July 29 (cp. Aug. 1, St. Peter's Chains?) as well as the Christmas commemoration (above § 8), and the Armenians keep both June 29 and Dec. 27. For the tradition of the association of the two Apostles in Rome: cp. Dionysius of Corinth (in Eusebius, HE ii. 25); Caius (ib.), who says that in his time, c. 200, their bodies rested on the Vatican and on the Ostian Way respectively; Tertullian (C. Marc. 4 5, De Praescr. 36). Cosin tried unsuccessfully to restore the name of St. Paul on June 29.

34. St. Peter. this day "Petri in catacumbas et Pauli Ostiense Tusco et Basso

There are several other Fs. of St. Peter. Polemius Silvius has "Depositio SS. Petri et Pauli" on Feb. 22; so the Lectinary of Silos (which also has June 29). This elsewhere in Gaul was the F. of "St. Peter's Chair"; Philocalus has "viii Kal. Mart. Natale Petri de Cathedra"; it never was an Eastern or African F.; if it fell in Lent it seems to have been observed earlier, on Jan. 18. The Gk. Calendar has also "Bonds of Peter" on Jan. 16; this is not the same as the Roman F. (so PB) of St. Peter ad Vincula (also called Lammus) on Aug. 1.

At Rome there was a custom on June 29, as at Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas, for all the Cardinal Presbyters to celebrate the Euch. with the Pope; so that they "simultaneously consecrate the body and blood of the Lord" (Ordo Romanus 1 48; ed. Atchley, p. 149).

(n) St. James the Great (July 25). The date can have no reference to the day of the martyrdom, which took place just before the Passover (Ac. 12 1 ff.). That would be a very inconvenient date for the F., and others were substituted in different countries. The F. of July 25 is not in the Gelasian or the early Gregorian, and first

35. St. James
the Great.

appears in the 9th cent. St. James is not commemorated separately by E. Syrians. Other dates are: April 30, Greek, W. Syrian and Coptic (Coptic also April 12); Feb. 4, Ethiopic; May 25 and Nov. 15, Neapolitan. See also above, § 8.

(o) St. Bartholomew (Aug. 24). Probably an Eastern F., brought to the West not before the 8th cent. In the Greek Calendar St. Bartholomew is commemorated with St. Barnabas on June 11, but on Aug. 25 we read, "Recovery of the relics of the Apostle Bartholomew," apparently the translation of the relics by the Emperor Anastasius to Daras on the borders of Mesopotamia, A.D. 500. The Mart. Hieron. has a double entry; on June 13, assigning the Apostle's death to Persia, and on Aug. 24 to India. Not E. Syrian; Armenian, Feb. 25 and Dec. 8; Ethiopic, June 17 and Nov. 19.

(p) St. Matthew (Sept. 21). A late F., not in the Leonine or Gelasian Sacramentaries, the Orationale Gothicum, nor in the earlier Gregorian. It is found in the Ambrosian, Mozarabic, Mart. Hieron., Bede, etc. Other dates are: Nov. 16, Greek, Armenian, Coptic; Oct. 9, Ethiopic, Coptic; Aug. 30, Coptic. Not E. Syrian.

(q) St. Luke (Oct. 18). This F. is found in the Gregorian Sacram. and in the Greek Calendar; it is on Oct. 19 in the Ethiopic, and 38. St. Luke. so in Bede (Auctaria); on Oct. 13 in Cal. Carthag. St. Luke's relics are said by St. Jerome to have been taken to the church of the Apostles at Constantinople, A.D. 357, together with those of St. Andrew. See above, § 26.

(r) St. Simon and St. Jude (Oct. 28). The association of these two Apostles is Western only, though we find some confusion between them in Eastern Calendars. The reason of the choice of Oct. 28 is unknown. The various calendars give the following dates. The Greek has: May 10, Simon Zelotes (so Basilean), identified in the Menaion with Nathanael; June 19, Jude the Lord's brother (so Basilean); Aug. 21, Thaddaeus. The Basilean also has: April 29, "Simon who is called Jude"; May 29, the Apostle Jude. The W. Syrian lectionary has: May 10, Simon; May 16, Jude. The Coptic has "Jude Thaddaeus" (cp. Basilean) on May 20. The Neapolitan has: May 16, Jude; July 1, Simon and Jude; Sept. 10, Passion of Simon, Apostle. The F. is not in the E. Syrian, Leonine, Gelasian, old Gallican, or in the older Gregorian; but it is in the Ambrosian and Mozarabic and in Comes Hieron. The Ethiopic and Coptic Calendars have "Nathanael the Canaanite," on July 10; the Armenian has Simon on Sept. 28.

(s) All Saints (Nov. 1). This is a very interesting F. as illustrating the development of religious thought. Originally it was a

40. All Saints. martyrs' F. (see above, § 2), possibly in the wider sense of the word which included confessors who were not actually put to death for the Name. The temple erected at Rome B.C. 27 and called "Pantheon" (πανθεῖον, also πανθεον), dedicated, probably, not to "all the gods" (for the name seems to mean rather "very sacred"), but to the gods of the seven planets, was consecrated as a Christian church by Boniface IV on May 13, 609 or 610, under the name of St. Mary and all Martyrs (Sancta Maria ad Martyres). In addition to this day, Nov. 1 was kept in the Pantheon as a F., c. 800; and—perhaps because of the convenience of pilgrimages—this day soon ousted the other one and became the annual F. of All Saints. It was introduced into the Frankish Empire by Louis the Pious, A.D. 835. Before the 9th cent. we can trace the change from "All Martyrs" to "All Saints." Gregory III dedicated a chapel in St. Peter's to "all Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors and all the just and perfect who are at rest throughout the whole world," c. 735 (Lib. Pont. 1 417). This F. had no octave in Sarum; it has one in the Roman books. In the 10th cent. it was supplemented by the observance of the following day as All Souls. The Greeks keep the Sunday after Pentecost as All Saints' Day (see above, § 25). This was in the same way a development of an All Martyrs' F., of which we read in Chrysostom (Encomium on all the Saints who were martyrs in all the world, Migne, Patr. Gr. 50 706 ff.) and Apost. Const. 8 33.

X. MICHAELMAS. Dedications of churches to St. Michael were common from the time of Constantine onwards; and the various Fs. no doubt commemorate in this case such dedications. This is the case with the F. of Sept. 29 (so found in the Gelasian), which is noted (on Sept. 30, however) in the Leonine as the dedication of a church of the Holy Angel in the Via Salaria, six miles from Rome, in the 5th cent. The F. spread in the West, and in England King Æthelred, A.D. 1014, commanded its observance with vigil and three days' preparatory fast; the Council of Mainz (can. 36), A.D. 813, also ordered its observance ("dedicatio S. Michaelis"). But it is not in the Gallican books.

The Greeks and Copts keep Nov. 8 ("Michael, Gabriel and all Angels," also called ἑορτὴ τῶν ἁγίων), doubtless the date of the dedication of St. Michael's church in the baths of Arcadius, near Constantinople (Sozomen, HE 2 3). The Greeks also have Fs. of the Angels on Mar. 26 and July 13; the Copts on April 7, June 6-8, Aug. 5, Sept. 9, Dec. 8; the Ethiopians keep the 12th day of each of their months in honour of the Angels; and the W. Syrian lectionary has Sept. 6. The E. Syrians have no such F. Other days in the West commemorate alleged manifestations of angels—on Mount Garganus c. A.D. 495 (May 8); and at Mont St. Michel in Normandy ("in Monte Tumba") c. A.D. 710 (Oct. 16)—and dedications of churches in those places.

XI. A. ANCIENT AUTHORITIES FOR INFORMATION IN THIS ARTICLE.

(a) Sacramentaries, Missals, etc. Leonine (6th cent., Roman); Gelasian (7th cent., combination of Roman and Gallican); Gregorian (8th cent., Roman, but has a Gallican supplement, by Alcuin?); Missale Gallicanum Vetus, c. 700; also Gallican Masses in Mone's Lat. u. Gr. Messen, 1850—of about the same date; Orationale Gothicum (see above 42. Bibliography. § 10; it contains the Colls. for all the Brev. services; published by Bianchini in Liturgia Ant. Hispanica, Gothica... Romae, 1746; Missale Gothicum, c. 700 (from Autun?, contains some Roman elements); Missale Francorum, c. 700 (Roman, with some Gallican rubrics); Stowe Missal, c. 628; Mozarabic, Sarum, and Roman Missals and Breviaries.

(b) Calendars. Philocalus, A.D. 354 (Roman; given in Ruinart, Acta Martyrum Sincera, ed. 2, p. 617, and Migne, PL 13); Polemius Silvius, Bp. of Sion 435-455 (Gallican; see Mommsen, Corp. Inscr. Lat. 133); Gothic, c. 390 (a fragment, given in editions of Ulfilas and in Wordsworth, Min. of Gr. p. 65); Carthaginian, c. 500 (given in Ruinart, p. 618, and Migne, PL 13); of Perpetuus, Bishop of Tours (Migne, PL 71 566); of St. Geneviève, c. 800; Neapolitan, 9th cent.; Basilean (of Basil II, Porphyrogenitus), 10th cent.; Coptic and Ethiopic (see Ludolf, Ad suam histor. Eth. commentarius, 1691); East Syrian (see Maclean, E. Syr. Daily Offices, 1894); the present Greek calendar (see Shann, Euchology, 1891).

(c) Lectionaries of Silos and of Luxeuil, both 7th cent.; Comes Hieronymi, 7th or 8th cent. (Western); West Syrian, 11th cent.

(d) Martyrologies. Syrian (originally Arian), A.D. 412 (the list abridged at Edessa from 4th cent. calendars of Nicomedia, Antioch, Alexandria; published by W. Wright, 1865-6, in Journ. of Sac. Lit.); Hieronymian, c. 600 (composite, made up of older Eastern and Western lists, compiled in Gaul; critically edited by De Rossi and Duchesne: from this the later Western Martyrologies derive); Bede, 731 (Migne, PL 94); Wandelbert, who versified Bede, 848 (Migne, PL 121); Ængus the Culdee, c. 850 (?) (edited by Whitley Stokes, HBS); Ado, Bishop of Vienne, 858 (Migne, PL 123); Usuardus, monk of St. Germain des Prés, Paris, 875; Rabanus Maurus, Archbishop of Mainz, c. 850 (Migne, PL 110); Notker Balbulus, monk of St. Gall, c. 895 (Migne, PL 131); Gorman, 12th cent. (ed. Whitley Stokes, HBS).

B. MODERN WORKS (a few only need be mentioned). Smith and Cheetham's DCA, passim; Hastings' Dict. of Christ and the Gospels, art. Calendar, the Christian; Duchesne, Christian Worship, its Origin and Evolution 8 (Eng. tr., 1903); Wordsworth, J., Ministry of Grace 7, 8 (1901); Achelis, Die Martyrologien, 1900, with full Review of the same by Abbot Butler in JTS 2 447 ff.; Staley, The Liturgical Year, 1907; Maclean, Ancient Church Orders 8 (1910); Kellner, Heortology (Eng. tr., 1908); Pullan, Christian Tradition, 1902; Dowden, The Church Year and Calendar, 1910.—C2. A. J. MACLEAN.

FINANCE, CHURCH.—Very little reference to the financial side of the Church's operations

1. Implied in PR. occurs in the Book of Common Prayer. This is not unnatural. The volume is essentially a manual of devotion, and references in it to matters financial would only be expected to occur incidentally. At the same time the Church organisation which the Book of Common Prayer constantly assumes to exist presupposes, among other requirements, some consistent financial system. For example, it is assumed that every parish has its "curate," its "clerks," its "choir," and often its deacon or assistant curate. It assumes the "ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof" are provided in each parish. Further, it assumes the existence of a diocesan organisation with all that that involves. All this assumed organisation necessarily carries with it some adequate provision for its maintenance. The "curate" must be provided for. The ch. fabric, with ornaments of the ch. and of the ministers, cannot be maintained without expense. The Diocesan machinery must necessarily make its financial demands.

When the PB was compiled, these financial necessities pressed but lightly in the Ch., no

2. Earlier Provision. doubt. Endowments were general and generous, benefactors were numerous, the obligation of supporting the Ch. was commonly recognised, and the system of CHURCH RATES came in to supplement deficiencies. But circumstances have now largely changed, and the growth and extension of the Church's responsibilities and activities create financial demands unknown in past days. It has come to be clearly recognised that the Church's financial system must stand on a sound basis on modern lines, if present-day necessities are to be adequately met. To accomplish this is the function of CF.

Organised CF. starts with insisting that a clear distinction must be drawn between the

3. Sphere Defined. Church's charities and the Church's maintenance. The first are the outcome of the healthy life of the Ch., the second is the means of ensuring that life and health; the first is an act of devotion, the second is a claim of obligation; the first, therefore, belongs to the sphere of the Church's charitable actions, the second belongs to the sphere of the Church's business, in other words, of the Church's finance.

The function of CF., then, is to determine the nature and extent of those requirements essential to the life and well-being of the Ch., and to initiate and maintain the necessary organisation for their permanent provision.

There are five requirements commonly recognised as essential to the Church's life and

4. Clerical Training, Maintenance, Pensions. efficiency. The first is a due supply of men to ensure the permanence of the sacred ministry. It is obvious that a constant supply cannot be ensured unless there be some recognised system of recruiting and training, and the expense involved in such training must of necessity be costly. An Ordination Candidates' Fund is therefore an essential department of CF. Following close on this and only second in importance is a financial system which shall ensure that all those admitted to the Sacred Ministry should be provided with such sufficient wage as to enable them to pursue their high calling without distraction. This maintenance of the clergy is not a matter of charity, it is a matter of plain and simple business; in other words, of CF.

Further, and following again close on the question of maintenance, comes that of Pensions. That priests should be relieved of their charge when no longer able to fulfil their duties is recognised as essential to Ch. efficiency. The establishment of a Pension Fund is a necessary sequel to that of a Candidates' Fund and a Maintenance Fund, and is, as in those cases, a matter not of charity but of plain practical business, in other words of Ch. Finance.

The Lay Ministry of the Ch. is only second in importance to that of the ordained ministry, and provision for the training, maintenance and pension of these lay agents must be included in any sound financial scheme.

5. Lay Agents, Fabrica.

Lastly, the provision for the building of new churches in populous districts as well as assistance in the repair of ancient ch. fabrics must clearly be treated as a matter of practical business in any sound Ch. system.

These five objects, then, are clearly matters which concern the very life and permanence of the Ch., and as such they make their claim not as an appeal of charity but as a demand of business obligation on all Ch. members.

A study of the organisation of the unendowed Churches and of the Nonconformist bodies makes it plain that their financial methods are based on these principles. In

6. Confirmation of Principles.

In the Scottish, Irish, S. African, Australian, New Zealand and American Churches, as well as with the Baptists, Wesleyans and Scottish Presbyterians, a Ministerial Maintenance Fund stands in the forefront of their financial systems, and closely connected with this a Church Extension Fund for aiding the work of Church extension and pioneer missions.

Scarcely less prominent is the Ministers' Pension Fund, and with it the Ministers' Widows and Orphans' Fund.

In all the Nonconformist bodies above quoted a Ministers' Training Fund and a Church Building Fund have a prominent place, and like funds are established or are being established in many of the dioceses of the Scottish, Irish and Colonial Churches.

But the function of CF. is not only to distinguish between the obligation of business and the claims of charity, but also to provide

7. Organisation. the organisation by which the business obligations of Ch. members shall be recognised and met.

Here again the experience and methods of unendowed Churches and of other voluntary supported religious bodies have much to teach us. Those objects determined to be necessary to permanence, growth and efficiency are not left for support to the mere inclination or goodwill of their members. They are financed by an organised system which sometimes takes the form of assessment, sometimes of apportionment, sometimes of official collections at stated intervals, while the administration of finance is placed in the hands of an executive body whose expenses in discharge of their duties are a first charge on the funds thus officially levied.

It is plain that a financial system based on some such principles as these must speedily find its place in the organisation of the Ch. of Eng. Cp. Abps'. Committee's Report, 1911.

It has only been the possession of endowments due to the generous solicitude of past generations that has enabled the Ch. to hold its own in the absence of a well-devised and well-administered financial system. But the decreasing value of tithe rent charge and agricultural lands, together with the ever-increasing demands which Ch. growth and extension make upon the resources of the Ch., constitute a strong and urgent appeal for a systematic method by which the financial requirements of the Ch. shall be from year to year estimated and the necessary funds raised and expended. An endowed Ch. need not be and should not be less effectually organised as regards its finances than an unendowed Church.

If the judgment and experience of unendowed Churches, compelled by the force of circumstances to formulate a workable system of finance, is to serve us as a guide, we shall probably be led to adopt a system on some such lines as the following. The diocese will constitute the financial unit, and the Diocesan Conference or Synod will constitute the financial authority, either directly or indirectly, through a Financial Council.

8. Outline Scheme.

The Conference will determine what are the objects to be regarded as essential to the efficiency of the diocese and its component parts, will estimate the annual outlay involved in their maintenance, and will require that every parish should take its share towards meeting the expense, the parishes in their turn laying the same obligation on the individual Ch. members of the parish. This must involve some system of assessment, apportionment, or such like method for raising the required money, in order to secure a sufficient and uniform annual income. Assessment as adopted in unendowed Churches fixes the payment to be made to the diocese by the parish, usually in proportion to the annual amount of their parochial receipts and expenditure, failure to pay which sum involves certain disabilities, as, for example, disqualification from representation in the Diocesan Synod.

Apportionment, on the other hand, is rather in the nature of a suggestion and incentive, and relies on the public spirit of the body for its success.

A system of voluntary individual self-apportionment has been widely adopted in Canada and America called the Envelope System, which is gradually making its way into the parochial system in England under the name of The Freewill Offering Scheme. Every Ch. member is asked to pledge a fixed weekly, monthly, or quarterly sum in support of the Ch. and parish, including the parochial contribution to the diocese, and 52, 12 or 4 envelopes, as the case may be, are supplied, in which the pledged sum is placed and brought to Ch., to be given there either in lieu of, or in addition to, the weekly alms. As an alternative to this, a system of a Ch. due of fixed minimum amount has been advocated, by which every member who claims the privileges of and uses the services of the Ch. should take his part in meeting the cost.

It seems plain that some requirement such as these must be introduced as an essential part of any sound and workable scheme of CF. To pay for what we receive is a sound principle of honest dealing. People are seldom unwilling to pay for what they value, while on the other hand they are disposed to value what they pay for.—A6.

G. R. BULLOCK-WEBSTER.

FIRST-FRUIT.—It appears from passages in such early writers as Origen and Irenæus (see e.g., Orig., Cont. Cels. 8 34, and Iren., Cont. Hæres. iv, 17 s) that offerings analogous to the first-fruits of the Jewish law, and following the precedent thereby established, soon became customary in the Christian Ch. In mediæval times the impost so called (Lat. primitiæ), otherwise annates or annalia, meant the first year's value of any ecclesiastical benefice, which was claimed by the Pope on every occurrence of a vacancy, and had to be paid by the person who succeeded to it. When the papal jurisdiction was repudiated by Henry VIII, this and the correlative source of income known as TENTHS were annexed to the Crown, and formed part of the national exchequer, till they were returned to the Ch. by the Act of 1703, when they were made the nucleus of QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.—A6.

G. WORLEY.

FITTINGS.—The F. of a church include:

(a) In nave: PEWS; ALMS-BOX; Book-Rack (see CUPBOARDS); Font-Cover (see FONT); Hymn Boards; Umbrella Racks; Verger's Cupboard (see CUPBOARDS). (b) In chancel: Altar-rails (see RAILS); SCREEN; TABLE OF COMMANDMENTS; REREDOS; CRENDENCE; STALLS. (c) In Porch: Table of Affinity; Literature Box. (d) In Vestry: Strong Box (or Safe). (e) Exterior: NOTICE BOARDS; Lamp. (f) Generally throughout Church and Vestries: Lighting F.; and Heating Apparatus. The present art. treats only of such F. as are not dealt with in any special article.

Hymn-Boards should be provided with spaces rather in excess of ordinary requirements to allow for extra hymns on special occasions.

2. Fittings in Nave. They should also be provided with a space at the top for the day of the month. It is well not to employ a wheel-pulley for hoisting, as the wheel is noisy. A smooth oak peg fixed in the wall with a knob to prevent the cord from slipping off is better. The cord runs over it easily and without noise.

Umbrella Racks should be provided in every church, either at the ends of the pews or in the form of stands near the exits.

It is expressly ordered in canon 99 that the "Table of Kindred and Affinity" (PB heading), "set forth by authority in the year of our Lord God 1563," . . . "shall be in every church publicly set up and fixed at the charge of the parish." The usual and most convenient place is the Porch, where every worshipper may see it. The SPCK publishes the Table in red and black at a low price.

A Literature Box is a very useful item to place in the Porch. It should be made with two compartments (pocket-shape compartments are more convenient than shelves), one for free literature, the other for books and pamphlets for which payment is required. Between the two should be the money-box with a slot.

In accordance with archidiaconal requirements a Strong Box or Safe is necessary. This should be large enough (not less than 4 ft. high) to contain two compartments one above the other: one for the Bapt. and Marriage Registers and deeds relating to the church, schools and other parish charities: the other for the Communion plate. The most convenient place for this box is the Clergy Vestry where, if possible, it should be let into the wall so that the door may close flush with the wall-surface.

Churches may be lighted with candles, oil, gas, or electricity. Candles are the most artistic and their soft light most conducive to

5. Lighting. devotion; but their cost is usually prohibitive. Where Oil lamps are used they should be of the very best make, as well on account of safety as of controlling the steadiness of the light and for the candle-power they afford.

Electric Light is now available for many churches and, where possible, it is well to employ it. Its advantages are chiefly cleanliness, the softness of the light, and the ease of extending the system to any part of the church. Even where electric-lighting is used, it is always advisable to have gas also in a modified degree, as there are many causes conducive to failure of the electric current which may happen at an inconvenient moment.

The instalment of Gas should not be left to any firm of gas-fitters alone. A lighting expert should always be employed. The lighting of churches and public buildings is a science in itself. The control of the whole system should be carefully thought out. The taps should be in a convenient place, out of sight of the congregation and near one of the exits.

7. Gas. Gas pendants are better than standards, and should be suspended, wherever possible, over the passages, not over the pews. Standards are more liable to vibration, by which the life of a mantle (where the incandescent system is used) is shortened, and the lights, even when lowered, usually coming between the preacher and the congregation, are inconvenient to the one and disconcerting to the other. Pendants have not this disadvantage, as they may be placed at such an altitude as to be above the line of vision. One other matter should be steadily borne in mind. All gas F. should be simple in design, not ornate. The dominant object for display is the light, not the F. The province of the F. is to convey the gas and to support the burners. They are essentially subordinate and should be kept subdued.

A Lamp should be placed outside the church to light the paths, and, if necessary, another to light the notice-board on which the notices for the week are posted.

The two systems of Heating now almost universally in use are the hot-air and the hot-water pipe systems.

9. Heating Apparatus. The former is steadily giving place to the latter which is more satisfactory in distribution of heat and also in cleanliness. A current of hot air accumulates dust. The radiator principle is now widely adopted with low pressure pipes, and has been found to answer the requirements both of large and small churches.—R5.

G. VALE OWEN.

FLAGON.—Flagons were generally introduced in consequence of the 20th canon of 1604 ordering the wine to be brought to the Holy Table "in a pot or stoup of pewter if not of purer metal." To meet the great demand created by this canon the parishes had to go to the "trade." They often procured the ready-made pothouse tankard; the whistle invariably found in the tail of the handle of the early tankard is evidence of this; the whistle, to summon the pot boy, was the origin of "You may whistle till you get it."

Flagons are usually plain tankards with a cylindrical body, a flat lid, an S-shaped handle, and a splayed foot. A variety termed round-bellied is rarer (Trinity College Chapel, Cambridge, 1625). Later, domed lids, spouts, and coffee-pot shapes were introduced (Hadley Monken, 1609), the cylindrical bodies were often engraved (St. Mary Woolnoth, London, 1587), or repoussé (Acton, 1639). In modern times the use of cruets in pairs was revived (parcel gilt English cruet, 1530-1535, at St. Peter Port, Guernsey, Proceedings, Society of Antiquaries, p. 337).

The rubric seems to contemplate that wine may be consecrated in the F., a convenient if not a necessary provision, having regard to the quantity of wine consumed in the 16th and 17th centuries.

The F. of average size holds about three quarts. The following is taken from the churchwardens' account of St. Mary Woolnoth, a very small parish, in 1590: "Item paide for xxiiij quarts and one pint of Muscadell for the Communion for one whole year ending at the same time . . . xxs. vd."

Twelve celebrations a year was the usual number, thus allowing about two quarts for each occasion. Though there is no rule, the function usually assigned by modern custom to the F. is for wine before consecration, and the place for it the Credence Table or Prothesis.—R3. E. H. FRESHFIELD.

FLESH.—F., as equivalent to man's material part, the body, is found in the version of Ap. Creed in the Bapt. Offices (= Lat. resurrectio carnis). More usually, however, it means the natural desires and passions of the body and the animal soul. These, though not evil in themselves, tend through original sin to be temptations and causes of sin. Hence the word F. sometimes passes into the sense of lawless desires which have become actually sinful (Art. 9, and Coll. 18 Trin.). The more exact sense, however, should be carefully borne in mind, especially by the Christian teacher, so as to avoid unreality or the suspicion of Manicheism. Human life cannot be without such desires as hunger and thirst and the sexual impulse. The best statement of the Christian attitude is found in the Bapt. question, "Dost thou renounce (i.e., refuse allegiance to) . . . the carnal desires of the F., so that thou wilt not follow nor be led by them?" (cp. The Ordering of Priests—"laying aside the study of the world and the F."). The F. therefore is to be disciplined and kept in order and its rebellions crushed. It must be ruled by the higher part of man, the "spirit," in union with the Holy Spirit (Coll. 1 Lent). The ideal of this subordination of F. to spirit is the keeping of the body in "temperance, soberness and chastity" (Cat.), and that harmony which results from the subjection of the whole man to the Divine will. Cp. ASCETICISM, BODY.—K1. A. R. WHITHAM.

FLOWERS.—The "dressing" or "decking" of churches with F. and greenery is very ancient.

Reference is often made to it by the Fathers, a well-known instance of which is the letter of St. Jerome to a friend, Nepotian, approving the care he was wont to bestow upon Divine worship by introducing for the adornment of the Church F. and leaves and vine branches.

In our church account books in England is found frequent mention of the "dressing" of churches on feasts, e.g., Christmas Day, Palm Sunday, Easter Day, Ascension Day, Whitsunday and on the Dedication Feast. The following extracts will show of what these "dressings" consisted:—

In 1506, "for an holy Bush before the Rode, iid" (for Christmas at St. Lawrence, Reading); in 1524, "payd for holy and ivye at Crystmas, iid" (St. Martin, Outwich, London); in 1557, "for Palmes on Palm Sundaie, Palme Cakes and flowers, vid"; in 1557, "for Garlands and strowing Erbes on St. James' Daie for ii years, iis. iiiid"; in 1687, "for Nosegays and Strowings, Ascension Day, 5. o"; in 1687, "for Strowings for the Church at Whitsuntide, 7. 6"; in 1688, "for Greens for the Church at Easter and Whitsuntide, 19. 6" (St. James, Garlickhythe, London).

It will be seen from the above that "holly," "ivy," "palms" (i.e., willow F.), "herbs," "greens," and, as we gather elsewhere from the account books, "rushes," "box," "sweet briar," "rosemary," "rose garlands," "birch," "broom," and "bay," were used either for strewings or for hanging up on the walls and pillars.

The custom of placing F. in pots and "vases" on the altar or anywhere else is of late introduction, and there is no evidence that "vases" were ornaments of the church "in the second year of the Reign of King Edward the Sixth." The old custom is preferable and beautiful, and it still obtains on the Continent and in a few places in England where rushes are strewn on special occasions.

It seems as if the use of F. in "vases" and in pots had come to stay. That being so, it is most desirable that abuses of this use should be carefully avoided.

(a) Often the gradine is overcrowded with vases of F. as well as the surroundings of the altar with masses of floral decoration. Such excessive floral adornment detracts from the prominence and dignity of the holy Table. Two, or at the most four, vases should suffice. Let it also be remembered that of old the decking of the church was only done on Feasts. (b) Brazen vases are aggressive and harsh. Simple and plain vases of a small size and of glass or earthenware are preferable. (c) Placing F. in tin holders is not necessary. They look far better when placed loosely and naturally in the vase. (d) Decaying and dead F. should be removed as soon as possible. They and the water in which they stand become most objectionable, and it is anything but seemly that dead matter should remain near the Lord's Table.—R4. H. D. MACNAMARA.

FONT.—In the primitive Church, when adult Bapts. were frequent, the Sacr. of Bapt. was administered with great solemnity, and at first only in baptisteries attached to the principal churches. When the civilised world

1. History. had become nominally Christian, infant Bapts. became the rule, and of necessity every parish church came in time to possess its F. Now, as a concession to convenience, we usually provide Fs. for chapels of ease and mission churches, but traces of older customs have survived in Italy, where many of the cathedrals, Florence and Pisa for instance, have their detached baptisteries, while others, like St. Mark's, Venice, possess enclosed chapels used solely for bapt. purposes.

Some of the old Italian Fs. are of great size, often eight or nine feet across. These take the form of circular classical vases, but do not appear to be intended for the immersion of adults. Often they have metal covers, only a part of which is made to open; these covers are generally more modern than the Fs. themselves, but they probably bear a general resemblance to the original F. covers of early times.

In certain West Country parishes, Morwenstow for example, there exist detached chapels built over natural springs of water, and similar

2. Baptisteries. structures are found in Brittany and elsewhere. Some of these are said to have been baptisteries, a theory somewhat conjectural. At Guiseley (Yorks.), in one of the glebe fields, an old stone tank, approached by a flight of steps and surrounded with a narrow platform, has lately been discovered and opened out. It is possible that, as the Rector at the beginning of the 17th cent. held heterodox views, this tank may have been intended for Anabaptist rites. The English custom, however, has generally been to place the F. in the parish church, the tradition of the primitive BAPTISTERY having survived to some extent in the invariable custom of providing a substantial F. cover, either fixed or movable.

Except in Italy, Continental Fs. are much the same size as English ones. A very fine 13th cent. brass F. is preserved at

3. Materials. Hildesheim, and metal Fs. are frequently met with in Germany. In Flanders, too, many of the 15th and 16th cent. Fs. are of brass, and others have brass covers. There was a brass F. in St. Albans Abbey until the Reformation, and there is still one in Little Gidding Church. About twenty-seven of our mediæval Fs. are of lead. Most of these appear to be earlier than the 13th cent.; they are generally plain circular tanks set upon stone bases. Such is the F. at Dorchester Abbey, ornamented with rude figures under semicircular arches, and the somewhat later example at Warborough close by.

Most English Fs. are, however, of stone or marble, and three different types are found in early work. The simplest of these

4. Early Fonts. is the plain cylindrical column hollowed out to form a basin. Then there are the cup-shaped Fs. in which the bowl is distinct from the stem; lastly, there is the cubical bowl supported on a group of pillars.

Of the first class—tub Fs.—that at Mellor (Derbyshire) may be quoted as an example. Haddon Hall has a rude cup F. in the private chapel, and one of the finest of our early cubical Fs. on columns is the black marble one, probably of foreign workmanship, in Winchester Cathedral. Occasionally, early Fs. are treated with considerable richness. Thus the square bowl of the Winchester example is carved with the story of St. Nicholas. The "tub" Fs. sometimes have arcaded ornament, as at St. Martin's, Canterbury, or bands of scrollwork. "Cup" Fs. are often plain with perhaps an enriched moulding between the shaft and the bowl, others are carved with grotesque figures as at Curdworth (Warwickshire), or with foliage and rosettes as at Mevagissey (Cornwall). A variant of the usual shafted form occurs at Gorran and Bodmin in Cornwall; in these examples the angle columns are carried up to the top of the bowl, which is rounded on its under-side so as to fit on to the central shaft.

The most important of our 13th cent. Fs. have circular or octagonal bowls set on groups of columns, and marble was largely

5. 13th Century Fonts. used in Fs. of this period, of which there are good examples at Beverley Minster and Stanwick (Northants.). But 13th cent. Fs. are rare, as in most churches the old Norman F. still continued in use.

After the 13th cent. most English Fs. are of "cup" form and octagonal, the shaft having a moulded capital and base. A few specimens, however, have no distinction between bowl and stem.

6. Later Gothic Fonts. Of these is the F. at St. Peter's, Northampton, a plain 14th cent. octagon with tracery carved on each face. In the later "cup" Fs. each face of the bowl and also of the stem is often panelled, and sometimes figure subjects are introduced. The seven Sacraments and the Crucifixion are favourite subjects: these Fs. were usually coloured and gilded. The Fs. at Gorleston, Little Walsingham, and Worsted (Norfolk) are of this description. They generally stand on octagonal platforms of three spreading steps with a square pedestal for the use of the officiating minister. Sometimes the risers of these steps are panelled with carved tracery, the effect of which is rich and dignified.

The 13th cent. F. at Youlgreave (Derbyshire) has a projecting stoup carved out of the same stone as the bowl. The 14th cent. one at Beckley (Oxon.) has a stone book-rest built into the adjacent pillar of the nave. That at Odiham (Hants.) has curious cavities, probably part of some contrivance for fixing the cover. Many old Fs. bear inscriptions of much interest.

Post-Reformation Fs. are frequently extremely small, but many of those in Wren's city churches are graceful and well executed. St. Lawrence, Jewry, and St. James, Piccadilly, contain two of the richest examples. A plain but good F. of Wren's, once in Bow Church, Cheapside, is now in St. Albans, Southend. There is a large Renaissance marble F. in Exeter Cathedral. These 17th cent. Fs. take the form of classical vases, and generally had carved oak movable dome-shaped covers.

The tawdry coloured marble Fs. of the Victorian period do not deserve much notice, but the modern F. in St. John's, Torquay, is arranged in a novel fashion. An ordinary F. is placed at the west end of the Nave, and by it is a good-sized sunk tank of marble provided with descending steps and arranged for the immersion of adults.

English custom places the F. in a conspicuous position "in the open church." And, as the rubrics require that Bapts. should

9. Position of Font. be conducted in the presence of the congregation, the modern custom of hiding away the F. in a semi-detached baptistery is to be condemned. The F. should be near the entrance to the church for obvious symbolic reasons, and the west end of the nave is generally the most convenient position.

The earliest English F. covers were probably plain flat lids provided with locks. Ancient practice was to 10. Font Covers. leave the hallowed water standing in the F., and these lids were therefore necessary. Although it is now customary to consecrate fresh water for every Bapt., Church law still requires that all Fs. should have proper covers, and it is to be presumed that they are meant to be covered when not in actual use. The custom therefore of using the F. as a monster flower pot at harvest thanksgivings does not seem in accordance with the intentions of the Church.

The early flat F. lids were often superseded in the 14th cent. by taller conical canopies, as at Monksilver (Somerset), and they in their turn gave way to more ambitious covers of tabernacle work. These were of two kinds. In the Eastern counties great pinnacled spires were generally suspended from the church roof with pulleys and weights, and hauled up bodily when the F. was used. Such are the F. covers at Ufford and Sudbury (Suffolk), Sall and Worsted (Norfolk), and Selby Abbey. West Country Fs. often had fixed covers like octagonal turrets finished with spires, a part of the lower portion opening in door fashion. Such covers remain at Cockington and at Swinbridge (Devon). They are of late date, and the type is not entirely confined to the Western counties. Needless to say, all these F. covers were originally painted and gilt.

At Luton, the F. is enclosed in a 14th cent. octagonal stone shrine: at Trunch and St. Peter Mancroft, Norwich, the same idea is carried out in woodwork, the F. cover proper being suspended within the fixed canopy. At Durham Cathedral is a 17th cent. F. cover of the same kind carried up to form a lofty spire, and there is another high Jacobean cover at Walpole St. Peter (Norfolk). But most Jacobean F. covers are plain flat lids with central uprights and radiating scrollwork brackets, and the Queen Anne F. covers are usually domical or bell shaped, and are invariably excellent pieces of joinery work, often delicately carved. The modern F. covers at Grantham and St. Alban's, Holborn, are excellent reproductions of 15th cent. tabernacle work.

[See further, Fonts and Font Covers by Francis Bond.]—r6. CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

FOOT-PACE.—The uppermost step of the platform, upon which the Holy Table immediately stands. It projects beyond the Holy Table to allow standing room for the celebrant. In side-chapels the Holy Table is often raised above the floor-level upon a foot-pace only.—r6. S. REDMAN.

FOREIGN INFLUENCES ON THE FIRST PB AND ORDINAL.—

1. German Influence.

The important influence upon the Prayer Book of the Church Service-books (Kirchen-ordnungen) of the Reformation in Germany was scarcely recognised in England before the 19th cent.; and anything like an adequate appreciation of the extent of that influence has been reserved to our own time. For many years before the PB of 1549 Cranmer had shown himself much interested in religious movements in Germany, and had carried on a correspondence with leading Reformers in that country. He had visited Germany, and had married a German wife, the niece of one of the leading Reformers, Osiander of Nuremberg. More particularly he was deeply interested in the attempts at Reformation made by the Prince-Archbishop of Cologne, Hermann von Wied, acting under the guidance of Melanchthon. It is to the important work issued under the authority of Hermann, and entitled Einfaltigs Bedencken (Simple Deliberation), that we owe many important features of the Prayer Book. Hermann's book, in German, appeared in 1543, and an improved edition in 1544. A Latin translation, differing considerably from the German original, and entitled Simplex ac pia Deliberatio, appeared in 1545. Cranmer's copy of the latter with his autograph signature is now in the Cathedral Library at Chichester. But recent research has made certain that the compilers of the English PB had before them the German as well as the Latin text. An English translation of the Latin appeared in 1547, entitled A simple and religious Consultation of us Herman archbishop of Colone, etc.; and a second edition, amended, in 1548. Two editions in a few months shows the interest taken in this work. Hermann's book owes many features to the Brandenburg-Nuremberg Service-book of 1533, which in turn owes much to Luther's early liturgical services. (See HERMANN'S CONSULTATION.)

In point of time the English Lit. of 1544 was the first authorised English service which manifests very distinctly German influence. It is substantially the

2. On Litany of 1544.

Litany of our present PB. The following features are due ultimately to Luther's Litany of 1529: (1) "from battle and murder," (2) "by thy baptism, fasting, and temptation," (3) "by thine agony and bloody sweat," (4) "in all time of our tribulation, in all time of our wealth," (5) "that it may please thee to rule and govern thy holy Church universal," (6) "to bring into the way of truth all such as have erred and are deceived," (7) "that both by their preaching and living," (8) "to bless and keep the magistrates," (9) "to strengthen such as do stand, to comfort and help the weak-hearted . . . Satan under our feet," (10) "to defend and provide for the fatherless children and widows," (11) "to have mercy upon all men," (12) "to forgive our enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and to turn their hearts." None of these features are to be found in the pre-Reformation Service-books of England. Similarly, the opening words of "O God, merciful Father, that despisest not" are due to the Latin of Hermann, and ultimately to Luther. The response to the suffrages, "Good Lord, deliver us," seems suggested by the corresponding German "Lieber Herre Gott."

When we come to the PB of 1549, the examination of the German Kirchenordnungen shows us that the very ingenious construction of Matins and Evensong out of (respectively) Matins and Lauds, and Vespers and Compline, had been anticipated in its main features in the Church Order for Calenberg and Göttingen in 1542, and, to some extent, in other German service-books. In the service for HC (and previously in the Order of the Communion of 1548) the idea of the "Comfortable Words," and at least two of the sentences, were drawn from Hermann. And here we have proof that the German text was before the English Reformers; for, while the Latin of Hermann reads simply "Audite Evangelium," the German reads "Hear the Gospel comfort" (Höret den Evangelischen trost). The collecting of alms and money offerings as part of the ordinary service of the Mass was unknown in mediæval England. It and "the poor men's box" is characteristic of the German Orders, and from them was doubtless adopted by our Reformers. The service for Bapt. owes some interesting features to Bucer's work (adopted by Hermann), and ultimately to Luther's Taufbuchlein (1527). To Luther may be traced the choice of the Gospel from St. Mark (10 13-16). In the English pre-Reformation books it had been, in the Ordo ad faciendum Catechumenum, Matt. 19 13-15 (which omits the taking of the children into Christ's arms). And to the same source is due the exquisitely beautiful "Doubt ye not therefore . . . embrace him with the arms of his mercy"; and the following prayer is almost word for word from Hermann. The service for Private Baptism shows many indications of having been influenced by the German text of Hermann. In the Confirm. Service the tender and moving expression, "Let thy fatherly hand, we beseech thee, ever be over them," is due to Hermann. In the Marriage service we owe to Hermann the impressive joining together of the right hands of the bride and bridegroom, and the declaration, "Forasmuch as N. and N. have consented," etc. In the Burial of the Dead we owe to Hermann the suggestion of the use of the old sequence, "In the midst of life (Media Vita)," which in the pre-Reformation service-books of England is to be found as an antiphon to Nunc Dimittis on the third Sunday in Lent and on subsequent days to the fifth Sunday, but which formed no part of the Offices for the Dead. Some features of the language of our English form are to be traced largely to Coverdale's translation of Luther's metrical paraphrase of the sequence. What is here indicated in outline as to the influence of German service-books will be found expanded, with many details, in the two works of the author of this article referred to below in the Bibliography.

The recitation of the Decalogue with a response after each Commandment in the PB of 1552 has been by some persons regarded as due to the influence of a service-book published in 1551 by Valerand Pullain, a Fleming, for the use of the congregation of foreigners, chiefly weavers by trade, who had been granted a place of refuge in the deserted abbey buildings at Glastonbury. But it is right to remember that the Ten Commandments had formed a feature of several German Orders for the Holy Communion, such as those of Franckfurt (1530), Bremen (1534), Pomerania (1535), Northheim (1539), Calenberg and Göttingen (1542). The form in which the Decalogue appeared in the German Orders was, it would seem, a metrical version, each Commandment being followed by the word Kyrieleis ("Lord have mercy"). It will be noted, too, that in the German Orders this feature was to be found in the service for the Communion, while in Pullain it was the opening of MP. Again, in the German Orders the Commandments followed one another consecutively, while in Pullain we find the curious feature of a Conf. and Absol. being interjected between the first and second Tables of the Law.

To the features of the two PBs of Edward VI noticed above should be added that the saying of the Lit. on all Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year was unknown in mediæval England; it is a feature in certain German Church Orders. The same is true of the direction to say the early part of the Communion Service on certain days when there is no consecration of the Eucharist; and the direction in the PB of 1549 for the minister to wear a cope on such occasions was anticipated by some of the German books.

The name "Lord's Supper" as a designation of the HC was practically unknown in mediæval England. It was very frequent in the German Church Orders. The requirement of the PB that when there was a celebration in the house of a sick person there should be found some to communicate with him seems plainly to be derived from Hermann. But enough has been said to demonstrate the extensive influence of Lutheran service-books on the English PB.

The English service for the Ordering of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons appeared in 1550; and the long address of the bishop to those about to be ordained Priests probably owes many of its thoughts and turns of expression to a discourse of Martin Bucer (see Church Quarterly Review, April, 1897).

Another powerful influence from abroad affecting the construction of the PB was the Breviary of Cardinal Quignon. But this will be treated in another article (QUIGNON'S BREVIARY).

For reprints or descriptions of the German Church Orders, see Æmilius Ludwig Richter's Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des sechszehnten Jahrhunderts (two vols., 4to, Neue Ausgabe, Leipzig, 1872); and the great work, still incomplete (bearing the same title as Richter's work), edited by Emil Sehling. Three volumes have already appeared (4to, Leipzig, 1902).

4. On Recitation of Decalogue.

5. On Rubrics of PB.

6. On the Ordinal.

7. Influence of Quignon.

8. Bibliography.

1904, 1909). When complete Sehling will supersede Richter. For an exhibition of the influence of the Church Orders of Germany on the English Prayer Book, see H. E. Jacobs, Lutheran Movement in England (Philadelphia, 1891); Gasquet and Bishop's Edward VI and the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1890); and J. Dowden's Workmanship of the Prayer Book (2nd edit., London, 1902); and the same writer's Further Studies in the Prayer Book (1908). The notes to F. Bulley's Tabular View of the Variations in the Communion and Baptismal Offices of the Church of England (Oxford, 1842) exhibit much of the Latin of Hermann's Simplex ac pia Deliberatio, so far as it relates to the Offices dealt with.—B1.

J. DOWDEN.

FOREIGN INFLUENCES ON THE PRAYER BOOK SINCE 1549.—The earlier stages of the English Reformation had been conducted mainly in accord with Lutheran opinions, but almost at once in the reign of Edward VI the influence of the Swiss School of Reformers became predominant. Cranmer was in cordial correspondence with Calvin himself, and urged him to "write often to the King." In 1548 he earnestly solicited a number of prominent foreign divines holding "Reformed" views to come to England that, by the assistance of their opinions, he might "do away with doctrinal controversies and build up an entire system of true doctrine."¹ Three of the most celebrated of these, Martin Bucer, Peter Martyr and John a Lasco, the two former of whom were given the Regius Professorships of Divinity at Cambridge and Oxford respectively, and the third of whom was appointed Superintendent of Foreign Congregations in London, came to England and lived on terms of close intimacy with the English Episcopate.

Their opinion of the PB of 1549 was sought, and the two Regius Professors published criticisms (Bucer's was called his "Censura"), pointing out the further changes they thought necessary, most of which were actually effected at the next revision in 1552. Martyr, writing to Bucer in Jan., 1551, thanks God for the opportunity afforded of admonishing the bishops, and states that, after the receiving of their joint criticisms, Cranmer had informed him that many changes were in contemplation.²

Of Martyr, Strype tells us, Cranmer "made particular use in the steps he took in our Reformation."³ This is also borne out by the fact that Cranmer, when in prison under Queen Mary, offered to defend the Scripturalness of the new PB (i.e., of 1552) in conjunction with Martyr.⁴ The Abp.'s great esteem for Bucer may be gathered from a special request for his judgment in the "vestibarian" dispute between Bishops Ridley and Hooper,⁵ and from his declaration after Bucer's death at Cambridge in 1552, that "his profound learning had produced not a transient but an everlasting benefit to the Church."¹

The superintendents of the congregations of foreign Protestants in London, Valerand Pullain and John a Lasco, both published liturgies for the use of their flocks during their stay in England, and these are supposed to have suggested the Introductory Sents., Fxh., Conf. and Absol. which first appeared in the 1552 PB. It was indeed asserted at the time that A Lasco was the means of Cranmer's accepting the Calvinistic doctrine of the Presence in the Lord's Supper, although this was more probably due to the influence of Bishop Ridley.² There can, however, be little doubt that in the differences of the 1552 PB from that of 1549 the opinions of Foreign Reformers, and those of the Swiss not of the Lutheran school, had very great weight. Although in the differences between the new English Service-books and their mediæval predecessors it was Lutheran guides who were followed, in the distinctive changes, nearly all of them with doctrinal significance, which marked Edward's Second PB, inspiration was sought and given from Geneva and Zurich, and not from Wittenberg.—B1.

G. FOSTER CARTER.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.—A PB which is to-day substantially what it became in 1662

is not likely to emphasise markedly the missionary aspect of the Church as we feel it to-day, and a general knowledge of the history of England for the years previous to 1662 will supply reasons. At the same time a PB based on Catholic lines, making full use of the Scriptures as Lessons, and of the Pss. and Canticles in its worship, cannot fail to abound in missionary aspiration. The Ordinal, certain Colls., and especially the Pr. for "all sorts and conditions of men," are also full of the true spirit.

Towards the close of the 17th cent. a very practical missionary spirit became active within the Church of England. "The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge" in 1699—its offshoot, the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" in 1701—both Societies co-extensive with the Church—proclaimed a new era. The SPG. commenced to work among non-Christians almost at once as its records testify in 1712. But missionaries supported by English money in the 18th cent. were for the most part Germans or Danes, especially in the great non-Christian lands; in 1799 the Church Missionary Society was founded to work exclusively among non-Christian people in Africa and the East, and this is a great landmark. The 19th cent. has undoubtedly witnessed an enormous advance in missionary work. For example, the amount contributed for Foreign M. by the Anglican Communion in 1800 was probably not more than

¹ Cranmer Letters, cc and xxxv (Parker Society).

² Strype's Memorials of Cranmer, p. 399, vol. 2 (London, 1855).

³ Strype, Mem. Cranm., p. 164, vol. 2.

⁴ Strype, Mem. Cranm., p. 6, vol. 2.

⁵ Cranmer Letters, No. 292.

¹ Ib., No. 299.

² Orig. Letters, p. 383.

£7,000; in 1900 it was about £800,000. So again, Anglican Bishoprics outside the British Isles, inclusive of the Church in the United States, in 1800 numbered 9, in 1900 178, in 1910 209. And be it remembered that there are two distinct departments of missionary work, both of transcendent importance, and to be placed therefore in parallel columns, not as first and second in importance; namely, the care of our own people and of Christians generally throughout the world: and also the work of evangelisation of non-Christians: these two sides can be called respectively Edification and Evangelisation.

Missionary Methods and Organisations within the British Isles. Owing in part to the lethargy of the Church in the 18th cent. Mission work abroad came to be organised not as the work of the whole Church, but by societies within the Church. In due time also, owing to the differences of views among sections of the Church of England, these missionary societies partook of a party character, and often in spite of their rules and ideals.

As time passed, these missionary societies developed greatly in strength and covered the British

2. Differing Principles of Missionary Societies.

Isles with their organisation: this is their position to-day. Missionary societies in the United Kingdom may possibly be classified under two heads according to the methods they have adopted. That is, there is a difference of principle among them in regard to the control to be exercised over Missionaries abroad. Some, acting on principle, do not consider that they are responsible for the Church views and ritual of the agents paid by their funds, the responsibility for such questions resting wholly with the Bps. of the dioceses aided by such funds. The usual plan in such societies is to furnish the Bp. with block grants, leaving further details to the Bps. and their diocesan Councils. Such societies do not generally correspond with the clergy they help to support but only with the Bp. or with some person appointed by him to be their correspondent. The utmost care is thus taken not to interfere with the administration of any diocese, whatever may be its general tone of doctrine or ritual; and no criticisms of diocesan policy are received by the Society from the clergy of the diocese, although general reports of work done are obtained from those clergy. These reports are utilised, and are then bound up and form the most valued possession of the Society for historical purposes. If Bps. or dioceses err in any matter, appeal, it is believed by such societies, should be to the Metropolitan or to the Higher Courts of the Church.

Other societies, also acting on principle, being supported by persons holding what without offence may be called sectional views regarding doctrine and ritual, hold that they are bound to see that agents paid by their funds do accord in their views and practices with those who furnish the funds. In each diocese abroad that is aided by such a society, the Secretary of the Society is a very important person indeed. He and his committee in the diocese are in very close touch with the home society and superintend the agents in the field and govern their movements. The society at home corresponds also direct with each of its agents and considers itself responsible for their doctrines and practices. The Bps. of dioceses where such societies are at work are either in full sympathy with the views of such a society, or else are prepared to accept on these terms its very valuable aid, fully aware that some of the noblest missionary work in the world is done by what may be called sectional societies. Under the present conditions of the Church with its wide platform of thought, and perhaps owing to the genius of the Anglo-Saxon race, these conditions must be accepted. For many a long day in the Anglican Communion there will be found Churchmen who will range themselves in one or other of two lines, those namely, who emphasise the Catholic, and those who emphasise the Protestant side, but in either case without excluding the other side. At the present time, Churchmen who emphasise the Protestant aspect of the Church probably contribute fully two-thirds of the funds for M. abroad.

Twenty-six years ago Churchmen in England felt the need of some central organisation which should bring missionary societies together on a common platform for mutual counsel and in order to attack common problems as one body. The gain from what is now known as "The Central Boards of Missions" has been enormous, and chiefly because Churchmen of very varying views have come to know and to respect one another on that platform, and to modify their views in regard to each other, with a great corresponding advance towards unity within the Church. The "Central Boards of Missions" are by their constitution debarred from becoming an executive force in the field, and collect no money for mission purposes abroad. Were they to commence to do so they would at once become one of many competing missionary societies and would lose their unrivalled position as mediators and unifiers, and as provokers to good works.

4. Unification of Missions.

Naturally, many Churchmen now ask how soon the Church can become its own missionary society, as is seen to be the case already among many of the daughter Churches of the Anglican Communion. The answer seems to be clear: "As soon as you have succeeded in unifying the present great missionary societies which occupy the whole ground." Meanwhile, the larger hope for which all pray depends upon the wise administration of the Central Boards of M. as a solvent of party differences in order to promote common action.

Of late years there has been a marked growth in the United Kingdom of Special Missionary Associations for the aid of individual dioceses abroad. This is quite a natural development since human nature craves for special as well as for general interests. The dangers of this movement are also obvious. A restricted outlook is mischievous: and also such organisations depend largely upon the personality of individuals whether at home or abroad, and the withdrawal of such attractions has often led to great financial suffering abroad. But in their right place such special organisations have a permanent value. The wise statesman recognises the fact, but continually presses for the world-wide view and duty first and from every individual, the special interest being ever relegated to a subordinate position.

5. Special Funds.

In new lands and where party differences within the Church are not so much in evidence as they are in the United Kingdom, the principle that the Church is its own Missionary Society is becoming an accomplished fact. The best illustrations can be found in the Church in the United States and in Canada. In each case all the M. of the Church are managed by the Church as a whole. Every three years the General Convention, or the General Synod, of the Church meets for the transaction of all Church business; and some of the most important business is the management of the Church's M. Missionary bishops successively address the great Church Assembly. Days are spent in considering missionary problems. Questions of policy are decided at these triennial gatherings, whilst the general administration of the M. is in the hands of a Board of Management elected by the whole Church and possessing executive powers. This reports to the triennial Church Parliament. Calculations are made from time to time in regard to funds needed: each diocese is then officially assessed for its proper contribution; and the dioceses then proceed to spread their own assessment over their own parishes. Letters are read in every church on certain fixed days, and parishes are regularly canvassed, often from house to house. Alongside of this general organisation a powerful "Women's Auxiliary" exists uniting all the women of the Church in one body for missionary purposes. It is obvious that this splendid organisation is only possible where the ground has not been previously occupied by immense organisations on society lines. For the higher organisation of the Church abroad, see art. ANGLICAN COMMUNION.

6. Methods and Organisation beyond the United Kingdom.

Careful investigation has shown that the M. of the whole Anglican Communion are a very small fragment of the missionary work which is being done to-day in the name of Christ. The following figures are suggestive. Of European workers living and at work among non-Christian peoples, Rome has in its service 34,523; Protestant missionary societies have 16,700; the Anglican Communion has 2,570. The Anglican Communion spends about £800,000 annually on its M.; the Protestant Missionary Societies spend about £4,300,000; but no publication is made of the sums that the Roman Church spends on its M. Outside the Roman Church upon the whole it is America that is predominantly converting the world to Christianity. The Anglican Communion is accountable for not more than one seventh of the work done by English-speaking M. The M. of the Eastern (Orthodox) Churches exist chiefly in Asia, but the statistics are not easy to obtain.—J10.

H. H. MONTGOMERY (BISHOP).

FORMS OF PRAYER.

I. EARLY CHRISTIAN USAGE.

Christian worship in its earliest form was modelled by the Apostles on that of the Synagogue, to which they had been so long accustomed.

The Synagogue service consisted of Pss., lections, homily and certain prescribed prs., benedictions or eulogies, examples of which are given in full by Edersheim, who also tells us that "the leader of the devotions might preface the regular service by free pr., or insert such between certain parts of the liturgy" (Jesus the Messiah 1 438-443).

Accustomed then, as the Apostles were, to a type of worship in which ancient liturgical F. were used and extemporaneous pr. also allowed, it is most probable that they observed a like order. To such F. as they already possessed, like the Lord's Pr., the Bapt. formula, etc., they would naturally add others, composed for common use, in which all might join and which were preserved, not in writing, but in the memory by constant repetition.

St. Clement's Ep. to the Corinthians, written A.D. 95, contains a passage resembling one of the solemn prs. used in early Christian

2. Witness of Clement and Justin Martyr. worship, which the writer seems to be quoting from memory. A few of the concluding sentences must suffice here, as the passage is very long, intercession being made for all sorts and conditions of men. "Grant unto them" (i.e., earthly rulers) "therefore, O Lord, health, peace, concord, stability, that they may administer the government which Thou hast given them without failure. . . . Do Thou, Lord, direct their counsel according to that which is good and well-pleasing in Thy sight, that, administering in peace and gentleness with godliness the power which Thou hast given them, they may obtain Thy favour. O Thou, Who alone art able to do these things and things far more exceeding good than these for us, we praise Thee through the High-priest and Guardian of our souls, Jesus Christ, through Whom be the glory and the Majesty unto Thee both now and for all generations and for ever and ever. Amen" (Ep. to Cor. 61).

Justin Martyr, c. 155, describing Christian worship after a Bapt., says: "We, then . . . lead him to the brethren at their place of meeting, to make common prayers (κοινὰς εὐχὰς) heartily both for ourselves and the enlightened (i.e., newly baptised) one and for all others everywhere" (1 Apol. 65). Again in an account of Sunday worship he says: "When we have ceased from prayer, bread is brought and wine and water, and the President sends up prayers and thanksgivings likewise to the best of his ability (δοῖν δυνάμεισιν ἀβρῶ)"—1 Apol. 67). From these accounts we infer that "the common prayers" were set F., which the people knew by heart, but that the President was allowed to offer prs. of his own composition.

The Teaching (Didache) of the Twelve Apostles, written very early in the 2nd cent., provides set F.

3. Early Liturgical Fragments. of thanksgiving over the Eucharistic Bread and Cup. "But as touching the Eucharistic thanksgiving, give ye thanks thus. First as regards the cup: 'We give Thee thanks, O our Father, for the holy vine of Thy son David, which Thou madest known unto us through Thy Son Jesus; Thine is the glory for ever and ever.' Then as regards the broken bread: 'We give Thee thanks, O our Father, for the life and knowledge which Thou didst make known unto us through Thy Son Jesus; Thine is the glory for ever and ever. As this broken bread was scattered upon the mountains and being gathered together became one, so may Thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy Kingdom; for Thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever and ever."¹ (Didache 9). The following direction occurs a little later on: "But permit the prophets to offer thanksgiving as much as they wish" (Didache 10).

From these liturgical fragments and from the foregoing account in Justin Martyr, we infer that those who had the gift of prophesying were not restricted to set F. when they presided at the Euch. Bingham thinks that the cessation of prophetic gifts necessitated the compilation of Liturgies. The long liturgical extracts in the Apostolic Constitutions (8 5-15) and in the Catechetical Lectures of St. Cyril of Jerusalem show that, by 350, complete Liturgies had evolved from earlier F. Such development postulates a long period of previous evolution, and throws back the origin of prescribed prs. to a very early date. The Prayer-Book of Sarapion, Bp. of Thmuis c. 350, contains F. of pr. for Bapts., Ordinations, Funerals, blessing of oils, etc., besides the Euch. Liturgy. Considerable latitude was accorded to bps. to vary liturgical F., or to draw up their own, according to the needs of their dioceses, the general construction and essential parts being retained (see Bingham, Antiquities xiii. 5 r).

II. THE REFORMATION AND SINCE.

In 1523 Luther compiled his Order of Service in the Church, and in 1526 his Deutsche Messe. His famous dictum, "Common prayer

4. The Foreign Reformers and Forms. is exceedingly useful and helpful," supports the participation of the people in the service, which he earnestly advocated. In 1538, Calvin drew up the Liturgy for the Church of Strassburg, and in 1541 his Genevan PB. Knox, in 1554, compiled The Book of Common Order, based on the Genevan Book, for use in Scotland. This Book, like Calvin's, allows the minister to exercise his own gift of pr. instead of, or in addition to, the prescribed prs., such rubrics occurring as "The minister useth this confession, or the like in effect." This Liturgy was widely used in Scotland up to the end of the 16th cent., when a strong objection to all set F. of pr. as unspiritual became general and was regarded as one of the essential differences between episcopal and non-episcopal Chs. everywhere.

In England the vestiarian controversy was followed in 1570 by an attack on the PB led by Thomas Cartwright, Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. In 1571, Whitgift became vice-chancellor and expelled Cartwright, who retired to Antwerp. Two Puritan ministers, Field and Wilcox, in 1571, compiled an address to Parliament denouncing the PB and advocating the Genevan Book. Cartwright added another, and under the title of The First and Second Admonition they were both presented to Parliament. Admonition 14 states: "Then men were not so tied to any form of prs. invented by man, but as the Spirit moved them, poured forth hearty supplications to the Lord. Now they are bound to a prescript order of Service." A long controversy ensued between Whitgift and Cartwright, in which Cartwright modified this statement, saying that "the meaning . . . is not to disallow of prescript Service of pr.; but of this form that we have," i.e., the PB. And again, "forasmuch as we agree of a prescript form of pr. in the church, let that go." Both Whitgift and Hooker characterise these later expressions as "retractions," proving that "they writ their book at the first with small advice and less discretion."

¹ Some scholars believe the above forms were used not at the Euch. proper, but at the Agape which preceded it.

In 1582 a meeting of conforming ministers adopted the Book of Holy Discipline, compiled by Travers on the Genevan model. Encouraged by the support of some prominent statesmen, they applied to Parliament in 1584 to authorise the book, but were foiled by the firm opposition of the Queen and Abp. Whitgift. In 1597 Hooker published the 5th bk. of his Ecclesiastical Polity, wherein he defended set F. on Scriptural precedent and on the grounds of decency and order (cp. EP v. 26). Hooker would doubtless have given fuller and abler treatment to this question, had he been sure of the Puritan position. When pressed in controversy, like Cartwright, they retracted so much, that they seemed almost to agree with their opponents and no practical difference remained. Their practices, however, were such that the Bps. feared to give them liberty lest the PB should be, in many places, scarcely used. Strype (Whitgift 3 5) quotes a report of the Abp.'s commissary on the usage at Eastwell parish ch.: the minister began "with the general Conf. and the Lord's Pr., then read the Pss. and Lessons, then sang a Ps. in metre, then a sermon . . . another Ps. and extempore prayer." The Brownists, afterwards called Independents, who separated from the Church about 1580, rejected set F. as superstitious and unlawful.

At the Hampton Court Conference no objection was offered to set F., possibly because the Puritans felt that an extreme attitude would be impolitic. But by 1644 the views of the Independents and Scotch Covenanters had so leavened Puritan thought, that, in the DIRECTORY FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP compiled by the Westminster Assembly, no prescribed form of pr. was adopted, and a condemnation of such F. inserted in the Preface. Jeremy Taylor replied with his Apology for Authorized and Set Forms of Liturgy, the ablest treatise ever published on this subject. Bp. Hall also wrote a defence, which was answered by a treatise called Smectymnuus, a fictitious word formed from the initials of its Puritan composers, Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow. They challenged the Bp. to produce any genuine Liturgy bef. 300, and denied the uniform and prescribed use of one bef. the Council of Milan in 416.¹ With characteristic gentleness, the Bishop replied that, "Nothing hinders, but that this liberty and a public Liturgy should be good friends and go hand in hand together."

¹ The authors of Smectymnuus seem to have made a mistake here. No Council of Milan in 416 is known to history. The canon they quote is No. 9 of the Council of Carthage in 407.

In the Exceptions against the BCP, presented by the Puritans to the Bps. at the Savoy Conference in 1661, it is affirmed that: "The gift of prayer, being one special qualification for the work of the ministry bestowed by Christ in order to the edification of his Church . . . it is desired that there may be no such imposition of the Liturgy, as that the exercise of that gift be thereby totally excluded in any part of public worship" (Cardwell, Conferences, p. 306). So far were the Bps. from accepting this suggestion that in Session 40 they unanimously voted for prescribed F. for use bef. and aft. Sermons, thus taking away the last remaining opportunity for extempore prayer. To their credit, however, they did not carry out this resolution.

During the 19th cent. the opposition to set F. largely decreased among non-episcopal bodies and a liturgical revival began. The Wesleyans use an emended form of the PB which is becoming more popular every year, even in country districts. The use of the Book of Common Order published by the Church Service Society has spread rapidly in the Church of Scotland during the last few years. A form of the PB with the emendations of the Savoy Ministers, drawn up by Professor Shields of Princeton, is used in several Presbyterian churches in America.

Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers; Duchesne, Origin of X'tian Worship; Bingham, Antiquities of the Christian Ch.; Frankland, The Early Eucharist; Neal, Hist. of the Puritans; Hall, Reliquiae Liturgicae; Schaaf-Hertzog, Encycl. of Religious Knowledge, art. Liturgies; Procter and Frere, Hist. of BCP; Perry, Engl. Ch. History, vol. ii.; Strype, Life of Whitgift; Cardwell, Conferences on BCP; Hooker, Eccles. Polity, bk. v.; Jeremy Taylor, Works 7:318 (Heber's ed.).—Bz. P. A. MILLER.

FORMULARY.—"A prescribed form; a formula" (Webster's Dict.).

FOUNDATION, OLD;—NEW.—English Cathedrals are organised on different lines according to their origin. Those of the old foundation are the thirteen whose chapters were, before the Reformation, composed of secular clergy, viz.: York, St. Paul's, Lincoln, Lichfield, Hereford, Wells, Salisbury, Exeter, Chichester, St. David's, Llandaff, Bangor and St. Asaph. The new foundation chapters comprise those founded by Henry VIII after the dissolution of the monasteries, viz.: Canterbury, Winchester, Worcester, Ely, Carlisle, Durham, Rochester and Norwich; Peterborough, Chester, Gloucester, Bristol and Oxford; the first eight were new deaneries to the bishoprics of the old foundation; the last five were deaneries to the bishoprics of the new foundation. In all thirteen the new dean and chapter took the place of regular clergy. (See further, CATHEDRAL.)—A8. R. J. WHITWELL.

FOUNDATION-STONE LAYING.—For many centuries it has been usual to lay a FS.

or more than one, when a church or some other important building is begun. This function is: (1) a solemn inauguration of the Work by an Act of Worship, in acknowledgment of the fact that "except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost that build it"; (2) a useful advertisement and means of obtaining money.

In 1220 the building of Salisbury Cathedral was solemnly begun with a great FS. laying. The bishop (Richard Poore) laid the first stone on behalf of the Pope, the second for the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the third for himself. The Earl of Salisbury laid the fourth stone, and his Countess the fifth. Other stones were laid by distinguished clergymen and laymen, and all who laid stones pledged themselves to a subscription to the Building Fund, payment to be spread over seven years. These 13th cent. stonelayers have recently had many unconscious imitators amongst the Nonconformists. But Churchmen have generally preferred to have only one FS., though cases are on record where the one stone has (with advantage) been laid by several persons representing various classes, as, e.g., landlords, clergy, employers of labour, labouring men. To have only one FS. seems more in accordance with the imagery of H. Scripture in its language respecting our Lord. It is usual to place beneath a FS. a bottle containing various papers and coins (of low value).

The essential element of the Service is the Benediction and Fixing of the Stone, in the Faith of Christ, the Chief Corner Stone, and in the Name of the H. Trinity, with statement of the purpose for which the building is intended. Prs. should be used for God's Blessing on the Work, Workers, Benefactors, and for the supply of the needful funds. Hymns may be used, and such Pss. as 127, 84, 87, 122. There are three useful forms of Service in the Priest's Prayer Book, pp. 223, 230, 232. But most dioceses have an Official Order sanctioned by the Bp. The stone should be marked with a modest Cross. If any inscription be desired, it should be as simple a record as possible (in Latin by preference) of the fact that a certain person laid the stone on a certain date.—S4.

W. A. WICKHAM.

FRACTION.—The synoptic Gospels and St. Paul agree in relating that at the Institution of the Euch. our Saviour "brake" the Bread which He hallowed.

1. At Last Supper. The importance attached by the Disciples to this action may be gathered from the fact that from it originated the designation first given to the whole rite. "The Breaking of Bread" was the earliest title of the Euch. celebration. It is to be noted that our Lord's F. took place after the Consecration of the Bread; the words, "This is My Body . . . This is My Blood," etc., which in the Roman and English Liturgies, in accordance with venerable tradition, are treated as the Words of Consecration, are not the consecratory words used by Christ Himself. (See EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION.) What these words were is not recorded. It was after He had "blessed" and "given thanks" that Christ "brake," and used the words just referred to.

In order to carry out with exactness the institution of Christ every Liturgy requires a

2. The Three Ceremonial Fractions.

F. of the Bread to be made in the course of the service, but considerable differences exist as to the manner of accomplishing this rite. Three kinds of F. are in use; these may be called: (a) the imitative, (b) the mystical, and (c) the utilitarian.

(a) The imitative F. is that prescribed in our PB, which strangely enough contained no direction for this rite till 1662. The celebrant in reciting the record of our Lord's act ("He brake it") imitates it. The traditional way of complying with this direction, by men of all schools, has been for the celebrant at the appropriate words to take one of the small pieces of bread prepared for Consecration, and to break it in two. The act thus assumes a purely ceremonial character, and seems almost naturally suggested by the words, but be it observed that it does not really represent what our Lord did, as it takes place before Consecration. Small trace of this F. is found in ancient Liturgies; something like it, however, appears in the Coptic Liturgy of St. Basil, and traces of some such custom are found in a few mediæval Missals.

3. The Imitative Fraction.

(b) The mystical F., found in almost, if not quite, all Liturgies of ancient descent, takes place after Consecration at a varying point in the service; it is frequently accompanied by words and ceremonies of highly mystical import, which include the mingling of a portion of the broken consecrated Bread with the consecrated Wine in the Chalice (see COMMIXTIO).

4. The Mystical Fraction.

(c) The utilitarian F., which in Oriental Liturgies is often combined with the mystical F., is simply the ceremonial breaking of the

5. The Utilitarian Fraction.

Sacr. Bread into portions suitable for the Communion of the faithful. This F. is the one of which we find the earliest mention in ancient writers. It has been abandoned in the Western Church (for reasons of convenience and reverence) since the introduction of separate breads to be consecrated for the use of communicants. In the East the Sacr. Bread is still ceremonially broken up for communicants and mingled with the contents of the Chalice. (See WAFER.)—R2. T. I. BALL.

FRANCHISE.¹—The Vestry is not an elected body. It is an assembly of parishioners, including women, and consists of two classes, those who pay rates for the relief of the poor of the parish, and those who occupy hereditaments which are rated for the same purpose. It is thus altogether based on a rate-paying qualification. Although the vestry is an ecclesiastical body its members have no spiritual qualification; a man may be a Nonconformist, or a Roman Catholic, or a Jew, or an avowed disbeliever in all revealed religion, or a notorious evil-liver; yet, if he pays his rates, he is qualified to attend a meeting of the vestry and to take a part in the exercise of the vestry's powers. And if a poll be demanded, which may be done by any member of the vestry, the parishioners have votes in proportion to the amount of their assessment up to a maximum of six votes. A man assessed at an annual value of less than £50 has one vote; at more than £50 but not more than £75, two votes; and so on, with an additional vote for every complete £25 of assessment, up to an assessment of £150 with six votes, which is the maximum.

1. For the Vestry.

¹ For the exercise of the Franchise for the Ruridecanal Conference, and (derivatively) for the Diocesan Conference and the Representative Church Council, see latter art.

It is only in ancient parishes that the vestry proper exists, though in new ecclesiastical parishes or districts there is an assembly of a similar kind for which persons are qualified in the same way as for the vestry. But in these new parishes there is no plural voting, whatever the assessment of the parishioner; each parishioner has only one vote. In some places under local Acts, or by the adoption of the Vestries Act of 1831, the parishioners do not themselves exercise the powers of a vestry, but elect what is called a "Select Vestry," to which those powers are committed. This is, however, comparatively a rare case.

The question of the qualifying F. for lay representation was discussed among Churchmen for many years before the Representative Church Council in 1903 arrived at the decision which has since remained unaltered. These discussions took place in Diocesan Conferences and in the Houses of Laymen, as well as in the Houses of Convocation of the two Provinces. And they revealed differences of opinion which may be classified in five divisions, although of course there were those whose opinions did not precisely fall within any of the five, or were held with a moderation or a dubiety which allowed of their rapid and easy modification.

2. For the Representative Church Council.

(i) Some Churchmen, emphasising the national character of the Church of England, were anxious that the F. should be that which already existed for the vestries; that is to say, that it should depend on a rate-paying qualification. They argued that it was the claim and boast of the Church of England that her activity and responsibility were coterminous with the nation. Individuals might exclude themselves from her ministrations; but she excluded none. Her mission was to the nation; and every citizen was by right a member of her communion if he chose to avail himself of his membership.

(ii) Other Churchmen shrank from the rate-paying qualification as being secular and inconsistent with the purely spiritual character of a religious body; and also as connecting the membership of the Church with the possession of a property qualification. But many of these thought that it was desirable that the qualification should be as wide as possible, and urged therefore that Baptism should be the only requirement. Every baptised person, they argued, is a member of the Church, and has therefore a right to the initial F. of her representative system.

(iii) Probably a more numerous body of opinion were from the outset in favour of restricting the F. more closely than would be done by a baptismal or a rate-paying qualification, and required, in addition to one or other of those qualifications, subscription to a declaration that the applicant for the F. adhered to the Church of England and to no other religious body. Those who adopted this view relied on the obvious consideration that there was something inappropriate and even absurd in allowing Nonconformists and Roman Catholics to decide about the government of the Church of England.

(iv) Strongly opposed to all these three solutions of the problem were those Churchmen who insisted that only communicants were entitled to the F. Communion, they maintained, was an absolute obligation upon Churchmen. Those who did not communicate were essentially rebels against Church order, nay, were disobedient to the command of Christ Himself. The non-communicant was one who had excommunicated himself; one who voluntarily stood outside the full membership of the Church. He was not excluded from the F.: he excluded himself by abstaining from Communion. And why did he so exclude himself? Must it not be either because of conscientious dissent from the Church's teaching, or of consciousness of grave sin, or of indifference to religious obligations? And could it reasonably be argued that the Church ought to be governed by dissenters, by evil-livers, or by the indifferent?

(v) Against these arguments one consideration weighed strongly even with a section who felt sympathy with their general trend. It was that to make the Lord's Supper a test and a qualification, even for the rights of Church membership, was to risk its profanation, and to lower its sanctity. These persons therefore desired a solution which, while meeting the objections which were urged to the wider Fs. founded on rate-paying, on baptism, or on a declaration of adherence, might yet run no risk of degrading the Eucharist. Accordingly, they propounded a solution of the problem which was ultimately adopted.

They suggested that those qualified for Communion should be deemed to be also qualified for the initial F., even although they had never availed themselves of their right to communicate or had so availed themselves rarely and irregularly. This qualification implied that the F. was to extend to those who were confirmed and were not excommunicate. But there exists also in the Church of England a small class of persons who are accustomed to be communicants although they have never been confirmed. This is unquestionably an irregularity; but it was felt that those who were admitted to Communion could not possibly be excluded from the F. A phrase was therefore coined which by definition was made to include both those who were qualified by Confirmation for Communion and those who, although not confirmed, were yet communicants. The phrase adopted was, persons who have "the status of communicants." The convenient method of using a specific phrase and defining it to meet all requirements was further employed in order to exclude persons who had been confirmed but who had seceded from the Church of England. As finally settled the qualification was made to run: "'Qualified person' means a lay member of the Church of England who has the status of a communicant—that is to say, either (a) is an actual communicant, or (b) has been baptised and confirmed and is admissible to Holy Communion and does not belong to any religious body which is not in communion with the Church of England." In this way a conclusion was reached in respect to the controversies between those who favoured a communicant F. and those who desired a F. depending on a declaration of adherence, on baptism, or on the payment of rates. Communion was recognised as being the true basis of full membership of the Church; but at the same time all risk or even appearance of profaning the Sacrament by using it as a test was avoided.

Another important controversy arose over the question whether the F. should be limited to men or should be extended to women. On the one side, it was urged that according to the teaching of St. Paul women were not intended to take part in the government of the Church; and that the immemorial custom of Christendom in excluding them from Holy Orders, no less than the example of the holy women of the New Testament headed by the Blessed Virgin herself, showed plainly that the undoubted virtues and sanctity often associated with the female character nevertheless furnished no ground for claiming a vocation for women in Church government. On a lower plane of argument it was pointed out that, if women were treated with perfect equality and fully admitted to the same F. as men, the very fact that women were more often religious than men would result in their considerably outnumbering the male voters; and, whatever might be the abstract merits of the question of right, it could hardly be doubted that a F. which enabled women to exercise a greater measure of authority than men in the Church would not give adequate weight and authority to the assemblies that it was the means of electing. To these arguments it was replied that St. Paul has himself emphasised the truth that Christianity transcends the distinctions between men and women; and that there was no analogy between admission to Holy Orders and the exercise of so simple and elementary a right as was involved in the F. Moreover—and this was perhaps the decisive argument—it was recalled that women were actually qualified, and had from ancient times been qualified, for the office of Churchwarden; and it was asked whether anyone would venture at the present day to deprive them of a right which they had always possessed and not infrequently exercised. The difficulty of the numerical superiority which the full extension of the F. would give to women was met by the suggestion that only those women should be enfranchised who possessed the old qualification for the vestries founded on the payment of rates, as well as the new qualification of the status of a communicant. This did not appear very logical, but its convenience was manifest; and some colour was attempted to be given it by dwelling on the fact that the Church had always recognised the position of the head of a house.

4. The Admission of Women.

3. Qualification Defined.

One other controversy of importance arose in connection with the exercise of the F., and

5. Limitation to Parishioners. this controversy cannot even now be regarded as finally determined.

It was generally agreed that the electors should elect parochial lay representatives who in the Ruridecanal Conference should elect representatives to the Diocesan Conference, the Diocesan Conference in its turn electing the members of the House of Laymen. But the question was then raised, Is a man bound to vote in the parish in which his residence is situate, or may he not at his option be included in the parish in the church of which he habitually worships? In the country districts of course no difficulty arises, since people are accustomed to worship in their parish church. But in the towns it is very common indeed for a man to attend a church which is not the church of his parish. In many cases persons have become active and prominent in church work in connection with churches of other parishes; and it was urged with much earnestness that to compel such persons to vote in a parish in which they felt no interest, and with which they had no spiritual connection, would make the representative system unreal, and would discourage the co-operation of some of the most active and devoted of the laity. It was responded that the parochial system is a fundamental characteristic of the Church of England, and that to introduce a congregational qualification into the F. would be contrary to the whole spirit of the law of the Church, and at least less congruous to the idea of establishment than the territorial organisation which adherence to a particular parish implies. In the end the proposal to allow persons who habitually attend a church to vote as though they were residents in that parish was rejected by a majority of the House of Bishops and of the House of the Clergy; a small majority of the Lay House only approving it. As according to the constitution of the Representative Church Council it is necessary to obtain the approval of all the three Houses to carry any proposal, the congregational basis of F. was excluded. Unhappily, all sections of opinion were not in this matter, as they were in others, prepared to acquiesce in the decision of the Representative Church Council; and the Diocese of Birmingham has actually seceded from the general representative system rather than consent to a strictly parochial Franchise.

The machinery by which a qualified lay person becomes entitled to vote is very simple. He or she (being a person of full age) must subscribe a declaration affirming that he or she has the status of a communicant lay member of the Church of England. This declaration has a note appended to it in these terms:

6. How to Claim the Franchise.

"N.B.—A person has the status of a communicant who either (a) is an actual communicant; or (b) is baptised and confirmed and is admissible to Holy Communion and does not belong to any religious body which is not in communion with the Church of England."

If the person be a man, he is, on signature of the declaration, entitled to vote in the election of parochial lay representatives for his parish who are in the Ruridecanal Conference to elect the members of the Diocesan Conference; if the person be a woman, she must also show that she is entitled by ownership or occupation to vote at a vestry of the parish in which she resides if it be an ancient parish possessing a vestry, or, if not, that she would be so entitled if her parish were an ancient parish. The mechanism by which the successive stages of representation are carried out is beyond the scope of this article. Nor can they yet be regarded as in any sense finally settled. Even at this moment (1909) a Committee is charged with revising the machinery for the representation of the laity. But, whatever method is finally adopted for the choice of the members of the Houses of Laymen, it may be confidently anticipated that the F. will remain based on the status of a communicant as its qualification.

—A2.

HUGH CECIL.

FREE-WILL.—Will is that faculty in the complex nature of man which enables him to act. A free will is a will, free to act under limitations. Some authorities ascribe this freedom to the will itself, others to some faculty controlling it. Those who deny freedom are called Necessarians, Necessitarians, or Determinists. Advocates of FW. base their doctrine on a supposed natural instinct. Determinists ascribe this instinct to man's ignorance of the motives that determine his acts. The problem of FW. was discussed very superficially by the Greek and Roman philosophers. Aristotle, in the Nicomachean Ethics, makes the freedom of the will the basis of moral responsibility. Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Augustine, and others discuss the question in relation to the overruling will of God. Most of the Patristic and Mediæval writers fall back on Revelation as the only means of reconciling human freedom with Election, Predestination, and the Omnipotence of God. At the Reformation opinion was divided. Art. 10 neither asserts nor denies the doctrine, for, although the Art. is headed "Of Free-Will," it is really concerned with the limitation of freedom—man's inability to do good works without the assistance of Divine Grace.

1. Definition and History.

The controversy between the advocates and the opponents of FW. has assumed great importance in modern times. German philosophers, such as Kant and Fichte, approaching the problem by an analysis of mental faculties, have declared in favour of freedom. In England, where the influence of natural science has been predominant, and the bent of the popular mind practical rather than theoretical, the opposite opinion has been widely maintained. Sharply divided as the two views appear, they are really complementary. If attention is directed exclusively to the action of the brain, there can be little doubt that the Determinists are right. The forces operating there are physical forces, and as such absolutely determinate. Riel, the most distinguished of modern Determinists, presses the matter further, insisting that these forces are incapable of modification except by similar physical forces, arguing that the claim for the mind of a power of influence over cerebral processes is tantamount to an ascription of a purely physical character to it. Thus the whole mentality of man becomes enmeshed in the trammels and laws of physical force. This argument, however, involves a false assumption. It is not true that only a physical force can influence a physical force, as will become apparent from the following consideration. The impressions conveyed to the brain by the organs of sense are of a vibratory character. As vibrations they impinge on the sense-organs, and as vibrations they enter the brain. But vibrations are not thoughts. To become thoughts they must undergo a radical transformation. There is a world of difference between the mental image or impression of a colour or a sound and the wave lengths that correspond with them. If our thoughts were vibrations, we should have need of only one sense instead of five. Sensations physically regarded are all of a kind, all undulatory. Mentally, they are irreconcilably different. This marvellous transformation takes place in crossing that mysterious gulf that separates mind from matter. Thus physical forces, acting on the physical plane, produce mental impressions acting on the mental plane. And the reverse is equally true. The two planes are complementary. The mind cannot act without the brain, nor the brain without the mind. The problems of the brain are physical problems; but, when we cross the gulf and enter upon an investigation of the laws of mind, we are confronted by entirely new conditions. We are no longer called on to deal with physical processes, but with mental processes; and, although the laws of the one have a curious and, indeed, vital relation with the laws of the other, they are still widely apart.

2. Free-Will and Determinism.

We have therefore to ask whether freedom, denied to the brain, can be ascribed to the mind. The Determinist maintains that it cannot. We never act, he says, outside our motives. We do not know precisely what those motives are, and hence arises our fancy that we are free.

Freedom is an illusion arising out of ignorance. This position also needs examination. Is it true that our feeling of uncertainty is identical with our feeling of freedom? Certainly it is not. Uncertainty breeds anxiety, doubt, and hesitation, feelings entirely distinct from the pleasurable and exuberant sense of freedom. If Spinoza, who originated this notion, had considered the evidence before him, he would never have suggested such an inadequate explanation. Freedom is not a name for our uncertainty about our motives; it is a feeling of mastery—a feeling that, whatever motives there may be for or against an action, we are able to accept them or ignore them at pleasure. Nor is the sense of freedom due, as others have supposed, to an afterthought; it does not arise from the reflection that we might have acted otherwise. It is a present sensation accompanying the act. Among the countless thought-streams, conscious and subconscious, that surge through the mind, furnishing what we call motives to the will, we possess the power of selection. We can elevate the most remote, delicate and fugitive thought into exclusive prominence by paying attention to it. That selected thought, or motive, pleasant or unpleasant, strong or weak, becomes for the moment the sole occupant of the field of thought. It is in this power of selection that our sense of freedom resides. It is a freedom of choice. It may be an illusion, but no Determinist has succeeded yet in showing that it is; and, as a distinct recognisable and universal instinct, it must have some foundation.

But, if the will is free, it is only partially free. It cannot step outside the laws of the mind of which it forms a part; that of course is obvious. But there are other limitations no less rigorous, first among which should be placed the necessity of complying with the demands of the body for food and rest. We may indeed will to ignore these claims, but we do so at the risk of suffering and death. The freedom of the will is also limited by racial and national peculiarities, by heredity, by climatic and geographical conditions, and beyond all these by the contagion of thought, the influence on morals and general conduct brought to bear upon man by society. The most potent of all limitations are those imposed by ourselves, the habits we form of action and thought; in other words, our co-operation with, or resistance of, Divine Grace.

3. Limitations of Free-Will.

In practical working, FW. manifests itself in the form it imposes upon its environment. Man makes his own world. If he builds a house, the materials he uses and the forces he employs are all physical, and ruled by the laws that govern the physical world. But the form he impresses upon them comes from his mind, it is an emanation from his imagination, it is his "design." The footprints of man in the world are in their way as clear and as distinguishable as the footprints of the Creator; both exhibit design, both are the expression of freedom. Philosophically, the freedom of God and the freedom of man are complementary. A mechanical mind involves a mechanical universe.

4. Footprints of Free-Will.

(Spinoza, Ethics, pt. 2, prop. 48; Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, Third Antinomy; Mill's Logic, bk. 6; Riel, Science and Metaphysics, pt. 2, c. 3; H. Browne on the 39 Arts., Art. 10.)—KI.

E. A. WESLEY.

FRESCO.—F, a term strictly applicable only to mural painting done on the fresh plaster, has come to be popularly used of all mural painting, and in this popular sense it will be considered. The decoration of the walls of a ch. by painting has been practised from the earliest ages.

In England the custom was largely extended by the influence of Benedict Biscop and his craftsmen from Gaul, and in the 9th cent. a canon was passed requiring every bp.

1. Mediæval English Frescoes.

before consecrating a ch. to see that a figure of the patron saint was painted upon the wall or over the altar. The Normans developed the work which the Saxons had begun, and their chs. were invariably ornamented with mural paintings. After the middle of the 12th cent. the art advanced rapidly, both in design of figure and ornament, and in the quality and variety of the colours employed. The paintings at Copford in Essex, though they underwent a mediæval restoration, show the excellence then attained. But the palette was still limited; in the smaller chs. all through the Middle Ages there was a general restriction to red, yellow, and black, with a sparing use of green and blue. In the 13th cent. it became customary to paint not the walls only, but the shafts and carved capitals, and the compartments of vaulting. At this period the walls were often covered with diaper work, the white surface being divided into squares, diamonds, or oblongs by red lines, the spaces being filled with simple ornament in red or grey; and the ribs of the vaulting-bounded compartments filled with stiff or flowing patterns in line, relieved by medallions with figures or devices, often monograms. Certain figure-subjects were of frequent recurrence. Of Gospel incidents, those most often found are the Annunciation and the Crucifixion, and the nave pillars of St. Albans Abbey exhibit remarkable examples of the latter. A great painting of St. Christopher was usually placed opposite the south or principal door of the ch., in order that it might easily be seen, since the mediæval belief was that whoever looked upon St. Christopher would be safe from sudden death on that day. Over the chancel arch, as at St. Edmund's, Salisbury, or in the tympanum filling it above the rood-loft, as at Wenhamston, Suffolk, was usually represented the Doom, showing the blessed being received into the turretted city of heaven, the lost being cast into hell's mouth. St. Edmund was always a popular subject. After the martyrdom of St. Thomas of Canterbury his figure was often painted on the ch. wall. Most of these have been obliterated, either in accordance with the Injunction of Henry VIII, or by a later and general destruction: a good example, which had been preserved by being covered over, may be seen at Hauxton, Cambs. Symbolic figures were of comparatively late introduction; but a fine 13th cent. example of the Wheel of Fortune may be seen in Rochester cathedral, where also the walls of the choir show a good 14th cent. decorative heraldic design, of which the lowest part is original. Mural painting suffered as a consequence of the Wars of the Roses. After the Reformation the mediæval paintings were in many places whitewashed over, and on the fresh surface were painted texts of Scripture, within ornamented borders.

The return to mediæval precedent in architecture and the allied crafts which accompanied the progress of the Oxford Movement gave an 2. Modern Frescoes. impetus to wall painting. Mr.

Lestrange at St. Alban's, Holborn; Mr. Dyce at All Saints', Margaret Street; Mr. Gambier Parry in his ch. at Highnam; and Mr. (afterwards Sir) Frederick Leighton at Lyndhurst, did work of fine quality and reverent spirit. Since then, the art of mural painting can hardly be said to have proceeded pari passu with the advance of sculpture and glass-painting. The desire to make every part of the ch. glow with colour has given place to the feeling that the rest of the ch. should be subordinated to the altar and its surroundings, and there is even a desire to provide, by the revived use of whitewash, a foil for the focussed splendour of the east end and the altar.—R4.

E. HERMITAGE DAY.

FRIDAY.—See WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 3.

FRONTAL.—See CARPET.

FULL MOON ECCLESIASTICAL.—See CAL-ENDAR, §§ 3, 6.

FUNERAL.—See BURIAL, BURIAL SERVICE.

FURNITURE.—See FITTINGS.

GALLERY.—Gs. are found in several of the Latin Basilicas such as St. Agnese and St. Lorenzo at Rome. Structural stone Gs. of Norman date occur at the ends of the transepts at Winchester and at the west end of Melbourn Church. The large triforia of Ely, Peterborough and Westminster were doubtless used for congregational purposes on great occasions, and the same was probably the case with the upper aisles of Laon, where the Gs. are in addition to the triforium, and other similar French churches. Stone 15th cent. Gs. are often met with in Southern Germany, and late mediæval usage introduced western Gs. for the use of the choir in Spain.

Our own roodlofts and the mediæval west Gs. at Worsted and Trunch (Norfolk) were probably used as minstrels' Gs. The use of wooden Gs. for congregational purposes did not become general in England till the 17th cent. Early Post-Reformation west Gs. remain at Odiham (Hants.) and Bishop's Cleeve (Gloucester), and handsome Gs. were built in Dartmouth Church in the early 17th cent. The Gs. with which many ancient churches were disfigured in the 18th cent. were often ugly and inconvenient, and many of them have been removed. But in several Queen Anne and Hanoverian churches the Gs. are an integral part of the design: where this is done tastefully there seems no good reason why Gs. should not be used, at any rate in town churches built upon confined sites.—R6. CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

GENUFLEXION.—See BOWING.

GILDING.—(a) In the case of plate. Silver PLATE may be either wholly gilt, or "parcel" gilt, i.e., partly gilt, the inside of the bowl of a silver chalice often being gilt when the rest is left plain. (b) In architectural decoration. In Gothic times stone or wood was seldom left in its raw state inside a ch., but was painted and gilt with great elaboration both for ornament and protection. All our ancient screens and most carved roofs, besides pulpits, reredoses, font-covers, and much carved stone-work, were originally brilliant with gold and colour.—R4.

F. C. EELES.

GIRDLE.—A cincture; usually a white linen rope some twelve to fourteen feet long, with a tassel at each end, worn round the waist to gird up the alb. Originally it was a flat band, often richly ornamented with jewels and fastened by a buckle or clasp. The G. came into general use in the West about the end of the 8th century. Although usually of white material it may be, and often is, coloured.—R3.

J. O. COOP.

GLASS.—This art. will confine itself to the question of the history of the use of stained glass as a decoration for churches, and, with slight exceptions, will not enter into questions of technique and manufacture. Let it be merely premised that stained-glass windows are used for the display of decorative patterns or pictures, composed of pieces of coloured glass cut to the required shape. On these pieces, when it is desired to form them into a picture, features of faces, folds of drapery, hair and the like, are painted with the brush: the paint is fixed by burning in a furnace, and the pieces are then fitted together by grooved bands of lead, framed into panels, and set up in the window-frame, where they are usually secured by lead or copper ties, which attach the panels to iron bars—transverse, upright, or both—set in the stone work. The colours—blue, green, or red—are in the substance of the glass: in the case of the red or ruby, it is commonly a veneer upon a body of white glass: in the case of other colours it is present in the whole thickness of the glass.

It is probable that the earliest extant specimens of stained-glass windows date from a time near to that when we first find written records of the art. Our first record is that Bishop Hoel of Le Mans (1081-1097) put some painted windows in his Cathedral: and it is generally thought that a portion of one of these still exists at Le Mans: it is the lower part of a composition representing the Ascension. In recent years it has been, most inexcusably, supplemented by the addition of an upper panel to complete the design. Another example which, perhaps, also belongs to the 11th cent. is a figure of St. Timothy in the church of Neuweiler in Alsace, and a very early date has been assigned to some figures in the clerestory of Augsburg Cathedral.

The 12th century is somewhat better represented. Notable examples are to be found at Chartres, in the western windows of the nave, and the central portion of the window known as Notre Dame de la belle Verrière: also at Vendôme, and at St. Denis, where a few medallions remain of those inserted by the famous Abbot Suger. In England there are fragments (some belonging to a Jesse-tree) scattered about the clerestory of York Minster.

The 13th cent. is regarded by many as the crowning period of the art. The work of the time is characterised by splendour and depth of colour, and by great skill and inventiveness in the selection of subjects, and what may be called the narration of stories. France is incomparably the richest of all countries in respect of the quantity and the quality of its 13th cent. glass. At Chartres and at Bourges there are churches which have retained their original windows almost intact: Le Mans, Troyes, Auxerre, Sens, Rheims, are also immensely important. In England, Canterbury Cathedral is without a rival in the amount of glass of the period which it has preserved.

The scanty remains of 12th cent. glass may be considered together with the work of the 13th century. The designs of windows were naturally influenced by the position they were to occupy. In windows near the ground it was the practice to depict a Biblical story or the life of a saint in a series of scenes (commonly in circular medallions) which were set on a ground of plain colour or of ornament. White or pale glass was little favoured, and the general aspect of these "medallion" windows, with their copious leadwork and small pieces of glass, suggests the analogy of mosaic work. For clerestory windows, and those further from the eye, large single figures, or a few large medallions, were manifestly appropriate. Some series of personages—Ancestors of Christ, Prophets and Apostles, or Bishops of the particular ch.—was commonly selected for such a position. Some of the most interesting of the medallion windows were devoted to the illustration of our Lord's life by means of types. This practice was possibly initiated by Suger at St. Denis. Important remains of such a series exist at Canterbury: it formerly filled some twelve windows. Single windows of this kind are to be seen in many of the great French churches. Another practice (represented formerly at Canterbury, and by extant windows at Bourges, Sens, and elsewhere) was to give a whole window to the illustration of a Parable. In some cases, e.g., the Good Samaritan and the Sower, the meaning of the story was brought out by means of types; in other cases, e.g., the Prodigal Son, the story was represented without such additions.

3. Early Subjects and Designs.

Many of these windows were gifts. Portraits of the donors, when these were individuals, are frequently introduced, usually at the foot of the window. Royal or noble personages are seen clad in their armorial bearings: sometimes they hold in their hands a model of the window which they offer to the church. It may be fairly said that heraldic glass—a very important branch of the art—first came in with the figures of donors. The gifts of corporations and trade-guilds are distinguished in a different way by scenes showing a particular art or craft being carried on. Coopers, vintners, goldsmiths, butchers, weavers, masons, are there seen exercising their various trades.

The 13th or wheel-windows were usually occupied by the portrayal of a single idea: such are, God in glory surrounded by the Elders of the Apocalypse, the Last Judgment, the Glorification of the Virgin; or again, the Arts and Sciences, the Virtues, the Ten Commandments, the Old Law and the New.

Besides the figured windows there were others filled merely with patterns or consisting mainly of grisaille glass varied with a few jewels of colour; and others again in which the glass was wholly white, and the window depended for its interest upon the fact that the lead-work was formed into patterns. The whole class of patterned and grisaille windows, beautiful as it is, is necessarily less interesting than the pictured windows. The leading example in this country is afforded by the "Five Sisters" in the north transept of York Minster.

The glass of the 14th cent. shows advance in technique and in delicacy of handling, but in respect of subject is less interesting and varied than what preceded it. In it we note the great development of the architectural canopy, and the presence of large areas of white glass. Heraldry also becomes prominent. In a typical three-light window of this century we shall find in each light a single figure, with a coat-of-arms or figures of donors or perhaps a historical scene placed below its feet, and a canopy filling up the remainder of the light, so that the strong colour forms a single band across the window; the small tracery-lights will be occupied by foliage, angels, heraldry, and so on. We find comparatively few windows in which a consecutive story is told. Single figures of saints predominate, and in a large church (such as York Minster) the same personages appear over and over again. This monotony of treatment and shrinkage in the variety of subjects is a defect for which the increased delicacy of treatment hardly compensates. Yet, when one is looking at the best work of this century, one can only be grateful for it. Particularly beautiful is the new fashion of using grisaille glass for figure-subjects. A window in the north clerestory of Evreux Cathedral, dated 1400, is a consummate work of this kind.

4. The 14th Century.

Much fourteenth century glass remains in England. York (especially the Minster), Gloucester (E. window), Carlisle (head of E. window), Tewkesbury, furnish leading examples. Oxford (New College Chapel) has a striking series of single figures. Lowick near Thrapston and Stanford near Rugby may be named among smaller churches.

The output of glass in the 15th cent. was enormous. Some idea of it may be gained when one thinks of the number of churches in England which were either wholly rebuilt in the Perpendicular style or had their small windows of earlier periods replaced by large Perpendicular ones. Many of the churches of this century were simply large lanterns for the display of stained glass. On the Continent almost equal activity was shown, and, as might be expected, far more of its products have survived than with us. In respect of style and subject we notice that the architectural canopy and the single figure are retained and increased in importance; a figure and its canopy will now fill a whole light instead of the middle third. There is a return to the fashion of portraying consecutive stories, for the artist feels himself able to give life and interest to the details of a scene. Less originality, however, is shown in the choice of subjects. Manuals such as the Biblia Pauperum and the Speculum Humanae Salvationis (both of which contain collections of scenes from the NT illustrated by types from the OT) are extensively employed, and for the lives of the most famous saints a somewhat stereotyped cycle of scenes is chosen. It is even possible to point to windows extant in different churches which have evidently been made from the same cartoon. Commercial methods are, in fact, beginning to make themselves felt. We begin to hear of the organisation of the trade, of ateliers in different cities, and of the names of individual tradesmen. This condition of things, if it made the "learned" windows of the 12th cent. impossible, was, at its best, productive of a wonderfully beautiful article.

5. The 15th Century.

There is a great deal of 15th cent. glass left in England, in spite of systematic destruction and neglect. York Minster has three huge windows: the East illustrating the Creation, OT story, and Apocalypse; one in the North Choir Aisle the Life of St. William; and one facing it the Life of St. Cuthbert. Malvern Priory Church has a large series of subject and figure-windows: at All Souls' College, Oxford, are fine single figures; and in the Beauchamp Chapel at Warwick are the lovely remains of the work of John Prudde. Hundreds of other churches possess notable relics of this ancient decoration.

In the 16th cent. the development of this branch of art in England suffered an abrupt break. With the Reformation the demand for churchglass ceased almost entirely: and, in its place, glass—usually armorial—for private houses was asked for. The presence of foreign craftsmen is strongly felt in some of the most remarkable works which we owe to this period. As characteristic of the glass of this century we may note the tendency to regard the window as a mere picture-frame and to emphasise the pictorial character of the composition. The splendour of colour and mastery of detail which the best windows show is unsurpassed: the religious interest is subordinate. The figures of donors usurp a larger place; great skill is lavished on the portrayal of landscapes, buildings and costumes. The control of the workman over his materials is complete, and the importance and prestige of particular ateliers or individual artists becomes vastly increased. The names of Barnard Flower and Galyon Hoone (both of them aliens) in England, and of Enguerrand Leprince, Jean Cousin, and the Pinaigniers in France, are examples. The first two were engaged on the windows of King's College Chapel, Cambridge: specimens of work by the other three may be seen at Beauvais (St. Etienne), Sens, and Paris respectively.

6. The 16th Century.

Two buildings in England (King's College Chapel and Fairford Church, Glouc.) have preserved their stained-glass windows complete. The 25 windows at King's were executed between 1515 and 1531: those at Fairford are somewhat earlier in character and may fall within the last years of the 15th cent. Among the immense treasures of stained glass on the Continent selection is difficult: but mention must be made of the glass at Montmorency near Paris, the splendid series at Auch (Gers), and the Cathedral and parish churches of Troyes, Liège, Cologne, Brussels, Gouda, all have glorious examples; Lichfield Cathedral possesses windows from Herckenrode (and elsewhere), mostly imported after the French Revolution, which can hardly be surpassed. At St. Neots, in Cornwall, is a curious series of windows (badly restored) which merit notice as specimens of provincial work, archaic in style, but dating from about 1530.

At some time, not yet determined, but fairly late in the century, a great change for the worse was effected by the application of enamel-painting to glass.

7. Decadence: Whereas in true stained glass the colour, red, blue, or green, is in the body of the glass, in enamel glass it is painted on the surface of plain glass with a brush, and is fixed by burning. Work of great delicacy and of considerable beauty can be produced by this process upon a small scale; but even so the artist is dealing perversely with his material. It can hardly be reckoned right to paint easel-pictures upon glass. When applied to large surfaces the result of enamel-painting is extremely unfortunate; it is neither beautiful nor durable. Nearly all the glass from the end of the 16th cent. to the beginning of the 19th is affected by this new development.

The decadence of the art has never been thoroughly investigated. In this country a brief revival set in under Abps. Abbot and Laud, which has left its mark on several College Chapels at Oxford, and in Abbot's Hospital at Guildford. The two Van Linges, Abraham and Bernard, were the most prominent artists at this period.

A curious example of what seems English glass is in the east window of Abbey Dore (Hereford); quite good in colour, and absurdly bad in drawing.

The Civil War dealt the coup de grâce. It stopped the production of fresh works and almost stripped our churches of what had survived (and little, in all probability, had been renewed previously¹) in their windows. The well-known journal of W. Dowling, the Earl of Manchester's commissioner in East Anglia, leaves no room for doubt on this head.

There were but few artists in glass in the subsequent period. Henry Giles, of York, executed a window at University College, Oxford, in 1687. J. Oliver gained reputation for minute work. The family of Price (the elder and younger William, and Joshua) did their best between 1700 and 1730. Windows by them may be seen at Magdalen College, ¹ The earlier destroyers had been local objectors on the ground of superstition. They had been restrained from destroying glass because of the cost falling on themselves of reinserting plain glass.

Oxford; it is to be feared that much of what they did has fallen a prey to the Gothic revival. William Peckitt of York (d. 1795) did large works at York Minster, Trinity College Cambridge (Library), New College Oxford, and Exeter Cathedral (W. window, now removed). Thomas Jervais (d. 1801) is responsible for the remarkable and beautiful transparency at New College, designed by Reynolds, and for the windows after West's designs, once in St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle. Francis Eginton of Handsworth (d. 1805) produced a large portion of the glass at Magdalen College, Oxford. Among the best works of the 18th cent. must be reckoned the northern rose of Westminster Abbey (now mutilated), put in by Atterbury when dean. In the early years of the 19th cent. David Evans, of Shrewsbury, had a great reputation. He it was who (with Betton, of London) renewed the glass of Winchester College Chapel (in 1822-28) and also a good part of that in Ludlow parish church.

In and after the revolution period much old glass was imported into England, especially from the Netherlands. Besides Lichfield Cathedral, St. George's, Hanover Square, Southwell Minster, St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, and many smaller churches and private chapels were thus enriched, and a stimulus given to production.

It is impossible to follow out the decline of glass-painting on the Continent. Le Vieil of Paris, one of the earliest systematic writers on the art, considers himself (in 1768) the last to exercise it in France, and asserts that there is an equal dearth of practitioners in Germany and the Low Countries. It is not easy, in fact, to point to really remarkable examples of 18th cent. work. Perhaps the later windows in St. Gudule at Brussels are the most notable.

Not less difficult is it to trace the revival of the art. It went hand in hand with the Gothic

10. The Revival. revival; and, as might have been expected, the aim of those who controlled the producers was to turn out facsimiles of mediæval windows. Among those who distinguished themselves at first the following may be named: Willement, Wailes, Ward and Nixon. J. Hedgeland hardly justified the support given him by C. Winston, the author of the very valuable Hints on Glass Painting by an Amateur. Our Cathedrals and parish churches teem with the work of Hardman, Heaton Butler and Baynes, Clayton and Bell, in which the rapid recovery of the lost ground can be followed; and these, if not deserving unstinted praise, possess not only a measure of actual beauty, but considerable historical interest. The weakest point about them is usually the design, which is apt to be either a slavish copy of a mediæval composition, or else wholly conventional. A new note is struck in the compositions of Burne-Jones, carried out by William Morris. It may reasonably be doubted whether these fulfil all the requirements of stained glass; but their intrinsic interest and beauty give them a place by themselves. A special commemoration is also due to John Clayton for work which, if it was the parent of a vast deal of inferior and uninspired stuff, had undeniable merits of its own. Without attempting to mention or criticise craftsmen who are still living, we may say with some confidence that at this moment the stained-glass artists of this country are achieving better results than can be found anywhere else.

On the Continent much noteworthy work has been done. Reproductions of 13th cent. designs, exasperatingly clever, were soon produced in France under the auspices of Didron and other archaeologists: but as a whole, and until quite recent years, French glass has been poor. The most characteristic product of Germany has been the "Munich Glass" (of which a large quantity may be seen in Glasgow Cathedral). It aims at presenting an immediately intelligible picture: the figures are usually on a large scale, and the colours telling: but for the beautifying of a church this style of glass must be pronounced wholly unsuitable.

Obviously nothing can be said here as to the choice of artists for stained-glass windows; but a word on the selection of subjects may be in place. Most of our churches have suffered from the absence of any ordered plan of subjects for their windows. It is true that in mediæval times such plans were comparatively rare, and that repetition of subjects was common. Regular schemes are most frequently found in certain parts of a great church: e.g., the Clerestory, the Lady-Chapel, the Chapter-house, or the Cloister. They do, however, indisputably add to the interest of a building, and where a new church is being built an effort should be made to provide a considered scheme, into which the windows offered as years go on by individual donors may be fitted. It seems hardly necessary to give examples of such schemes: but it should be borne in mind that, in the windows which are near the level of the eye, it is a mistake to confine the design to a series of single figures, as opposed to pictorial scenes.

11. Counsel as to New Work.

The presence of ugly 19th cent. windows constitutes a great difficulty. It is hard not to acquiesce in their destruction; yet it must be remembered that some of the most distressing efforts of the forties and fifties mark real advances in the revival of the art; and, to the historian, it would be a real calamity if a clean sweep were made of them. Relief may sometimes be obtained by a process of stippling the more dreadful colours with brown paint, applied within or without.

The practice of collecting the relics of old glass into a single window, which is popular with 12. Care of Old Glass.

restorers of churches, is much to be deprecated. Even scanty fragments, if left in situ, may reveal to the expert the original design of the whole window. If old glass is restored, intrusive fragments may legitimately be removed and replaced by glass of neutral tint. If, however, it is deemed essential to restore in colour, a careful drawing of the window showing the modern insertions should always be hung in the church, or be made readily accessible to students. The condition of the leading of ancient windows ought to be strictly inquired into by those in authority; and it is much to be desired that a complete inventory of all remains of old glass should be made.

Lastly, no good results are gained by the employment of opaque or tinted glass to fill new windows, and still less to replace old plain glazing.

The following books on stained glass are of special interest and utility: P. Le Vieil, L'Art de la peinture sur verre et de la vitrerie, Paris, 1774; N. H. J. Westlake, History of Design in Painted Glass, 4 vols., London, 1881-94; L. F. Day, Stained Glass, 1903, Windows, 1909; and the works of C. Winston and Waal.—R4.

M. R. JAMES.

GLEBE.—The assignment of a house and a suitable portion of land (together called "manse") to the incumbent was from the first an absolute canonical condition for the constitution of a parish and the consecration of its church (Abp. Anselm's canon, A.D. 1102), and Lyndwode (Provinc., p. 254) says that glebe-house and land were regarded as accessories of common right to the church. The rule, however, has seldom been adhered to in the modern formation of parishes. Under 51 and 52 Vict., c. 20, G. land may be sold, with permission of the bishop, patron and Lands Commissioners, if for the permanent benefit of the benefice, but not the parsonage house and its curtilage. The land must be sold free of incumbrances, but there may be a farming lease upon it for a term not exceeding fourteen or twenty years. If practicable, the land is to be sold in small parcels, or offered to the Sanitary Authority for the purposes of the Allotment Acts. The price paid is to be invested by the Lands Commissioners in the names of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. G. may be let on building leases for 99 years, or on mining leases for 60 years. In 1878 the maximum yearly value of the G. lands of England was estimated at £400,000, but the present value is perhaps hardly a third of this. By the Pluralities Act of 1838, §§ 28-30, an incumbent is forbidden to keep more than eighty acres in his own hands without written permission from the Bishop, or to appear to sell his produce in market overt.—A6.

DOUGLAS MACLEANE.

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.—The GIE, in its Scriptural form (Luke 2 14) is found in most of the Eastern Liturgies, e.g., the Greek St. James and the Liturgy of the Apost. Const., though in varying parts of the service (Brightman, Eastern Liturgies, pp. 24, 45, 227, 248, 252, 361).

In its extended form, known in the East as the Great Doxology and in the West as the Angelic Hymn, it is, together with the Te Deum, among the chief remains of the psalmi idiotici (i.e., pss. composed by private persons and not taken from the Psalter) of early days (Batiffol, Hist. Brev., p. 9). Some have found a resemblance between it and the thanksgiving Polycarp uttered at his martyrdom (Martyr. Polycarp. 14). This is, however, doubtful.

The GIE appears to have been originally a Greek hymn for Mattins.¹ It is first found in the Appendix to the Psalter in the Codex Alexandrinus (c. 400) of the Bible under the heading of "Morning Hymn," and in the ¹ In the present Greek offices it is said daily at Orthros (Lauds) and Ardoisirov (Compline), but not at the Eucharist.

Apost. Const. (c. 370) under the heading of "Morning Prayer." These sources do not appear to have been known to the compilers of the PB, and the present text differs from them (see Apost. Const. 7 47, Funk's ed., 1905). In the Syrian Tract, De Virginitate, wrongly ascribed to Athanasius, but early (4th cent.), the Christian maiden is advised to say every morning "Glory to God in the highest, and the rest." This probably refers to the hymn we are considering. It seems thus to have been in use at Antioch before the end of the 4th cent., and appears to have been translated into Latin at an early date.

According to the Liber Pontificalis 1 129 (c. 514) it was introduced into the Roman Liturgy by Pope Telephorus (†) early in the 2nd cent., and was said by the bishop only in the Christmas night mass; but Pope Symmachus (498-514) extended its use to Sundays and Festivals (ib. 1 263; cp. Walafrid Strabo, 838, De Rebus Eccles. 22).

There can, however, be little doubt that in the West, as in the East, the GIE. was at first simply a morning (and afterwards an evening) hymn; e.g., the Rule of Cæsarius of Arles (c. 500) gives it for use at Mattins every Sunday (cp. Regula S. Aureliani, and Brev. Goth., Migne, PL 86 943). Although there is no reason to question the statement quoted above, that the hymn as a whole was introduced into the Communion Service at Rome at the beginning of the 6th cent., it was not apparently in general use there till the 11th cent. (cp. Micrologus, c. 1160, De Eccles. Observ. 2).

The Celtic Latin Version corresponds to the Greek of the Codex Alexandrinus, with some variations: (1) "in earth peace to men of good will"—following here the Vulgate; (2) "we give thanks to thee for thy great mercy"—a characteristic Western variant for the Eastern "glory"; (3) "we glorify thee, we magnify thee"; (4) "thou only art the Lord; thou only art glorious with the Holy Ghost in the glory of God the Father," where the repeated reference to the Holy Ghost may be due to the rise of the Macedonian heresy (c. 360, Burn, Introduction to the Creeds, p. 269; cp. Irish Book of Hymns, HBS, 149 ff., 21, 135 ff.; and the Stowe Missal in Warren's Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church, pp. 193, 197, 227, 230). The Eastern (and early Celtic) form reappears in the Scottish Office of 1764 (Dowden, Scottish CO., pp. 223 ff.). The rubric in the (7th cent.) Bangor Antiphonary (HBS, f. 33 r.) directs the use of the GIE. "at Vespers and at Mattins."

In the Ambrosian rite the hymn was used daily at Mattins with a curiously interpolated pr.: "preserve us . . . from heretics, from Arians," etc. (Dowden, Scottish CO., p. 227). It does not appear to have found a place in the ancient Gallican Liturgy (cp. Martene, De Antiq. Eccles. Rit. i, 43), but in the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (c. 700) it occurs as a thanksgiving after Communion, as in the Anglican rite (Warren, u.s., p. 250). In Spain it appears in the 8th cent. (Heterius and Beatus, adv. Elipand. 1 66), but in England not bef. the 11th cent. (see the evidence collected in CQR, Oct., 1885, pp. 12-13).

On the whole, then, the use of the GIE. in the Communion Office at Rome seems to have gradually spread until it was generally adopted in the West in the early part of the Ordinary of the Mass, while its older use as a morning or evening hymn disappeared by degrees (cp. CQR 21 n).

The ordinary Latin version of the GIE. is sometimes ascribed to Hilary of Poitiers

(Alcuin, De Divin. Offic. 40) and is found in MSS. as early as the 8th cent. (DCA, art. Gloria). The present English version, which appears first in the PB of 1552, differs from that of 1549 and from the Roman and Sarum texts in repeating "Thou that takest away, etc." three times, and "Have mercy upon us" also three times, corresponding in the latter respect, whether consciously or not, with the form in the Codex Alexandrinus.

In the first PB of Edward VI, as in the Sarum and other English uses, GIE. is appointed to be sung at the beginning of the Communion Office after the Introit and the Kyries and before the Coll. for the day; it was transferred to its present position in 1552.

The text has been incidentally dealt with to some extent already, but it may be mentioned further that the Sarum, Bangor and Hereford Missals add several interpolations which were appointed to be said at festivals of the Blessed Virgin (Maskell, Ancient Liturgy, p. 37). "Glory be to God on high."

The Scriptural words form a Hebrew parallelism, in which the third clause is subordinate to and an amplification of the second, and therefore without copula. The English text, "goodwill," etc., follows AV; and, oddly enough, the 5th cent. form in the Appendix to Codex Alexandrinus, and indeed that of all the Eastern versions, is the same, though this MS. in Luke 2 14 has "of good will" or "of good pleasure" (eudoklas). The Latin texts follow the Vulgate and old Latin forms, "bonae voluntatis," though they commonly read "on high" (in excelsis), so departing from the Vulgate "in altissimis" and the Greek "ἐν ὑψιστοῖς" alike. The two forms seem to have existed in the earliest Latin Biblical texts (CQR, Oct., 1885, p. 15).

"We give thanks to Thee for Thy great Glory." To thank God for the very fact that He is what He is touches perhaps the highest level of worshipful adoration in the Communion Office. The phrase is thoroughly Eastern. But it has been differently explained: "Because . . . reverence and adoration rather than giving of thanks is due to the great glory of God . . . therefore glory is here used for that attribute in which God is especially glorified, viz., His mercy, which, when exercised towards us, always turns to the glory of God Himself, Who shows that mercy. Often also in Scripture glory is used for mercy, as e.g., Rom. 3 23, 'All have sinned and come short of the glory of God'" (Cavallieri, Opera 5 20; cp. Maskell, Ancient Liturgy, p. 38). This idea may partly account for the above-mentioned Celtic version of "misericordiam" for "gloriam"—a characteristically Western touch.

"O Lord God." . . . Our office following the Sarum has "O Lord God, Heavenly King, God the Father Almighty" . . . ; but the Greek of (e.g.) the Horologion has "Lord King, Heavenly God, Father Almighty" (CQR, u.s., p. 3).

"O Lord, the only begotten Son." The additions in the Greek versions of "and the Holy Spirit," and in the Celtic (Bangor) version of "and we all say Amen," extend the thanksgiving to each of the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity, and the latter addition seems placed there as being a characteristic ending to Doxologies (cp. Rom. 9 5).

"O Lord, the only begotten Son." This is the first instance in which the Second Person of the Trinity is ordinarily addressed in the English Communion Office. Previously, the Father only is addressed, and the merits of the Son pleaded before Him, but this great central pleading is now regarded as over, and thanksgiving is due to the Son (and the Spirit) as well. (The Collects addressed to the Son are an exception to this.)

(A) For the texts.—* Bangor Antiphonary, HBS, 2 75 ff.; * Bunsen, Analecta Anti-Nicaena 3 86; * Daniel, Thesaurus Hymnologicus 2 267; * Lagarde, Apost. Const., p. 229; * Warren, Celtic Church, pp. 193, 196, 227, 250; † Burn, Introduction to the Creeds, p. 265 ff. (he gives reasons for thinking that the Tu Deum was partly founded on the GIE.).

(B) General.—† CQR, Oct., 1885; * Brightman, Eastern Liturgies, p. xxxiv; † Scudamore, NE, pp. 783 ff.; * Maskell, Ancient Liturgy, p. 26; * T. Smith, Account of the Greek Ch. (1680); * Irish Liber Hymnorum, HBS, 1 49, 2 135; † Duchesne, Christian Worship, p. 166, etc.; * Palmer, Origines 2 137; † Catholic Encyclopædia (London, 1909); * Dowden, Scottish CO., p. 223, etc.; † Dowden, Workmanship of the PB, pp. 75 ff.; * Bingham, Antiquities xiii. 10 9, xv. 3 31; * Bona, Rev. Liturg. (1674) 2 2; * Probst, Lehre und Gebet, p. 290; * Thalöcher, Handbuch der Cath. Liturg. 2 77 ff.; * Rietschel, Lehrbuch der Liturg. 1 36 etc.; * Hauck-Herzog, Encyclop. 11 548; † Luckock, Divine Liturgy, p. 365 ff.; † Procter and Frere, BCP, pp. 462 ff.; * DCA, s.v.; * Julian, Dict. Hymnol., s.v.—H3.

J. F. KEATING.

GLORIA PATRI.—See DOXOLOGY, § 3.

GLORIA TIBI.—See GOSPEL, § 3.

GOD.—Our inquiry is practical rather than metaphysical: and may thus be divided:—(1) What God is in Himself; and in what relations He stands (2) to the Universe, (3) to Mankind, and (4) to the Church.

God is a Spirit, One, Self-Existent, unchangeable, and therefore "without body parts or passions"¹: infinite,

1.
God in Himself.

i.e., without limitation in time (Eternal), in space² (Omnipresent), or in knowledge (Omniscient).³ Personality is attributed to God by the Creed of the Ch., and is involved in the doctrine of the TRINITY, which implies those eternal relationships within the Being of God which are expressed in the Johannine formula, "God is Love" (1 John 4 16). Of necessity then God is a Moral Being, Holy, Just and True, in Himself: He is in fact Absolute Goodness. From Him "all good things do come,"⁴ especially GRACE.

God is the Maker and Sustainer of the Universe, both transcending it and immanent in it: not purely transcendent (as

2. God and the Universe. Deism and Mohammedanism teach), nor purely immanent (Brahmanism, and generally Pantheism).⁵

though prayer tends to dwell on the former aspect. All things take their beginning from God as their "Efficient Cause," and

¹ Art. 1; Tertull., Adv. Prax. 29. This does not exclude Divine sympathy with man.

² "Incomprehensible," immensus, QV.

³ "The Fountain of all Wisdom," Coll.⁸ at end of HC.

⁴ Coll. 5 Easter: cp. Coll. 7 Trin.

⁵ "Pater de caelis Deus," Lit.: cp. Dowden, Workmanship of the PB, p. 153; Sea, Colls. 1, 8, 4; Exh.¹ VS.

fulfil His design as their "Final Cause," to use the language of philosophy. The universe is purposeful: God is subject to no ἀνάγκη of Fate,¹ to no abstraction called Natural Law; for the laws of Nature express His purpose and inworking; and, if they proceed by evolution, this is only the material expression of the thought of God. There is "no word impossible with God."² He has "ordained . . . the services of Angels and men in a wonderful order,"³ an order which reaches beyond the frontiers of scientific research. And therefore miracles do happen, and prayer is answered.

While he is a part of God's creation, man stands in a peculiar relation to God, as "made in His image." Owing to the

3. God and Man. Fall, man is "very far gone from original righteousness" (Art. 9) and yet a remedial process is traceable through the sacred history. Thus to the "quiescent" attributes of God must be added the "operative" attributes so called. He is the Moral Governor of the world. His "Providence ordereth all things" (Coll. 8 Trin.). By Him Kings, representing the civil power, are set on their thrones (Colls. Access.; Art. 37). By His inspiration priests and prophets prepared the way for Christ (Art. 7): by whose Gospel the "bondage of the figure or shadow" is exchanged for "the freedom of the spirit" (Pref.⁴; cp. Heb. 1 1). The Incarnation is, in fact, the manifestation of God to man, in so far as man is able to know God by faith in this earthly life (Colls. Epiph., 6 Epiph.). It is also the "taking of the Manhood into God" (QV., v. 35) in the Person of the Incarnate; in whom man is created anew in the Divine Image.⁴ Thus gradually the doctrine of the Trinity emerges.

By the Incarnation man is reconciled to God, and the principle of regeneration is affirmed.

4. God and the Church. By Bapt. man is born into the family of God. Thus, while all men are the children of God by creation, only the faithful are His children by redemption and adoption. In the Ch., as the congregation of the faithful (Art. 19), the Holy Spirit dwells, and through her He imparts grace. Henceforth it is as members of the Ch. (the Spirit-bearing Body of Christ) that men may rightly approach God with common worship, offering up their prayers and praises in the Name of Jesus Christ, the Church's Lord. The PB nowhere contemplates the case of Christians who are not living in vital communion with the visible Ch., and even assumes that the whole nation is incorporated in the Ch. of the nation (State Prayers, Pr. for Parliament, Pr. Ch. Militant; cp. the Bidding Prayer).—K2¹.

W. YORKE FAUSSET

¹ As in the Greek poets: "Against Necessity the very gods fight not" (Simonides).

² "Who alone workest great marvels" (Pr. Clergy and People); and Pr.³ at end of VS.

³ Michaelmas Coll., "dispensas" (Latin).

⁴ Iren., Contr. Hæres. v. 16 2, Similitudinem firmans restituit, consimilem faciens hominem invisibili Patri per visibile Verbum: Athan., de Incarn. 13 7, 54 3, Αὐτὸς γὰρ ἐξηρπώθησεν ἐκ ἡμεῖς θεοποιήθημεν: cp. Col. 3 10.

GODLINESS.—In the AV of the NT this is the translation of εὐσεβεία, e.g., in 1 Tim. 3 16. It represents "pietas" in the Colls. for 22nd and 23rd Sundays aft. Trin., e.g., "the author of all godliness" (23rd Sun.). It would appear that this word "pious," itself a reminder of filial duty, has its reference to the position of Christians as the children of God, in their prayers to God and in their habits of conduct in relation to Him. For example: in the close of the General Conf., in the Pr. for the Church Militant, and the Pr. in the marriage service for the bringing up of children. The idea of growing into the image of God (see Gen. 1 26) is directly inferred. In the Coll. for the 5th Sunday aft. Trin. the phrase "godly quietness" is the translation of tranquilla devotione.—K1.
G. J. HOWSON.

GODPARENTS.—The origin of the office of sponsorship seems to have lain in the obvious necessity of getting references as to the character of candidates for baptism, and guarantees that on becoming members of the Ch. they would fulfil the duties involved, much as to-day admission to a club or society is granted on the testimony of a proposer and seconder (Can. Hipp. 19 102). As sureties present at the ceremony they were the natural persons to act as susceptores (Tert., De Cor. Mil. 3), and received the neophytes at the font—an office later undertaken by deacons and deaconesses (Apost. Const. 3 16); while, in the case of infants or infirm people unable to make the answers themselves, they acted also as sponsors (Can. Hipp. 19 113; Tert., De Bapt. 18). They were at first the parents or relations and, naturally, of the same sex as the catechumen. Only one was required, but, later, a surety was demanded for the catechumenate and a witness for the confirmation, so that there might be three in all. From the 6th cent. onwards, the idea prevailed that to act as sponsor for any one constituted a relationship with him, and in later ages this was held to extend to his kinsfolk and to other godparents. As this created a bar to marriage, it led to frequent difficulties which were to a certain extent removed by the Council of Trent. As a consequence of this idea, and possibly from the natural feeling that a reference should be from one uninfluenced by family ties, parents were forbidden to stand for their children, and are still so forbidden by canon 29, which has only been informally repealed by the Conv. of Cant. in 1865. Sponsorship seems never to have involved material responsibilities.

The PB orders that there shall be three godparents, two of the same sex as the child baptised, thus following the mediæval English custom; in the Roman Church only one, or at the most two, are required. Their duties are to make the responses in the name of the child (though this may be done by proxy), to see, as representatives of the Ch., that they are instructed in the Cat. and brought to Confirm. (of which one is to be a witness), with all that this involves. Canon 29 enjoins that only Communicants are to be accepted. An extraordinary laxity has prevailed in this matter, both on the part of the clergy who baptise without the full number of godparents or even with no godparents at all, and without inquiry accept as sponsors men and women of another communion or even of no religious belief and practice at all, and on the part of the laity who make promises which they have no intention of fulfilling and solemnly profess beliefs which they do not hold. Clearly, the work of reform in this matter must be a slow and gradual one; but the first step is to require due notice of baptisms with the names of the godparents, so that they can be previously visited or written to, and can have, if necessary, the elements of their duties explained to them, or, if they prove quite unsuitable, be rejected, and the sacrament be postponed till proper sponsors can be obtained.

(Procter and Frere, A New Hist. of the PB, p. 575 n.; Stone, Holy Baptism, pp. 100 ff.; Bingham, Antiquities xi. 8; Rogers, Principles of Parish Work, p. 133 ff.)—A3, K1. CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

GOLDEN NUMBER.—See CALENDAR, § 4, 5.

GOOD FRIDAY.—See HOLY WEEK, § 3; HOLY WEEK (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 6.

GOSPEL.—The lessons from the G. in the Communion Service of the PB are derived from those of the Sar. Missal, which exhibits a variety of the old Roman series. This was revised by Alcuin for Charlemagne, though there is probably substantial truth in the tradition that the origin of the Lectionary goes back to St. Jerome; and at any rate the original nucleus of it must date from the 4th cent. (see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE, § 4). The series of G. lessons given in the PB includes: those for (a) Sundays and great festivals of the Christian year; (b) those for movable holy-days; (c) those for the Saints' days. In addition to those given in the PB the old Roman series included lessons: (d) for Vigils of great festivals; (e) for all week-days in Lent (those for Thursdays in Lent except Maundy Thursday are not original); also (f) for Rogation days and Ember days; and (g) for many Saints' days which were not retained in our Calendar. In the Sar. Missal there were also Epistles and Gs. for Wednesdays and Fridays from Adv. to Ascension and for Wednesdays after Trin., but these do not appear to belong to the original Roman series.

The following differences from the Sar. Epistles and Gs. are noteworthy.

(1) In the Sarum and Roman rites there was a Mass for the Vigil of Christmas, and in addition three different Masses for Christmas Day.

2. Details. The original Mass of the festival was that of the Vigil with G., Matt. 1 18 ff. Our G. for Christmas Day is that of the third (and latest) Mass of the day. In the PB of 1549 and the American PB an Epistle and G. for an early Communion (if there should be two) are appointed, and the G. for this is Luke 2 1-14, which was that in the Sar. Missal for the first Mass of Christmas Day. (This was also the original G. for the day in the "Gallican" rite.) (2) The original Roman Gs. in Holy Week were the complete Passion from Matt. (caps. 26, 27) on Palm Sunday; that from Luke (caps. 22, 23) on Wednesday; and that from John (caps. 18, 19) on Good Friday; the account of the feet-washing being read on Maundy Thursday. The Passion from Mark was omitted altogether, as that G. was (unfortunately) considered to be merely an epitome of Matt. Other G. lessons were subsequently added for Monday and Tuesday, and finally the Passion from Mark displaced that for Tuesday. There was no Mass on Easter Even, and the Mass appointed for the Vigil of Easter (with the G. from Matt. 28) was the original Easter Mass. The other days of Easter week were supplied with Gs. of the Resurrection from Luke and John (Mark being passed over as before); and finally, when it was necessary to provide another Mass on Easter Day for those who had not attended the Vigil, the Resurrection from Mark was utilised for the purpose. In 1549 the Gs. provided for the two Communions on Easter Day were those from Mark 16 and John 20:1 ff. The latter (our present G.) was the Sarum Gospel for Saturday in Easter-week (and the Mozarabic Gospel for Easter Day). Thus, the original G. for Easter that was used in every known Liturgy disappeared altogether, and the later Roman G. for the day (Mark 16:1 ff.) disappeared also when the first Communion was abandoned in 1552. It has reappeared as the G. for the first Communion in the Amer. and Irish PBs. (3) In the Sar. and Roman Missals special Epistles and Gs. were appointed for the Vigils of Ascension and Pentecost; but (in both cases) these were later additions, and our PB has preserved the original Epistle and G. for the day. It seems probable that in the Roman as in other rites Pentecost had originally no octave: the summer Ember days were fitted in here and wound up with their own Mass at the end of the Saturday night Vigil—i.e., early on Sunday morning—and there was originally no other Mass for the Sunday. Just as in the case of Easter Day, a Mass at a later hour was required, and a "votive" Mass of the Holy Trinity was used for the purpose. This (so to speak) accidental Mass subsequently developed into the festival of the Holy Trinity. (4) The Sundays after Pentecost (as well as those after Epiph.) had no particular relation to the ecclesiastical year: they were merely "Dominica Cotidiana"—i.e., ordinary Sundays—and there were no "seasons" of "Epiphany-tide" or "Trinity-tide": for these Sundays a series of edifying passages not previously appropriated to special days was chosen out of the Epistles and Gs. The series of EPISTLES followed the order of the Epistles in the NT; it is possible that the Gs. were arranged on account of some supposed connection (often rather far-fetched) with the different Epistle-lessons. (5) The Gs. for Saints' days in the PB are generally taken from the "Proper" or "Common" of the Sar. Missal: in several cases vv. have been added, though sometimes with the unfortunate effect of blunting the point of the passage chosen.

In the first ages of the Church all the lessons appear to have been read by readers; but in the 4th cent. the Epistle began to be assigned to the sub-deacon and the G. to the deacon, and in the West this custom has continued to the present time. All the lessons were read originally from the ambon or pulpit; when this contained desks at two levels, the G. alone was read from the higher level, the Epistle and other lessons (and the Respond) from the lower level. Special honour was given to the G. lesson in various ways. St. Jerome tells us (Contra Vigilant. 7) that lights were used; incense also was burnt in the deacon's procession to the ambon to read the G. (Peregrinatio Silvia = Etheria). No doubt at first the people stood to hear all the lessons; by the 4th cent. they began to sit for the other lessons, but everyone made a point of standing for the G. in order to show special honour to this lesson. After the G. was announced, it became a common custom to sing "Glory be to thee, O Lord," and in some places it was also customary to respond "Amen" aft. the Gospel.

2. Ceremonial of the Gospel.

At the Reformation no change was made in the manner of reading or listening to the G., though in the PB of 1552 and later editions "Glory be to thee, O Lord," was no longer prescribed. We do not know of any authority for the variation, "Glory be to thee, O God," sometimes used at the present day; and the ascription aft. the G., "Thanks be to thee, O Lord (for this thy glorious G.)," appears to be due to a misunderstanding of a late and distinctively Roman custom. (It appears in the Scottish PB of 1637, and is used in the present Scottish Liturgy.) The same may be said of "Praise be to thee, O Christ," aft. the Epistle.

(For Bibliography of ancient G.-cycles, see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE, § 7.)—G.

W. C. BISHOP.

GOSPELLER.—At High Mass, according to the Latin rite, the celebrant has two main assistants, the Deacon and the Sub-deacon, though for many cents. they have been usually clergy in priests' orders. One of the main functions of the Deacon is to read the Gospel, and of the Sub-deacon to read the Epistle, whence they are sometimes called Gospeller and Epistler. Canon 24 of 1604, which speaks of them under these names, assumes that the custom of the celebrant having two assistants will still be kept up in Cathedral and Collegiate churches.—R2.

J. W. TYRER.

GOWN.—Originally worn by the clergy over the cassock going to and from church—a custom continued up to quite recent times. The G. has never been prescribed or in any way authorised for use in church during Divine service, and the so-called "preacher's gown," for so many years used in the pulpit, is really a survival of the old priest's Gown. This vesture originally had sleeves reaching to the wrists, with wristbands similar to those of the bishop's rochet. The sleeves were afterwards tucked up, and the G. so made is still the correct dress to be worn by every clergyman at Court and civic functions. The notion that these Gs. were Genevan or Puritan is an entirely mistaken one. The Puritans loathed the G. just as much as they loathed the chasuble.¹ It is probable that the use of the G. as a preaching vesture came into fashion by reason of its use by preachers at St. Paul's Cross and in other outdoor pulpits.

Although never so authorised, there is no objection to be urged against the use of the G. in the pulpit, and many even of the High Church clergy have recently adopted it. In the University churches the preacher always wears the G., but takes no part in the service. A clergyman who is a graduate may, and generally does, substitute the G. of his University and degree for the priest's Gown.

[The legality of the preacher's G. was tested in the Supreme Court in 1896 (L.R. Chanc., 1897, 1 85, in re Robinson v. Wright v. Tugwell), and was affirmed on the grounds that : (1) the sermon is not a "ministration," or part of the ministration of the HC, and (2) continuous use has established the lawfulness of the G. in the pulpit.—G. H.] [This, however, was a decision of a civil, not an eccles., Court.—J. W. T.]—R3. J. O. Coop.

¹ Strype, Annals, i. p. 336; Robertson, How shall we conform to the Liturgy? p. 203.

GRACE.—G. is, in PB language, the "favour and goodness" of Almighty God towards man (HC Thanksgiving, Confirm. 3rd Coll.). That it is the gift of God is implied by the very fact that it is constantly an object of direct petition; thus in the Litany, 7th, 8th, 12th, 21st Supplications; cp. Pr. of St. Chrysostom. For the same reason, G. is termed "heavenly" (Exh. MEP, Pr. for Royal Fam., Confirm. 2nd Coll., Coll. 5 Epiph.).

The root idea of the word is that of a gratuitous favour. There can be no claim of right by man as against his Maker on the score of natural virtue, and no such thing as a human goodness independent of Divine assistance.

In the OT this idea is conveyed more generally by the word חסד (in LXX), God's redemptive mercy. In the NT word χάρις this is extended to involve various considerations; the moral condition of unfallen man; the effect of the Fall in estranging him from God, warping the free action of his will, and entailing upon him, to use Augustine's phrase, "peccatum poenam peccati" (Aug., Op. Imp. 6 17, C. Julian. 5 14). He falls under the "law of sin which is in his members": he contracts an infinite debt of sin, and incurs an eternal penalty, an indelible stain, an incurable disease. Sin is now dynamic, a power spoken of in terms almost personal. Law defines it, provokes it, but cannot purge it. At this crisis G. comes in, a power which more than countervails sin. It is the exercise of God's "good pleasure," manifested in the Incarnation in which "the manhood is taken into God," and culminating in the Atoning Sacrifice. [G. is, however, not a new and distinct quality or activity of God, but a fresh and fuller exhibition and exercise of the fatherly disposition of God, typically shown to Abraham, and recognised by Psalmists (e.g., Ps. 32) and Prophets (e.g., Hosea).]

In eccles. usage the term G. comes into acute contrast with human free-will, an antimony latent in NT teaching about "faith and works," but never made explicit. Again, some theologians from Augustine to Calvin have based G. upon the abstract idea of a Divine Power absolutely unlimited, which predestines to life or to damnation. Such a G. is irresistible and efficacious. This has involved, from Irenæus downwards, the doctrine of the total corruption of human nature and the denial of "natural virtue." Further, in regard to the psychology of the subject, some have held that a Divine element, the "spirit," is present in men from the first, by which he is prepared to receive a fuller measure of Grace. Others have taught that the "donum superadditum" of G. is found only in the true children of God, while they allow that God's assistance (auxilium) is given to others (cp. Bp. Gibson, 39 Articles, p. 416). The Pelagians held that before all accession of G. there is a "possibility" in the natural will to which G. is an addition (cp. Mozley on Predestination, pp. 49, 54). Certain SCHOOLMEN held the semi-Pelagian view, that man's natural goodness might so be exercised as to merit G. "of congruity" (cp. Art. 13), i.e., by natural fitness.

Theologians have distinguished between "prevenient" G. and G. "following," or between G. "operant" and "co-operant": the former inclining the will aright, the latter aiding in action (Gibson, op. cit., 378 n. 2, 382). The distinction appears in Art. 10, and Colls. for Easter, 17 Trin., 4th aft. HC.

G. is indispensable to the apprehension of truth (Collects for Trin. S., 2 Easter, 3rd aft. HC, 1st at end of Ord.), and to right action, for without it man may fall into sin and run into danger bodily and spiritual (Coll. for G. 3rd MP, 1 Lent, "gratiae salutaris" Coll. Clergy and People, Te D. v. 26). Hence the need of prayer for "special G." (Cat. on Lord's Pr., Confirm. Pref. and form of Administration). In Art. 9 a severer view is taken of concupiscence, the post-baptismal "infection of nature," than the Tridentine; while a total depravity of man is not asserted with the Calvinists. The Bapt. services affirm the need of G. to bestow "that thing which by nature" the child "cannot have"; "the old Adam is buried," Christ is "by Baptism put on."

(a) Relation to the Natural order. It follows that G. is a supernatural gift which lifts us out of the merely natural into the spiritual region ("by adoption and grace," Coll. Xmas.). We are under God's governance (Coll. for G. 3rd MP, taken from Ferial Coll. for Prime "semper ad tuam iustitiam faciendam omnis nostra actio tuo moderamine dirigatur"), as members of the "Church and household" of God (Coll. 5 Epiph., cp. Accession Service Pr. for Sovereign and R. Family).

(b) The means of Grace. The Church is the sphere of covenanted G.: the SACRAMENTS are appointed means "whereby we receive the same." The mode is nowhere defined; the effect is stated, in either case, as a "benefit" (Bapt. 1 4th Exh., Cat.) or "inward grace" (cp. the word "effectual" in Art. 25; "instrumentally," Hooker, Ecl. Pol. v. 67 8, 12). The warrant is the word of Christ. The condition is faith. (See further, MEANS OF GRACE.)

(c) Relation to the Holy Spirit. The petition of the Litany "to endue us with the G. of Thy Holy Spirit" contains an expression not to be found verbally in the NT (see however Heb. 10 29). But the G. of Christ is the operation of His Spirit in our hearts, issuing in the charismata of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12 4); and, when G. is expressly connected with the Holy Spirit, this is in view of an office to be fulfilled in the Church.

1. Biblical and Ecclesiastical Use.

2. PB on need of Grace.

3. Other Points.

This appears in the Confirm. Pr. for the sevenfold Gifts, and in the Ordinal. Thus the G. desired for the Bishop is a special G. of "authority" (Pr. before the Consecration).

(d) Relation to Individual Personality. The principle "nihil bonum sine gratia" (cp. Art. 13, Colls. for 1 Trin., 11 Trin., 4 Adv.) is not so applied by our Church as to reduce a man to a non-moral automaton. Dr. Mozley says that G. is "that power whereby God works in the wills of His reasonable creatures" (Predest., p. 302). But this G. is not irresistible; otherwise it would be needless to pray that the baptised "may ever remain in the number of thy . . . elect," or that the Communicants "may continue in that holy fellowship." The human will is still free to choose or to refuse. The originality of moral action is reserved. But a mystic union with God, and the consequent sense that God is working in and by him, enable a man to fulfil his own personality.—K1.

W. Y. FAUSSET.

GRACE BEFORE MEAT.—Thanksgiving is of the spirit of the Mosaic law, and hence we find that the duty of saying G.

1. In the Bible.

is strictly enjoined upon the Jews. The blessing over the bread bef. meals is "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who bringest forth bread from the earth." Aft. meals one says, "Let us bless him of whose bounty we have partaken," and the others respond, "Blessed is he of whose bounty we have partaken, and through whose goodness we live." The leader then proceeds with the "benedictions," three or more in number. For children a shorter G. is enjoined: "Blessed be the Merciful, the Master of this bread."¹

The custom of the Jews was followed by our Lord (Matt. 14 19, 15 36), and, thus sanctioned, was from the first adopted by the Christian Church. St. Paul alludes to it in Acts 27 35, 1 Cor. 10 30, 31, 14 16, Col. 3 17, 1 Thess. 5 18, 1 Tim. 4 3-5, and the testimony of the Fathers is abundant and explicit.²

In the Sacramentaries we meet with a variety of Gs.: one of the most ancient bef. meat (according to Dr. Scudamore) is, "Refresh us, O Lord, with thy gifts, and sustain us with the bounty of thy riches": and one of the earliest aft. meat, "We have been satisfied, O Lord, with thy grants and gifts. Replenish us with thy mercy, Thou who art blessed," the latter petition reminding us of the shortest G. extant, said to have been suggested by Luther, "Benedictus benedicat."³

It is beyond the scope of the present art. to notice monastic and college Gs. A remark or two on those found in the Primers may prove of interest. These books of devotion are rich in the subject bef. us; many contain six or eight Gs., the Primer of 1553 containing no less than fourteen.

¹ The Daily PB of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Empire.

² See W. B. Scudamore's art. in DCA.

³ [The conciseness of the G., "Benedictus benedicat," with its complementary thanksgiving, "Benedicto benedicatur," is untranslatable. But the following might condense the Gs. of the Primers: "With all his gifts, God send us love." "To God, who gave, our love be given." The briefer the form, the better in a hurrying age, so that it be said gravely and without hurrying.—G.H.]

2. In the Primers.

There are several features in the earlier Primers which do not occur in those issued aft. 1549: the use of the Lesser Lit. and the Lord's Pr., for instance, and the petitions "from the fiery darts of the devil, both in weal and woe, our Saviour Christ be our defence, buckler, and shield," and "God have mercy upon all Christian souls." Some of the Primers after 1549 contain the Pr. for charity usually found in those of earlier date, "God is charity and he that dwelleth in charity dwelleth in God and God in him. God grant us all to dwell in charity"; and in almost all is found the petition: "God save the Church, the King, and Realm And send us peace in Christ our Lord."

Of Gs. for children one of special interest occurs in the Primer of 1534: "The grace or blessing of the table to be said of children standing bef. it, their hands elevated and joined together, saying thus devoutly and sadly: "The eyes of all things look up and wait upon thee. . . . Thou openest thy hand and replenishest all things living with thy blessing. Our Father. Our Lord God, our heavenly Father, bless thou us and these thy gifts. . . . So be it." We are reminded of Herrick's touching lines entitled "A Child's Grace":

"Here a little child I stand
Heaving up my either hand;
Cold as paddocks though they be,
Here I lift them up to Thee,
For a benison to fall
On our meat and on us all."—S5.

H. C. BATTERBURY.

GRACES, THE CHRISTIAN.—The Christian Ch. owes to St. Paul the significant and suggestive grouping which we follow when we pray (Trin. 14) for "the increase of faith, hope, and charity." The triad must have soon formed itself in his thought as it occurs twice in his earliest extant epistle (1 Thess. 1 3 5 8). These graces are only numbered as three in 1 Cor. 13 13, but the group recurs in Rom. 5 1-3. Separate arts. deal with each. Here it is desired briefly to emphasise four points.

1. Their Unity.

1. The three are not separable qualities which can be cultivated and enjoyed apart, but distinctive aspects in the one life of the regenerate spirit. It is the activity of the mind which gives its characteristic quality to the grace of faith, but a mere mental persuasion is valueless in isolation. Christian faith in its essence consists in a judgment that God in Christ is completely trustworthy: "He is and he is a rewarder of them that seek after him" (Heb. 11 6). But he who trusts in and depends upon a person hopes for and expects the fulfilment of his promises. Faith in the living and eternal God must at once colour the imagination which gives to hope its peculiar quality. Again, faith and hope without love are not CG. "The devils also believe, and shudder" (Jas. 2 19), and the "workers of iniquity" who "knock at the door, saying, Lord, open to us," have to "depart" (Lk. 13 25-27). Only the "faith which worketh by love" (Gal. 5 6) is the all-inclusive grace; and the only hope that is

¹ See E. Hoskin's Primers.

Christian is that "hope set on him," which leads those who have it to purify themselves, even as the Object of their loving hope, their hopeful love, is pure (1 John 3:3). In a word, faith and hope, restricted to the precise and specific senses of belief and desire (activities of mind and imagination prompted by the will which seeks comfort and advantage), are no Christian activities. Baptised into their fuller Christian meanings, each of the three involves and implies the rest. Faith is the realisation of the Eternal God, as the past has revealed Him in the Gospel of the life, death, resurrection, and exaltation of the Son of God. Hope is the confident reaching out of the soul to the further and fuller revelations of grace here and hereafter which that Gospel promises. Love is the cleaving of the awakened heart in the self-surrender of unquestioning devotion to the Almighty Father, the Divine-human Brother and Lord, the indwelling and regenerating Spirit, as faith presents the Triune God in the living present.

2. In this essential unity of the Christian life is found the reconciliation of those seemingly sharp antinomies of thought and divergences

2. Their Distinctiveness. of expression which embittered the Christian life of the Reformation period and helped to divide the Church. If the CG. are not separable or successive as such, it—that is to say—they only become Christian when they involve and imply one another, then we may, without being untrue to principle, tolerate varieties of emphasis in accepted types of Christian teaching. Of the soundness of this position our PBs. and hymn-books, in their catholicity of devotional expression, are a concrete and convincing proof. The real distinctions involved are not thus obliterated. And there is a natural order of development, which carries with it a grading of values. Hope (or fear, its shadow) first agitates the soul with desire for some blessing, here ("Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" "Oh, for the wings of a dove," "As the hart pants, so longeth my soul after thee, O God"), or hereafter ("I desire to depart and to be with Christ which is far better," "Come, Lord Jesus"). Faith fastens on the satisfying object ("I know whom I have believed," "Lord, I believe"). Love thereupon is born ("Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she"—to whom he said, Thy faith hath saved thee—"loved much," "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee"). The primacy of love follows from the sovereignty of the heart in the manifold order of human nature (cp. MAN, §§ 17-25).

3. It is another consequence of the same unity that the CG. are directed upon man as well as God. It is indeed the chapter occupied with love in its manward aspect which groups it most decisively as the highest in the triad of which faith and hope are the other members. In God man lives and moves and has his being (Acts 17:28), and the amazing truth of his kinship with the Creator in whose image he was made carries with it as a consequence the duty of faith, hope, and love towards his fellow-men. So the first commandment of love to God, just because it involves heart, mind, soul, and strength, includes the second, and does not merely imply it as an appropriate pendant or parallel. And

Christian love, directed ever to the godlike in man, "believeth all things, hopeth all things."

4. The possible "increase of faith, hope, and charity" is without limit. Love never "faileth," never

4. Their Eternity. drops out of the circle of elements that makes up the Christian life. And in the conclusion of 1 Cor. 13 the unity of faith and hope with love is shown by the singular verb (μὴνῃ), "and now abides faith—hope—and—charity, this triad."¹ So in this persistence of the CG. which our faith accepts we gain an insight into the life of the eternal world. The time element, on which the interest of life depends, is given with hope. The occurrence of new revealing deeds of God, and the validity and value of the old, are assured with faith. And the continuance of persons is required by love.—K3. G. HARFORD.

GRADINE.—(Lat. gradus). Originally the ornaments of the Holy Table stood directly upon it. Then a G. or raised ledge, over or behind the Table, fixed to the wall or reredos, was introduced to hold the ornaments. No unquestioned example occurs till recent times. It is sometimes incorrectly called super-altar. Occasionally two or more gradines are found. [The correctness of the G. is somewhat doubtful. It is certainly not authorised by the Ornaments Rubric. Cp. No. 66 in Table I at end of RITUAL LAW.]—R5. S. REDMAN.

GRADUAL (GRAIL).—An anthem sung after the Epistle—according to ancient precedent from the Gospel lectern. In the time of St. Augustine it was a whole Ps.; later, it consisted of sacred words repeated thrice, with a psalm-verse after the first, and the Gloria Patri after the second repetition. It is said to have derived its name from the gradus, or step whence it was chanted. Its use is a witness to the fitness of the Psalter as an accompaniment to Eucharistic worship, and to the ancient custom of interposing singing between readings of Scripture (cp. the position of Te D. at MP and Magnificat at EP).—Q2. MAURICE F. BELL.

GRADUATES.—In 1549 it was provided that G. should wear their hoods when preaching; and canon 25 requires any one on a Cath. or Collegiate foundation to wear his hood "at the times both of Prayer and Preaching." Canon 58 requires ministers when officiating to wear their hoods, if graduates, but if not, "some decent TIPPET (i.e., Scarf) of black, so it be not silke."—R3. G. HARFORD.

GRAVE.—An excavation in the earth in which a dead body is deposited; hence any place of interment. Sometimes a grave is lined with brick or takes the form of a vault.—Oa. HUGH R. P. GAMON.

GRAVESTONE.—Properly, a stone placed over a grave or at the entrance to a tomb; but the term is commonly applied to an upright stone at the head or foot of a grave, bearing an INSCRIPTION. By strict law no G. can be erected in a churchyard without a Faculty from the Ordinary, and apparently no usage to dispense with such a Faculty can be established as a legal excuse. It is, however, usually sufficient to obtain the incumbent's consent.—Oa.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

¹ It may be noted that Church Praise, 1907 (a Presbyterian hymnal), omits from Bp. Chr. Wordsworth's Quinquagesima hymn the verse containing the lines, "Faith will vanish into sight, Hope be emptied in delight." But they need only mean that earthly faith will in heaven assume an intenser form as sight, and that hope will lose the urgency of contrast with an unsatisfying present. At the same time they must to most readers seem to contradict the NT text.

GRAVEYARD.—A burial ground or enclosure for the burial of the dead. Though it is more commonly used as a synonym of CHURCHYARD, it may be used with equal propriety as a synonym of CEMETERY.—Oa. HUGH R. P. GAMON.

GREGORIAN CHANT.—See PLAIN-SONG.

GUNPOWDER TREASON.—See STATE HOLY-DAYS.

HABIT OF CLERGY, OUTDOOR.—The latest regulations concerning the outdoor habit, or everyday dress, of the clergy of the Church of England are contained in canon 74 of the Code of Canons which were issued by the Convocation of Canterbury, with the Royal sanction, 1603-4, but which did not receive confirmation of Parliament at the time. This canon has neither been repealed nor varied by subsequent legislation; and, though custom has gradually modified some of its antiquated details, and disuse has affected others, yet, from a legal point of view, it remains the standard of the everyday dress of the English clergy. Canon 74 is founded on an Act of Convocation, 1557, de Vestitu; Royal Injunctions, 1559, § 30; Advertisements, 1564, § 4 (Cardwell, Synodalia 2 437; Doc. Ann. 1 225, 329).

Canon 74. Decency in Apparel enjoined to Ministers.

"The true, ancient, and flourishing Churches of Christ, being ever desirous that their prelacy and clergy might be had as well in outward reverence, as otherwise regarded for the worthiness of their ministry, did think it fit, by a prescript form of decent and comely apparel, to have them known to the people, and thereby to receive the honour and estimation due to the special messengers and ministers of Almighty God: we therefore following their grave judgment, and the ancient custom of the Church of England, and hoping that in time newfangledness of apparel in some factious persons will die of itself, do constitute and appoint, That the archbishops and bishops shall not intermit to use the accustomed apparel of their degrees. Likewise all deans, masters of colleges, archdeacons, and prebendaries, in cathedral and collegiate churches (being priests or deacons), doctors in divinity, law, and physic, bachelors in divinity, masters of arts, and bachelors of law, having any ecclesiastical living, shall usually wear gowns (logis) with standing collars, and sleeves strait at the hands, or wide sleeves, as is used in the universities, with hoods (caputiis), or tippets of silk or sarcenet (vel liriipitiis ex serico), and square caps (pileis quadratis). And that all other ministers admitted or to be admitted into that function shall also usually wear the like apparel as is aforesaid, except tippets (liriipitiis) only. We do further in like manner ordain, That all the said ecclesiastical persons above mentioned shall usually wear in their journeys cloaks with sleeves (pallia cum manicis), commonly called priests' cloaks (presbyterorum pallia), without guards, welts, long buttons or cuts. And no ecclesiastical person shall wear any coif or wrought nightcap (pileolo ullo lineo acupicto), but only plain nightcaps of black silk, satin, or velvet (ex nigro serico, tramo-serico, aut holoserico). In all which particulars concerning the apparel here prescribed, our meaning is not to attribute any holiness or special worthiness to the said garments, but for decency, gravity, and order, as is before specified. In private houses, and in their studies, the said persons ecclesiastical may use any comely and scholarlike apparel, provided that it be not cut or pinkt (scissuris aut puncturis variatis); and that in public they go not in their doublet and hose, without coats or cassocks (promissis vestibus); and also that they wear not any light-coloured stockings (tibialia colorata). Likewise poor beneficed men and curates, not being able to provide themselves long gowns (talarium togarum), may go in short gowns (logis uti curtioribus) of the fashion aforesaid" (Cardwell, Synodalia 1 206, 289).

The official outdoor habit, "the accustomed apparel" of Bishops, referred to in canon 74, comprises: cassock, rochet, chimer, and tippet (properly a black scarf lined or edged with fur), and black velvet square cap. The bishops still retain this outdoor habit in proper use when attending the House of Lords. By custom the bishops have come to wear this outdoor dress in service time; this is, however, not the full episcopal vesture for ministration referred to in the Ornaments Rubric. For illustrations of the outdoor or ordinary habit of a bishop, see portraits of Fox (Corpus Christi Coll., Oxford), Warham (Louvre, Paris), Cranmer (Nat. Port. Gall.), Parker (Lambeth Pal.). Ridley, in 1555, on his way to the stake, wore (Foxe, Acts and Mon., 1583, p. 1769) "a faire blacke gowne furred, a tippet of veluet furred, a veluet night cappe and a corner cappe on his hed." He had no doubt been deprived of his rochet at his degradation the day before. It is very doubtful if the bishop's cassock, a part of "the accustomed apparel" of canon 74, was in 1604 and previously of either purple or violet hue: the colour of Abp. Warham's cassock was scarlet, and that of Abp. Cranmer black. The pectoral cross is wanting in all the portraits referred to above, as is even the case in the portraits of Cardinals Wolsey, Pole and Allen: this ornament, so frequently worn in the present day by Anglican bishops, both in and out of service time, was unknown in England in the 2nd year of Edw. VI.

The official outdoor habit of Priests, according to canon 74, consists of: cassock (traditionally double-breasted, and devoid of a row of buttons down the front); gown (a certain variety in shape allowed); hood, or tippet (that is, scarf); square cap (see CAP); coif (skull-cap) of black silk, satin, or velvet; and priest's cloak on journeys. There is no English authority for the Italian biretta, or for the cape worn over the shoulders of the cassock. For illustration of the outdoor habit of a priest, see Staley, Ceremonial of Eng. Ch., plate 17, p. 285.

See Lacey, The Eccles. Habit in England; Robinson, The Black Chimera, St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. Trans. 4 126 ff., and 181 ff.; Dearmer, The Parson's Handbook 134 ff.—TC.

V. STALEY.

HAIL MARY.—See MARY, THE BVM., § 2.

HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE.—See HISTORY OF THE PB, § 15.

HANDS.—Washing of H. is a common Christian ceremony, expressing innocence or getting rid of evil; cp. Ex. 30 19 f., Deut. 21 6 f., Ps. 26 6, 73 13, for Jews, and Matt.

1. Washing of Hands. 27 24 (Pilate) for the heathen. We find it practised: (a) By Christians bef. pr.; Tertull., de Ora. 13; he attests the custom but ridicules the notion that washing is necessary before prayer, and the Canons of Hippolytus 25 224, 27 241, bid the faithful to wash their hands before prayer, but say that it is unnecessary to bathe the whole body. Cp. also Test. of our Lord 2 24, Egyptian Ch. Order 57, Ethiopic Ch. O. 48. (b) Bef. entering a church, often coupled with feet washing. Hence fountains were commonly found in the court of the church, Eusebius, HE. x. 4 40; Socrates, HE. 2 38, etc. For the courtyard see Test. of our Lord 1 19. (c) By the celebrant, sometimes by assistants also, at the Offertory; Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. Lect. 23 9 (quoting Ps. 26 6; all the Presbyters); Apost. Const. 8 11 (τοῖς ἑπεὶ πρὸς); Ordo Romanus I (8th cent. ?), ed. Atchley, p. 134 (by Pope and Archdeacon); Ord. Rom. II (9th cent. ?), ib., p. 156 f. (by Pope, Archdeacon and all the Deacons). The LAVABO is, however, not mentioned by Amalarius of Metz (who died 837). It is given in Cosin's Notes (Hierurg. Angl.), 2nd ed., 2 78, p. 2 178. (d) By bishops bef. ordaining another bishop; Test. of our Lord 1 21, Arab. Didascalia 36. (e) By communicants bef. reception; Caesarius of Arles, Serm. 229 5 (in App. to Augustine's Sermons, ed. Ben.). (f) By the celebrant (ablation of fingers) aft. his communion in the Roman, Sarum and other Missals, and aft. the Blessing according to a common Anglican custom in the present day. This is not mentioned in Christian antiquity.

Hands raised: (a) In prayer. This is a Christian custom inherited from the Jews; cp. 1 Kgs. 8 22 (Solomon), Ps. 28 2, 63 4, 134 2; see

2. Lifting up of Hands. 1 Tim. 2 8. It was also a common custom among the heathen; see e.g., Virgil, Æn. 3 176 f. Patristic references are: Tertullian, De Ora. 14, 17, Apol. 30; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 7 7; Origen, De Ora. 31 (eyes and hands uplifted); Eusebius, Vit. Const. 4 15 (Constantine depicted on coins raising his eyes and spreading out his H. as if in pr.). The raising of the H. was accompanied by stretching them out, apparently in the form of a cross: as Tertullian says (l.c.), the praying Christian took his model from the Lord's Passion. In all ages of the Church it has been usual for the celebrant at the Euch. to raise his H. in pr.; the East Syrian presbyter never says any Coll. (which only a priest may say) without doing so. (b) In baptism, by the candidate when making the Renunciation, for emphasis: Cyril of Jer., Cat. Lect. 19 4. We may compare our Lord's action of stretching forth his hand as an expression of emotion or for emphasis in Matt. 12 49, or St. Paul's in Acts 26 1. (c) In blessing, cp. Lk. 24 50. This is the common attitude in giving the benediction, so that χεῖροβασία (which often means a stretching forth of the hand over a person as well as a manual contact) is frequently used to mean "a blessing." (See also LAYING ON OF HANDS.)—R2. A. J. MACLEAN.

HANGINGS.—See CURTAINS.

HARVEST FESTIVAL.—The regulations in the Mosaic law touching H. thanks-

1. In the OT. givings were partly due, we may well suppose, to the fact that the customs practised by neighbouring nations in connection with the ingathering of the fruits of the earth were wont to degenerate into licence (see Frazer's Golden Bough, vol. ii). According to the law of Moses (Deut. 16 16) all the men of Israel were "to appear before the Lord" at the three great "Pilgrimage feasts," which were not only historical festivals, thanksgivings for past mercies, but HFs. as well, thanksgivings for present mercies—for the beginning of H. at the Passover, for its completion at Pentecost, for the ingathering of the vintage at the feast of Tabernacles. Each occasion, and especially the last, was a time of rejoicing and of bounty to the poor (Lev. 19 9, 10; Ruth 2 2, 15; Is. 9 3, 16 10).

In mediæval England it appears that August 1, Lammas Day (in old English "hlāf-mæsse," i.e., "loaf-mass"), was recognised by the Church as a feast of Thanksgiving for the first-fruits of the H. On that day bread made of the new wheat was offered at the Mass and solemnly blessed.

It is not easy to trace the history of our modern form of HF., but it is certain that it has existed in England for at least sixty years. The idea that it would be meet to offer thanksgivings annually to the Almighty, whether H. be plentiful or otherwise, does not appear to have taken root until the middle of the last cent. A special thanksgiving Pr., it is true, was bef. that time occasionally issued by authority, but in each case was called forth by an abundant H. The first recorded instance occurs in 1796, "a pr. of thanksgiving to Almighty God: for the great Blessing which . . . he hath vouchsafed to this nation, in our favourable and abundant H. To be used after the General Thanksgiving . . . and to be continued for one month." Similar Prs. on similar occasions were put forth in 1801, 1813, 1842, 1846 and 1854. In 1847 a complete form of Thanksgiving, containing proper Sentences, Ps., Lessons, Colls., together with an Epistle and Gospel, as well as Prs. and thanksgivings written for the occasion, was issued "by her Majesty's special command." This was due to an abundant H. in a year of pestilence and grave national difficulties, and in consequence partakes of a penitential character (Brit. Mus. 3406, d. 14 11).

After this date a growing desire for an annual festival may be traced. A writer in the Guardian (Sept. 7, 1853), for example, pleads for a week-day Service at the conclusion of H. and records that he has held such a service since 1850 with increasing success. On Oct. 1, 1854, a "thanksgiving service for a plentiful H." was held, apparently for the first time, in St. Paul's (Arch. Sinclair, Memorials of S. Paul's Cath., c. 29), and in the same year the Bishop of Oxford writes, "I have no authority by which I can lawfully appoint a day of thanksgiving for my diocese; nor can I appoint special lessons for any service," and goes on to suggest that notice should be given that on such a Sunday "a sermon will be preached upon the subject, the Holy Euch. specially administered, and the thanksgiving offerings of both communicants and others be collected" (Guardian, Sept. 20, 1854).

In 1858 HFs. had become popular, at least in country districts. We read of village churches beautifully decorated and crowded to overflowing by labourers and their families at the service held in church before the customary "H. Home" rejoicings. At one such meeting we find the Vicar contrasting the old and new method of celebrating

"H. Homes": formerly, he says, "There was not the slightest recognition of Almighty God and no meeting in God's House to thank Him for the H." (Guardian, Oct. 6, 1858).

From this date the wish for an authorised form of service becomes pronounced, but it was not until 1862 that both Houses of Convocation for the Province of Canterbury agreed on and issued their present form (published by Longmans).

4. Forms of Service. That such a festival as H. Thanksgiving should be recognised in our PB seems to be called for by the appointment of Rogation days, but whether a fixed time should be indicated for its observance, or a form of thanksgiving inserted, are questions to be faced in the future. In the Amer. PB (1789) there is a "form of Pr. and Thanksgiving . . . for the fruits of the earth . . . to be used yearly on the first Thursday in November, or on such other day as shall be appointed by the Civil Authority"; and in the Irish PB (1878) is found "a form of Thanksgiving for the Blessings of H.," but no date is fixed for its observance.—C2.

H. C. BATTERBURY.

HASSOCKS are made in different sizes. In choosing them regard should be had to the height of the pew-backs and width of pews, as these considerations are important both in respect of facility in entering and leaving the pews and in kneeling. For pews of ordinary width a suitable size is 14 in. by 8 in. For pews moderately high a height of 5 in. is not too much, but the 3 in. size is also convenient. H. are made chiefly in hemp, felt, and Brussels, and cost from £4 to £8 a hundred. It is cheaper in the end to buy good H., as the lower-priced very quickly burst with wear and the packing is inferior. In most cases wood KNEELERS are preferable. They are permanent and cost little more than H. of the best kind.—R5. G. VALE OWEN.

HATCHMENT.—Shortened from "Achievement" (N.E.D.), a lozenge-shaped escutcheon placed over the entrance of a deceased person's house for, say, twelve months, and then sometimes removed to the parish church. The incumbent is not obliged either to receive or keep it, but, if Hs. are in a church, they ought, for antiquarian reasons, to be allowed to remain there, though they should not occupy a prominent position. In the 16th cent. shields were carried at stately funerals, hence the H., which came into vogue during the 17th cent. and remained common in the 18th, but is little used now.—OC.

W. A. WICKHAM.

HEAD COVERING.—See CAP.

HEALING.—See UNCTION.

HEARSE.—(1) The triangular iron frame which supported the candles used at TENEBRAE. (2) A framework, more or less elaborate, with lights, escutcheons, hangings and decorations, placed over a corpse in a church, e.g., the "goodbye Harse wt. manye lights," etc., figured from the Islip Rolls, in English Allars (Alcuin Club). The H. was sometimes placed, with a hearse-cloth, over a tomb, e.g., a brass one still in the Beauchamp Chapel, Warwick. The word was also used of the wooden frame attached to a bier to support the hearse-cloth or pall, when the body was thus reverently covered, before the less seemly fashion of heaping the coffin with flowers had set in. (3) The carriage on which the corpse is borne to the grave. In the 17th cent. a "horse-litter" was sometimes used. In the next cent. Nicholas Blundell used to lend his carriage to his neighbours. Later on there was generally a Parish H., and a hearse-house in the churchyard. A quaint two-wheeled H. with stumpy plumes is still to be seen at Mytton, kept in the Tower of the Church. The H. was often hung with trappings. Later came the "nodding plumes" ("the hearse with its dismal emblazonry," Guy Mannering). These are rarely seen now. Few modern hearses are comely, and many are most unsightly. The glass-sided H. is perhaps the simplest and best, if the coffin is covered, as it should always be, with a pall. Where circumstances permit, the wheeled bier, with H. and hearse-cloth, is much better than a horse vehicle.—OC.

W. A. WICKHAM.

HEAVEN.—Heaven is regarded as the abode of God. (1) The Father, who "is" or "dwells in H." (LP, Lit. "de caelis," Sea,

1. The Divine Abode. HC Off.). There the divine kingdom exists (S. aft. Asc.), thither the suffering saints look for their vision of glory (St. Steph.), and thence God is besought to "look down" upon the sick (VS). (2) The Son, for thither "our Saviour Christ" ascended, as the three Creeds teach, and there are His "natural Body and Blood" (HC blk. rubr.), for with "body, flesh and bones" He went up (Art. 4), as the narrative in Acts implies (cp. Asc. Pref.). There in vision the protomartyr saw Him standing (St. Steph.). (3) The Holy Ghost, because thence He "came down" at the Pentecostal outpouring (Whit. Pref.; cp. Coll., and S. aft. Asc.). (4) Further, H. is the dwelling-place of the angels, whether conceived as in ancient times as controlling spirits of the spheres (Te D., Bened.), or as graded ministrants of God (HC Sanctus, St. Mich.), who would seem to be understood as those who fulfil there in perfect harmony the divine Will (cp. LP).

(a) H. in the language of the old cosmology represents the upper portion of the created universe, the terms "H. and earth" together

2. Other Uses. forming the general expression for the whole. This combination is the most frequent in the PB; thus, the universe is full of the majesty of the glory of God (Te D., HC Sanctus); for both parts are His creation (Ap., Nic. Cr., Sea), in both all things are "ordered" by His "never-failing providence" (8 Trin.), and the constituent parts are contrasted in language reminiscent of Law (Cat., HC, VS), Prophets and Psalms (Sea).

(b) The Kingdom of H. is a related phrase of which there are several instances in the PB, signifying in the Jewish terminology of the first evangelist that supernatural km. of glory divinely prepared and divinely brought. To it access has been opened by Jesus for His faithful ones (Te D.): they shall inherit (Cat.) and be made partakers of it (HC Exh.¹), yet to some extent partaking and inheriting are present facts. For Infants and Adults prayer is made that Jesus Christ would give them "the km. of H. and everlasting life" (Bapt.^{1, 2}).

(c) Heavenly as an epithet applied to God the Father is met with in addresses of petition from numerous prs., also in "our (your) h. Father," etc. So too the km. of which Christians are partakers is h. (HC). Phrases relating to H. in the eschatological sense are "thy h. treasure" (11 Trin.), "thy h. promises" (13 Trin.), and "h. habitations" (VS).

It is noteworthy that H. is never used absolutely in the PB to signify the condition or abiding place of the saints in the

3. The Future World. The future, the home of the blessed, just as in the Synoptists this usage does not occur. Nor does the popular notion of "going to H." appear in the language of the PB. Moreover, it is just in regard of the terms relating to the so-called "Last Things" that there is most urgent need for reinterpretation. For the traditional material imagery which is reflected to some degree in the PB cannot be dissociated from a cosmology and a religious hope that are alike geocentric. Language in all probability intended at first to be taken literally can only be regarded by the modern mind with its wider knowledge of the universe as symbolic presentation, the temporary expression of spiritual and moral truths that have abiding value. In the PB the future state, as with the NT writers, is adumbrated by various figures rather than definitely described. To enter into speculative detail concerning H. in its future meaning is unprofitable, for it is beyond the range of human experience. Even the words of Jesus only afforded hints in the pictorial language of parables, the interpretation of which is disputed. In His days there had been much recent development of views on the age to come, and their expression was very diverse. They are found in the apocalyptic literature of the Jews, which incorporated and attempted to combine the ideas of inherited nationalism, the dualistic speculations introduced under Persian influence, and the vividly imaginative constructions of their own confident faith amid struggles against world-powers. Our Lord's reserve and infrequent recorded references to the subject thus form a healthful warning against dogmatic definiteness of detail; even when using current traditional material He transformed and spiritualised it. Still the old phrases hallowed by catholic memory may be adopted, but far different is ours from the Jewish nationalistic conception; our vaster thoughts of God demand a larger view of Heaven.

That H. is with God, in communion with Him and with the saints, is sufficient solace for the believer, based as it is on the fixed conviction of His power and love; and of that "certain hope" Jesus Himself is the pledge. H. is but a word-symbol for transcendent conditions which can be expressed but very inadequately under the human categories of space and time which have to be utilised.—K2².

E. W. WINSTANLEY.

HELL.—Just as Heaven per se is not to be found in the PB for the state of final bliss, so also there is no example of H. in the sense of popular eschatology as the place or state of endless torment. For this implication "damnation," "everlasting fire," etc., are used. (See JUDGMENT.)

Apart from the Gospel portions, H. only occurs thrice in the PB, and then in the sense of Hades, the unseen underworld, according to Jewish cosmology the waiting-place of the departed. These references are in the Creeds (Ap. "ad inferna," QV. "ad inferos") [and Arts. (3 "ad inferos"). They allude to our Lord's descent thither during the period of entombment, an event which is implied in the words "from the dead" which follow in the Creeds, and which is recorded in the NT, 1 Pet. 3:18 ff., 4:5 f.; cp. Acts 2:27, 31, Rom. 10:7, Eph. 4:9, interpreting OT passages in relation to it.

This belief emphasised the reality of the death and burial of Jesus, and appears very familiar in early days independently of the Petrine Epistle (e.g., Ign., Just., Gosp. Pet., Iren., Tert., Clem. Al., Orig.; also the recently discovered "Odes of Solomon"). It is met with in confessions of Greek synods in the 4th cent., and in the Bapt. Cr. at Aquileia ("in inferna," according to Rufinus), but is not incorporated in the Ap. Cr. till much later. Even then it is merely a statement of fact without any reference to the nature of our Lord's activity, that "harrowing of hell" which appealed so strongly to Christian imagination. To this indeed Art. 3 in its earliest form alluded, as well as to the Petrine passages, concerning which no certain solution can be said to have been reached.

For their discussion, see Clemen, Niedergefahren zu den Toten; also Bibl. Dict. and Comm.; Plumptre, Spirits in Prison; Trans. of 3rd Intern. Congr. of Hist. of Religions 2:293 ff. (Loofs); etc.—K2².

E. W. WINSTANLEY.

HEREFORD USE.—See USE, § 17.

HERESY, HERETIC.—These words are not of common occurrence in the PB, but their use may be illustrated from the suffrage in the Litany which asks for deliverance "from all false doctrine, heresy, and schism," and from the 3rd Collect for Good Friday, which prays for mercy on "all Jews, Turks, Infidels and Hereticks." In other passages there is a reference to the subject without any use of the word itself, e.g., in the question put to bishops and priests as to their readiness "to banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's Word."

"Heresy, in law, is only that which has, before 1559, been adjudged so to be by the authority of the canonical scriptures, or by any of the first four General Councils, or by any other General Council wherein the same was declared heresy by the express words of the canonical scriptures, or which, since 1559, may have been, or may be, determined to be heresy by Parliament with the assent of the clergy in Conv." Halsbury's Laws of Eng., 1910, 11:653, thus summarises the still valid definition in 1 Eliz. c. 1, s. 20, and adds in n., "where a clerk is accused of heresy, the arts. of charge must distinctly state the obnoxious opinions and the exact terms in which he has uttered or published them."—G. H.]

The words "heresy" and "heretic" came into the English language from the Latin haeresis, haereticus, which represent the Greek αἵρεσις, αἱρετικός. The former word denotes (1) choice, selection, (2) the tends of a school or sect, or the sect itself; hence it was applied to the self-willed adoption by individual Christians of doctrines or principles divergent from those of the Church: the "heretic" is the man who adopts such opinions. Both words are found, the latter only once, in the NT (1 Cor. 11:19, Gal. 5:20; Titus 3:10), but in the NT the meaning is rather factiousness than doctrinal error.

Yet the dangers to which the Church was to be exposed from H. were already felt in the Apostolic age and are clearly pointed out in some of the later books of the NT, e.g., Col., Pastoral Eps., the Eps. of St. John, 2 Peter, Jude, and Rev. (see esp. Col. 2 8; 1 Tim. 4 1-3, 6 3, 20; 2 Tim. 2 17; 1 John 2 22; 2 John, v. 7; Rev. 2 6, 14). Some of these Hs. were with regard to the Incarnation, amounting to a denial that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh (2 John, v. 7); others involved a denial of future Resurrection (2 Tim. 2 18), or were connected with a perverted asceticism (1 Tim. 4 1-5). Against these and similar errors the Apostolic writings contain frequent and emphatic warnings, and in one passage (Titus 3 10) St. Paul enjoins absolute avoidance of the "heretic" who remains deaf to exhortation.

The NT, therefore, contains plain traces of the first beginnings of the heresies—derived from various sources, such as Judaism, Oriental religions, Greek philosophy—which vexed the Church (esp. in the East) in the first centuries of her life in such forms as Docetism, Gnosticism and Manicheism. It is outside the limits of this article to describe the growth of these heresies, or of the later heresies of the 4th and 5th cents. with regard to the Person of Christ or the Godhead of the Holy Spirit. The Church was, from the first, alive to the danger, and a long succession of writers (such as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Epiphanius and Augustine) devoted themselves to controverting heresy. When Provincial or General Councils became possible, conciliar action was resorted to, as in the notable instance of Arianism. The recognition of Christianity by the State soon led to the adoption of coercive methods of dealing with heretics and schismatics, and St. Augustine in his later writings justified and advocated this course, which was, unhappily, adopted by the Ch., and carried into effect for many centuries. (See also CHURCH, SCHISM. For full accounts of earlier heresies, see arts. in DCB; and for heresies in all periods, J. H. Blunt, Dict. of Sects, Heresies, etc., 1874.) —K2.

WALTER HOBHOUSE.

HERETIC.—See HERESY.

HERMANN'S CONSULTATION.—Hermann, Archbishop of Cologne and Elector of the Empire.

1. Biography born 1477, died 1552. He was of the noble family of the Counts (Grafen) of Wied. After acting as administrator of the bishopric of Paderborn, he was in 1515 elected unanimously to the archbishopric of Cologne. He took part in the election of the Emperor Charles V, and officiated at his coronation as King of the Romans at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1520. During the early years of the Lutheran movement, H. had taken a strong and even violent part in opposition to the new doctrines, but eventually, due, as is supposed, to the influence of Martin Bucer, he adopted the views of the Reformers. He was excommunicated by Pope Paul III in 1546. He retired to his hereditary estates of Wied, where he ended his days a few years later.

H. claims a place in this Dictionary because of a work published with his authority, and under his name, which exercised a powerful influence upon the English Reformers who compiled the PB of 1549. This book, in the German tongue, appeared in folio in 1543, and was reissued with corrections and improvements in November, 1544. Both editions were from the press of Laurence von der Mülen, of Bonn. The long German title set forth that the book contained the "Simple Deliberation (einfalltigs bedencken)" of Hermann, Archbishop of Cologne and Elector, whereby a Christian Reformation, founded on God's word, of Doctrine, Sacraments, Ceremonies, the Services of the Church, and Cure of Souls, may be established, until such time as a free General, or National Council, or the Orders of the German Nation gathered together in the Holy Spirit, may establish a better. A Latin translation, which varies a good deal from the original, appeared at Bonn in 1545. From the Latin an English translation was published in London in 1547 and a second and amended edition in 1548. There is demonstrative proof that both the German and the Latin texts were known and made use of in the framing of the PB of 1549. (See FOREIGN INFLUENCES for details.) The book contains a number of doctrinal treatises, and also certain liturgical forms for use in the administration of the Sacraments and other rites of the Church. The Church Order for Brandenburg and Nuremberg (1533) was the source of much of H.'s book. Melancthon and Bucer, together with the less known Hedio and Pistorius, were largely concerned in drawing it up. H. himself was ill qualified through lack of learning to undertake the task. Cranmer in his letters refers to H. in terms of much regard.

The German text of the Einfalltigs Bedencken is reprinted in Richter's Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen. The Latin text (1545) has

2. Bibliography. not been reprinted. Much as to the life of H. and the controversies in which he was engaged will be found in G. Drouven's Die Reformation in der Cölnischen Kirchenprovinz zur Zeit des Erzbischofes und Kurfürsten Hermann V. Graf zu Wied (1876), and in C. Varrentrapp's Hermann von Wied und sein Reformationsversuch in Köln (1878). —B1.

J. DOWDEN.

HIERARCHY.—The organisation of the Church for administration and for the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. It is distinguished as of two kinds, H. of Order, and H. of Jurisdiction. (1) In regard to the first, see ORDERS (HOLY). It is enough to point out here that in the 2nd cent. is found a gradation of (i) bishops (normally one for each city and neighbourhood); (ii) priests; (iii) deacons. It is disputed whether these bishops represent a localised apostolate, or a concentration of the higher powers of the presbyterate. Those who hold the former view are disposed to reckon the episcopate a distinct Order; those who hold the latter take it to be only a specialisation within the Order of the Priesthood. In any case, the fundamental source of the H. is most naturally found in the devolution of powers in various degrees from the Apostles. A later devolution of the same kind produced further degrees below the Diaconate (subdeacon, etc.), but these are not usually reckoned hierarchical.

(2) The H. of Jurisdiction depends upon the limitation of authority in the Church to places or persons. The Apostles seem to have exercised their authority within certain spheres of influence, more or less clearly defined by mutual arrangement or by force of circumstances (Rom. 15 20, 2 Cor. 10 16, Gal. 2 9), and the presbyter-bishops and deacons of the NT are evidently local administrators. The differentiation of functions in 1 Cor. 12 4-10 is not hierarchical. The itinerant Prophets of the Didache (perhaps identical with those of Eph. 3 5) seem to have succeeded to the place of the Apostles. The bishops of the 2nd cent. are clearly superior in administration to the presbyters, and a local H. is thus instituted. St. Cyprian regards all bishops as theoretically equal, though his own conduct shows the practical superiority of the incumbents of the more important sees. The development of the provincial system (ARCHBISHOPS, PATRIARCHS) created degrees of authority among bishops, and gradations among presbyters were of contemporaneous growth, as is seen in the vexed question of Chorepiscopi. Eventually, and especially after the systematising of the Canon Law, gradations of this kind became numerous. The practice of appointing minor clerks to high administrative and judicial offices finally produced a complete severance of the H. of jurisdiction from the H. of Order. For example, the Dean of Arches, now usually not in holy orders, is superior in jurisdiction, as Judge of the Provincial Court of Canterbury, to a diocesan bishop.—A3. T. A. LACEY.

HISTORY is the vision of reality, revealed in a series of events, and mirrored in the memory of mankind. The historian is therefore a seer, and the old Jewish grouping of the histories and prophecies of the OT under the Former and the Later Prophets is philosophically sound. A true historian must be a prophet, beholding in and under the outward events their unseen and eternal basis and meaning, though the prophet, so far as he under guidance from above imaginatively constructs the future, has in that degree become other and more than historian.

Every historical work is a selection more or less deliberately made from a much larger collection of materials. But it need not for that reason be misleading. That a great man may in some critical moment of supreme self-expression reveal himself to the right observer more effectively than to another who has through years seen his life as a succession of petty happenings, is evidenced by the saying, "No man is a hero to his own valet." So, if a historian can with few strokes present his personages in their essential character, we have no right to demand, though we may often desire, more.

H. must be a unity, for it is an axiom of thought that reality is one. And for those who have learnt to know reality from

2. Its Unity. Holy Scripture, and from its witness and guardian, that Ch. which is "the pillar and ground of the truth," the open secret of its unity will ever be the mind and will of God, partly embodied already in the world, partly in process of being revealed to, and accepted by, mankind.

Judged by this test, nearly all the books bearing the word "History" on their title pages, without any adjective to limit its scope, have been profoundly and perilously misleading.¹ Especially is this true of the manuals "for schools and colleges," from which the youth of this and other nations have been left to gather their earliest and sharpest impressions of the development of reality in the Christian centuries. J. R. Green's Short History of the Eng. People was for long almost the one shining exception. At last, the qualifying epithets, political, social, economic, etc., are coming into use. But it is quite urgent that parents and teachers shall guard the young against the subtle danger arising from deliberate or inadvertent ignoring of religion, or from its jejune, disproportionate and inaccurate treatment, in ordinary histories.²

Even Ch. History is not free from a kindred danger. Either religion may be too narrowly interpreted, almost as though the exclusive possession of the particular body of Christians under consideration, or some particular element may be over-emphasised, the organisation or the theology or the ceremonial of the Ch. It is, of course, easier to describe a part, than to present so richly complex a whole as is made up by the inner and outer movements and relations of all who profess and call themselves Christians. But, if less than the whole of the religious life of Christendom is in view, the limitation should be stated; and it is not enough to specify limits of date and locality.

H. is not a science like chemistry; but that is not because its status is inferior, but for an opposite reason. It is the historical element of recorded observation which gives to any science all its certitude and validity. The so-called laws and the convenient terms and classifications are but compendious means for recognising, remembering, recalling, and relating, groups of data, those data being strictly facts of history. Science, when it leaves this historical basis in observation, sacrifices the modest truth of particulars to gain the handy compactness of generality.³ H. ever describes events in their unique individuality.

The complaint is sometimes made that in H. there can be no demonstration such as is available in mathematics. But

4. H. and Mathematics. that is, once more, not because

H. must take a lower place than mathematics in regard to reality, but for the opposite reason. That which is mathematically demonstrated is never a statement about reality, but always some result of manipulating numbers, symbols or figures, which is only inevitable because the mind made them after its own pattern and did not find them in the real world. Twice two makes four for the very good reason that we have consented to call $2 + 2$ by the name four and to mark it by the symbol 4.⁴

¹ It is proper to note that this is not a little due to the pernicious habit of post-Reformation writers dividing H. into sacred and profane.

² The same risk may be noted as arising in connection with much prose fiction.

³ For practical purposes the particulars of Science are, of course, useless until they are classified and generalised. Cp. Man, § 25, and Table II there.

⁴ It is again true that this mathematical machinery of the mind, with its numbers, lines and symbols, is for practical purposes quite indispensable as a means of conveniently grouping and rapidly handling facts and objects. [See further, Croce, Logica (4), 1909, pp. 15-27, 229-261.]

But Ezekiel's curt record, "At even my wife died" (24 18) carries conviction with it across the centuries. If H. cannot produce certitude, nothing else can. If it fails in a particular case to produce certitude, that may be accounted for in many ways. There may not have been preserved or discovered sufficient evidence to justify assurance; or this evidence may not be known, or not convincingly marshalled. Or the investigator may be mentally deficient, or inefficiently prepared by experience, or biased by prejudice or self-interest, or distracted by other things (cp. KNOWLEDGE). But the vastness of the ocean of human ignorance, and the insecurity of certain historical quagmires, must not weaken confidence in the sure foundations of ascertained fact.

Something more is said under KNOWLEDGE about the ascertainment of historical truth.

Here it needs only to be pointed out that, in regard to times earlier than our own, a preliminary discipline is necessary before it is safe to pronounce judgment upon alleged facts of H. Even in a trial concerned with yesterday, the "evidence" in court is of varying value according to the knowledge, power of expression, and good faith of the witnesses, and the personal equation has always to be allowed for. Much more, then, where the witnesses are documents, and especially where these are anonymous, and most of all when they are composite (as is the case with a large part of ancient and mediæval narratives), the witnesses have to be weighed in the balances of criticism before H. can be safely constructed from the data which they contain.

The two processes of judgment—upon the documents and upon the events—go on concurrently, for in historical inquiries the reasoning proceeds by a kind of oscillatory movement. Backwards and forwards the student must patiently go, comparing his estimates of authorities with his construction of facts, then readjusting the first by the second, and so on, till a stable equilibrium of conviction is reached, or the inquirer reports the problem as for the present unsolved.

The PB is based on certain assumptions as to Biblical and Eccles. H. Its creeds, its sacraments, its institutions, its ritual, its polity, are rooted in H., and, of all Chs., the Ch. of Eng. has made most of H. The grounds of her fundamental assumptions have, during the last century, been minutely examined in the light of modern methods of inquiry. As a result, there is a still considerable Right of staunch conservatives who assert that tradition has been vindicated all along the line; there is a less considerable Left of pronounced sceptics who declare that the records have been torn to rags; and, in between, is the Centre, comprising the large majority of responsible students, who do not pretend to echo all the views of an earlier generation, but who find God in Christ, and Christ in H., with a reasoned certitude all their own.

6. H. and Certitude.

6. H. and Criticism.

7. H. and the PB.

These have taught us to trace in the OT the Divinely guided ascent of Israel from the level of the book of Judges to the loftier plane of the Psalter, as by a ladder set up from earth to heaven. Some of its histories stand out as the most authentic memorials of antiquity. Others, when sifted, add much precious material to our knowledge. All remain as mirrors of the interests, ideas, and institutions of the ages to which their authors belonged. And the whole abides as the imperishable monument of the people who, of all the older races, heard most distinctly the voice of God, and knew Him best.

In the NT they have disentangled for us a strong and closely interwoven cord (not a chain—with strength equal but to its weakest link) of artless testimony, linking us securely to the First Christian Age. And in the midst of all the documents—Matthæan Logia, Marcan Interpretations of Petrine Memoirs, Lucan Gleanings of Palestinian Recollections, Johannine Echoes of the Life-bringing Word, Lucan Records of Pentecostal Activities, Pauline and other Apostolic "Letters from the heart," and the closing Apocalyptic Visions—in and under and through and over them all there moves supreme the Son of God, transcendent by their unanimous witness. It is the Historic Fact of the unique figure of the Christ which (apart from differences of detail—some of them very important) extorts a homage, real even when almost half reluctant, from the main mass of honest NT students.

In the NT and later records similar unprejudiced study has revealed the mystical Body of Christ in its unity and universality, developing from the first as an organised whole, with the two Sacraments of the Gospel everywhere received, a Baptismal Creed growing up round the Baptismal Formula, an Apostolic Ministry at work, the Lord's Day an established institution, the New Law moulding life, and the New Worship fashioning its own liturgical forms.

Finally, it may be justly claimed that (after making allowance for unsolved problems, the altered perspective of some historical events, persons and institutions, and a change of view as to certain details of historical construction) the foundations of PB religion are stronger than ever. If some of the ground is less solid than it once seemed, at least the points which have to bear most weight are now underpinned with the reinforced concrete of critical reconstruction, in place of the once sound, but at last decaying, timber of imperfectly tested tradition.—U.

G. HARFORD.

HISTORY OF THE PRAYER BOOK.

- I. BEGINNINGS UNDER HENRY VIII, § 1.
- II. THE FIRST PB OF 1549, § 2-7.
- III. THE ORDINAL OF 1550, § 8.
- IV. THE PB OF 1552, § 9-11.
- V. THE ELIZABETHAN PB, § 12-14.

- VI. ALTERATIONS UNDER JAMES I, § 15-16.
 VII. THE PB OF 1662, § 17-20.
 VIII. SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS, § 21-22.

I. BEGINNINGS UNDER HENRY VIII.

Until the last few years of the reign of Henry VIII the public offices of the Ch. of Eng. were in Lat. The exceptions to this rule were few and precise. Not only were the offices in Lat., but they were still unchanged in form until the period named, notwithstanding a series of doctrinal and ceremonial alterations carried out in the later thirties.¹ These alterations, to say nothing of other considerations, really necessitated some liturgical revision, but it was probably the difficulty of such a task and the certain hostility which its performance would provoke that delayed any authoritative attempt until 1541. In that year a commencement was made, suggested perhaps by QUIGNON'S BREVIARY to some extent, when a printed ed. of the Sar. Brev. appeared purporting to "omit the title wrongly ascribed to the Roman Pontiff along with other points repugnant to the statute of our most Christian King." Next year this slightly reformed Brev. was imposed by Convocation upon the Southern Province (Wilkins 3 86r). In 1543 the King directed Cranmer to bring before Convocation the more complete reformation of the Brev., extending the revision to the Missal and other service books (ib. 3 86s), but the committee of the upper and lower houses appointed in consequence was unable to agree. The committee therefore at once came to nothing, nor does it appear that effect was given to a resolution of the same Convocation in favour of introducing a morning and evening Lesson in English into the Sunday and holy-day service. It is, however, practically certain that Cranmer was already deeply immersed in the problem of liturgical revision, and may have suggested the steps which led to the translation and use of the LITANY in English in 1544. At all events, in that year Cranmer translated and amended the Lat. Processional so long in use in England. He has left us no record of his action, and, in trying to reconstruct the story of the process of liturgical change, we are left to inference from a few known facts. The Abp.'s letter of 1545² suggests that some of the Bps. were in conference with him in that year as to further changes. If so, we may very probably refer to the last years of Henry's reign one or both of two draft schemes of revision which have been preserved, though without any date attached to them (Procter and Frere 34). In the second draft some anticipation of what was to come is given in the fact that the hours are reduced to two, and that the Lord's Pr. is in English. It is worth noting that the Petition of the Poor Commons addressed to Henry in 1546 begs him not to let the priests persuade him that God is better pleased with the service in Lat. (Early English Text Society, Extra Series 13 89), and this document probably illustrates a growing feeling in favour of English among, at all events, some portion of the laity.

II. THE FIRST PB OF EDWARD VI, 1549.

On the accession of Edward VI some amount of English Service was introduced almost at once into the Royal Chapel. This set the fashion of what we may term amateur English services, of which there are traces in 1547 and 1548 (Eng. Hist. Rev. 11 322); but these were the vagaries of individuals. In the autumn of 1547 the Injunctions which were carried round England by visitors enjoined setting up the Bible in English, teaching the Lord's Pr. and Ten Commandments, reading Ep., Gospel and Lit. all in English, and reviving the order of 1543 as to Lessons in English. Parliament met in November, and at once took up the question of some alteration in the Mass. This was done without waiting for Convocation, and, after long debates whose exact record has perished, the Act 1 Edward VI, c. 1, was passed. This Act repressed all revilers of the Sacrament, restored Communion in both kinds, and abolished compulsory Conf. before reception. But before Parliament rose, Peter Martyr, Ochino and Tremelius arrived in England and were lodged with Cranmer at Lambeth, Dec. 20.

1. Liturgical Change in 1547.

What now followed was an almost necessary result of the recent Act of Parliament which had restored the Cup to the laity.

2. Order of Communion, 1548.

Early in 1548 Cranmer was consulting the Bps. as to the various points connected with the doctrine and ritual of the Mass. Various questions were propounded to them. Possibly the fact transpired, for on Feb. 6 a proclamation prohibited changing any rite or ceremony not abolished by authority (Wilkins, Concilia 4 22). On March 8 was published The Order of the Communion. Its design was to present an Appendix in English to the Mass. In use it was intended to follow the communion of the priest in the still unchanged Lat. service. A proclamation of identical date enjoined its use, and this was followed five days later by a Privy Council letter (Burnet 2 76s) to the Bps., bidding them secure the obedience of the clergy. The source of the document is very largely Abp. HERMANN'S CONSULTATION, and to-day, after all intervening change, the Order of 1548 still forms the very core of our English Communion Office. From it are derived the CONFESSION, COMFORTABLE WORDS, PRAYER OF HUMBLE ACCESS, the WORDS OF ADMINISTRATION, either in whole or in part, as well as one of the EXHORTATIONS and the address, "Ye that do truly," etc. Its authors were certainly Cranmer, whose "broad soft touch" is apparent, and probably Ridley, together with "sundry most grave and well-learned prelates," of whom the proclamation speaks.

¹ But see traces of a desire for vernacular services in Dixon, Ch. Hist. 2 396, and Gasquet & Bishop, pp. 4, 27, 29.

² Burnet 5 353, but see Cranmer's Remains 415.

Further liturgical change was directly contemplated by the Proclamation establishing the Order of Communion. It is probable that the studies of Cranmer already referred to had, by this time reached some definite result of which the Order was the mere first-fruits. In the summer of 1548 he was intent upon conference with "learned men who having compared their opinions together with us may do away with all doctrinal controversies and build up an entire system of true doctrine" (Parker Society, Original Letters 1 17). The same purpose is seen in a letter of Somerset dated Sept. 4 (Bishop and Gasquet, p. 147). Accordingly at Chertsey, five days later, Cranmer met certain Bps. and others. The meeting was probably formally appointed, but the written commission, apparently, does not exist. The business before them was to discuss the draft of a book which, it seems likely, was already prepared. At all events the time spent in discussion was too short for compiling a liturgy. There is proof that besides Cranmer there were present at Chertsey, Goodrich of Ely, Thirlby of Westminster, Holbeach of Lincoln, Ridley of Rochester, May Dean of St. Paul's, Haynes Dean of Exeter, along with Drs. Robertson and Redman, and some others (Cranmer's Register, f. 327 d). The list does not vary greatly from that of Fuller, which depends upon evidence no longer accessible. He adds Skip of Hereford, Day of Chichester, Drs. Cox and Taylor (Ch. History). This Committee went to Windsor about Sept. 13, where they met the King and Court just arrived from Oatlands. A proclamation of Sept. 23 inhibiting preaching says that the King was hoping to see a uniform order of religion, "for which cause at this time certain bishops and notable learned men, by his highness' commandment, are congregated." Their conference was concluded in the early part of October.

4. Formation of First PB.

Parliament met Nov. 24. The steps taken in drawing up and passing a bill of Uniformity are difficult to trace. It would seem from the Journals of the Houses that on Dec. 19 "the book for the service of the Church (was) read and redelivered to Mr. Secretary Smith." Next day a draft bill "for the confirmation of the service to be used through the realm commissa est Magistro Hales." This is thought by Mr. J. T. Tomlinson to mean that the actual draft PB was read aloud in the Commons just at the close of the Great Debate to be mentioned. But the bill for Uniformity began in the Lords. The book was not annexed to the Act as in 1552 and 1662. The bill was read in the Lords, Jan. 7, 10 and 15, 1549, and in the Commons Jan. 17, 19, 21. On Jan. 22 it was sent to the Lords and is called in the Lords' Journal "For the uniformity of service and ministration of Sacraments to be had throughout the realm." Convocation was sitting, but its relation to the book is problematical. The evidence is conflicting, but the balance of probability seems to be in favour of the conclusion that the book was not brought before it.¹ Meanwhile on Dec. 15 a great debate began in the Lords upon the whole subject of the Mass; but this debate, interesting as it is, did not produce any change in the book (see J. T. Tomlinson, The Great Parliamentary Debate in 1548 on the Lord's Supper). There is indeed no proof that Parliament altered a line in the draft prepared. The first ACT OF UNIFORMITY was a new departure. Some precedent may be found in previous enactments dealing with religion, but the Act of 1549 introduced a revolution in prescribing by authority of Parliament one uniform national use, and in prescribing penalties for failure to use the book or for depraving it.

The book does not specify the sources used: the student is left to trace them. Research has shown with increasing clearness the origin of most portions, though the work is perhaps not yet complete. It is known for instance that Cranmer had a considerable patristic and liturgical library,² and that he had a wide knowledge of ancient liturgies as well as of the newly fashioned service-books in the reformed congregations on the Continent. The sources then are partly old and partly new.

5. Sources of First PB.

(a) From the quarry of the ancient service-books, and mainly from the wide-spread use of Sar., Cranmer dug the greater part of the book of 1549, translating the Lat. into matchless English. The ordinary reader may most easily trace the debt of the book to previous service books in Cornford's BCP with Historical Notes (SPCK), in which the origin of every part of the present PB is noted in the margin, though the work needs revising and supplementing.

(b) New material has been traced to the following 16th cent. documents. (i) To QUIGNON'S BREVIARY we owe, besides certain principles of general construction, some portions of Cranmer's Pref. and of the Calendar, together with the principle of the LECTONARY. (ii) To Hermann's Consultatio may be traced certain portions of the Lit., Communion, Baptismal, Confirmation, Marriage and Burial Services (see special arts. on these Offices, HERMANN'S CONSULTATION, and Cornford's book). Such is the wide influence of Hermann upon the PB of 1549, but it is now known that much of it must be derived through Hermann from Luther himself. Most of the points borrowed in the Bapt. Office come from the Tauf-buchlin of 1527, and some of the suffrages in the Lit. come from Luther (Dowden, Workmanship of the PB, p. 253; see also pp. 11, 30, etc.).

It is unnecessary to follow in this place the fortunes of the First PB beyond saying that further attempts were made at the close of 1549 to supersede the old service books. The Act of Uniformity had prescribed the use of the new book throughout the realm "in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book and none other or otherwise." About Christmas a proclamation was issued directing the destruction of all the old service-books. This was followed by a special Act of Parliament in Jan., 1550, which with minute specification condemned to be "clearly and utterly abolished extinguished and forbidden for ever to be used or kept in this realm" "all books called Antiphoners, Missals, Grails, Processionals, Manuals, Legends, Pies, Portuasses, Primers in Latin or English, Couchers, Journals, Ordinals."

7. Abolition of all Old Service-Books.

¹ For the affirmative side, see Dixon, Ch. Hist. 35, 127, 130, 146, 147, 161, 163; against this view, Gasquet and Bishop, pp. 148-156. Mr. Tomlinson quotes Heylyn, Cyp. Ang. p. 326, ed. 1668, on the negative side.

² For Cranmer's Library, see Burbidge's Remains of the Library of Thomas Cranmer. The British Museum copy identifies the present locality of the books.

III. THE ORDINAL OF 1550.

The First PB had no Ordinal annexed. The omission, as we judge by the sequel, was at once considered. In Jan., 1550, the 8. The First Ordinal.

(An Act for the Ordering of Ecclesiastical Ministers), contemplated "one uniform fashion and manner for making and consecrating Bishops, Priests, Deacons, and Ministers of the Church." For this purpose a commission of six Bps. and "six other men of this realm learned in God's law" was to be appointed. They were, however, probably called on to endorse a form already drawn up under Cranmer's supervision. It was in print before March 25, and was to come into use from April 1. Short of demonstrative proof, it seems to be clear that the new ORDINAL was largely influenced by a form drawn up in 1550 by Bucer under the title De ordinatione legitima ministrorum ecclesiae revocanda. Many of the thoughts and phrases of this document appear in the Ordinal, but Cranmer is observed to have improved Bucer's language in translation, whilst he is independent on doctrinal points.¹ The work still exhibits the spirit of compromise between the school of Cranmer on the one side and the views of such men as Holbeach on the other. The delivery of chalice and paten is retained, and so is the taking of a corporal oath, but no provision is made for the Minor Orders contemplated by the Act 3 and 4 Edward VI, cap. 12. On the whole, the Ordinal of 1550 departs very widely from the PONTIFICAL, as will be best appreciated by comparing it with the Sar. Pontifical (see Maskell, Monumenta Ritualia, vol. 2).

IV. THE PB OF 1552.

Edward's First PB and the Ordinal which followed it were a compromise between two schools of thought. Compromises of rarely satisfy all parties, and it may be doubted whether the book of 1549 was acceptable in all particulars even to those who took part in its compilation. The years that followed its appearance were a period of great flux in eccles. opinion. Whilst some were reported to the Council in 1550 because the book "was used as the very Mass," others regarded it as erring on the side of defect, and desired a fuller reformation. This must have been the case with some of the new Bps. such as Ridley, Ponet and Hooper, all promoted in 1550, and with Scory and Coverdale, appointed to be Bps. in 1551. It has been suggested that a Royal Visitation in 1550 went beyond the regulations of the new PB by ordering what was in some respects contradictory to it,¹ but in the absence of evidence we cannot fully determine the point. At all events individual Bps. like Ridley and Hooper enjoined at their Visitation in 1550 orders which are far more radical in character than the rules of 1549. Of these the most notable was the destruction of stone-altars, begun by Ridley, taken up and extended by order of the Privy Council. Precisely at this juncture, and as if by design, Cranmer published his Defence of the True and Catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament. In effect this treatise, written by the Primate himself, could not be brought into harmony with that view of the Euch. which was still supported by such men as those referred to above, amongst whom the book of 1549 "was used as the very Mass." This was the situation as seen by the Abp. and his friends in 1551 after Gardiner's attack upon the Primate's Defence. It was this which led Cranmer to contemplate further revision. During the last two years he had not been idle. He had submitted the book of 1549 to Peter Martyr and Bucer, asking their opinion of it. Bucer's criticism was given in great detail in his Censura (for its substance, see Procter and Frere, pp. 73-76). This constitutes an important document for the Second PB, since a rough analysis of its suggestions proves its extensive influence upon the changes that were made in the revision of 1551: sixteen of these suggestions were adopted wholly, five partially, and only seven were ignored. The objections of Bucer dealt principally with vestments, non-communicating attendance, prs. for the dead, the sign of the cross, the Manual Acts, the Invocation of the Holy Spirit in the Pr. of Consecration. A letter of Jan. 10, 1551, from Peter Martyr to Bucer shows that Cranmer's mind was occupied with the prospect of liturgical revision, and that he had been in conference with some of the Bishops.

9. Revision of First PB desired.

Once more the actual steps taken in the Revision are wrapped in much obscurity. A later reference by Cranmer proves that the work of revision was committed to "a great many bishops and other of the best learned within this realm and appointed for that purpose." The names of the revisers will always be conjectural in the present state of our evidence, but it is natural to suggest, as helping Cranmer, Ridley and perhaps Ponet and Hooper among the Bps., with Peter Martyr, Bucer (in the earlier stages—ob. Feb., 1551), and probably Dr. Cox, with perhaps Dr. Guest, representing the divines. Their work was ready before the end of 1551, but Parliament being postponed until Jan., 1552, the book could not be introduced until then. In obscurely recorded debates the revised book was now discussed, and as a result of their deliberations the two houses legalised the Second PB despite the opposition of the two remaining Bps. of the older school. The curiously composed Act of Uniformity establishing the book prescribed attendance at church under penalties for absence. Convocation did not so far as is known consider the book at all. (Ex post facto sanction was given by Art. 35 of 1552-3.) It was to come into use on All Saints' Day, 1552. Events of some importance took place between the passing of the Uniformity Act and Nov. 1. Apart from a commission to inquire into Ch. goods, a storm was raised in Eng. by Knox over the question of kneeling at the Communion. The Privy Council thereupon took upon themselves to order the addition of a rubric (the BLACK RUBRIC) on kneeling, which was appended to the Communion Office (Acts of P.C., Sept. 26).

10. Process of Revision.

¹ Dowden, Workmanship, pp. 44-46: "The differences between the two documents in their doctrinal aspect are more striking than the resemblances."

¹ Procter and Frere, p. 60. This is controverted on strong grounds by Mr. Tomlinson, Queen Elizabeth and the Royal Visitations.

Generally speaking, the character of the changes is, as has been seen, in conformity with the suggestions of Bucer.

In brief the details are: (a) The Daily Services have the Sents., Exh., Conf. and Absol. prefixed.

The position of the Lit. is altered.
11. The Second PB, 1552. (b) The Communion Office is recast. We note in it additions, viz., Commandments and Black Rubric; transpositions, viz., the Gloria in excelsis, and Pr. of Humble Access; division, viz., the Pr. of Consecration; omissions, viz. Introit, Mention of BVM and Saints, Mixed Chalice, Sign of the Cross, Agnus Dei, Manual Acts, the Vestments, the terms Mass and Altar; substitution, viz., the second clause for the first in the Words of Administration.

There is ample evidence of the widespread use of the book during the remaining eight months of the reign. At Mary's accession it was for some months the only legal service book. The proclamation of Aug. 18, however, can scarcely have failed to discourage its use, and at length, before the year closed, Mary's first Act of repeal restored the ancient services on or before Dec. 20. There is evidence that the proscribed English PB was secretly used even in Mary's reign (Strype, Ecc. Mem. iii, 1 329), and that the commissioners who examined heretics directed inquiry as to the use of the book.

V. THE ELIZABETHAN PB.

The Elizabethan eccles. changes were made silently and secretly. The exact steps taken as regards the PB are still matters of dispute. According to one view 12. Third PB, 1559. Restoration of the 1552 PB with Three Changes. The book was submitted to a committee of revisers, viz.: Drs. Bill, Parker, May, Cox, and Messrs. Whitehead, Grindal, and Pilkington.

The authority for this theory and for the names is a proposal found in a document first printed by Strype, and known as The Device for Alteration of Religion.¹ A letter of Guest is also quoted to prove that revision was seriously considered. Another view denies that there is any clear contemporary proof of a real revision. Whether the committee met or not, however (and we have no evidence that it did meet), and whether Guest's letter describes certain features of this revision or not (and the point is disputable—Gee, op. cit. 31-39), the authorities, by whom we understand Cecil and his helpers, decided to restore the book of 1552 with three exceptions, viz., "one alteration or addition of certain lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, and the form of the Litany altered and corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the Sacrament to the communicants, and none other or otherwise." Such were the only alterations allowed by the Uniformity Act of 1559. The book, however, had a troublous time in Parliament (Gee, op. cit. 80-103), and the bill passed by a majority of three in the Lords, and in the teeth of opposition from the Bps. as yet undeprived.

¹ The document has frequently been printed and can be seen, for instance, in Gee, Elizabethan Prayer Book.

At this point we are confronted with one of the most difficult points in PB history. The printed Elizabethan PB differs 13. The Printed PB of 1560. from that of 1552 not only in the three specified and legal alterations, but in various details as well.¹ Chief of these is the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC, which may be described as contradictory to that of 1552. The chief theories are: (1) that the Privy Council introduced these alterations on its own authority (the Acts of the Council for that year are lost); (2) that the Queen introduced the changes by her own authority with a view to conciliating those who would dislike the plain ritual of the book.

It is not necessary to trace here the development of the intense opposition to the PB which 14. Further Fortunes of the PB of 1560. forms so large a chapter in the history of the Elizabethan Ch. This did not alter the shape or the legal use of the book within the Ch.

Certain changes were, however, made otherwise in the text. In 1561 the Court of High Communion was directed to amend the Calendar. This issued in new Lessons for Whitsunday, tables of movable feasts and for Easter, whilst certain names of saints were introduced into the Calendar.² It may be added that the Visitors of 1559 seem to have directed the destruction of the service-books replaced under Mary, and that subsequently explicit inquiry was made by Bps. in their Visitations concerning any surviving copies which were to "be utterly defaced, rent, and abolished."

VI. ALTERATIONS UNDER JAMES I.

The accession of James revived the hopes of the Puritan objectors which had been severely repressed since the Act of 1593.

15. Hampton Court Conference. The Millenary Petition ventilated some of their grievances. They mentioned particularly certain ritual and ceremonial matters, e.g., the sign of the cross, the ring in marriage, the rite of Confirm., the terms Priest and Absolution, the obligatory use of surplice and cap, and "the longsomeness of the service." In January, 1604, at the Hampton Court Conference, between king and Bps. on one side and four Puritan divines on the other, these and other matters were discussed, and particularly the administration of Private Bapt. Certain changes were accordingly promised, and were next considered at a small committee of the Bps. and Lords of the Council.

¹ Summarised ib., p. 129. See too Clay's Introduction to Liturgical Services of the Reign of Elizabeth.

² See Procter and Frere 110, 317-340; Gee, Elizabethan Prayer Book 192.

On Feb. 9 the King issued Letters Patent "pro reformatione Libri Communis Precum" to the members of the Eccles. Commission in accordance with the provision at the end of the Uniformity Act, 1559. The Letters spoke of "certain things which might require some declaration and enlargement by way of explanation" and had been "declared and enlarged by way of explanation" by the said commissioners.

They are specified and may be summarised as follows: additions, viz., the phrase "or Remission of Sins" in the rubric bef. the Absol., Pr. for the Royal Family in daily service and Lit., Thanksgivings for Rain, Fair Weather, Plenty, Peace and Victory, Deliverance from Plague (2), the second part of the Cat.; alterations, viz., in Calendar canonical lessons for certain apocryphal lections, introductory phrasing in Gospels for Easter 2 and Trinity 20, four rubrics in Bapt.² recast (the first rewritten), title of Confirm. The most important of all the changes in 1604 was the addition to the Catechism.

After the Long Parliament began to sit, the PB shared the unpopularity of the Ch. In 1641 changes were proposed by a Committee of the Commons but came to nothing. The Westminster Assembly in 1643 was called to settle "the government and liturgy of the Church of England." In 1645 the DIRECTORY FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP was substituted for the PB, and the use of the latter made penal. Such was the legal position of the book from 1645 to 1660, but some clergymen managed to defy the rule in practice.

VII. THE PB OF 1662.

At the Restoration the book of 1604 was at once used by surviving clergy. It was also used in the King's Chapel. The Puritan was "to advise upon and review the said book of common prayer comparing the same with the most ancient liturgies which have been used in the church in the primitive and purest times." They were also to consider objections, "and, if occasion be" to make changes "in the interests of peace." Thereupon the Conference opened on April 15 and met at intervals until July 24. The divines drew up a book of grievances and proposed amendments extending to thirty-three pages in large-sized octavo. The Bps. answered these at similar length. Baxter, who led the Presbyterians much as he wished, drew up a "Reformation of the Liturgy," which his colleagues desired to see allowed as an alternative to the PB. He also penned a reply to the Bps.' answer. In one or two final meetings viva voce conference took place, and this showed that, apart from certain concessions which had already been promised, the Bps. found themselves unable to allow more.

17. The Savoy Conference. party petitioned for concessions, and some urged the formation of a new book. In October, 1660, the King issued a Declaration of Indulgence (Cardwell, Conferences 286 ff.), promising to "appoint an equal number of learned divines of both persuasions to review" the Prayer Book. Meanwhile it was conceded by this document "that none be punished or troubled for not using it until it be reviewed, and effectually reformed." For the present, too, certain specific points were remitted, e.g., the use of the surplice, etc. In March, 1661, Letters Patent were issued to twelve Bps., and twelve Puritan, or rather Presbyterian, divines, with nine assessors to the Bps., and nine to the others.¹ The general instruction

¹ See Gee and Hardy, Documents, p. 588.

Meanwhile the Ch. party had been proceeding independently. Convocation on May 8 provided two forms of Pr. for special days.

18. Process of Revision, 1661. Much of the time between July 30 and Nov. 21 was apparently spent in mutual conference (Selborne's Notes on the Liturgy, p. 42), which can probably be traced in what is known as the Durham Book, a printed book dated 1619, with alterations written in by Cosin and added to by Sancroft. The Bps. returned to London in readiness for Convocation on Nov. 21. Its first act was to appoint a Committee of Bps. under the authority of the King's Letters. These were Cosin of Durham, Wren of Ely, Skinner of Oxford, Warner of Rochester, Henchman of Salisbury, Morley of Worcester, Sanderson of Lincoln, and Nicholson of Gloucester. So forward was the work, thanks to the earlier conferences, that the result was ready almost at once. The Lower House then considered it, proposing amendments.

The completed book was subscribed by both houses of Convocation for both provinces, Dec. 20, 1661. On 14th Jan., 1662, a 19. The PB of 1662 authorized by Church and State. Bill of Uniformity, which had passed the Commons in the previous July annexed to the book of 1604, was reintroduced into the Lords. Ultimately the revised book was annexed to this bill. Amendments were made in the Bill, but not in the book, and the Royal assent was given May 19, 1662. Commissioners were appointed to examine and correct printed copies of the book, which were thereupon sealed with the great seal of Eng. and sent to the various cathedral and collegiate churches, and also to the various courts of law, and to the public records in the Tower.

It is impossible here even to give a summary of the alterations made. It has been estimated by Wheatly that they amount to 20. Alterations in the PB of 1662. 600. In general they were points acceptable largely, but by no means exclusively, to the school of Cosin and Wren, though much that Cosin desired was rejected (see Cosin, Correspondence, Surtees Soc.), whilst the concessions for which the Presbyterians contended were not much regarded by the Bps. The strong Royalist spirit which set in with the Parliament of 1662 fortified them in this attitude, and the long continuance of this cavalier Parliament put far away all fear of a Nonconformist reaction. In the new Pref., contributed by Sanderson, the actual changes were classified as follows: (1) amendments in Calendars and Rubrics "for the better direction of them that are to officiate in any part of Divine Service"; (2) removal of obsolete and ambiguous words; (3) introduction of AV of 1611 save in five of the most familiar Bible extracts, viz., Pss., Canticles, Commandments, Offertory Sentences, Comfortable Words; (4) addition of occasional Prs., Thanksgivings, and other Services, notably "for those at Sea," the Office for Adult Bapt., etc.

VIII. SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS.

After 1662 the PB remained practically unchanged for more than 200 years. Two serious attempts were made to introduce further change. (a) At the accession of William III ten Bps. and twenty divines were appointed to consider changes, but after a careful report suggesting extensive alteration it was seen that Convocation would not tolerate the proposals, and the matter came to nothing. (b) Again, in 1879, at the time of the ritual disputes, the Convocation of Canterbury obtained letters of business and considered the amendment of rubrics, the addition of more proper Pss., the observance of certain Octaves, and an explanatory addition to the Ath. Cr. A PB embodying these suggestions was printed in 1880, but the whole scheme was dropped.

In 1751, under Statute 24, George II, cap. 23, revised "Tables and rules" were introduced, viz., the Tables to find Easter and the other Movable Feasts, in consequence of the change of style.

22. Actual Changes since 1662.

In 1859, by Royal Warrant, the services for Nov. 5, Jan. 30, and May 29, which had been appended to the PB by like authority in 1662, were discontinued. In 1871, on the recommendation of the Ritual Commissioners, a revised Lectionary was drawn up and introduced into common use. Next year a Bill was brought into Parliament as a further result of the same report, authorising shortened services, and allowing greater elasticity in the use of the PB. This important Act allowed: (1) the shortening of MEP, (2) special services for special occasions, (3) the separation of certain services (e.g., Lit. or HC might now be used as a separate service), (4) lecture or sermon without service. It did not, however, permit any alteration in the Office of HC.—B1.

H. GEE.

HOLINESS.—See SANCTIFICATION; CHURCH, § 5.

HOLY COMMUNION.—See COMMUNION, HOLY.

HOLY-DAYS.—A name often applied (as in HC Rubric aft. Nic. Cr.) to all FESTIVALS, other than Sundays, appointed to be observed in the Ch. of England. Sometimes, but less correctly, it is taken to include also such greater Fasts as Ash-Wed. and Good Fr. (so canon 13).—C.

J. W. TYRER.

HOLY GHOST (SPIRIT).—It is not easy to estimate the teaching of the PB on a subject like that of the HG., as it enshrines prayer-material accumulated through many centuries, and has itself grown in accordance with national needs.

1. Biblical Quotations.

In studying the references and allusions to the HG. in the book as a whole, it seems convenient to divide them into two classes: A. Biblical, B. Ecclesiastical.

A. For the Biblical references, whether direct or indirect, the printing of the PB (Off. Un. Pr. ed.) suggests to the reader a subdivision into two groups: (i) those where a small "h" appears; (ii) those where a capital is used, and personal attributes or activities are ascribed.

(i) (a) The dominant use of HG. (Spirit) is that which is frequent in Acts; God's HS. is mentioned as given to men (MP, EP, Absol., Royal Fam., Bapt., Ord.³), sent down upon them ("healthful," Pr. for clergy), filling them (St. Steph.) for special purposes; there is the corresponding idea of reception on the human side (Ord.³, ³, Art. 16).

(b) God's HS. is regarded as the divine means of regeneration, remission and sanctification in the rite of adoption and incorporation (Bapt., Confirm.). The Christian may (c) increase in the sevenfold gift (Confirm.), and with the holy or blessed Spirit the sick may be strengthened (VS); for it also (d) earnest prayer is to be made (Ord.³). (Typographical consistency is not always observed, and caps. are found in all cases in the 39 Arts. as now printed, although originally only in Art. 1. The Amer. PB uses caps. throughout.)

(ii) HG. (Spirit) is found (a) with reference to His operation in the Incarnation (Ap. Nic. Creeds, Christmas Pref.), and (b) where the office of the Paraclete, the divine Friend in human need, is in view (Te D., Confirm.), the one Spirit (Accession), governing the Church as a whole (Good Fr. Coll.³, cp. Pr. for Ch. Milit.), and thus regarded as the Author of its ministerial organisation (Ord.³, ³; cp. "divine providence," Ord.¹, Ember Pr.³), while guiding ("good," Pr. for all cond.; 19th Sun. aft. Trin., ref. added in 1662), renewing (Christmas) and assisting Christians continually (Sunday aft. Ascens., Confirm., Ord.). Again, (c) He came (Lit., Whit. Pref.), yet is sent (Quinq.), and indeed is probably Himself regarded as the grace with which men are replenished (Pr. for King) and endued (Lit.).

To Him are attributed (d) the inward moving (Ord.) or working in the soul (Art. 17), the calling (Ord.³) and governing of men (Art. 21, Communion), the illuminating (Whit.) and inspiring of hearts (HC); cp. "Inspiration of Christ's Spirit" (Art. 13), although this, like illumination, is not directly a NT figure.

He is apparently (e) both Seal and Sealer (Art. 27), and (f) may be sinned against, as in the Gospel-story (Art. 16). In addition there must be noted (g) all the occurrences of the apostolic "grace" (MP, EP, Lit., Bur., Prs. at Sea), and (h) of the baptismal formula from the close of St. Matt. which is incorporated in other solemn acts of blessing (Matr., Absol. of Sick, Ord.).

B. Passing to instances of the Ecclesiastical use of the term, caps. are naturally employed throughout.

(i) The HG. is named in the GLORIA, which appears at the end of each Canticle (except Te D.)

and Ps. printed in the services.
 2. Church This doxology closes also the Usage. QUICUNQUE and the centos in

Prs. at Sea, and occurs in Lit. and Accession. Here may be mentioned the reference in the very ancient GLORIA IN EXCELSIS of the HC office, although the Western form has been changed slightly from that of the Greek, which, like the present Scottish, refers to the Son and the Spirit at the close of first portion.

(ii) The threefold Name is used in the Peace with Benediction, the Biblical opening of which (Phil. 4 7) dates from 1548, concluding several services (HC, Confirm., Ord., Accession). A fuller variation of the blessing occurs (Matr.), and a supplicatory form (Prs. at Sea).

(iii) Belief in the Divinity of the HS. is expressed in the Creeds, the Apostles' (MP, EP, Bapt., Cat., VS), the Nicene (HC, "The Lord and the Life-giver," etc.; see NICENE CREED), and in the precise and logical phrasing of the Quicunque. Thanksgiving to the Triune God is desired in the 3rd Exh. in HC, and the special function of the HS. to sanctify the baptised is stated in the summary of the Ap. Creed in the Cat., while in the Trin. Pref. the co-equality is emphasised.

(iv) The Spirit is addressed as God in the invocations in the Lit., at the close of Coll. for 6th Sunday aft. Epiph., and in the translations of the Veni Creator contained in the Ordinal.

(v) For the endings of the Colls. and other prs. two Trinitarian formulæ in the main are found: (a) "Who liveth and reigneth with thee (the Father) and the HG. (S.) (ever) one God, world without end (now and for evermore)," occurs over thirty times in all, and is adapted from the old Latin conclusions phrased according to rule; there are some further variations and additions (Whit., Bapt., Ord.). (b) "To whom with thee and the HG. be (all) honour and glory, world without end (now and for evermore)," is used mostly for a few new compositions; there is also the ancient form (HC Pr. of Oblation) and a fuller example of this Eastern type (Prs. at Sea).

(vi) To the HS. is addressed the only hymn included in the PB, the Veni Creator Spiritus, which appears in two translations in the Ord., the second being that of the PB of 1549, an expansion rather than a close rendering of the original. Since the last revision the hymn fittingly precedes the Bp.'s pr. that the HS. may be the efficient cause of the progress of both ministers and people in "the knowledge and faith of " God (Ord.). (See VENI CREATOR.)

(vii) The doctrine of the Arts. concerning the HS. is in part taken from the NT, in part it exhibits the inferences and interpretations of Church experience. On the one side reference is made to sin against the HG. (16), the signing and sealing by Him (27), and the reception of the gift (16); on the other the HS. is named in the Art. on the Tri-unity of God (1), the so-called "double procession" is taught (5), while Christ's Spirit is regarded as inspiring good works (13), and the governing of God's Spirit is needful for right judgment (21).

(viii) In the two parts of the Homily for Whitsunday, the separate office of the HS. to sanctify, regenerate and quicken is emphasised, and also His function as continually expounding and declaring the revelation to the Church.

On some aspects of the PB teaching comment seems to be required.

(a) The Whitsunday preface. Herein are found the words "giving them (the App.) the gift of divers languages." This inference from the language of the record in

2. Special Points.

Acts (2 4 ff.) appears to be perfectly legitimate, but the other NT references to "speaking with tongues" in the judgment of not a few expositors preclude the acceptance of such an interpretation of the effect of the descent of the HS. as historically well founded. Nor indeed was this form of miracle needful when the language both of culture and of trade round the Mediterranean seaboard was Greek.

(b) The "double procession." This especially Western doctrine appears (1) in the historic interpolation in the "Nicene" Creed, (2) in the addition to the third invocation at the opening of the Lit., introduced by the Reformers with questionable taste to balance the preceding attributive clauses. The dogma seems to be implied also (3) in the Quicunque: "Spiritus sanctus a Patre et Filio: non factus nec creatus nec genitus, sed procedens," words which recall the confession cited at Toledo (447) long before the addition of Filioque in the Creed. Further, (4) for "Te utriusque Spiritum credamus" of the Veni Creator, there is Cosin's version, "And thee of both to be but one," and the older translation "The Sp. of Father and of Son," while "Proceeding from above, Both from the Father and the Son" is introduced at the opening of the latter form.

So also (5), Art. 5 states that "The HG., proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory, with the Father and the Son." Finally, (6) the Hom. for Whitsunday lays stress on the fact that the HS. is "distinct from the Father and the Son, and yet proceeding from them both."

This doctrine cannot be said to have more than its roots in NT thought. Moreover, the separate invocation of the HS. as in the hymn of the Ord., however appropriate to the devotions therein, belongs to a stage of Christian reflection much more developed than that of apostolic times when the living experience of the Sp. speaking and being felt within the faithful was primary. Here it may be added that the omission (1552) of the ancient "Epiklesis" of the HS. before the consecration of the elements seems regrettable. In the Scottish and Amer. offices it has been restored. (See EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION.)

(c) The gift of the Spirit. What does the PB

teach concerning the coming of the Sp. of God to dwell in the human spirit? Is it at Bapt. or Confirm. or both? To answer this is not easy, for the question strictly does not arise in the PB; the activity of the Sp. is assumed in response to the petitions of the faithful at all times. Pr. for the Sp. is prominent in the offices of both rites, "Give thy HS." in the one, "Strengthen . . . with the HG., the Comforter" in the other; but the impression is left that in Bapt. the gift is regenerative and sanctifying rather than a Presence abiding in and strengthening those born again. Yet manifold prayer does not cease to be made for the HS. by the confirmed: in the language of devotion logical exactitude is not to be sought, nor may mechanical conceptions be encouraged.

Within the PB, in favour of the view that the divine inhabiting belongs to Confirm., is the fact that the pr. of thanks aft. the address in Bapt.¹ follows the Lord's Pr. at the reception of Infants already baptised, with the necessary verbal changes. (It is omitted here in Amer. PB.) It recurs in Bapt.² subsequently to the act, "Give thy HS. to these persons, that being now born again . . . they may continue thy servants . . ." although here the address itself in quoting the Petrine sermon (Acts 2:38) might seem to involve a bestowal of the HG. in Bapt. On the face of these forms of service an inconsistency exists: it may be only interpretative. In one sense the HS. is given at Bapt., in another there is no "indwelling" Presence (to use a current though not PB term) till the Strengthen comes to abide within for continued Christian life at Confirm.; cp. Coll. at imposition, "let thy HS. ever be with them." The Eng. pr. bef. laying on of hands is not so definitely worded in this matter as the old Lat. form, "immitte in eos": strengthening is more prominent than "indwelling."

(d) Relation to modern thought. How far does the revelation through nature and man as now apprehended demand reinterpretation of the doctrine of the Sp. that is found in the formularies? Only as far as old expressions may need explaining, retranslating into the thought-forms and word-symbols of the present, because revelation is regarded as continuous and itself the operation of God's Spirit. God is known in and through His working in the universe, He is apprehended as Sp. operating in and through human consciousness, and man has a knowledge of sp. only as manifested in and through matter. The spiritual apart from the material transcends human experience. Modern thought, as was the case with the NT writers, would tend to reserve the term HS. for the Divine Will operating in and through the human sp., the invisible and controlling self of personal life.

To conclude. Despite superstitions and misunderstandings that may have arisen, there is no more trace of magical action implied in the sacramental offices than in the NT teaching of the Sp.'s work within the Church or individuals.

The primitive Christians found divine gifts associated with certain acts of ministering, and there followed the formulation of that experience in language which can never give complete or final expression to it: life is more than phraseology.

The manifestation of the Sp.'s influence may be sudden or slowly developed, but the preparation therefor is always unseen. With the individual, consciousness of human need and desire for divine gifts are conditions of spiritual receptiveness: faith is necessary to inspiration. Human co-operation is always assumed. So is it in the PB.

Endowment and "indwelling" alike are to be regarded as permanent for the various members of the one Body, according to their particular needs.

Nor can we confine the gift of the Sp. to those alone who have submitted to certain sacramental rites. The facts of religious history and of individual lives are too obviously against such restriction: we cannot limit the interpenetration of the human spirit by the divine. Yet such considerations must not lead us to undervalue divinely approved means of grace with their historic blessings where they may be had.

Behind the varied expression discoverable in all this inherited wealth of prayer-material, primitive, mediæval or comparatively modern, there exists the complex Apostolic conception—based on and verified by experience—of the HS. inhabiting, helping, strengthening, controlling the universal Body of Christ, as also its local or national portions and its humblest individual member. This operation is for fruit in personal life, for the edification of Churches, and for the guidance of whole and of part in the Father's time into all the truth; so uniting man with God, and man with man, in the communion of Love that is divine, once incarnate in human life.

—K2⁵.

E. W. WINSTANLEY.

HOLY SPIRIT.—See HOLY GHOST.

HOLY TABLE.—See ALTAR, LORD'S TABLE.

HOLY THURSDAY.—The old English name for Ascension Day (see FESTIVAL, § 21). It is sometimes incorrectly applied to the Thursday in HOLY WEEK.
—C2.

J. W. TYRER.

HOLY WATER.—See WATER, HOLY.

HOLY WEEK (Hebdomas Sancta, ἑβδομάς ἁγία or ἁγία or τῶν ἁγίων; in Pseudo-Ignatius, Philipp. 13, ἡ τοῦ πάθους ἑβ.; W. Syr. "the great week").—The subject of the Holy Week Fast will be dealt with under LENT. In this article we may consider the observance of various days in the week.

Palm Sunday (Dominica in ramis palmarum or Dom. palmarum; κυριακή τῶν βαίων or β. ἐορτή or ἡ βασιλόπος &; E. Syr. "Feast of Hosannas") is first heard of in the Pilgrimage of "Silvia," c. A.D. 385. In this book there is mention of a procession on Palm Sunday afternoon from the church on the Mount of Olives to Jerusalem with palm branches and olives (a comment on Mt. 21:8, Mk. 11:8; ct. Jn. 12:13), and the bishop, "after the type of our Lord," is conducted into the Holy City. The festival is next mentioned in the 6th cent. Life of Euthymius (who died 472) by Cyril of Scythopolis. Isidore of Seville (De Off. 1 28) also mentions it (7th cent.); but the procession, at least, was not universal in the West till the 8th or 9th cent. The great feature of the day, until the Reformation, was the service before the mass, consisting of lections, blessing and distribution of palms and the procession, which included the hymn "Gloria laus et honor." As the procession and its ceremonies (together with the name Palm Sunday) were omitted in the PB, all reference to the events of the day dropped out from the service until the new lectionary restored it in the Evening Lesson (Lk. 19 28 ff.).

Maundy Thursday (Feria quinta in Coena Domini; ἡ μεγάλη πέμπτη, etc.; E. Syrian

2. Maundy Thursday. "pesha," i.e., Pascha or Passover, but erroneously spelt as if derived from a verb meaning "to rejoice").

On this day we find instances of an evening or afternoon Euch., as in the Testament of our Lord 2 11 (?), and "Silvia"; also at the 3rd Council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (can. 29, Labbé, 3 285), which excuses fasting before communion on this occasion; also in Egypt in Socrates' time (HE 5 22, where an Agape before the Euch. seems to be meant). St. Augustine says in Ep. 54 9 Ben., ad Januar. (118 7), that two Eucharists were celebrated on Maundy Th., one early and one in the evening, the latter for those who fasted on that day, the former for those who did not. This evening Euch. was forbidden by the Trullan Council (can. 29), A.D. 692. It was originally not a Th., but a Fr. Liturgy, for those who counted the day as beginning at sunset. As a preparation for Bapt., this day is marked by the ceremonial bathing of the candidates in many of the Church Orders and in Augustine, Ep. 54 10 Ben. The Test. of our Lord also says that the "widows προκαθήμεναι" or "presbyteresses" are to bathe on this day (1 42), and Augustine tells us that bathing was in many places a general custom then. The pedilavium is also found on Maundy Th., and this is the origin of the Eng. name, which however is not found in the PB (dies mandati, cp. the "new commandment," Jn. 13 34); see Augustine, Ep. 55 31 Ben. The Council of Elvira (c. A.D. 305, can. 48) forbids the clergy to wash the feet of those who are "being baptised" (qui baptizantur). In N. Italy (not in Rome) this custom was in vogue, but was postponed till immediately after Baptism (Pseudo-Ambrose, De Sacramentis 3 1). On Maundy Th. in the Lateran three lamps were prepared, and kept alight until the vigil of Easter (Duchesne, Chr. Wor., p. 251). Other customs of this day were the Repetition of the Creed by the "competentes" (redditis symbolis), Laodicea, can. 46; the Reconciliation of penitents, e.g., cp. Ambrose, Ep. 20 26 Ben., ad Marcellinam; and, after the 5th cent., Consecration of the chrism and of oil for the sick (DCA 1 355). The E. Syrians renew the "holy leaven" on this day (Maclean-Browne, Catholicos of the East, p. 248).

Good Friday (Feria sexta in Parasceve, or simply Parasceve, as in Tertull., De Jejun. 14, Origen, C. Cels. 8 22, or Dies Parasceves; ἡ μεγάλη παρασκευή, ἡμέρα τοῦ σταυροῦ, σωτηρία, πᾶσχα σταυρώσιμον, etc.; Syr. "Friday of the Passion," or "of the Crucifixion," or "Great Friday"; Welsh Dydd Gwener y Croglith, or simply Croglith; Gaelic Di-h-aoine na Ceusda; German Charfreitag; Danish Langfredag). For the early observance of this day, and for the apparent commemoration in some places of the Crucifixion and Resurrection together, see FESTIVAL, § 17. It has been the general custom not to celebrate the Euch. on this day, doubtless from the feeling (whether well or ill founded) that the "Thanksgiving" was unsuitable for the great day of mourning. We do not find any trace of a Good Fr. Euch. in the Church Orders or in "Silvia."¹ For Alexandria in the 5th cent. see WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 3. At Toledo, A.D. 633, there was no mass or communion of any kind (can. 7); and this is also the Maronite custom (Scudamore, Notit. Euch. 902) and that of the East Syrians (see the Syriac "Takhsa," p. 150). From the 8th cent. there was "Mass of the PRESANCTIFIED" in Rome on this day with a general communion; but later the priest alone communicated.

A great feature of Good Friday was the "Adoration of the Cross." The first beginnings of this are found in "Silvia," where the people come to kiss the True Cross. The service in the Latin books, especially Gallican, from the 7th or 8th cent., is shown to be of Eastern origin by the fact of the Trisagion being said both in Greek and Latin. The service also includes the Reproaches and the hymn Pange Lingua. On this and the following day the E. Syrians say "Light to your dead" instead of the usual greeting of "Peace to you."

Easter Even (Sabbatum sanctum or magnum, vigilia Paschae; τὸ μέγα σάββατον, τὸ ἅγιον σ. etc.; E. Syr. "the great Sabbath," or "the Sabbath of light").

This day was always kept as a fast, even when Saturday was ordinarily a feast (e.g., Apost. Const. 7 23). There was originally no special synaxis on this day, on which in the Church Orders the competentes were exorcised, and received the sign of the cross, or "seal," preparatory to their baptism (for which see FESTIVAL, § 19). But from the 8th cent. onwards many of the ceremonies of the Easter Vigil were transferred to the daytime. The Mass in the Roman rite is the first of Easter. And this seems to be the case among the E. Syrians, who allow one who has communicated on this day to end his fast after the evensong (Cath. of the East, p. 345). The vigil was marked by numerous lamps and candles (Eusebius, HE vi. 9.2, and Vit. Const. 4. 22, cp. Cyril of Jer., Cat. Lect. Intro. 15). This is perhaps the origin of the Paschal Candle.—c3.

¹ In "Silvia" the word missa is used for "dismissal," though it is used for the Euch. in St. Ambrose (Ep. 20 4 Ben., ad Marcell.).

A. J. MACLEAN.

HOLY WEEK, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.—

The Sunday next before Easter (Palm Sunday) introduces the solemn commemoration of the actual events that lead up to and include the Death of Christ upon the Cross of Calvary. The value and significance of that Death must be gathered and estimated from a consideration of His bearing and demeanour, and also from a careful examination of the prophecies and types which, through the ages of preparation, had converged upon this stupendous event. The first liturgical note of Palm Sunday is in the Epistle (Phil. 2. 5-11): it is the wonderful statement of the mind of Christ, as St. Paul declares it to the Philippians. Humility and obedience, the obedience that knows no limit, are His as He approaches the Cross. This must be borne in mind as we recount to ourselves the incidents of the Passion (Second Lesson, MP, Matt. 26; Gospel, Matt. 27. 1-54). The treachery of Judas, the violence of the Soldiers, the cowardice of the Judge, the blindness of the Priests, the ferocity of the Multitude, gather about and close in upon the Just and Holy One who would not "snatch at" an equality with the Father, but willed rather to die for man's salvation. On this day we are bidden to think upon these two sides of the great tragedy: the narrative runs on with its full tale of human infamy, and He moves calmly to His Death, a sacrifice and a ransom for many. And the prophetic background is in those great transactions of the last days of the Hebrews in Egypt (First Lessons, MEP, Ex. 9, 10, 11) in which God weighed out the recompense to a hardened and worldly people. The plagues that fell upon the Egyptians were their own false gods multiplied and turned upon their worshippers. So, the corruption of the religion of Jehovah brought the Chosen People themselves to reject the Son of God: He came unto His own, and His own received Him not.

The Epistle (Is. 63) for the Monday before Easter assures us of the reality of Christ's identification with His people in their suffering and affliction: and the Holy Gospel (Mark 14) sets before us the agony of Gethsemane, the representative penitence of that Only One who never sinned. On this day Jesus Christ came into Jerusalem from Bethany and cleansed the Temple: the First Lessons (MP, Lam. 1. 1-14; EP, Lam. 2. 13-22) reflect this in the solemn denunciations of Jeremiah. The prophet bewails the misery of Jerusalem and urges the people to mourn and pray. Long before the consuming zeal of the Son of God swept the traffickers from the sacred courts, Jeremiah so lamented the desolating effect of sin and the blindness and self-assurance of a people that would not know God. And the NT Lessons at Matins (John 14. 1-14) and Evensong (John 14. 15-31) offer to the soul, distressed by the thought of Christ's Passion, and moved by the quickened sense of unworthiness, the spiritual consolations derived from the lips of the Lord Himself. As He drew very near to His Death, He assured His apostles of the greater intimacy that the redeemed would have with the Father when the propitiation should be fully made. Prayers would rise through the Son to the Father in the new access of privilege and covenant of Atonement: and grace would come down in the dispensation of the Spirit to fill loving hearts with spiritual peace. So beforehand, as we approach the Crucifixion, we begin to count the treasures that are ours by the love of the Redeemer.

The Holy Gospel (Mark 15. 1-39) for the Tuesday before Easter is the vivid narrative of the trial and condemnation and crucifixion of Jesus Christ as recorded by St. Mark. The incidents are a quick succession of tragedies, having their climax in the confession of the Centurion, "Truly this man was the Son of God." The Lessons from the Lamentations of Jeremiah (MP, Lam. 3. 1-33; EP, Lam. 3. 34-66) affirm the mercy and justice of God, and assure the afflicted that He will deliver them that trust in Him. To suffer for righteousness, to endure affliction for Christ's sake, is to be made one with Christ: it is so that we are crucified with Him, and so shall we attain to the power of His Resurrection. The Epistle for the day (Is. 50. 5-11) gives us this note: Christ endured willingly because He saw His Father's Face. The violence of His enemies became the means by which He saved them that hated Him: He gave His back to the smiters, because He had already given them His Heart, and His love was stronger than death. In the Second Lessons (MP, John 15. 1-13; EP, John 15. 14-27) we are taught that we must be identified with Christ and constrained by His love, so that His life shall be ours, not only as a gift made in our behalf, but as a power continuous in our mortal members; and then living in Him, though we be yet in an evil world, we shall be true witnesses to our fellow-men of His love and His grace. As He came down from Heaven to show us the Father, the grace which He sends down by the ministration of the Spirit is a perpetual exposition of God to mankind.

On the Wednesday before Easter we are called to consider the great self-restraints of the Son of God: He meets the craft and malice of Satan and men with willing endurance. In the Holy Gospel (Luke 22) St. Luke tells us of the conspiracy of the Jews, and of the Lord's knowledge of impending treachery. The institution of the great Sacrament of Divine Love is the response of our Lord to the hate of His enemies and the falsehood of His followers. The Epistle (Heb. 9 16-28) teaches the efficacy of Christ's Sacrificial death, the value of the self-oblation of the Redeemer as an expiation for sin. For on this day the Lord remained at Bethany in retirement with the Twelve as though He would brace His human will to the great struggle that lay before Him. The First Lessons of both morning (Lam. 4 1-20) and evening (Dan. 9 20-27) show the destructiveness of transgression, the ruin of Zion and the thralldom of sinners; and in the Second Lessons (MP, John 16 1-15; EP, John 16 16-33) we hear the gracious promises of Christ, while He re-assures His people and promises the outpouring of the Holy Ghost as the supreme gift which the Father would send in His Name. On this day we are called to recognise the death of our Lord not as a calamity which He could not escape, but as the terrible means by which He willingly passed to achieve our salvation. Whilst His enemies purposed His death, He looked beyond to the "preaching to the spirits in prison," to the "rising again from the dead," to the "going to the Father," to "the consummation" of all things. And in the evening Second Lesson He speaks of the share that His people must have in His tribulation and in His victory. The gift of the Holy Ghost is the re-inforcement of human nature by that same power which raised up Christ, so that men may be raised from a death of sin to a life of righteousness.

Whilst the Holy Gospel (Luke 23 1-49) for the Thursday before Easter (Maundy Thursday)

5.
Thursday.

sustains the narrative of the Passion so as to bring to the Christian soul in the devotions of this week the accumulated force of the four inspired records, the Epistle (1 Cor. 11 17-34) gives us one of the key-notes of the day. Maundy Thursday is the Thursday of the Mandate, the new Commandment "that ye love one another" (Second Lesson, EP, John 13 1-35). It is also the day of the institution of the Sacrament of Holy Communion. In the Epistle we have the admonition of St. Paul: the mysteries must be approached by men self-mortified: the old nature must be put off, that the new nature may be put on. On Maundy Thursday the old dispensation passed away, giving place to the new dispensation: in that night the Passover ended and the Eucharist began. The OT Lessons (MP, Hos. 13, 1-14; EP, Hos. 14) of the day tell the doom of Ephraim because of idolatry, and repeat the promises of restoration and recovery. And the great High Priestly Prayer of Jesus Christ is the Second Lesson (John 17) in the morning. In that Prayer the Lord pleads that the Son may be glorified in the salvation of His whole people, and that His people may be one. Maundy Thursday gives us warning that sin works death, and calls us from the death of sin to the new life in Christ, which is fed by His sacramental grace. This day claims us as one with Christ, through His love for us and our responsive love for Him, one in humble service and one in Godward life, and pledges us to constant charity.

In the Holy Gospel for Good Friday (John 19 1-37) we have the full record of the actual death of Christ as St. John writes it—the preliminary scourging, the official sentence, the formal title of condemnation, the bowed Head, the pierced side. And the Epistle (Heb. 10 1-25) gives the note of sacrifice in "the offering of the Body of Jesus Christ once for all." The Proper Psalms of this day profess the penitence and spiritual anguish of our Lord, and of ourselves identified with Him in contrition for sin: they give a tongue to the broken heart. So the Church instructs us that the right temper and demeanour of the soul in contemplating the death of Jesus Christ is not merely gratitude for salvation but rather spiritual sympathy: a crucifixion with Christ and a mortification of self. The OT Lessons (MP, Gen. 22 1-19; EP, Is. 52 13-53 12) show us the fulfilment of type and prophecy in the death of Christ. The offering of Isaac prefigured the self-sacrifice of the Eternal Son on Mount Calvary; and the predictions of Isaiah, as he told of the Despised and Rejected of men, were God's promises of the sinless Redeemer. The NT Lesson in the morning (John 18) sets before us the principal characters in the great tragedy—Judas, Annas, Caiaphas, Simon Peter, Pontius Pilate—that we may distrust human nature and ourselves. And the Second Lesson in the evening (1 Peter 2) is St. Peter's exhortation to personal holiness in the example of Christ and under the persuasion and influence of His love. His example is moral perfection and self-sacrifice; and His love is declared in His redemptive death.

On Easter Even we are called to consider the burial of our Lord. In the Holy Gospel (Matt.

7.
Easter Even.

27 57-66) we read of the claiming of the sacred Body by Joseph of Arimathea and of the jealousy with which the Jews set a watch about the sepulchre. And the Epistle (1 Peter 3 17-22) gives the concurrent record of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, which, still in perfect union with His Divinity, went down into Hades and carried a ministration of mercy to some who, apparently, had not had in their mortal life perfect opportunity of repentance. This mission of Christ illustrates the extensiveness of the ministry of the Crucified Redeemer: it is not only to all living, but it reaches those who have passed out of this present life. So the OT Lessons of the day (MP, Zech. 9; EP, Hos. 5 8-6 3) speak of hope and assure the penitent of God's mercy. None have wandered so far or fallen so low that God cannot reach and recover them. He will save, He will revive His people, He will raise us up. The Second Lesson in the morning (Luke 23 50-56) speaks of the devotion of the Holy Women to the Sacred Body: they prepared spices for the anointing which they purposed as soon as the Sabbath should pass. They kept the law of Sabbath, but also fulfilled the law of love. Christian love should move men to "exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees," and to add the tribute of affection to the defined routine of duty. In the Second Lesson of the evening (Rom. 6 1-13) we have the mystical teaching of St. Paul associating Baptism with the burial of Christ, and applying the lesson that the Christian life is lived in personal and direct union with the risen Lord: sin is reversion to a state from which we have been translated, a wilful return into Egyptian bondage.—G27.

J. WAKEFORD.

HOMILIES.—The two vols. of discourses referred to in Art. 35, which were published by Authority in the reigns of Ed. VI and Q. Eliz., to be read in ch. by the clergy. There was ancient precedent for the

1. History. authorisation of discourses to be delivered by the clergy. Augustine (De Doct. Chr. 4 29) approved of the use of the sermons of others by those who had no ability for composition. The practice became so general that in process of time collections of H. were formed for the use of those who were unable or unwilling to compose their own sermons. Bede's Homilia de tempore are said to have been much used in this way. Charles the Great commissioned Paul Warnefrid to draw up a collection of H. from the Fathers for use in the Gallican Church. Aelfric, Abp. of York (1023-1051), issued a book of H. for the use of the clergy, based upon earlier collections of the Anglo-Saxon Ch. At the time of the Reformation it was felt that the people much needed instruction, and that the clergy as a body were unable to give it. Many were illiterate, and some ill affected to what was called the new learning. In many parishes the incumbent was not licensed to preach. Consequently, in the Convocation which met on Jan. 20th, 1542, it was resolved to prepare a book of H. to be read to the people in the churches at the time of Divine Service. The book was produced in Convocation a year later, but was not published. Probably Henry VIII refused to authorise its publication. However, when Edward VI came to the throne it was issued by the authority of the Council on July 31st, 1547.

It contains twelve H., the titles of which are as follows:—1. A fruitful Exh. to the Reading of Holy Scripture: 2. Of the Misery of all

2. Contents. Mankind: 3. Of the Salvation of all Mankind: 4. Of the true and lively Faith: 5. Of Good Works: 6. Of Christian Love and Charity: 7. Against Swearing and Perjury: 8. Of the Declining from God: 9. An Exh. against the Fear of Death: 10. An Exh. to Obedience: 11. Against Whoredom and Adultery: 12. Against Strife and Contention. Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5 and probably 9 are by Cranmer, 2 by Archdn. Harpsfield, 6 by Bp. Bonner. More H. are promised in the postscript to this book, and a second book was issued by authority in the reign of Q. Eliz. It was probably completed by the beginning of 1563, but was not issued in its final form until 1571. It contains 21 H. For their titles see Arts. of Religion, No. 35. The largest share of the authorship of this second book is attributed to Jewel. Grindal wrote No. 4. Pilkington probably No. 5. Nos. 13 and 14 are from Taverner's Postils. No. 17 is probably by Abp. Parker.

There were several important alterations made by Q. Eliz.'s own hand before she would authorise the publication of the book.

Those who have subscribed their "assent" to the 39 Arts. and the PB, etc., may be supposed to have assented to the statement in

3. Authority. Article 35 that the Books of Homilies contain a godly and wholesome doctrine. This, of course, only implies a general approval. There is one, however, which must be considered to have greater authority than the rest, and that is the Homily on the Salvation of Mankind. This is no doubt the one inaccurately referred to in Art. 11, as giving the sense in which it is intended by the Arts. that the doctrine of Justification by Faith should be understood.

The style and method of the Homilies make them unsuitable for reading in ch. at the present day. They are, however, ex-

4. Value. tremely interesting and valuable, giving, as they do, much information with regard to the opinions of the leading Reformers, and throwing much light upon documents more authoritative than themselves.—
LUCIUS SMITH.

HOOD.—A piece of cloth or silk, of varying shape and colour, hanging from the shoulders and down the back, worn by all graduates to mark their degree. Originally, the H. was meant not for ornament but for use, nor was its use confined to the clergy. It was generally fastened to the COCK or other vestment and was drawn over the head in wet or cold weather for warmth. It was frequently lined with fur, more or less costly, according to the means and dignity of the one who wore it. In its original shape it is still worn by the monastic orders. It is doubtless a survival of the ancient ALMUCK and of the caputium of the monastic dress. Its ancient use in the Ch. of England has entirely ceased, and it is now purely an ornament to mark the degree and distinction of the wearer, and is worn by both clergy and laity.

"Certain Notes" at the end of the First PB lay down that "it is seemly that graduates when they do preach shall use such hoods as pertaineth to their several degrees." By the 58th canon of 1604 it is ordered that "every minister saying the public prayers or ministering the sacraments or other rites of the Church. . . if they are graduates, shall wear upon their surplices at such times such hoods as by the orders of the universities are agreeable to their degrees." From this it will be seen that the wearing of the H. is restricted to graduates. Non-graduates, although members of a theological college, are not authorised to wear other than "a black tippet, not of silk"; albeit the custom of wearing a H. by members of a theological college is now tacitly sanctioned. This practice has probably arisen from the long standing misinterpretation of the term TIPPET.

In form, colour and shape the Hs. of the different universities vary greatly. As a rule they are: scarlet for a Doctor; black silk with a lining of coloured silk for a Master; and black stuff with an edging or lining of fur for a Bachelor.

The tendency at the present day is to restrict very largely the wearing of the H. during Divine Service, a custom which has nothing to sanction it. Even those who maintain the direction of the canon as to the wearing of the H. to have been superseded by the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC of 1662 have no warrant for the disuse of it which at present so widely prevails. The H. ought to be worn at Matins, Evensong, and by the preacher. Being purely a mark of personal dignity, it is considered, by those who take the canon as abrogated, that the H. should not be worn by the celebrant at HC, nor at a Marriage, this service originally being intended to be preliminary to HC, but that it may be worn at a Bapt., this service being appointed to take place during Matins or Evensong. (See Palmer, Origines Liturgicae, Appendix, sec. 10.)—R3. J. O. COOP.

HOPE.—It is difficult to treat Hope in connection with the PB, apart from a study of the word in its use in Holy Scripture. As regards the PB it may suffice to say that it is, in a degree second only to the Bible, and as a consequence of its profound and intimate penetration by the Bible, "the Book of Hope." Hope, in its religious and specially in its Christian connotation, may be said to carry with it, among other contents, these; a definite and more or less confident expectation, quite different from a mere favourable surmise or sanguine "thought born of desire"; and, as the cause of such expectation, not inferences from miscellaneous data, but a divine Person and His promise. There is thus a vital connection, as we study the word in Scripture, between Hope and Faith. If Faith is trust, as we take it to be in the light of its use by our Lord and the Apostles (Jas. 2 14-26 is no real exception: the writer is meeting the Jewish teachers with their own use of terms), in other words, if Faith in God has the virtue assigned it because it means in effect God trusted—then it is not too much to say of Hope that it is Faith with its face forwards. It is an expectant outlook for the promised blessing, because of reliance upon the fidelity of the Promiser. In numerous passages of the New Testament, if we read them aright, Hope (very frequently defined by the article, ἡ ἐλπίς, "the hope") has a particular reference to the promised Return of the ascended Lord. Obviously it is so in Tit. 2 13; "looking out for the blissful hope and the appearing, etc." And we believe that this passage is a key to the definite reference of many others; e.g., Rom. 5 2, Heb. 6 18, 1 Pet. 1 3. The word is thus raised to a level far above our conventional uses, under which it often denotes little if anything more than the vaguest possibilities. Firmly based upon a recognised Divine promise, Hope looks at once upwards and forwards through whatever immediate darkness, assured that her eyes are in the direction of the sunrise and that the sun will not fail. It is needless to point out how, as time advances and with it the disillusionment of innumerable human "hopes" based on grounds less than God, the quality of Hope in Holy Scripture, and in the religion for which it is the oracle and the warrant, grows continually in significance and value.

In the PB the articulate references to Hope in the abstract are few, except so far as the countless Biblical passages embedded in the PB—Canticles, Psalms, Epistles, Gospels—testify as Scripture to the Promises and the consequent Hope. But in two widely contrasted connections the PB itself teaches Hope in its highest form; the hope of the Lord's Return in the Prayer of Consecration at the Holy Communion, and the hope of Resurrection, in vital connection with it, in the Burial Service. Perhaps no more beautiful example can be given of the emancipation of our worship at the Reformation into the light of the full Biblical Gospel than the contrast between the unreformed and reformed Orders of Burial—the note of predominant fear in the one, and of luminous Hope in the other.—K3. HANDLEY MOULE.

HOSANNA.—A Hebrew word (possibly taken from Ps. 118 25 and signifying literally "save, we pray," but in course of time transformed into a joyful exclamation) used by the multitudes at our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11 9, 10), and adopted unchanged by the Christian Ch. in most versions of the SANCTUS (but not in that found in the PB since 1552). It also occurs in hymns and elsewhere. (See art. Hosanna in DCA and in Hastings' DB.)—B2. J. W. TYRER.

HOST (from Lat. hostia, a victim).—A term applied to the consecrated elements in HC, more esp. to the bread or wafer. For adoration of the H., see ADORATION.—R2. MORLEY STEVENSON.

HOUR-GLASS.—About the time of the Reformation, pulpits were provided with hour-glasses to regulate the duration of sermons. They ceased to be general after the Restoration.—R3. S. REDMAN.

HOURS OF PRAYER.—The primitive Church had a weekly nocturnal service of prayer, called the VIGIL, coming between the 1. Origin. Sabbath and the Lord's Day, preparatory to the celebration of the Euch., and consisting of Pss. and lessons with the Lord's Pr. Here we have the germ of the Divine Office. The more zealous Christians extended the observance of the Vigil to the other days of the week, and added to it devotions at the 3rd, 6th and 9th H.¹ The rise of persecution put a stop to all meetings for pr. in the daytime, but the secret observance of the Vigil continued. When persecution ceased, not only was the observance of the H. resumed, but the religious communities added offices to be said at daybreak (LAUDS), and after darkness had come on (VESPER). Last of all were added PRIME and COMPLINE, said in the dormitory, on rising and on lying down to rest.

¹ See Tertullian, De Orat. 25.

As regards the matter of the Office, there was great variety in different places as to what

Pss. were said and what books of
2. Structure. Scripture were read. At first, the customs of the East in regard to the offices said at the H. were copied in the West, but they were found less suited to the Western temperament. St. Benedict (480-543) saw this, and recast the entire series of offices. And, though the ordinary Western office eventually assumed a form differing considerably from the Monastic, it is to his inspiration that we owe the plan and arrangement of the Brev. With him originated the rule of reciting the Psalter once through in each week. He also prescribed that the whole Bible should be read through in the course of a year, but the lessons had no prescribed length until long aft. his time. With regard to the PSALTER, in the ordinary Western Brev. Lauds and Prime have practically fixed Pss., and Terce, Sext and None are occupied by Ps. 119. The rest of the Psalter is divided between Mattins (NOCTURN)—which take up all the first 109 Pss. not otherwise used—and Vespers, which take the rest. Prime, Terce, Sext and None have all the same structure, probably due to St. Benedict. A hymn precedes the psalmody, which is said under one Antiphon. To this, at Prime, succeeds the Quicumque vult. The short chapter, lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., preces, and Coll. follow. The modern Roman use shortens these offices by restricting the use of some of the above parts to certain seasons. Compline has fixed Pss. said under one Antiphon, short chapter, hymn, and Nunc Dimittis, followed by the lesser Lit., etc., as at Prime and the other lesser H. The preces at Prime and Compline include the Apostles' Creed. In the Monastic Brev. the arrangement of the Psalter for recitation during the week differs greatly from that described above. In the Milan office the whole Psalter is only said through once in each fortnight.—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

HOUSELLING CLOTH.—At an uncertain date there arose in Western Christendom the custom of spreading a linen C. (or "towel," as it was sometimes called) before communicants when they received the HC. This C. was sometimes held by the communicants themselves, sometimes it was held before them by an acolyte or acolytes, and when communion rails came into fashion it was spread on them. The practice seems to have been regarded as comely and reverent, as a safeguard against any portion of the Sacr. falling to the ground, but to have had no special doctrinal significance. The custom did not entirely die out at the Reformation, and has never ceased in a few places; within the last fifty years it has been to some extent revived. It was practised at all CORONATIONS of our monarchs, until that of William IV. The name usually given to the C. comes from husel, an Anglo-Saxon name for the HC.—R3.

T. I. BALL.

HUMBLE ACCESS, PRAYER OF.—The title of this Pr. probably comes from the Scottish Liturgy of 1637, where it is called a "Collect of Humble Access to the Holy Communion."

Its source is very obscure. There is a Pr. said at the communion of the priest in the Syrian Liturgy of St. James used by the Orthodox and the Jacobites: "Grant, O Lord, that our bodies may be sanctified by Thy Holy Body, and our souls cleansed (i.e., enlightened) by Thy atoning Blood, and that they may be to the pardon of our offences and the remission of our sins" (Scudamore, Not. Euch., p. 546; Renaudot, Lit. Orient. 2, p. 41). But this could scarcely have been known to the Reformers. The Hereford Missal contains a Pr. that "the Flesh of Thy only begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ may purge (mundet) and the Blood wash away (lavet) stains of sin which we have contracted from flesh and blood" (Scudamore, l.c.). Dr. Dowden (Further Studies, p. 317 ff.) has fully illustrated the main thought. The Cat. of Becon, Cranmer's chaplain (Works, PS., p. 243), quotes Pope Gelasius' Decretum de Consecrat., pt. iii, "The Sacrament is not superfluously received under both kinds. For the kind (species) of bread is referred unto the flesh, and the kind of wine unto the soul, when one (? wine, Lat. vers. vinum) is the Sacrament of the blood, in which is the Seat of the Soul. And therefore is the Sacrament received under both kinds that it may be signified that Christ took both the flesh and the soul, and that the participation of the Sacrament is profitable as well for the soul as the body; so that if it should be taken only under one kind it should be signified that it profiteth unto the tuition and preservation of the one only."

The position of the Pr. of HA. is peculiar to the English Office. In 1548, 1549, and the Scottish Liturgy it came immediately before reception. The abrupt transition from the exaltation of the Tersanctus is remarkable, and also peculiar to the English rite. But the sudden sense of unworthiness to draw near is natural even in the midst of the previous act of Praise.

In 1549 the text of the Pr. ran thus: "drink His Blood in these Holy Mysteries that we may continually dwell in Him and He in us, that our sinful bodies," etc. In 1552 the words "in these Holy Mysteries" were omitted. The alteration can hardly be pressed to signify any change of doctrine as to the Real Presence. "So to eat . . . that . . ." (cp 2nd Post-Communion Pr., "so to assist us with Thy Grace that we may continue," Coll. for SS. Simon and Jude, etc. See Dowden, Further Studies, p. 341).—H2.

J. F. KEATING.

HYMN.—The word H., used freely (e.g., in the LXX. OT, Ps. 71 20, Eccles. 44 1; and in NT, Eph. 5 13, Col. 3 16) to describe any kind of religious song, might include the TE DEUM (so in PB, Rubric in MP), the SANCTUS, the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS, the Trisagion of the Eastern Liturgies, the Western REPROACHES, the Hebrew Pss., the Gospel Cants., and the Gloria Patri (so in PB—"Order how the Psalter is appointed," etc.). For the purposes of this art., we confine ourselves however to the consideration of metrical and rhythmical compositions as used in Divine worship in the Christian Church.

Metrical Hs. found their way into Christian usage in Syria in the time of St. Ephraim Syrus (306-373) as an antidote to the teaching popularised in Hs. written by heretics as early as the 2nd cent.

The same thing occurred at Antioch in the 3rd cent., in Alexandria under St. Athanasius, and at Constantinople under St. Chrysostom. Gradually they introduced themselves into liturgical worship from outside the Ch., as the result of popular pressure upon the orthodox in times of controversy.

History repeated itself once more in the Ch. of the West. Hilary, Bp. of Poitiers in the 4th cent., is said to have written the first Latin Hs. in defence of the faith against the Arians; but it was Ambrose, Bp. of Milan (374-397), writing in the same cause, who may be considered to have laid those sure foundations upon which all modern Christian hymnology is based. Eighteen Hs. exist which are ascribed to his pen; but few can be said to be his undoubted work. His authorship of Asterne rerum conditor, Deus Creator omnium, Jam surgit hora tertia, and Veni Redemptor gentium is, however, undisputed. Prudentius (born 348) followed with two collections of sacred poems. These had many imitators, of whom the most famous are Sedulius (c. 450), Venantius Fortunatus (c. 600), Gregory the Great (540-604), Theodulf of Orleans (c. 800), and the Ven. Bede (673-735). Hs. by these writers, in spite of much opposition, gradually crept into liturgical use. St. Benedict indeed ordered his monks to use a H. at each Office; but they formed no part of the Euch. Office until the arrival of the SEQUENCE.

The writing of Hs. was carried on from the 9th to the 15th cent. by Rabanus Maurus, Bruno of Angers, Fulbert of Chartres, Abelard, Bernard of Cluny, Bonaventura, Thomas Aquinas, Thomas à Kempis, and other composers.

In the 17th and 18th cents. a number of new Latin Hs. appeared in Brevs. issued for the use of particular dioceses or religious communities (mainly French). Many of these are very beautiful, particularly those by Jean Baptiste de Santeuil and Charles Coffin.

Office Hs. having found a place in the monastic Hours, St. Augustine of Canterbury must have brought with him to England the old cycle of Hs., afterwards displaced by that much finer Celtic cycle which has been identified with the set of Hs. for each evening of the week sent by St. Gregory the Great to St. Columba, and which eventually superseded the old cycle even at Rome. In later mediæval times, Hs. were added in great numbers, especially on the Continent, for the various seasons and for holy-days; the English Ch. observing, on the whole, a wiser restraint in the number of those appointed for minor holy-days and new or local festivals. Each H. had its own special position in the Services; at Nocturns, Prime, Terce, Sext, or Nones, bef. the Pss.; at Compline, aft. the Pss. Cranmer attempted to translate these Lat. Hs. and confessed his failure. One unsatisfactory translation only, and that not from his hand, was included in the new English PB (the alternative VENI CREATOR in the Ordinal). And so the old Hs. disappeared from use in England for a while; and with them disappeared the custom of singing Hs. as an integral part of divine worship proper. In future, Hs. were to be regarded rather as a non-liturgical addition to the service, to be added at the discretion of the minister.

3. Office Hymns.

Of an entirely different character was that other H. sung immediately before the Gospel, and known as the SEQUENCE, probably because it followed after, and was originally the melody of, the

4. The Sequence.

"a" at the end of the ALLELUIA. This melody without words was often of extraordinary length, elaboration and difficulty; and so, at first in N. France and afterwards at the monastery of St. Gall in Switzerland, it came to be embellished with words for the convenience of those who had to sing it. Then, words were written to fit new melodies; and, later, new words were composed to which suitable melodies were adapted. Later still, metrical Hs., such as the Veni sancte Spiritus, the Dies iræ, and the Stabat Mater, though not written in Sequence form, were used as Sequences. Notker Balbulus (840-912), the most eminent of the Sequence writers at St. Gall, is of special interest to students of the PB, as being the author of that Sequence of which a magnificent fragment is embedded in our Burial Office: "In the midst of life we are in death. . . ."

Hs. in the "vulgar tongue" appear in Italy as early as the 13th cent.; and what we know as CAROLS supplied, to some extent, the need for religious expression in song in Eng., France and Germany in the cents. immediately preceding the Reformation. But with the invention of the printing press the movement became irresistibly popular. In Eng., however, for a long time it confined itself to the use of Metrical Psalms only in public worship. Coverdale (c. 1539), indeed, published a book of Goostly Psalmes and Spirituall Songes of a Lutheran type, but it was soon suppressed.

5. Vernacular Hymns.

The first work of any influence on modern English hymnody is the Certaine Psalmes, chosen out of the Psalter of David and drawn into Englishe metre by Thomas Sternhold, grome of ye Kynges Maiesties robes, to which John Hopkins added further Pss. in 1551. This Old Version received further additions at the hands of exiles in Geneva in 1556-1562, with an Appendix in the shape of a metrical version of the Ten Comms. by Dean Whittingham. With the accession of Q. Elizabeth, the Old Version was legally sanctioned by Royal Injunctions (1559), allowing a H. to be sung "in the beginning or at the end of Common Prayer." The Appendix was enlarged by the inclusion, in 1560, of metrical versions of several Cants., the Ap. Creed and the Lord's Pr.; and, in 1561, similar versions of Venite, Te Deum, Quicumque vult, and the Hs. "Come, Holy Ghost" (alt. in Ordinal) and "O Lord, turn not Thy face away" were added bef. the Psalter, and four other Hs. aft. it. Further Hs. appeared in the final ed. of 1562, known, from the name of its publisher, as "Day's Psalter"; and the metrical Pss., together with the Appendix, were printed uniformly and bound up with the English Bible and PB.

6. The Old Version of the Psalms.

Aft. the Restoration, John Playford (1671) published a book containing some of the Old Version Pss., some new versions, and some entirely new hymns. Cosin's translation of the Veni Creator, which appears in the PB in the Ordering of Priests, found a place in this work. Bp. Cosin had also translated several of the old office Hs. and part of the Lauda Syon of St. Thomas Aquinas. George Wither (1623) had attempted, in his Hymnes and Songs of the Church, to improve the style of hymnody of his age, but his well-meant efforts failed. The times were not ripe; and the 17th cent. gave Eng. few Hs. of lasting value. Exception must be made in favour of Bp. Ken's Morning, Evening, and Midnight Hymns, written for Winchester scholars in 1674.

Towards the end of the 17th cent. the New Version appeared. It was the work of the Poet Laureate, Nahum Tate, assisted by Dr. Nicholas Brady, and it was authorised for use by order of King William III in Council (1696). This book also contained, in addition to the metrical Pss., a Supplement, where we find for the first time the well-known "While shepherds watched their flocks by night."

Several private collections of Hs. appeared at this time, the most noticeable being The Divine Companion (1st ed. 1701). Addison's five Hs. out of the Spectator (1712) at once became popular; but we must turn to Nonconformity, and to Dr. Watts in particular, for the first beginnings of the modern English H., "which is neither an office H. like Wither's, or Ken's, or Austin's, nor yet a metrical Ps., nor again a close paraphrase of Scripture, but a new species, evolved from the last named, and acquiring in the process a novel liberty of treatment and a balanced artistic form" (Frere, Hist. Introd. to H. A. & M., p. lxxxiii). John Wesley issued, in 1737, a Church hymn book (the first since Wither's time), and from that day modern hymnody developed at a rapid rate. Hymn books were issued for the use of various institutions: the Lock Hospital (1760), the House of Refuge for Female Orphans (1762), and the Foundling Hospital (1774).

Collections of Hs. continued to be issued by individuals; notably by Toplady (to whom we owe "Rock of Ages"), Chas. Wesley (who wrote "Jesu, Lover of my soul"), Cowper the poet (author of "Hark, my soul," "There is a fountain," "O for a closer walk," etc.), John Newton (who wrote "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds"), Thomas Kelly (author of "We sing the praise of Him who died"), and James Montgomery (to whom we owe "Hail to the Lord's Anointed," "Songs of praise," "For ever with the Lord," etc.). In the year after Bp. Heber's death (1826), his widow published the first important hymn book of the 19th cent. More than half the Hs. in this book were composed by the Bp., and among them we find "The Son of God goes forth to war," "From Greenland's icy mountains," and "Holy, holy, holy." Ten years later Bp. Mant published a book of Ancient Hymns, Isaac Williams a collection of Hs. translated from the Parisian Brev., and John Chandler another book of translations of Hymns of the Primitive Church. The years of the Oxford Movement were prolific in translations from the Latin and Greek, the work of Newman, Keble, Copeland, Oakeley, and Caswall; and, in the mid-cent., Dr. Neale. The Lyra Germanica of Miss Winkworth (1855) and the Sacred Hymns from the German of Miss Cox (1841) enriched our stores with translations from the German. And original and effective work was produced by writers such as Keble (author of "New every morning," "Sun of my soul," etc.), Lyte (author of "Abide with me," etc.), Newman (author of "Praise to the Holiest," "Lead, kindly light"), Faber (author of "Sweet Saviour, bless us ere we go," "O come and mourn," "My God, how wonderful Thou art," etc.), and Mrs. Alexander (author of "There is a green hill," etc.).

Since that date, the four most popular of our Ch. hymn books have been: (a) Mercer's Church Psalter and Hymn Book (1854).

(b) Hymns Ancient and Modern (1st ed. 1861), the work of a committee of whom the best known names are those of Sir H. W. Baker, the Rev. F. H. Murray, the Rev. G. Cosby White, the Rev. W. Upton Richards, and the Rev. Thos. Helmore. This extraordinarily successful compilation has since gone through many eds. and added to itself many supplements. Its last revision was in 1904, and its last ed., the monumental Historical Ed. of 1909, which "contains notes on the origin of both Hs. and tunes and a general historical introduction" of great value by Dr. W. H. Frere. No student of hymnology can afford to neglect this work. (c) The Hymnal Companion to the Book of Common Prayer (1st ed. 1870), a development from the Christian Psalms of Edw. Bickersteth (1833), and the Psalms and Hymns of Bp. Bickersteth, his son (1858). (d) Church Hymns (1st ed. 1870, rev. ed. 1903), enlarged from the Psalms and Hymns of the S.P.C.K. (1855).

Mr. Robert Bridges' little Word-book of the Yattendon Hymnal (1899) has been an inspiration to more recent hymnal compilers; and mention should be made of the Rev. G. R. Woodward's Songs of Syon (professedly a "supplemental" compilation); the Rev. G. H. Palmer's little volume of translations called The Hymner; the New Office Hymn Book (a "companion to the BCP"); and two more important books: (e) The English Hymnal (1906), a large and broad-minded collection of "the best Hs. in the English language"—a "formidable rival to the new ed. of H. A. and M." (Julian, Dict. Hymn., p. 1,633); (f) The Oxford Hymn Book (1908), an "expanded ed." of the hymn book of the University ch., Hs. being selected for their "simplicity,

7. The New Version of the Psalms.

8. Private Collections.

9. Modern English Hymn Books.

directness and genuineness of religious feeling," the editors (Dr. Strong and Dr. Sanday) avowing a preference for the objective type of Hymn.

Metrical Hs. are not expressly mentioned in the PB, except in the Ordinal, where two translations of the Veni Creator are given for use at the Ordering of Priests and the Consecration of Bps. The PB is silent with regard to others. The fact is that their legality cannot be proved by the words of any statute or rubric, but that they have established their position and received their authorisation from long-standing custom. Abp. Benson, in his Lincoln Judgment, laid down the proviso that they should not be inserted so as to interrupt the Church Service, quoting to that effect the liberty assigned by the First Act of Uniformity of Edw. VI of singing "... openly ... at any due time, not letting or omitting thereby the service or any part thereof," and illustrating that liberty by instancing the prevalent practice of singing Hs. bef. and aft. the sermon in the Communion Office and during the Collection of Alms; but this leaves much to the discretion of the parish priest.

It may be held that the term "Anthem" (in the Rubric aft. the 3rd Coll. at MEP) may cover the singing of a metrical H. as well as a setting of sacred words from the Scriptures or other sources, but even this is not positively enjoined upon ordinary parish chs. At any rate, the Office H.—i.e., the H., that strikes the key-note of the service for the day—should not be sung in that particular place. The position of the Office H., where it is sung, is either (a) according to the Elizabeth Injunctions of 1559 "in the beginning of common prayers"; or (b) before the Pss., as in most of the Hours in the Brev., and in the Reformed Brev. of Quignon; or (c) before Benedictus at MP and Magnificat at EP, as placed in the ancient English Lauds and Evensong. The English Hymnal and the New Office Hymn Book contain the most complete set of translations of these ancient office Hs. They are, at best, but translations; and it may be thought better, by some, to substitute for them, in their important liturgical position, some of our really good English Hs., care being taken to choose those that are really full of teaching as well as impressive in their dignity and reverence. If the Lit. or the Occasional Prs. are said, there may be a H. aft. the "Grace." If a sermon follows, a H. may be sung at its conclusion. If, in accordance with the Rubric, catechising follows the 2nd Lesson, there is room for a H. to be sung bef. it begins.

To sum up, at MEP, hymns may be sung suitably at the following places: 1. (Office Hymn)—either (a) bef. the service, (b) bef. the Pss., or (c) bef. Benedictus or Magnificat. [But in these two latter positions it might be considered a "letting ... of the service."] 2. Aft. the 2nd Lesson at EP, if catechising follows. 3. Aft. the 3rd Coll. in place of the "Anthem." 4. Bef. the sermon. 5. Aft. the sermon.

It appears to have been one of the earliest traditions of the Ch. to separate Lessons by singing (as we do at MP with the Te Deum and at EP with the Magnificat). It would be in accordance with such precedent to sing a H. between the Ep. and Gospel at HC—the ancient position of the GRADUAL, TRACT, ALLELUIA, and SEQUENCE. At the HC therefore, the most suitable places for Hs. will be: 1. Bef. the service begins, if the Lit. is not sung—in place of the ancient Procession or INTROIT. 2. Between the Ep. and Gospel; "There is more to be said for introducing hymnody at this point than at any other part of the Liturgy" (Frere, Elements of Plain-song, p. 75). [But here again it might be objected to as a "letting ... of the service."] 3. At the Offertory. 4. Bef. the Pr. of Consecration. [This should be very short, otherwise the same objection might be raised.] 5. At the Communion; Abp. Benson gave judgment that the illegality of Hs. at this place could not be maintained "in the face of concurrent, continuous, and sanctioned usage" (Lincol. Judg., p. 64). 6. Aft. the Blessing.

If Hs. are sung at Bapts., Marriages, or at the Burial of the Dead, it is evident that their only defensible position is outside the liturgical service. They should not "let" the service by being interpolated into it at the risk of marring its carefully wrought structure. In the Order of Confirm., the precedent of the Ordinal may be quoted for the singing of the hymn Veni Creator bef. the Pr. for the Gift of the Spirit. (For further information, see Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology, and Frere's Hist. Intro. to H. A. & M., mentioned above, § 9 b.)—Q2.

MAURICE F. BELL.

HYMN TUNE.—The English Ch. of to-day has great stores from which to borrow for the musical illustration of her equally great stores of words available for musical treatment. Not only have her own children been prolific in the production of Ch. music, good, bad and indifferent, but she has herself borrowed freely, in the course of generations, from the music of other nationalities.

For many cents. no harmonised music was sung in divine worship. The Latin Hs. were sung in unison to their authorised PLAIN-SONG melodies. These melodies were, however, sometimes employed in the 15th and 16th cents. as canti fermi round which parts were written, of a more or less elaborate description, for other voices (for examples, see Frere, Hist. Ed. H. A. and M., pp. xxxvi, 146, 199). The few Hs. with English words that occur in mediæval MSS. were intended for extra-liturgical or secular use. There was no congregational singing in the vernacular, though religious melodies other than Plain-song were coming into vogue in the shape of popular CAROLS (see English Carols of the 15th Cent., edd. Fuller-Maitland & Rockstro).

In Germany, Hs. in the vernacular with carol-like melodies founded on folk-song were common enough in mediæval times; but in the 15th cent. there was a great revival of hymn-singing on the part, first, of the Bohemian Brethren in Moravia. The melodies of these Hs. (first publ. 1501) were founded partly on the ancient plain chant and partly on popular and secular airs. The Lutherans soon adapted them to German words and, through them, we have such Ts. as Ravenshaw, familiar to us as adapted by W. H. Monk to the words "Lord, thy word abideth." Its orig. form (by M. Weisse, 1531) is as follows (see Songs of Syon, 1910 Ed., No. 312 A):

2. German Hymn Tunes.

Luther adapted much old material both from ecclesiastical and from secular sources and, himself poet and musician, contributed original work, e.g., the stirring Ein' feste Burg (or Worms, 1529), of which such great use has been made in later days, in choral and orchestral works, by Bach, Mendelssohn, Wagner and others. Its original form is

The T. known as Luther's Hymn (commonly sung to "Great God, what do I see and hear?") is said to have been heard by Luther from a "wayfaring man" on the road. Other great composers of Chorale-tunes of this period are Johann Crüger (1598-1662) and Philip Nicolai (1556-1608). Crüger wrote, in all probability, the T. Nun danket (or Wittenberg)—our "Now thank we all our God"—considerably altered since its publication—(thus):

To Nicolai we owe both words and music of Wachet auf ("Sleepers, wake"), which Mendelssohn used with such effect in the Hymn of Praise and in the overture to St. Paul. Such men as these—organists or choirmasters of Lutheran chs.—wrote and published many collections of Chorales during the 17th and 18th cents.; and to the greatest of them all, J. S. Bach, we owe the Vierstimmige Choralesänge, with its wealth of unapproachable harmonies. Coverdale attempted, but failed, to introduce the German Chorales into England in 1539: and, with but few exceptions, they were little known in our country until the publication of Lyra Davidica in 1708. John Wesley found them in use in the Moravian settlements and included several in his psalm-books. Since his time their popularity has steadily increased, though the English public has never taken so kindly to them as to many other forms of H. melody, mainly because very few have been given and, of the few that have, most have been printed in mutilated forms.

In France the music of the people found its way into Huguenot circles; Clement Marot's Psalms (1533) were set to ballad

3. French Hymn Tunes.

Ts. and, his work being continued by the reformer Beza, these familiar words and Ts. became the hymnal of the Genevan Calvinists. In England, at much the same period, Thomas Sternhold (d. 1549) did a work on much the same lines as Marot. With one exception all his versions of the Pss. were in the old ballad metres (SM and CM) and were sung, probably, to traditional ballad Ts. During the persecution of Mary's reign the Puritan exiles in Geneva published (1556) an ed. of Sternhold's Psalter, adding some versions and many Ts. from the book they found in use among the Genevan Protestants. This was the Psalter written by Marot and Beza and established by Calvin for his followers. Calvin, in producing his Psalter, had been fortunate enough to find in Louis Bourgeois a man who was to do extraordinarily successful work in the adaptation of melodies, derived mostly from secular sources, for the metrical psalms. Bourgeois was not, however, allowed a free hand in the matter; the great reformer insisting, against the musician's inclinations, upon two things:—(1) that these Ts. were to be sung in unison, and (2) that one note only should be written to each syllable of the words. It will thus be seen that no harmonies were used for the accompaniment of HTs. in the Reformed Chs. until comparatively recent times. Few of the Ts. in this Anglo-Genevan Psalter are still in use. The Old 44th, the Old 137th and the Commandments Tune are, however, still sung in our chs. After the death of Mary the refugees brought their psalter to England; and, with it, other Ts. which they had learnt to love, including the T. that we know now as the Old 100th, which, though ascribed to Bourgeois, is almost certainly older than his time. It first appears in England in the Old Version of 1561.

John Day published the first Eng. ed. of the Psalter with music in 1559-60. Harmonised edd., introducing some new four-line Ts., were produced within the same cent. by Damon (1579: RV, 1591), Este (1592) and Allison (1599). These "Short" or "Church Tunes" in CM included, in Damon's books, Cambridge, Southwell (or London), and Windsor (or Eaton): in Este's, Winchester Old: in Allison's, Playford. The older eight-line psalm-tunes in these books are still known as the

4. English Hymn Tunes in Elizabethan Period.

"Old Tunes." Of these the most familiar at the present day are the Old 25th, Old 81st, Old 132nd and Old 137th. Most, however, of the foreign psalm-tunes were somewhat altered to suit one or other of our stereotyped English hymn-verse forms (SM, CM, LM). It was long before English verse writers would write in unfamiliar metres even to suit the Ts. they wanted to have.

But it must be remembered that music in the Elizabethan era was much cultivated in domestic circles, and that, outside the authorised unisonal psalm-singing, there was a certain amount of unaccompanied part-singing of a religious character in the homes of the people. As early as 1553, Christopher Tye had published a book of original Ts.: in 1560 Abp. Parker printed a psalter with Ts. which contains the well-known Tallis' Canon: and in 1563 we have William Hunnis' book of original Ts. with the curious title Seven Sobs of a Sorrowful Soul for Sinne, in which, for the first time, we find our customary final Amen.

In the year that Este's psalter was published, Thomas Ravenscroft was born. The book of Psalmes that he edited (1621)

5. In the Reign of James I. was to have a lasting influence upon English psalmody. Here we find a large number of new four-line

Ts., for the most part the work of Ravenscroft himself. These included some Scottish Ts. from a psalter published by Andro Hart (1615), notably Dundee (or French), Dunfermline, and York (or The Stilt). Other well-known tunes that we owe to Ravenscroft's Psalter are Bristol, St. David, and Lincoln.

Two years later the Eng. Ch. very nearly succeeded in obtaining an authorised hymnal. George Wither obtained a patent from King James I, ordering that his book of Hymnes and Songs of the Church, set to music by Orlando Gibbons, should be bound up with the Old Version. But the arrangement was still-born; and, after three cents., the Ch. still finds herself without her book of Common Praise. One at least of Gibbons' beautiful Ts. has survived to our time. Most hymn books contain his Angels' Song, written for a Christmas H., but now wedded to the words "Forth in thy name, O Lord, I go." It has been twisted out of shape at various times, but its original graceful rhythm is as follows (see Songs of Syon, 1910 ed., No. 410 A.):

The music that Henry Lawes set to George Sandys' Paraphrase upon the Divine Poems

26—(2422)

(1638) is of rare beauty, but the merit of his work has never been sufficiently recognised in our modern hymnals.

The New Version of the Psalter, prepared by Nahum Tate and Nicholas Brady and authorised by King William III in Council in 1696, contained, with its supplements (1700-1708), many stately new Ts., amongst them

6. After the Restoration.

Dr. Croft's Hanover, St. Anne and St. Matthew. Then came—the first of many special tune-books—the collection made (1688) for the parish chs. of St. Martin in the Fields and St. James, Piccadilly, the 2nd ed. of which (1697) contained, in addition to the old Ts., the familiar St. James. John Playford had endeavoured, after the Restoration, to revive the old traditions of Eng. hymn-singing. The 1st ed. of his book was published in 1671. In his 2nd ed. he practically confessed the failure of his laudable attempt and set to work on a humbler scale and in a more popular fashion. The melodies of his Hs. appear, now for the first time, in the treble. His son Henry issued The Divine Companion (1701-1709) as a supplement to his father's psalters: and this contained a number of new HTs. by Dr. Croft, Jeremiah Clarke, and others. To the Lyra Davidica, a little book of some 80 pp., published anonymously in 1708, we owe the celebrated Easter H., "Jesus Christ is risen to-day." In this book we trace the first beginnings of that florid style which, in after years of Methodist enthusiasm, lost all restraint and revelled in roulades and grace notes.

In the 18th cent., however, the Ch. of England, for the most part, refused to allow any Ts. to be sung in the course of divine worship except a few of the old traditional ones that had become over-familiar in an era of spiritual torpor. The Methodist revival

7. Hymn Tunes and the Methodist
Revival.

began the awakening. In 1742 appeared the badly-printed and worse-edited Tune Book which takes its name from the Foundry in Moorfields, the first Methodist meeting-house in London; in 1746 Lampe's beautiful publication, Hymns on the Great Festivals and other Occasions; in 1753 Thomas Butts' Harmonia Sacra; in 1761 Wesley's Sacred Melody; and in 1781 his last tune-book, Sacred Harmony. We owe to these Methodist hymnals such well-known Ts. as London (or Addison's), Oliver's (or Helmsley), and Leoni. Many of our Ch. composers then responded with the gift of such Ts. as Yorkshire (or Stockport—by John Wainwright, 1723-68), Invocation (or Carlisle—by Charles Lockhart, 1745-1815), and Darwall's 148th (by the Rev. John Darwall, 1731-89). At this period several charitable institutions also were noted for the singing in their chapels, and collections of Hs. were published; one by M. Madan (founder of the Lock Hospital), which has given us Giardini's Moscow; two others for the use of the Royal Female Orphan Asylum, to which we owe St. Edmund (by E.

Gilding, died 1782), St. Bride (by Dr. Samuel Howard, 1710-82), and the Morning Hymn (by F. H. Barthélémon, 1741-1808); and a series of books for the Foundling Hospital, to which we owe the association of Haydn's Austria with the words "Praise the Lord! ye heav'ns, adore him." Dr. Miller also (died 1807), organist of Doncaster, published two successful tune-books and gave the English-speaking world the famous T. Rockingham, an adaptation from an older T., and associated since 1854 with the words of Watts' H., "When I survey the wondrous cross."

But it was only gradually that the chs. gave in. In 1819 Thomas Cotterill, vicar of St. Paul's, Sheffield, introduced into his ch. the Hs. of his friend, the Moravian poet, James Montgomery. The congregation rebelled and took the matter to the Diocesan court.

The Abp. diplomatically proposed that, if Montgomery's book were withdrawn, he would sanction another (and inferior) selection. In this way modern hymnody began to pursue its triumphant course in particular association, since the time of Bp. Heber's Collection, with the PB and with the holy-days and sacred rites of the Ch. The Rev. W. H. Havergal's Old Church Psalmody (1847) went through five editions: Dr. Gauntlett, in his Church Hymn and Tune Book, enriched the Church with several fine Ts., notably St. Albinus, St. Alphege and University College. Dr. Crotch and Sir John Goss did much for the reform of Ch. hymnody in England in the early years of the 19th cent. Through the Society for promoting Church Music (1846-51) and its monthly journal The Parish Choir, many of the old Ts. were revived. In its pages occurs the popular T. Innocents whose origin is still a matter of uncertainty. The Hymnal Noted (1852 and 1854) went a step further and published a book of plain-song melodies harmonised in their proper modes. The Chorale Book (1863) drew attention to the treasures of German hymnody, though many Chorales had been inserted in Mercer's Church Psalter and Hymn Book (ed. by Sir John Goss) in 1854.

Another small hymn book, A Hymnal for use in the English Church, had been published in 1852 by the Rev. F. H. Murray.

9. Hymns A. and M. Rector of Chislehurst, and in 1857 he formed a committee of some 20 clergymen who, with the Rev. Sir H. W. Baker as Secretary and Mr. W. H. Monk as Musical Editor, issued, two years later, the first tentative draft of Hymns Ancient and Modern. The 1st Ed. of the completed book appeared in 1860-61, and new editions followed in 1868 (with appendix), 1875 (Revised Ed.), 1889 (with Supplement), and 1904 (New Ed.). Of the contributors to this epoch-making book, Dr. W. H. Monk's name will live in connection especially with Mr. Lyte's "Abide with me" to which he wrote—"at a time of great sorrow"—the tune Eventide. Dr. Dykes wrote 7 tunes for the 1st ed. (Melita, St. Cross, Nicaea, St.

Cuthbert, Hullingside, Horbury and Dies Irae) and 24 for the edd. of 1868 and 1875, full of melody but over-charged with sentimentality: the work of Elvey, Stainer, Barnby and Henry Smart was also largely represented in this collection which for many years has maintained its position as the most popular hymnal of the Eng. Church. Until the issue of its "New Ed.," however, it was stronger on "Modern" than on "Ancient" hymnody. The revival of the more ancient Ts., and the restoration of many to their original forms, was left to the Hymnal Noted (1852 and 1854), to James Turle's edition of the SPCK Psalms and Hymns (1863), and, later, to the new edition of Church Hymns (1903), and to the English Hymnal (1906).

The weakness of the 19th cent. compilations of Hs. lay in the over-multiplication of new Ts., many of which have become popular on account of their prettiness, but are sadly lacking in strength and reverence. The taste of our Ch. public requires to be trained to desire the use only of the worthiest Ts. in the service of God's house and to have courage to reject jejune and meretricious ones, however popular they may unfortunately have become.

Some of our best-known Ts. have taken a new lease of life since their editors have taken them in hand, and altered their rhythm to suit

10. Adaptations. English words. Here are some instances:—(a) The T. Angelus, usually attached to the words "At even ere the sun was set," is an adaptation of a melody by G. Joseph (1657) as a setting to words by Johann Scheffler ("Angelus Silesius"). Its original form was as follows:

(b) The T. wrongly attributed to Richard Redhead and set to "Soldiers who are Christ's below" is part of the humorous mediæval "Sequence of the Ass" sung for many cents. at the New Year in Northern France.

(c) The straightforward SM Tune St. Helena is a barely recognisable adaptation, probably by Dr. W. H. Monk, of a T. by B. Milgrove (1769) called Mount Ephraim.

Mention must be made of a few once popular HTs. which have been taken from instrumental and choral works. A familiar T. to

11. Arrangement. "Onward, Christian soldiers" comes from Haydn's Symphony in D. The T. Mendelssohn (or Berlin) sung to "Hark, the herald angels sing," was adapted by Dr. Cummings from a chorus out of the Festgesang, of which the composer wrote "It will never do to sacred words." Some of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte and Four Part Songs have been supplied by various editors with sacred words. Beethoven's Sonatas and some of his chamber music have been robbed in the same way. There is a T. in most of our Mission Hymn Books known as Weber, which is an arrangement of the opening chorus of fairies in his opera Oberon: and many of Handel's operas and oratorios have been laid under contribution, the most successful adaptation being the T. Brunswick from an air in Saul.

Within the last few years another vein of far richer ore has been discovered. Dr. Vaughan Williams (Mus. Editor of the Eng. Hymnal) has made considerable use of the traditional songs of the English people—in many cases cents. old—which have been unearthed through the labours of the Folk-song Society. Some of these had been wedded to sacred words: in other cases they yet have to prove their suitability for their sacred use, as they have already proved their power to touch the hearts of the Eng. people by their survival after so many generations. They may prove to be a welcome addition to our store of English hymn tunes.—Q2.

MAURICE F. BELL.

HYPOTHETICAL BAPTISM.—See BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 31.

IDOLATRY.—See IMAGES, RITUAL (Ornaments).

IGNORANCE.—By Ignorances in the Lit. is clearly meant sins committed in I. of their real nature. That there are such sins, and that they require pardon from God, is taught in Scripture (cp. Num. 15 27-29, Luke 12 48, 23 34). To the objection that there can be no personal moral guilt attaching to such sins, it may well be answered that we can never be certain how much our own fault may have contributed towards our ignorance. Moreover, in proportion as we grow in the love of God, we shall dread the thought of offending Him, even in ignorance.—Pd.

A. R. WHITHAM.

IMAGES.—An image is the likeness of anyone or anything, whether it be a painting, or a mosaic, or a stained-glass window, or a statue carved in stone, wood, or metal.

1. In the Early Church.

The use of I. in the early Church was strictly avoided. There would naturally be very strong prejudices against them on the part of Jewish converts to the Christian Faith, and on account of the idolatrous heathen worship. To no greater lengths would the early Christians go than the introduction of symbols painted on the walls of their chapels, on the tombs in the catacombs, and on furniture. Such representations took the form of the Good Shepherd (painted on a chalice; see Tertullian, A.D. 200, De Pudic. 10), the Cross, the Fish, the Ship, the Dove, the Palm Branch, the Anchor, etc. Before the end of the 3rd cent. paintings of persons on the walls of churches had most probably been introduced, as at the Council of Elvira (305) these were forbidden lest they became objects of worship. In the 4th cent., however, pictures of saints and martyrs were frequently introduced. Statues, which far more than pictures were regarded as tending to idolatry, seem to have been but rare in churches until the 6th or 7th century.

The Eastern Church has always shunned the use of "graven I." thus adhering literally to the 2nd

2. In the Eastern Church. Commandment, and uses Icons (εἰκόνες = image), i.e., flat-painted pictures of our Lord, the BVM. and the saints. Nevertheless it was owing to the superstitious use of such paintings and mosaics that the trouble began. Pope Gregory the Great dealt with it in the West, and directed that I. should only be used "for instructing the minds of the ignorant." In the Eastern Church at the beginning of the 8th cent. much superstition prevailed in the use of Icons, and in 726 the Emperor Leo III (the Isaurian) forbade their worship, and again in 730 proclaimed all image-worship as idolatrous and commanded I. to be destroyed.

This action led to the great Iconoclastic Controversy. The synod of Constantinople (754) condemned I., but the 2nd Council of Nicaea (787) decreed not only that I. should be admitted, but should also be venerated, a distinction being

3. The Iconoclastic Controversy. drawn between the supreme worship (λατρεία) offered only to God, and reverence (δουλεία) due to I. of Christ, His Mother and the saints. This in doctrine and practice was generally accepted. A determined movement, however, soon followed, strongly supported by Charlemagne (742-814), in France and Germany against the decisions of the Council. It is interesting to note that this movement was joined by the English Church, which was very largely influenced by Alcuin, and that at a synod held at Frankfort (794), at which English, Gallican, German, and Italian Bps. were present, the decrees of the 2nd Council of Nicaea were rejected: I. were to be permitted as memorials and ornaments, but were not to be adored. The synod of Constantinople in 842 commended I. to the veneration of the faithful.

In course of time unfortunate and most undesirable developments followed, e.g., St. Thomas Aquinas

4 Medieval Superstitions. allowed that the same adoration of Christ and to the Cross as to Christ Himself (Summ. Theol. iii. 25 3, 4), and Abp. Arundel (1408) ordered in his Constitutions that "all henceforth preach up the veneration of the Cross, and of the image of the Crucifix, and other images of saints." History is full of instances of superstitious observance in connection with I., such, e.g., in England in pre-Reformation times as the famous roods of St. Paul's by the N. door, of Bromholm, Waltham, and Chester, and the statues of the BVM. at Bexley, Wilsden, and other places.

The writings of Erasmus and Sir Thomas More speak of the abuses then existing. The

5. Line taken at the Reformation. Injunctions of Edw. VI (1547) ordered that "all I. abused by pilgrimages and other special honours" should be taken away, and that those which remained should be for "a memorial only." The extremists of the reforming party rejected utterly the use of I., and much wanton destruction took place from time to time, but in many places they remained for long afterwards. By the order of Oct. 10, in the third year of Q. Elizabeth, the roods were removed, but the screens were to remain.

A restoration of statuary was in some places effected not long before the Commonwealth, and was often attended by remonstrances, as

6. The Puritans and Images. The following extracts will show. 1625-49: "The great conformity and likeness continued and increased in our Church to the Church of Rome in . . . setting images, crucifixes and conceits over them" (Nelson's Impartial Collection 1 165). 1639: "Sir Paul Pinder—having at his own charge first repaired the decays of that goodly partition made at the West end of the quire, adorning the front thereof outwards with . . . statues of those Saxon Kings which had been founders or benefactors to the Church—beautified the inner part thereof with figures of angels, etc." (Dugdale's Hist. of St. Paul's Cathedral). 1640: "The said church is divided into three parts: the sanctum sanctorum, being one of them, is separated from the chancel by a large screen, in the figure of a beautiful gate, in which is carved two large pillars and three large statues: on the one side is Paul with his sword, on the other Barnabas with his book; and over them Peter with his keys" (Petition by the Puritans to Parliament against the Rector, Dr. Heywood, 1640. Some account of the Hospital and Parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, p. 201). 1640: "One and the same" (with the Church of Rome) "in . . . fair crucifixes . . . where your altar and crucifix standeth, goodly gay images . . ." (Reply to a Relation of the Conference, etc.). 1641: "In which diocese" (Gloucester), "proceeding in his former courses, he" (Godfrey Goodman) . . . "set up divers crucifixes and images in the cathedral at Gloucester and elsewhere" (W. Prynne, The Second Part of the Antipathy). In 1644, in accordance with an ordinance of Parliament, great activity seems to have been displayed by one William Dowling in the destruction of I. in Suffolk and Cambridgeshire.

The law in the Church of England with regard to I. has been decided in recent years in several cases: prominent among these have been the Exeter Reredos case (1875), the St. Paul's Reredos case (1891), and the St. Anselm's, Pinner, Rood-screen case (1900). In the two latter the lawfulness also of the crucifix was sub judice. The decisions, summed up in the fewest words, amount to this—that I. for memorial and decorative purposes are not illegal [cp. nos. 58, 60, 68, 69, in Table I at end of RITUAL LAW].

The Roman Catholic Church, through the decree of the Council of Trent (1545-63, Sess. xxv), strongly resents the imputation of idolatry in her use of I., and renews the distinction between the absolute worship due to God alone and the veneration due to I. "whereby we worship Christ and the saints, who are prototypes of these images."

In many of the German Lutheran churches crucifixes and I. still remain and are regarded as permissible for purposes of instruction and as aids to faith and devotion.

To attach miraculous powers to an Image is one thing, but to treat it as representing one

8. The True Via Media. whose memory we venerate and love, e.g., by placing flowers upon it or near it, whether inside or outside a church, is another thing, and we know this is frequently, innocently and lovingly done, be the Image one of our Lord, or a saint, or Lord Nelson, or General Gordon. It lies with the Church of each age and each country to regulate the use of I. and to safeguard it against any risk of superstition.—R4.

H. D. MACNAMARA.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF BVM.—

The controversy on this subject began in the 12th cent. All the Latin Fathers and schoolmen up to that time had taught or implied that Mary was conceived in original sin. Scotus, who inaugurated the new opinion, proves indirectly that it was new. He gives his opinion in favour of the Immaculate Conception timidly, and thinks it "commendable," "if not contrary to the authority of the Church and the saints." The question was left open at Trent, and the new doctrine was first made an article of faith by Pius IX in 1854.—U.

W. E. ADDIS.

IMMERSION.—The method of administering the Sac. of Bapt. by dipping the whole body into the water. See BAPTISMAL OFFICES, §§ 19, 20, 21.—IC.

J. W. TYRER.

IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY.—See under CLERGY, DISABILITIES, etc.

IMPROPRIATIONS.—Impropriated tithes are those "greater tithes" which are paid not to the incumbent but to lay persons or corporate bodies, though the right of colleges and of spiritual houses and persons was formerly called appropriation. Since the dissolution of the monasteries about a fourth of the tithe of England is impropriated, and is now in the hands of about 4,000 impropricators. The impropricator has rectorial rights, including the principal seat in the chancel, with duty of repair, the services being performed by a vicar, to whom the "smaller" tithes are assigned. Obligation to provide for the poor was charged upon monastic appropriations by Abp. Stratford's Constitutions (1342) and by an Act of 1391. The Lateran Council of 1078 forbade laymen to possess tithes.—A6.

DOUGLAS MACLEAN.

IMPUTATION.—The verb "impute" occurs in Vis. of the Sick, Ep. for the Circ. of Christ (Rom. 4 8), and in Ps. 32 2. The word is formed from the Latin "imputare" (= to attribute or reckon something, good or bad, to a man) which was used in the Vulgate to translate λογίζομαι, Heb. חָשַׁב.

It is used in the active with a negative: "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." "impute not unto him his former sins"; positively in the passive: "Faith was reckoned (imputed) to Abraham for righteousness." "that righteousness might be imputed unto them also." Men may through ignorance or malice impute to a man wrong motives or actions which he has never done. They may impute virtue to a villain or villainy to a saint. God cannot be ignorant or malicious. In what sense then can God not impute sins undoubtedly committed, or impute rightness to a man whose life has been all wrong? For the answer to this, see JUSTIFICATION.—PD. J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

INADEQUATE PERFORMANCE OF ECCLESIASTICAL DUTIES.—A bp. has power to enforce due performance by an incumbent of divine service on Sundays and holy-days, and of the other duties undertaken in ordination vows—first issuing a commission of inquiry, upon whose report he may require the incumbent to nominate a curate or curates to fulfil the duties. If the incumbent's negligence is reported, he may be inhibited from performing all or any of the duties.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

INCAPACITY.—A bastard was formerly incapable of being ordained, save under dispensation; and, if he were ordained, his illegitimacy was good ground for refusing to admit him to a benefice. After an abeyance of some 250 years, this rule has been revived, a licence being substituted for a dispensation. See Eng. Hist. Rev. (1910) 25 679-82. If an incumbent be a lunatic, so found, his committee may resign in his name. No man may be ordained deacon under 23, or priest under 24, years of age.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

INCARNATION.—(See first, arts. on JESUS and CHRIST.) The great all-inclusive fact and truth of the Incarnation so underlies, pervades, and envelopes the whole of Scripture, of Catholic Christianity and of the PB, that it must be treated here rather in its large scope than in its particular features and bearings. It is only in its relation to the eternal mind and purpose of God, to the reason and meaning of the World, and to the natural and supernatural end and destiny of Man, that so stupendous an assumption as the personal entrance of God into humanity can find either credence or justification.

God in Christ enters not alone into a man, but into humanity. In the mind and gracious purpose of God all men are ultimately in Christ, even as all men are primarily in Adam. Adam is "Man in nature and in himself" ("in the flesh"); Christ is "Man in God" ("in the spirit"). Christians are those who are by Baptism "in Christ," and the commission and mission of the Church which is the Body of Christ is to make Christians of all men. The hesitation to accept and the failure to realise the fullness of the effect of being in Christ by Baptism arises from the fact that we have come to treat Baptism as a human rite or ceremony, and so made it a mere form or letter—instead of taking it for what God would make it, a direct act of divine adoption and grace, an actual divine incorporation into the risen life of Jesus Christ. The difficulty lies further back, in our inability to recognise the Church as indeed the Body of Christ—as Christ Himself, in the flesh not alone of His individual but of our universal humanity. The necessarily inchoate presence and evidence of Christ in us ought not in the least to discredit the fact of the real presence and the real operation of Christ in His Church and in its sacramental acts. The essence of Christianity is to realise or actualise our Baptism; and the grace of it is all there, all that is lacking is the faith. The need of the time is to realise God in His World, and Christ in His Church—which means, not making them more real than they are, but more real and more effectual to and in us. The divine inclusiveness of the Incarnation of Christ, of the Church as the living Body of Christ, goes back into the eternal inclusiveness of God, in Himself and in His purpose in the world from the beginning. Jesus Christ is the divine predestination of Creation and the natural destination of Man in it. The End of Nature is the destination of Man. God predetermined it and him in Christ, as He now in His Church determines or new-creates us in Christ in the likeness of Himself. If the whole divine, cosmic, human significance of Jesus Christ—the Incarnation of God in His world as its predestined End, its coming back into, as it issued forth from, Himself—were fully understood, it would be seen to be the most natural of truths, as it is also the most supernatural—the supernatural which alone explains and justifies all the natural. Not only is Jesus Christ Himself, but equally is His transcendent Work on earth, His death and resurrection inclusive of all humanity. We see in Him not only the completed End but the completing process of our salvation. It was only as He in His own person brought our humanity into oneness with God, and so freed it from sin, that He is our redemption. It is only as He was Himself the human author of human holiness, righteousness, eternal life, that He is to and in us the example, the source and power, the realisation and fact, of all these. He avails for us all because He is potential in us all who believe. Not only does His example reveal but His Spirit and presence in us imparts to us all the grace and reality of His own death to sin and life to God. In His Death man dies from sin into holiness, because from nature and self into God: repentance is perfected into the perfect putting off of sin. In His Resurrection man rises out of all deficiency of nature and all insufficiency of self into the all-sufficiency of God: faith is perfected unto the actual putting on of God, and so of holiness and eternal life. In the PB the whole truth of God is fully contained and clearly expressed—the truth of the predestination of humanity to divine sonship, of the incarnation of God as the mean and condition of that inheritance, of Christ in the flesh of His own natural body, of Christ in the life of His mystical and spiritual Body the Church, of Christ for all men as entitled to Baptism, of Christ in all who believe as realising their Baptism. The PB takes each divinely instituted Sacrament as a direct Word and Act of God, and takes God at His word in each. In it Baptism is what it signifies—regeneration by incorporation into the risen life of Jesus Christ. In it the Lord's Supper is eating and drinking the Body and Blood of Christ, participation in His Death and Resurrection, appropriation to ourselves and conversion into our own of His death to sin and His life to and in God. When our Christianity awakes to all this reality of Christ in His Church, it will cease to be chargeable with dealing with mere form or letter—not through discarding or voiding God's ordinances of life, but through possessing in them all the fullness and reality of God Himself. [Cp. BODY, ii. The Body of Christ.]—K2². W. P. DU BOSE.

INCENSE.—This term is applied: (a) to a substance, which is either gum or a compound of gum and other ingredients, and 1. Definition. from which when burnt there issues a sweet-smelling smoke; and (b) to the sweet-smelling smoke itself.

The use of I. held a prominent place in the worship of Israel. It was burnt twice daily by the high priest on the altar of I. in the Holy Place (Ex. 30 7, 8).

In later times the duty and very high privilege of performing this function, and that only once in his lifetime, devolved upon the priest to whom it fell by lot (Luke 1 9, 10). I. is spoken of in Holy Scripture as symbolical of pr. (Ps. 141 2, Rev. 5 8, 8 3). Frankincense was one of the three significant gifts presented by the wise men to our Lord.

Notwithstanding such associations connected with I., the early Church rigidly refrained from introducing it into her worship. This can readily be understood, for it was used in pagan worship, and the pinch of I.

offered to a false God was the frequent temptation held out to Christians to deny their faith. Up to the end of the 4th cent. its use is hardly ever alluded to. At first Christians seem to have employed it only at funerals, and to this Tertullian (198) refers, but he and Arnobius and Lactantius (303) distinctly reject its use in worship because of its pagan associations. The Fathers sometimes refer to the use of I. in funeral chapels, the atmosphere of which became unwholesome and dangerous and required sweetening. People had to be restrained from worshipping in these damp and unsanitary underground chambers and to be urged by their bishops to betake themselves to the ordinary public churches. The first use then of I. by Christians seems certainly to have been for the purpose of sweet fumigation only.

No record of I. being actually used during public worship exists before the year 385. In the Pilgrimage of Silvia it is recorded that I.

was burnt in the Sanctuary of the Resurrection as a preparation for Sunday worship. In the Arabic Didascalia (c. 400) are found the earliest directions for the use of I. at the Euch., the censuring of the altar being mentioned; and in the writings of Dionysius Areop., in the description of the Liturgy, censuring takes place; but in these instances it is preparatory to the service and not a part of the rite. This non-liturgical use of I. continued for a very long time, certainly in Rome until the 9th cent., and up to that time no Roman liturgical books mention the censuring of persons and things. So far as the Euch. is concerned, I. was used in the middle of the 9th cent. at the entrance of the ministers into church and at the procession bef. the Gospel, but not afterwards in the service. The censuring of the Oblations seems to have been a matter of gradual introduction, but it became universal probably about the year 1200.

In the old English Service Books we get the fully developed ceremonial use of I. at the Euch. As regards details there are differences in the Uses of Sarum, Bangor, York, and Hereford, but the censuring takes place in all, in one way or another, at the Introit, the Gospel, and the Offertory. There were other times at which I. was used, such as Lauds and Evensong during the singing of Benedictus and Magnificat, at the Burial of the Dead, at the Consecration of Churches and Churchyards, and at Processions.

In the Reformed Books no directions appear for the ceremonial use of I., which indeed ceased immediately, but the non-ceremonial use continued, there being clear proof of this in Church Account Books. Subjoined are a few of the entries:

- In 1548-9, "Pro thure per totum annum, 3s. 6d." (Corpus Christi Coll., Oxford).
- In 1550, "For frankynsense, 7s." (York Minster).
- In 1558-9, "Payd for halfe a pound of francunsense, vi. d." (St. Mary's, Reading).
- In 1562, "For frankincense to perfume the church, 1d. For ditto, 2d." (St. Mary's, Cambridge).
- In 1589, "Item paid for frankynge Sense, 3d." (St. Margaret's, Norwich).
- In 1604, "Item, pd. for frankansense and holly for the Church, 11d." (St. Ewen's, Bristol).
- In 1629, "Item pd. for frankenssec and Rosen, xxid." (St. Peter Mancroft, Norwich).
- In 1637-8, "Item for frankincense and rushes (at the bishop's visitation), 13d." (St. Oswald's, Durham).
- In 1752, "Paid for Frankincense, Senemon. and Charcole, 3s." (St. Peter's, Barnstable).

There are some well-known instances of the still use of I. It was burnt in Bishop Andrewes's Chapel, where "at the reading of the first lesson the clerk put I. in a triquetral censer." George Herbert, in the Priest to the Temple (c. 13), speaks of the parson taking order that the church "at great festivals be strewed and stuck with boughs, and perfumed with I." In 1684, on Easter Day in Whitehall Chapel, "perfume was burnt before the Office began" (Evelyn's Diary). In 1760, in the Coronation procession of George III, perfumes were burnt. In Ely Cathedral it was a constant practice on the greater festivals (c. 1770) to burn I. at the altar.

In 1866, in the Report of the Ritual Committee, the "burning of I. in a standing vessel for the two-fold purpose of sweet fumigation and of serving as an expressive symbol" is referred to as having been "undoubtedly used from ancient times."

In 1899 Archbishops Temple and Maclagan, in their Opinion [pronounced the ceremonial use of I. illegal, but] said "There is nothing to prevent the use of I. for the purpose of sweetening the atmosphere of a church. . . . In conclusion, we are far from saying that I. in itself is an unsuitable and undesirable accompaniment of Divine worship."—R2

¹ [This was in accordance with the opinions of Sir R. Phillimore, Sir J. Parker Deane, Sir J. D. Coleridge, and other lawyers, in 1866.]

H. D. MACNAMARA.

INCOME.—See ANNUAL VALUE OF BENEFICE.

INCUMBENT.—The word I. is derived from the Latin incumbo. Incumbens in mediæval Latin meant a possessor (Maigne 1. Meaning: d' Arnais); and that not only of a benefice but of a permanent office.

As now usually employed it means the holder of a parochial BENEFICE, whether RECTOR, VICAR, or PERPETUAL CURATE. Properly speaking the designation applies to his tenure of the office of parish priest, as well as of his benefice, though it is more commonly used in connection with the latter. The I. is, if Rector or Vicar, admitted to his office by INSTITUTION by the Bp. or his commissary, and to his benefice by INDUCTION by the Archdeacon on the mandate of the Bp., or, by delegation from the Archdeacon, by some beneficed priest of the diocese, the Archdeacon usually addressing a mandate for that purpose to "all beneficed clerks of the diocese" empowering any one of them to induct. In the case of a Perpetual Curate the admission is by licence from the Bp. without institution or induction.

Canonically and spiritually, the I. has the cure of souls in the parish and the "government" of the ch. and parish. This cure he shares with the Bp.; for on institution the latter reserves his own episcopal rights, so that he can personally minister pastorally to any parishioner, administer the Sacraments, and officiate and preach in the ch. on any occasion when he may see fit to do so. Saving this, the I. has the sole right to officiate and to arrange the services, provided, of course, that he does so in a lawful manner. The Bp. cannot authorise any other priest to minister without the consent of the I., unless he neglects his duty, or becomes incapable, or unless in the judgment of the Bp., after due inquiry, the needs of the parish require more than one priest to work in it, in which cases the Bp. can appoint an assistant to aid him. Further the Bp. can, in the case of an Institution such as a school or hospital, etc., license a CHAPLAIN to minister to its inmates.

A Rector or Vicar is in his capacity as I. a "CORPORATION Sole," that is, an artificial person created by law and consisting of one natural person, for the purpose of preserving perpetual succession certain rights differing from his, the "Corporator's," rights as a private person. In the present case, the object is the holding and preservation of the right to all the goods of the benefice and of the fabric of the church and the ground of the churchyard. The freehold of the church, churchyard, house of residence and the glebe lands and buildings thereupon are vested in the Rector by institution and induction. It is usually held that in the case of a Vicar the freehold is also in him with the exception of the chancel, the freehold of which is said to be in the impropriator, or "lay rector" as he is somewhat improperly termed. There seems, however, to be some ground for doubting this last point. But, even if the freehold of the Chancel is in the Impropriator he has not possession of the chancel. The right to this is in the Vicar: so that, if the lay rector fastens the priest's door of the chancel and the Vicar causes the door to be broken open, no action for trespass, the Court held in Griffin v. Dighton, will lie against the latter. A Perpetual Curate is not a Corporation sole and no freehold vests in him. In this case he has only the right to possession of the church and churchyard and of the house of residence and the glebe. It is a difficult question as to whom the freehold vests in, until a Vicarage shall be created or the IMPROPRIATION ceases and a Vicar or Rector be instituted and inducted, when it would, as it were, be granted out again by those acts to the Incumbent. A good deal of confusion exists as to the legal theory of the whole matter.

The qualifications of an I. are that he must have been at least 3 years in Holy Orders, that he must be a priest, that he must have been duly presented by the Patron of the benefice, that he exhibits to the Bp. his LETTERS OF ORDERS, and testimonials from three beneficed clergy concerning his life and doctrine. The Bp. can further examine him, as provided in canon 39 of 1604, as to his sufficient learning and orthodoxy. A clergyman can be I. of only one benefice at a time, unless two benefices have been permanently united, or unless with the consent of the Bp. he has licence from the Abp. to hold two in plurality. In all other cases institution into a benefice of the I. of another benefice ipso facto vacates his incumbency of the latter.—ra. E. G. WOOD.

INDEPENDENTS—now usually known as Congregationalists. Their distinctive note is their ecclesiastical polity. They hold: (1) That where any company of faithful men, even if they be but two or three, are gathered together in the name of Christ, He is in the midst of them, and that where He is there is a Church. Among them it has been a disputed point whether more than one such church did in apostolic times or should at the present time exist in one town. (2) That each such Church, while bound to regard with deep affection every other Church, is nevertheless in its own government and discipline strictly autonomous. External coercive control, especially that of the State, is to them abhorrent. Each Church is "independent" and "congregational." (3) That the minister or pastor of each Church is in the scriptural and apostolic sense both a bishop and presbyter. That he should be elected by those and only those who are professed members of the local Church, and should be ordained by those who already hold this same office of bishop and presbyter. (4) That taught by the Word of God, and guided by the Holy Ghost, Christian people generally and each church particularly is led into all truth and has plenary power of government and discipline with "authority in the controversies of faith."

1. Distinctive Principles.

Theologically, the Independents followed the Reformers, but were specially influenced by

2. Theological Position. John Calvin. Of late years, however, little else than the broader forms of Calvinism remain, and these are held in an extremely elastic manner. They accept no "written" or "formal" creed, although few of them would reject the great truths embodied in the Apostles', Nicene and Athanasian Creeds. As a consequence of this rejection of any formal creed, and as the result of the strict independency of each of their Churches, it is impossible to lay down any statement of their belief or details of their ecclesiastical polity which would cover the whole ground or might not most easily be challenged.

As a separated body of Christians the Independents take their rise from about the year 1560. In

3. History. 1568 there existed an Independent Church of which Richard Fitz was pastor, and in 1580 Sir Walter Raleigh spoke of the Brownists as existing by "thousands." Robert Browne, who had been a clergyman of the Church of England, and who later returned to that Church, publicly taught most of the views which have distinguished the Independents. With the Puritans, they repudiated all "rags of popery"; with Cartwright and the Presbyterians, they rejected Episcopacy, but went further and objected to the Presbyterian form of government; and, later, asserted that Christians and Christian Churches should in all matters which pertain to the conscience and the religious life generally be free from all external coercion. At first there was a tendency on the part of those in authority to class Independents and Baptists (who alike are "Congregationalists") as Anabaptists, but little by little it was made clear that the Independents were not merely paedobaptists (so occupying a different position from the Baptists whose distinguishing tenet is "believers' baptism"), but also opposed to the Anabaptists whose beliefs impelled them towards Anarchism and Communism. For some years the Independents were unable to grasp their own principle and were as little ready to grant full toleration as the Puritans generally. But later, with the Baptists, they became the pioneers of absolute freedom of conscience. Under Elizabeth many of them were haled to prison and some died upon the scaffold, among whom were Barrowe, Greenwood and Penry; Whitgift being the first to put his signature to the warrant for Penry's execution. James I endeavoured to "harry" all Brownists and Anabaptists out of the land. Many were imprisoned, many banished, and others, chiefly from London and Lincolnshire, fled to Holland. Among these was John Robinson, who founded an Independent Church at Leyden, from which sprang the non-persecuting Pilgrim Fathers of New England. From the same congregation came Henry Jacob, who in 1616 formed an Independent Church in London. Under the Commonwealth Independency leapt into prominence, Cromwell himself being a Congregationalist, and many Independents holding benefices at that time.

In 1833 "The Congregational Union of England and Wales" was formed, but this has no direct coercive power. During the last decade there has been a conspicuous drawing together of the Independent Churches, a deepening of fellowship and a growing sense of solidarity.

In 1910 the number of Congregational Churches in England and Wales was about 4,680, but, owing to the very elastic way in which the term "Congregational" can be used, it is impossible to give exact figures.—A.T. G. E. CATLIN.

INDUCTION.—Induction is the action of formally introducing a clergyman into possession

1. Nature of Induction. of the church to which he has been presented and instituted together with all rights, profits, etc., pertaining to it. As by Institution the spiritual care of the parish and the cure of souls are committed to an incumbent, so by I. are committed to him the temporalities of the church, and actual possession of the church and glebe. He acquires thereby jus in re, and could take any legal action that might be necessary for the recovery or protection of the property of the benefice. Of common right it belongs to the archdeacon to perform the act of I., yet he ought not to do it without the bishop's mandate, and, if unable himself to do it, he must issue his mandate or precept to some other incumbent to act for him. Whereas Institution may take place anywhere, I. must take place in the church of the benefice, the clerk to be inducted appearing in propria persona, or by his lawful proctor. The mandate of the bishop "impowers and strictly requires the Archdeacon to induct the Clerk or his lawful Proctor into the real, actual and corporeal possession of the said benefice and of all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances thereunto belonging."

The manner of I. is for the archdeacon to lay the hand of the priest upon the key or handle of the church door (the churchwardens or other qualified persons being present as witnesses), and then to say "By virtue of this mandate I induct you into the real, actual," etc. The newly-inducted incumbent then enters the church, and tolls the bell to signify to the parishioners his so taking possession. We read of George Herbert that "being left in Church to toll the bell, as the law required him to do, he wearied the patience of his friends at the door, and one of them, looking in, saw the new rector lying before the altar. He had been setting rules for the government of his pastoral life, and making a vow to keep them." Another custom occasionally observed in connection with I. is for the new incumbent, with a spade, to turn a sod in the churchyard to indicate that he has taken possession of the freehold. The archdeacon, or his deputy, afterwards signs in duplicate a certificate, duly attested by witnesses, of having performed the act, one copy being sent to the bishop's registry, and the other preserved with the parish papers.

Though no religious service need accompany the ceremony it is now usual for such to take place when the incumbent has been privately instituted by the bishop. The use varies in different dioceses, but a general one is to have EP (with Proper Ps. and Lessons) to the Third Coll., an address from the archdeacon explaining the ceremony, and then the I. proper, followed by silent pr. for the new incumbent and other Collects, and the placing of him in his seat on the south side of the Holy Table by the archdeacon, who uses a solemn and impressive form of words in doing so.—s6, ra. EDWARD BARBER.

INDULGENCE.—In the Primitive Church the various penances which were imposed on Christians, who had lapsed during a period of persecution or who had fallen into grievous sin, were sometimes relaxed by the bp. on evidence of the sincere contrition of the offenders. This relaxation was termed an I. In process of time charity to the poor or liberality to the Church were accepted in lieu of genuine repentance or as sufficient evidence of it. This concession soon led to the demoralisation of the earlier penitential system, especially after the formulation of the mediæval and scholastic conception of an intermediate state between death and judgment, called PURGATORY, where the temporal penalties due to sins not sufficiently atoned for in this life were finally expiated. Thus, although it was officially declared that the Sacrament of Penance could alone remove the eternal guilt of sin, it was contended that Is. could release from the purely temporal penalties due to sin both on earth and in Purgatory. In order to perfect this theory, the Schoolmen in the 13th cent. invented the doctrine of the Treasury of Merits, which was formally authorised by Pope Clement VI in 1343. According to this doctrine, the superabundance of the merits of Christ and of the saints constitute a sort of spiritual treasury placed at the disposal of the Pope, as the representative of the Church, which he could apply for the benefit of the sufferings of souls both on earth and in Purgatory. A grant from this Treasury was termed an I., and was at first bestowed as a reward to those willing to go on a crusade or give money for the erection of churches or cathedrals, but was at length obtained by virtue of a mere money payment elaborately calculated according to the nature of the offence; until the punishment due to the most heinous crimes could be atoned for in this way. Although theoretically these Is. were confined to the remission of the temporal penalties due to sins, in practice and in popular belief they were regarded as dispensing with the necessity of Confession and Absolution. Indeed the language in which the I. was often drafted obscured the distinction between the complete forgiveness of sins and the remission of the temporal penalties due to them. Thus Pope Boniface VIII, in 1300, granted "the fullest pardon of all sins" to those who should visit Rome in the Jubilee Year; and certainly at the time of the Reformation the most prominent idea in Is. was the pardon of sins. Tetzel promised his purchasers "the fullest remission of all sins," even those which they "might desire to commit in the future." The Council of Trent declared that "the power of granting Is. was given by Christ to His Church"; and, although it stated that "the treasures of the Church should not be made use of for gain but for godliness," yet Is., both partial and plenary, are still granted by the Pope, or through the bps., to pilgrims, or as a reward for special acts of piety and devotion, or in return for money given to ch. building. The Ch. of England in Art. 22 condemns "the Romish Doctrine concerning . . . Pardons," "Pardons" being only another name for Is., as the Latin of the Art. "Indulgentiis" shows.—Pe.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

INFALLIBILITY.—See AUTHORITY.

INFANT BAPTISM.—See BAPTISM, § 6, 12-15; BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 22.

INFANT COMMUNION.—The practice of IC. prevailed in the days of Cyprian, who relates (De Lapsis 25) that an infant, who had been previously taken by a nurse to a heathen sacrifice, refused the cup and, when it was forced upon her, vomited. Augustine (Serm. 174 7) says: "Infants are made partakers of his table, that they may have life in themselves." It was also customary in the East from early times (Clementine Liturgy in Apost. Constit. 8 13; and Ps.-Dionysius), and it is still practised in the Eastern Churches. According to rule it should be administered in both kinds with a spoon, but in practice the wine only is now given, and in some Churches it is given with the finger. In the West, as a Bp. was only rarely present at a Baptism, Confirmation was deferred till the children had reached years of discretion, and the Communion of infants accordingly became rare. In the Eng. Ch. since the Reformation it has been abandoned altogether. (See DCA, art. Infant Communion; Bingham's Antiq. xii. 1.)—He. J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

INFIRMITY.—If an incumbent of seven years' service be incapacitated by permanent mental or bodily infirmity from performing his duties he may (34-5 Vict., c. 44) give notice to the bp., who may issue a commission of inquiry. On their affirmative report, and with the patron's consent, he may declare the benefice vacant.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

INHIBITION.—(1) The Order of an Ordinary, or of a higher court Christian, forbidding the exercise of the functions of an inferior court or judge: (a) for a certain time, as during a visitation by an abp. or bp.; (b) in a particular cause, as by a superior court before which an appeal is pending (canons 96-98).

(2) "Inhibition" now generally means the episcopal judgment suspending ab officio an incumbent whose conduct makes this course advisable, in order to avoid scandal, and otherwise in the interests of the benefice. The inhibiting bp., by curates or otherwise, must make provision for eccles. duty. (a)

IN the case of INADEQUATE PERFORMANCE OF ECCLESIASTICAL DUTIES the bp. may, on the report of the commission, inhibit the negligent incumbent from the performance of all or any of the duties (Pluralities Act, 1838, s. 77; Pl. A. Amendm. Act, 1885, s. 3). During inhibition, any right of patronage vested in the incumbent as such vests in the patron of the benefice or (if the bishop be patron) in the abp. (Benefices Act, 1898, s. 9). (b) In causes under the CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT, 1840, if it appear to the diocesan that "great scandal is likely to arise from the party accused continuing to perform the services of the church . . . or that his ministrations will be useless pending the investigation," he may inhibit the accused until sentence has been given (s. 14). (c) If a SEQUESTRATION remain in force over six months, the Bp. may inhibit the incumbent from the expiry of that period during the existence of the sequestration. (d) Obedience to a monition under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, may be enforced by a three months' inhibition from exercising the cure of souls in the diocese, such inhibition to be continued until the incumbent undertake in writing to obey. If the inhibition continue more than three years, the benefice is voided. (e) The CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, applies to cases within its purview the provisions as to inhibition of the Church Discipline Act (b, above).—A5.

R. J. WHITWELL.

INJUNCTIONS, ROYAL.—The term Injunctions (Lat. inunctiones, things enjoined, commands), with or without the

1. Under Henry VIII in 1536 and 1538. prefix "Royal" in distinction from "Episcopal," in English history denotes orders relating to eccles. matters issued by the sovereign in virtue of his position as "Supreme Governour of the Church of England." It is found in the Royal Declaration prefixed to the 39 Arts., and in Art. 37, where the reference is to the Elizabethan Is. of 1559 as the foundation for the statement of the Art. that the "chief government" of the Ch. attributed to the sovereign does not confer the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. The practice of acting by Injunction was devised by Henry VIII or by his vicegerent, Thomas Cromwell, as a means of giving effect to the eccles. "jurisdiction" assumed to be conferred upon the Crown by the Act of Supreme Head in 1534 (see SUPREMACY). In this art. the more important only of several series issued at this epoch can be mentioned. Two sets of Is. were issued by Cromwell on the sole authority of the King, the first in 1536, after the publication of the Ten Articles; and the second in 1538, after the Bishops' Book. They are of interest as marking the extreme point to which doctrinal change was carried in this reign. The Is. of 1536 directed the clergy to preach down the Pope and preach up the King: they were to explain the Ten Articles; to forbear superstitious ceremonies; to teach the Lord's Prayer, the Creed and the Ten Commandments; to provide for the due administration of the Sacraments; and to read the Scriptures. The series of 1538 confirms that of 1536, and, besides a number of other regulations, contains an order for setting up a large Bible in every ch., and for keeping parish registers of every wedding, christening and burial.

The method was in harmony with Tudor ideas of government, and was imitated by each of Henry's children in turn.

2. Under Edward VI in 1547.

The Is. of 1547, drawn up on the basis of the earlier sets, but considerably amplified, were the main instrument by which the Edwardian Reformation in its earlier stages was effected. The most important provisions were those which ordered the destruction of all pictures of feigned miracles on walls or in windows, the taking away of all lights except the two lights before the Sacrament, the possession of a copy of the Great Bible and of the Paraphrase of Erasmus in every parish ch., and the reading of the Epistle and Gospel at Mass in English.

The Elizabethan Is. of 1559 may be described as an appendix to the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, being designed to settle certain details in the "change of religion" which were not covered by those Acts.

3. Under Elizabeth in 1560.

They were a republication of the Edwardian Is., but with some alterations and additions for the most part designed to conciliate the Marian party. Of the new provisions, the most remarkable were those which related to Clerical Matrimony and Clerical Apparel. No clergyman might marry without first having his chosen partner examined by the bishop of the diocese and the two nearest justices: according to Heylin the regulation fell dead from the first. The clergy were bidden to wear "such seemly habits and such square caps" as were worn in the latter year of King Edward VI. The series closed with four appended directions of great interest. The first gave a "contemporaneous exposition" (Hallam) of the Royal Supremacy (referred to by Art. 37 as above); while in the second the rubric in the PB sanctioning the use of ordinary bread at Communion was superseded by a direction that wafer-bread should be used instead.

An especial interest belongs to the Elizabethan Is. of 1559, owing to the attempts that have been made to show that they were a taking of "other order" under the 25th section of the Elizabethan Act of Uniformity, and as such superseded the provisions of that Act in regard to the Ornaments of the Ministers (see esp. The Ornaments Rubric Explained, etc., by Joseph Nunn, Heywood).

It is believed, however, that this contention cannot be sustained. The proviso of the Act compliance with which was necessary to give statutory force to any action relating to the Ornaments, required that such action should be taken "by the authority of the Queen's Majesty, with the advice of her commissioners, appointed and authorised under the great seal of England, for causes ecclesiastical, or of the Metropolitan" (Gee & Hardy, Documents, p. 466). It can be established, beyond reasonable doubt, that the Is. of 1559 did not fulfil these conditions.

They were issued before June 24th, 1559, on which day the Visitors for the Northern Province were ordered to publish them (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 45); but at that date not only was there no Eccles. Commission in existence (the writ for the formation of the first permanent commission is dated July 19th, ib. 45 A), but there was no Metropolitan to advise; Parker was not consecrated until December, and on June 24th was not even Abp. elect. If any doubt remains it is decisively removed by the evidence of the Is. themselves, the preamble of which states explicitly that they were issued by the advice, not of the Commissioners, or of the Metropolitan, but by that of the Queen's "most honourable council" (Gee & Hardy, p. 418).

The only piece of evidence that has been adduced in favour of the opposite view is the fact that in a letter written by Parker to Cecil on Jan. 8th, 1571, the direction about waferbread appended to the Is. (as above) is referred to as having been an authoritative taking of "further order" under "one proviso" in the Act (Correspondence of Abp. Parker, p. 375, Parker Society). But Parker (or rather the Queen, whose words he is reporting) expressly states that this "further order" had been published by her by virtue of the law empowering the Queen to publish "further ceremonies." This law is distinct from the immediately preceding proviso relating to the ornaments, which, it may be added, has no direct bearing upon ceremonies.

It is possible, however, that any claim of statutory authority for the appended order "was an afterthought, only put forward at a later date (some twelve years after the issue of the Is.) when the true sequence of events was not accurately remembered" (Bp. Gibson, G., July 7, 1909). But however this may be, it remains certain that the Is. of Elizabeth were not framed or issued "with the advice of her commissioners, appointed under the great seal for causes eccles. or of the Metropolitan of this realm." [See, however, further RITUAL LAW, § 5, 8-14.]
—A4.

A. ROBERTSON AND R. W. B. LANGHORNE.

INNOCENTS' DAY.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 11; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 5

INSCRIPTION.—The bishop has jurisdiction over the Is. on tombstones in consecrated ground, and may prohibit any I. which is contrary to the doctrine and discipline of the Ch. of Eng., e.g., an I. which approbates the Roman Catholic doctrine of purgatory. An I. intended for a churchyard stone should in the first instance be submitted to the incumbent for his approval.—oa.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

INSTALLATION.—When a Dean, Canon or Prebendary takes his place among the cathedral clergy, it is usual for him to be solemnly installed. No form is provided for this in the PB, so usage varies from ch. to ch. As a specimen, we give the form of

I. of the Dean of St. Paul's: (a) he is received at the Chapter House by the cathedral clergy; (b) he takes the customary Declarations and Oaths, and the Bp.'s Mandate for I. is read; (c) he is conducted in Procession to the Holy Table, and Te Deum is sung; (d) the Lesser Lit., Lord's Pr., V and R and a Coll. follow; (e) the Senior Canon conducts the Dean to his Stall, and installs him with a suitable form of words and another Coll.; (f) after service they return to the Chapter House, where the Dean swears to preserve the customs, liberties and possessions of the ch., and all promise him canonical obedience.

A Canon or Prebendary is installed in a somewhat similar manner, but with much less ceremony.—36.

J. W. TYRER.

INSTITUTION.—Originally the right to nominate fit persons to officiate throughout a diocese was in the bishop. But when lords

1. Origin. of manors and others built churches, and endowed them with manse and glebe and tithes, the bishops were content to let them have the nomination of persons to the churches so built and endowed, with reservation to themselves of an entire right to judge of the fitness of the persons so nominated (Gibson's Codex). This right of nomination by degrees became associated with the manor or other property, and was looked upon as hereditary, and might even be treated separately and separated from the property.

When the bishop has satisfied himself that the person so nominated has been duly

2. Procedure. legally presented by a deed in writing by the person or persons who have the right to do so, and when he has also ascertained that he is qualified as regards age, learning, behaviour and orders, and has approved of the presentee, the clerk is said to be admitted. The next formal step is I., or, as it is sometimes called in the older records, investiture. I. by the Ordinary dates from the time of Richard I or John. It is based on the fact that the bishop has the cure or care of all the souls in his diocese; and he delegates the cure in each parish to one who has satisfied the above-named conditions, and who thus becomes the Curate of that parish. This explains the phrase in our Coll. "Bishops and Curates," as including all ministers. Every care is taken by the bishop in the inquiries which he makes to see that the conditions are fulfilled. I have known a bishop to insist on examining a presentee, even though he had the degree of D.D., and to refuse him for insufficiency of learning. The right of I. (and Induction) was originally of the King's foundation and donation, and about the time of Richard I or John was given to the bishop, who "anciently had all the churches of his diocese vested in himself as universal incumbent thereof, and sent out curates and deacons to officiate with such salaries as he pleased to allow out of the profits" (Aylyffe).

When the presentee has thus been admitted, or approved as a fit person to serve the church to which he is presented, he must make declarations (a) of assent to the Thirty-nine Arts. and the Book of Common Prayer and of the Ordering of Bishops, Priests and Deacons, and (b) against Simony, and take the Oaths of (a) Allegiance to the Sovereign, and (b) Canonical Obedience to the Lord Bishop of the Diocese. He is then in a position to be instituted by the bishop. This ceremony need not take place in the diocese where the church is situated. The bishop may do it as well out of his diocese as within, for the matter is not local, but follows the person of the bishop whithersoever he goeth. As an instance of this, I have known the case of a bishop of the Southern Province instituting a clerk in the private chapel of another bishop in the Northern Province. Nor need the I. take place in a church or consecrated building, and I myself was instituted to one benefice in an archdeacon's study. But it is confessedly more seemly, where it can be done, that I. should be made in a sacred building, and, if this can be arranged to take place in the church of the parish to which the clerk has been appointed, it will be found to be of considerable interest, and we may add, of great benefit to the parishioners. They will be able to understand far better their own relations to the bishop as their Chief Pastor, and also the great responsibility resting upon their new Incumbent, and thus to feel more for him and to help him more by their constant prayers.

Where I. is thus public the ordinary course of procedure is as follows, due notice of the service having been given on the previous Sunday, and the parishioners solemnly

2. Order of Service for Public Institution.

"invited to be present, and to join in prayer to Almighty God for a blessing on the future ministrations among them of their new Vicar." MP (or EP) is usually said to the Third Coll., when aft. an anthem or hymn may follow an address or sermon, this giving the bishop an admirable opportunity of explaining the nature of the ceremony he is about to perform. The priest to be instituted is then presented to the bishop sitting in his chair before the Holy Table, by the patron or archdeacon or rural dean. The Declarations and Oaths (if not previously made) may then be made and taken; whereupon the bishop addresses the congregation, and beseeches them to join together in pr. to Almighty God to grant "to this our brother grace to fulfil, among the people committed to his charge, the vows made by him when he was ordained." After certain versicles and prayers pointedly referring to the future life and ministry of the new incumbent, the bishop reads the Letters of I., the priest to be instituted kneeling before him, and holding the seal thereof in his right hand. Then the bishop lays his hand on the head of the priest, and pronounces a solemn form of Benediction. The INDUCTION of the new incumbent may then take place, the archdeacon or his representative receiving at the hands of the bishop the Mandate of Induction. After this the congregation are desired secretly in their prayers to make their humble supplications to God for His blessing upon their newly-appointed minister, for which prayers silence is kept for a space. Then the Veni Creator Spiritus may be sung, and the bishop closes the service with another pr. and the Blessing.

In cases where the bishop himself is the patron, Collation takes the place of presentation and admission, the two proceedings being described by this term. It is manifest that the bishop being himself the patron does not present to himself, as also that he would satisfy himself that all necessary conditions were fulfilled in the person whom he appointed to a benefice.

It will have been gathered that I., implying as it does the conferring of the cure of souls, is a spiritual function, though a bishop may delegate the duty to his chancellor, vicar-general or commissary.—$6, ra.

EDWARD BARBER.

INSTRUCTIONS.—In parochial Missions the address which follows the Mission Sermon in the evening is usually spoken of as the

1. Origin of Instructions.

Instruction. When the practice of giving a second address began it may be difficult to say, but it is in keeping with the commission to preach the Gospel given by our Blessed Lord to His apostles. Go, said He, into all the world and make disciples of all the nations, baptising them into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you. The preaching of the Gospel was, therefore, to be followed by teaching. But the actual genesis of the Instruction following the Mission Sermon, as is the invariable custom in Missions, may perhaps be traced to the results immediately attending the preaching of the Word, by which many were brought to faith in our Lord, or to a sense of sin. These would remain behind seeking further instruction and guidance. Thus it was with Paul and Barnabas, after their preaching at Antioch, "when the synagogue broke up, many of the Jews and of the devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas, who speaking to them urged them to continue in the grace of God" (Acts 13 43). It therefore seems probable that these I. were at first private I. given after Mission preaching to those, few or many, who had been aroused by the preaching to seek further help and guidance, and that these private individual I. in time gave place to what is now the formal Instruction following the Mission Sermon.

However this may be, some form of Instruction or Address is now universal at the Evening

2. Nature of Instructions.

Service in Parochial Missions. As much of the spiritual success and worth of a Mission depends upon these I., it may be well to consider what the character of the teaching given in them should be to bring about the best results. We may say at once that it certainly should not be the kind of Instruction given in a class room to students, or even such as that given to Confirmation candidates. It should not be in any way a technical, dogmatic, argumentative exposition of doctrine, however well stated or however unanswerable the arguments and reasons brought forward may be; such I. as these, following a Mission Sermon which by its fervour and love has moved many hearers to a sense of repentance and contrition, and filled them with holy desires and good resolutions, only tend to destroy the good that has been done, and to drive away some who were drawing near to God in faith and penitence. This is not the moment to bring forward reasons and arguments for this or that article of the faith. By the Mission Sermon the soul has, like the prodigal, been led to come back to himself, to his right mind, to see himself as God sees him. The Instruction that follows should help him in some loving practical way to get back to God, and lead him to make some definite act towards repentance, or faith, or Bapt., or HC, whichever be the special subject selected.

The dry and dogmatic way in which these I. have often been taken has led many missionaries to put the Instruction first and the Sermon second. This is undoubtedly the better plan if it is necessary that the Instruction be of a somewhat technical character. But there does not seem to be any reason why it should be. If the genesis of the Instruction suggested in this article is correct, namely, that it arose from the informal advice given to inquirers who remained behind after the Mission preaching was ended seeking further help, it is very much more profitable to retain it in its proper place and restore it to its primitive character. Care also should be taken that it have a direct and intimate connection with the subject of the Mission Sermon which has preceded it, and that it be of an equally fervent character, that it still appeal to the heart rather than to the head, and that it labour to move the will to act through the affections, rather than by convincing reasons.

This sort of Instruction leads naturally into that informal pr. meeting which is the most fitting conclusion of the Mission Service. In this penitents may be given opportunity of bearing witness to their conversion or faith, either in what is sometimes spoken of as coming out to the "Penitent form," or in the "Renewal of Bapt. Vows."

It is not an uncommon custom where there are two Missioners, for one of them to take the Mission Sermon and the other the Instruction.

4. By Whom Taken. In some few cases this may work well, but as a rule it is far better for the one who preaches the Sermon also to give the Instruction following. The lessons of the Mission Sermon and the fruit of it are bound up so intimately with the Instruction following, as to be dangerously imperilled if another steps in and tries to gather them.

Thus it not infrequently happens that many who have been moved to faith and repentance by the Mission Sermon have been entirely put off, disaffected and lost, by some one else following with an Instruction which has little or no bearing upon the discourse which has preceded it, or connection with that special incident or passage of Scripture which had been, the moment before, drawing the soul towards God and filling it with desires for better things.

[The term Instruction is also suitably employed to denote other explanatory addresses, such as are given to Confirmation candidates, Communicants Unions, etc. A series of special I. often replaces the sermon on week-days, or follows it on Sunday evenings, in Lent or Advent. These afford a valuable means of giving thorough elementary teaching to those who have never received it, and of reviving clear ideas in the minds of others. The matter should be carefully arranged under three or four heads. Each main point should be condensed into a short sentence. Recapitulation should always precede the conclusion. A sparing use of illustration and anecdote is helpful. —G. H.]—x2. GERARD SAMPSON.

INSTRUMENTS.—(Instrumenta).

An Instrument is the object delivered to a candidate for some sacred office at the time of his admission thereto by the lawfully constituted authority, the object being symbolic of the office. The term occurs already in the year 385, in a letter of Pope Siricius to Himerius (Ep. l. 14). The delivery of the I. is designated by the phrases Porredio Instrumentorum, Instrumentorum Traditio. The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua (or 4th Council of Carthage, as they are sometimes called), a Gallican document of the latter part of the 5th cent., order this ceremony to be performed at Ordination in the case of the Minor Orders. The Ostiarius receives the keys of the church; the Reader, a book; the Exorcist, a book of Exorcisms; the Acolyte, a candlestick with taper; the Sub-deacon, an empty chalice and paten, with a ewer and napkin. In later times similar ceremonies were introduced into the rites of Ordination to the Sacred Orders. The Book of the Gospels was delivered to the Deacon, a ceremony probably originating in England. The Priest received the chalice and paten with bread and wine; the Bishop, the staff, ring, mitre, and Gospel Book. Later mediæval theologians regarded these as constituting the materia of the Sacrament of Holy Orders, a view which was supported by the Decree of Eugenius IV to the Armenians ("Sextum sacramentum est ordinis, cujus materia est illud per cuius traditionem confertur ordo"), but appears to be no longer held (see art. ANGLICAN ORDERS). A survival of the porrection of the I. is found in our Ordinal in the delivery of the NT to the Deacon, and of the Bible to the Priest and Bishop.—TC. H. LEONARD PASS.

INSURANCE.—The first thing a man should do after ordination, as most Bps. advise, is to join the Clergy Pensions Institution 1. Personal. (No. 11, Norfolk Street, Strand; see prospectus). For a payment of some £2 2s. a year, say from 23 to 65, he may secure an annual PENSION of £15 15s., which is capable of augmentation out of lay contributions up to about £50. This excellent result is effected by the combined action of clergy and laity.

A prudent clergyman will wish to make provision for those depending upon him. By a small annual payment, called a premium, he may secure this end. He is advised to study the prospectuses of two or three offices of good repute, also to confer with some friend of experience in insurance matters. Great facilities are now offered. A man may insure with profits or without; he may pay his premium once a year in full, or at twice, half each time; he may insure on the joint lives of his wife and himself; he may insure the education of his children; he may arrange for his policy to mature at death, or at 60, whichever event may first happen.

The following concrete cases may prove encouraging. 1. A policy for £1,000 with profits, charging moderate premiums, taken out 45 years ago, is now worth more than £1,600. 2. Another policy for £1,000 with profits, charging more liberal premiums, taken out forty years ago, is now worth more than £1,800. 3. Another policy with profits laid out in reduction of the premiums, of forty years' standing, has not only cancelled its premiums, but receives a small addition to the sum assured every bonus year. 4. In a fourth policy, the bonuses are taken, in cash. Each of the above is a mutual life office. In case a man is not obliged to effect an insurance, he may wish to replace in the family purse what has been expended on his education and advancement in life, which can easily be done by means of an insurance policy.

For Fire Insurance the reader is recommended to consult Jack's Reference

2. Fire Risks. Book (10, Henrietta St., W.C., 1908), where a full and clear account is given.

Churches.—In case of fire, burglary, injury by wind or other cause, employers' liability, care should be taken by the churchwardens to insure for a sum sufficient to indemnify against all possible damage or loss, and provision should be made to preserve evidence of the cost or value of property, as far as possible. Churchwardens are prone to insure for too small an amount. For a minimum, three-fifths of the original cost meets with general approval.

Parsonages.—The incumbent is responsible, and will do well to arrange for one annual inclusive premium to cover all house liabilities.

Schools.—The Managers, not the Trustees, are answerable for the structure, and for accidents to teachers and scholars, and by means of an inclusive policy should protect themselves as far as possible.

Pew Rents are sometimes unpaid to the loss and inconvenience of the incumbent and wardens. These losses might be covered by insurance.

For the insurance of all forms of Church Property the Eccles. Insurance Office offers facilities and subsidises the Clergy Pensions Institution out of its profits.—A6. J. S. WILSDEN.

INTERCESSION.—I. has ever been regarded as an essential element of pr., both public and private. St. Paul in his injunctions

1. Necessity of Intercession. to Timothy urges the primary importance of supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks being made for all men (1 Tim. 2 i, 4); and it is instructive to observe how very prominent a part I. occupied in all the early liturgical worship of the Church. The like prominence of I. in the daily Offices and Euch. Service of the English Ch. is often overlooked till it is pointed out that the prs. and devotions of priest and people are always expressed in the plural number, making them essentially intercessory in character. The "we," "us," "our," so continually recurring, cannot be regarded as limited to those only who are gathered in pr. They include the whole membership of the Ch., indeed they go beyond this to embrace the whole human family.

Though the power by which I. operates is in the end a deep mystery, stretching beyond our grasp, we are able to recognise certain elements in its operation which help us to understand something of its power. Let it be remembered at the outset that I. is one of the activities of pr. and acts by the same laws which govern

2. Its Nature. pr. There are two primary facts to be borne in mind as regards pr. (a) Prayer is in its essence the communion of man with God. This capacity for communion with God is man's distinctive prerogative. It is the characteristic which marks man off from the brute creation and gives him his unique dignity in the Universe. (b) Prayer is not, then, as many would represent it, a going to God to induce Him to comply with man's wishes. It is not the pleading with God that He would bend His will to our will. True pr. is spiritual intercourse with God, by which we learn to know Him, to know His will, and to desire to do His will. "Hallowed be Thy Name," "Thy kingdom come," "Thy will be done": these are the petitions of true prayer. It is this communion of human spirit with the Divine Spirit by which the human spirit is drawn into conformity with the will and purpose of God.

Further, the telepathic power with which man's spirit is endowed for the purpose of holding communion with God, the Uncreated Spirit, enables man in like manner to hold communion with other created spirits. Hence intercessory pr. may be regarded as the force by which the interceder not only projects his spirit upwards to commune with God, but is able also to project it outwards to touch the human spirit prayed for, and to lift it up into that same communion with God, thus drawing it into fellowship with Him Who is the source of all health and wealth, whether of mind, body, or estate. This aspect of pr. and I. brings into prominence alike its dignity and difficulty. Both need to be recognised. Its dignity should make man aim after the attainment of that unique prerogative of his manhood—spiritual intercourse with God. Its difficulty calls for diligent effort and practice with a view to that attainment.

The value and importance of I. is fully recognised among us, and is evidenced by the many manuals and leaflets of intercessory

3. Its Practice. pr. which are so widely circulated.

On the other hand, the importance of training and practising the soul in the habit of I. is not so clearly perceived, though intercessory services and pr. meetings are now becoming more frequent. There can be no doubt that such united devotions are of immense value in teaching and exercising the spirit in the systematic habit of Intercession. The organising of these united meetings for intercessory pr. allows scope for great variety. They may be held in church, in vestry, in parish room, or in private house. They may be conducted by priest, layman, or woman. They may take the form of prepared petition, or of free utterance. They may cover an almost unlimited field as regards subjects.

It is scarcely possible within the limits of this article to give any detailed suggestions as to the mode of conducting united intercessory devotions.

But a very suggestive pamphlet on the subject has been written by the Rev. C. Harris, D.D. (SPCK, Northumberland Avenue, London, W.C.), entitled Prayer Meetings for Churchmen. This might with great advantage be consulted by those wishful to gain further information on the subject.—K4.

G. R. BULLOCK-WEBSTER.

INTERMENT.—The interring or depositing a dead body in the earth (BURIAL).

INTINCTION.—See COMMIXTURE.

INTONING.—Intoning, in the proper use of the term, is the recitation by the precentor of the first clause of a Ps. or Cant.

1. Definition. In Gregorian music the intonations are prescribed. The term is now generally used of the recitation of the service on one note with inflections at certain portions, such as the versicles and responses.

The question of the desirability of I. the service rather than of reading it in the natural voice has been much debated. In

2. Desirability. favour of I. has been urged: (a) the antiquity of the practice—it is alleged to have been used in early Christian times and also in the Jewish Church; (b) the greater solemnity which is thereby imparted to the service; (c) the greater ease with which the voice makes itself heard in intonation than in reading. On the other hand, it has been urged that the use of I., especially in pr., is unnatural.

The PB gives no special direction on this point and apparently leaves it an open question.

There is, however, a passage in the 3. Authority. INJUNCTIONS by Queen Elizabeth, which is not without interest. She "willeth and commandeth that there be a modest and distinct song so used in all parts of the Common Prayers of the Church, that the same may be as plainly understood as if it were read without singing" (Heylin, Hist. Ref., p. 289). I. however gradually fell into disuse, except in cathedrals, etc., until comparatively recent times, when it has been extensively revived.

Dr. Madeley Richardson lays down four important things to be observed in I.: (a) the necessity of maintaining good vowel

4. Practice. tone; (b) the distinct enunciation of every consonant; (c) the keeping of accurate pitch; (d) evenness and steadiness of tone (Richardson, Church Music, p. 79). (See READING.)

To these we may add one or two cautions.

Let no one attempt to intone who cannot do it well.

Never hurry.

Lay due emphasis upon important words.

Be reverent.

(Literature: Grove's Dictionary of Music, art. Church Music; Madeley Richardson. Cp. SINGING, § 6)—Q2. MORLEY STEVENSON.

INTROIT.—In the PB of 1549, bef. the Coll., Ep. and Gospel of each Sunday, a Ps. with Gloria Patri was printed in full. These "Introites" (as they are called) resemble the Offices of the Sar. and other Missals—the Is. of most parts of the Western Ch.—only in their position before the HC, and in their continuance of the "old custom of perhaps 1,500 years' standing of 'coming before His presence with a psalm'" (Frere, Elem. of Plainsong, ed. i, p. 84). This Edwardian psalm-series had no other connection with, and was far inferior to, the older Gregorian series.

It seems probable that the singing of an I. or Invitatory came into use in the West from Spain, and into Spain from the East. It is noticeable that the Mozarabic liturgy makes much use of Ps. 93 (with *Alleluia*s and Gloria Patri) as I., while in the much earlier liturgies of Basil and Chrysostom there are three ANTIPHONS in frequent use, also from Pss. 92, 93, 95, sung as Is. while the priest prays secretly. The compilers of our PB introduced in 1544 the Pr. associated with the 3rd of these antiphons at the end of the Lit., and thus the "Prayer of St. Chrysostom," which is practically part of the Eastern I., became attached to that service which has been called the "Anglican I.," and was ordered by the Injunctions of 1547 to be said "immediately before high mass."

The introduction of psalm-singing before HC into the services of the Ch. of Rome is traditionally ascribed to Pope Celestine (423), and the compilation of the later antiphon-system to Gregory the Great (595). The customary form of Roman I. at the present day consists of (a) antiphon, (b) psalm-verse, (c) antiphon, (d) Gloria Patri, (e) antiphon.

As we have already seen, in the Sar. and some other Western Uses the I. was known as the Office. Scudamore (DCA 1 865) believes that this name arose from a mistaken idea that the title "ad missam officium," prefixed to each Mass in the earlier Missals, referred to the I. which immediately followed without any heading of its own.—Q2.

MAURICE F. BELL.

INVITATORY.—The name given to the 95th Ps. as sung at Nocturns, viz.: divided into five verses as in the old "Italic" version, and with the I. antiphon sung complete before the Ps. and after the 1st, 3rd and 5th verses, and the latter part only after the 2nd and 4th verses and the Gloria. Finally the complete antiphon is once more sung. The origin of this custom is ascribed to St. Benedict. (See VENITE.)—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

INVOCATION.—"In the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This is the formula with which preachers in the Roman Catholic Ch. preface their sermons. It is the usual introduction to all the Offices of the Roman Church, and the sermon may be regarded as one of the Offices. There is no authority for this use in the Ch. of Eng., nor is there ancient precedent for it, and the Offices of the PB do not commence with the Invocation.—X2.

LUCIUS SMITH.

INVOCATION OF SAINTS.—I. of Saints is a part of the "Romish doctrine" condemned in Art. 22. Two points are in dispute about this. (1) At an earlier stage in the English Reformation (in the reign of Henry VIII) the word I. had been used of pr. to the saints for benefits and gifts, and distinguished from the appeal to the saints for their prs. (the Ora pro nobis which is ordinarily called I.—Stone, Invocation, pp. 32, 33).

1. Invocation Condemned in Art. 22.

It has been maintained that it is I. in the former and not in the latter and ordinary sense which is condemned by this Article. On the other hand, it is maintained that the distinction was "merely part of a transient compromise," and was obliterated bef. 1553, and a fortiori bef. 1563, the date of the present Arts., and 1571, the time of their final revision (Bp. Wordsworth, Invocation, pp. 57 ff.). (2) What is meant by the "Romish" doctrine . . . of I. ? Some (e.g., Stone, Invocation, pp. 38 ff.) distinguish between the ROMISH DOCTRINE here rejected and the official doctrine of the Roman Church as defined at the close of the year 1563 by the Council of Trent. The Romish doctrine is by them defined as the doctrine of "the extreme mediæval party," which directed pr. to the saints for gifts in the same way as we pray to God. But it seems to be proved that the terms "Romish" and its Lat. equivalent "Romanensis" were in use at this time to describe the Roman Church as a whole rather than any particularly extreme section in it; that the framers of our Arts. had before them an authoritative exposition of the "Romish doctrine" as taught in England in Bp. Gardiner's Arts., which he imposed on the University of Cambridge in 1555; and that the practice of I. had been already alluded to and incidentally sanctioned by the Council of Trent in Sept., 1562, in its decree, De Sacrificio Missæ. In both cases I. is limited to requests for prs. (Wordsworth, Invocation, pp. 35, 37, 50 ff.); it is more probable therefore that Art. 22 was intended to be a condemnation of I. in general. This is borne out by the fact that all Is. were cut out from the public prs. of the Church from 1549 onwards. The framers of the Art. may have had before their minds principally the practice of praying to the saints directly for gifts: but if so they did not distinguish it from the milder form of I., but treated the whole as one practice.

We must take notice, however, that I. is not considered by itself in Art. 22, but as an integral feature of a whole system of thought and practice. The "Doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshiping and Adoration, as well of Images as of Reliques, and also invocation of Saints," is regarded as one coherent whole: it is the general conception of the relations between the departed and the Church on earth which is described under its most prominent and characteristic features, and pronounced as a whole to be "a fond thing vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God." This doctrine is based upon the distinction between two classes of the blessed departed: (a) those in Purgatory still under punishment, for whom the Church prays and offers the sacrifice of the Mass; (b) the Saints in Heaven, partakers of the Beatific Vision, and interceding for us on earth, who may therefore be invoked by us for their prayers. It is acknowledged on all sides that there is no Scriptural warranty for either the belief in PURGATORY, or the practice of Invocation. But by the 4th cent. the early Church distinguished between those of the departed for whom she offered pr. and supplication, and the pre-eminent saints and martyrs for whom she offered praises and thanksgivings. The distinction was not rigorously or consistently maintained: prs. are found in early Liturgies on behalf of apostles and martyrs and even the B. Virgin (see Mason, Purgatory, pp. 138 ff.). This distinction led to I. and the belief in Purgatory, the former beginning in the 4th cent., the latter hardly found until the 6th century.

The reasonableness of the practice of I. depends upon the answer we give to the following questions. (a) May we ask for the prs. of our brethren? (b) Do the departed pray for us? (c) Can they hear us as we invoke them, or are our individual needs known to them? The first two points will be readily granted. The third is at best highly doubtful: we know nothing of the knowledge which the departed have of the affairs of our individual lives (Heb. 12:1 and Rev. 6:10 give no certain indication of this), and it seems to be attributing a semi-divine power to them if we suppose them able to receive and attend to the millions of Is. that may be made to them every day. It should also be remembered in this connection that in popular worship in the Latin countries the saints really became the successors of the old pagan gods. As well as these doctrinal objections there are also the practical dangers: (a) that I. proper may lead on in popular usage to pr. proper, i.e., to practical idolatry; (b) that, even if it could be restrained to I. proper, it tends to weaken the sense of our Lord's Mediatorship and take too much the place of direct pr. to God. Lastly, we can secure the benefits of I. without its dangers. If we yearn for the intercession of the great saints whose pr. undoubtedly "availeth much" with God, we can always ask God that, if it be His Will, He would make our need known to them that they may offer their pr. on our behalf. This practice, known as comprecation, is both more ancient than I. and absolutely unobjectionable.

Literature: Mason, Purgatory; Stewart, Doctrina Romanensium de Invocatione Sanctorum; Stone, Invocation of Saints; J. Wordsworth, Invocation of Saints; Addis & Arnold, Catholic Dictionary (R.C.); Schouppe, Elementa Theologiæ Dogmaticæ 2 492 ff. (R.C.); Möhler, Symbolism I 6 (R.C.); and Commentaries on the Arts., esp. Burnet, Forbes, Gibson, Kidd.—K2⁴. S. C. GAYFORD.

IRELAND, CHURCH OF.—Although Christianity existed in Ireland prior to the mission of St. Patrick, it was owing to his zealous efforts that the country was converted to the Faith of Christ. His missionary career dates from A.D. 432, and during the period that elapsed between that year and the death of the Saint (c. 475) a considerable part of I. had been evangelised. A band of devoted workers continued and extended his labours. By Irish missionaries a large part of Scotland, of England, and many districts in N. France, Switzerland, Germany and Italy, were won for Christ. Missionary zeal, coupled with reverence for Holy Scripture and a spirit of absolute independence, formed the characteristics of the Celtic Church of Ireland.

The conquest of I. in the 12th cent. was undertaken by Henry II, King of England, with the sanction of Pope Adrian IV, one of the avowed objects of the conquest being to bring the independent Church of I. into complete subordination to the See of Rome. The way had been already prepared for this by the Synod of Kells, held A.D. 1152, when for the first time the authority of the Pope was recognised in I., and pallis were given to the four archbishops. With the loss of its independence there opened a dark chapter in the history of the Irish Church. There was constant friction between the natives and the English settlers. The Irish were subjected to many cruel acts of oppression and injustice, and spiritual life sank to a low level.

When the Reformation took definite shape in the 16th cent., I. was well prepared to accept it.

3. The Reformed Church.

For four cents. the country had groaned under the tyranny and exactions of the Papal See. In 1551 the English PB was first used in I. Preparations had been made for the translation of the PB into Irish. The early death of Edward VI prevented this work from being carried out. If the Bible and PB had been given to the people in their own tongue, there is little doubt but that the reformed Faith would have won its way in I. In the reign of Elizabeth all the existing Irish bishops, with the exception of two, accepted the Royal Supremacy and the Reformation. But, nevertheless, the nation at large was alienated from the movement, mainly because of the English guise in which it was presented to them.

The Bill for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of I. was introduced into Parliament in 1869 and became law in 1871. The government of the Church is now vested in the General Synod, which consists of Three Orders: the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity. The two archbishops and the eleven bishops are ex-officio members of the Synod. The elected members are 208 clerical and 416 lay representatives, chosen triennially by the Diocesan Synods. The representative members sit and vote conjointly, except when a vote by Orders is demanded, which may be done at any time through a written requisition signed by ten members of either Order then present in Synod. No alteration in the formularies of the Church can be made except by a Bill. Such a Bill must be founded on a resolution passed by the Synod. Both the preliminary resolution and the subsequent Bill require a two-thirds majority of each Order of representatives present and voting so as to be declared passed. A restricted veto is given to the bishops. A revision of the PB was undertaken shortly aft. Disestablishment: the revised PB came into use in 1877.

4. The Disestablished Church.

into Parliament in 1869 and became law in 1871. The government of the Church is now vested in the General Synod, which consists of Three Orders: the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity. The two archbishops and the eleven bishops are ex-officio members of the Synod. The elected members are 208 clerical and 416 lay representatives, chosen triennially by the Diocesan Synods. The representative members sit and vote conjointly, except when a vote by Orders is demanded, which may be done at any time through a written requisition signed by ten members of either Order then present in Synod. No alteration in the formularies of the Church can be made except by a Bill. Such a Bill must be founded on a resolution passed by the Synod. Both the preliminary resolution and the subsequent Bill require a two-thirds majority of each Order of representatives present and voting so as to be declared passed. A restricted veto is given to the bishops. A revision of the PB was undertaken shortly aft. Disestablishment: the revised PB came into use in 1877.

In 1909 a Committee was appointed by the General Synod to consider further the question of revision with a view to enrich the PB by additional services or portions of services, and also to adapt by rubrical alterations existing services to the needs of the present time. The Committee has no power to suggest any change involving questions of doctrine or ritual.—A1.

T. STERLING BERRY.

IRELAND, PRAYER BOOK HISTORY IN.—

The Act of Parliament in the reign of Edward VI, directing the Communion in both kinds to be given to the people, applied to Ireland as well as to England. "The Order of the Communion" (1548) was intended for both countries. In Ireland its introduction was strongly resisted, and an attempt to compel its use, made by Staples, Bp. of Meath, proved utterly unsuccessful. In Feb., 1551, a Royal Letter was sent to the Irish Viceroy, expressing the desire of the King that the PB of 1549 should be used in Ireland. The Viceroy summoned an Assembly of Bishops and Clergy, but the majority of those present, headed by the Primate, resisted the proposal. The Abp. of Dublin and four other Bps. were in favour of the PB. It was first used in Christ Ch. Cathedral, Dublin, on Easter Day, 1551. It was not, however, generally adopted in the country. No authoritative direction was issued to introduce the Second PB of Edward VI into Ireland. The slight hold which the PB had there is proved by the fact that during the reign of Mary it was not found necessary to prohibit its use. In 1560 the Irish Parliament passed, after much opposition, an Act of Uniformity similar to the English Act of 1559. By this Act the use of other Service Books was prohibited; but there was no possibility of printing the PB in Irish characters, and, as most of the priests did not understand English, the strange expedient was adopted of sanctioning the use of Latin in public Service.

The PB was not translated into Irish until 1608. The Irish Convocation in 1662 approved and adopted the PB as revised after the Savoy Conference; and its use was ordered under penalties by the Irish Parliament in 1666. In 1711, at a Synod in Dublin, A Form of Prayer for the Visitation of Prisoners was adopted, and having received Royal Assent it was inserted into the Irish PB. Some Irish PBs also contained A Form of Receiving Lapsed Protestants or Reconciling Converted Papists to our Church, and also A Form of Consecration of Churches.

The Act of Disestablishment gave liberty to the National Church to deal with the revision of its formularies, and the work was at once taken in hand. The revised PB was published in 1877. (For the methods adopted in carrying out the revision, see IRELAND, CHURCH OF.) The following are the principal alterations introduced into the PB. (Cp. RITUAL iv. Var. Syn. of PBs.)

A new Pref. is inserted detailing the chief changes

2. The PB of 1877.

at once taken in hand. The revised PB was published in 1877. (For the methods adopted in carrying out the revision, see IRELAND, CHURCH OF.) The following are the principal alterations introduced into the PB. (Cp. RITUAL iv. Var. Syn. of PBs.)

A new Pref. is inserted detailing the chief changes

and giving reasons why further alterations were not carried out. The Table of Lessons differs from the English use by entirely excluding Lessons from the Apocrypha and including all chapters in the Apocalypse. Ps. 148 forms an additional alternative to the Te Deum and Benedicite for use after the 1st Lesson in MP. Permission is given to omit the Lesser Lit. and the Lord's Pr. after the Creed when the Lit. is said. An alternative 3rd Coll. for EP is given, taken from the Colls. at the close of the HC. The rubric directing the use of the Quicumque vult is removed, but the Creed is left in its former place in the PB, and the Pref. notes that in discontinuing its use "this Church has not withdrawn its witness. . . to the truth of the Articles of the Christian Faith therein contained." Some additional Prayers "for several occasions" are introduced, including The Prayer for Unity, A Prayer for a Sick Person, On the Rogation Days, On New Year's Day, For Christian Missions, For the General Synod of the Church of Ireland, and a prayer To be Used in Colleges and Schools. A special Thanksgiving For Recovery from Sickness is added. Alternative Colls., Epistles and Gospels for Christmas and Easter are given, for use where there are two celebrations of HC on those Festivals. The Ep. for the 1st Sun. aft. Easter has been changed to 1 Cor. 5 6-8. Several rubrical alterations are made in the Order for HC. The position of the celebrant during the Prayer of Consecration is defined to be at the north side of the Table. The minimum of Communicants is reduced to three or two at the least. Some verbal changes are made in the longer Exh., At the time of the Celebration of the Communion. In the Bapt. Office provision is made for the order of service when a child that has been already baptised is brought to the church at the same time with a child that is to be baptised. Parents are permitted to be sponsors for their children, and if need be one sponsor suffices. A new Q. and A. taken with a slight alteration from Art. 28 are introduced into the Catechism. A Coll. and the "Grace" are added at the close of the Marriage Service. In the Order for the Visit. of the Sick, the Absol. from the HC is substituted for the Absol. previously in use. In the Order for the Burial of the Dead an alternative Lesson, 1 Thess. 4 13-18, is introduced; and a clause from the Prayer for the Church Militant substituted for the thanksgiving in the Coll. after the Lord's Prayer. The following additional services have been introduced: The Order for Morning Service to be used on the first Sunday in which a Minister officiates in the Church of a Cure to which he has been instituted; A Form of Thanksgiving for the Blessings of Harvest; The Form of Consecration of a Churchyard. Many new canons have been drawn up, and these are included in the PB under the heading Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical.

The Committee appointed in 1909 to consider the further revision of the PB have as their aim to accommodate the services to the needs of the time and to enrich the Liturgy by incorporating material hitherto unused drawn both from ancient and modern sources. The recommendations of the Committee will be brought before the General Synod, at first in the form of Resolutions, afterwards in a Bill. Alterations involving questions of doctrine and ritual lie outside the scope of the work of the Committee.

—B1. T. STERLING BERRY.

IRON CHEST.—In mediæval times chests bound with iron were provided for books and vestments. Canon 70 of 1604 demanded a "sure coffer" for registers, and has been re-enforced by statute (52 Geo. III, c. 146, § 5). The modern equivalent is the safe.—R5. S. REDMAN.

JAMES THE GREAT, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 10, 35; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 15.

JAMES THE LESS, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 10, 31; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 11.

JESUS.—The name "Jesus," used alone, designates our Lord in His humanity. In the PB—apart from those portions which are simple transcripts of Scripture—"Jesus" hardly ever occurs alone. In the exceptional instance of the Collect for St. Stephen's Day, the First Martyr is recalled as having seen his human Lord standing at the right hand of God in his behalf; just as St. Paul at his conversion encounters the risen and living Jesus and makes to him his surrender. These are testimonies soon after the event to what might be called the literal resurrection and ascension of the human Jesus. But very soon, in the mind and usage of Christianity, the perfect coalescence of the divine and the human, and so of the person and the work of our Lord, manifests itself in the merging of the two terms "Jesus" and "Christ" into a single proper name. Nevertheless, in that large and important part of the PB which is transcript of Scripture, and especially in the dominant fact of the Church Year, the human and historic life of Jesus is minutely and exactly re-enacted in the practical and devotional life of the Church, with all the meaning and weight attached to each act and incident of it in the NT. The PB has no other aim and makes no other claim than to be Scriptural and Catholic—to represent the truth of Christianity as it was given to the Church, and as it has been appropriated and understood by the Church. In the Litany, in the Collect and Proper Preface for Christmas Day, as generally in the PB, the essential mystery of the Incarnation is found not alone in the official character and act of the Christ but primarily in the person of Jesus. (See further, arts. on CHRIST and INCARNATION.)—K2¹.

W. P. DU BOSE.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 10, 33; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 13.

JOHN THE EVANGELIST, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 10; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 4.

JUDE, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 39; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 20.

JUDGES.—See COURTS.

JUDGMENT.—I. A review of the various aspects of J. brought forward in the PB will serve to gather together the instances of that and related words.

(1) The Person of the Judge. (a) God is regarded as the Judge. This agrees with the OT and, in the main, the Synoptic conception. Thus, we have "Almighty God . . . Judge of all men" (HC and Sea Conf.), "the righteous Judge by whom all must be judged" (VS Exh. ³), while God is implied in the OT language of the Commin. office in Title and Exh. ("God's anger and Js.," "The day of the Lord"), and to the "most mighty God" is addressed the petition to "enter not into J." with His servants (Prs. bef. Blessing). That even "Good works . . . cannot . . . endure the severity of God's J." (12), and that "the flesh . . . deserveth God's wrath and damnation" (9), is the witness of the Arts. (b) The Judge is the glorified Jesus. This is in accordance with Mt. and the early Christian view generally. That He will "come to be our Judge" (Te D.), "to judge the quick and the dead" (Ap. Cr., QV., 1 Adv.) is the repeated expression of the ancient belief; and deliverance is sought "in the day of J." from His "wrath and from everlasting damnation" (Lit.). In the solemn prose adaptation, influenced by Coverdale's poem, of the Sequence Media Vita appeal is made by the priest on behalf of the mourners at the Christian's grave to Jesus as "most worthy Judge (in place of "God") eternal" (Burial). Similarly, the Arts. assert that He will "return to judge all men at the last day" (4).

(2) The Time of the Judgment. It is "in" or "at the last day" that the coming of Jesus Christ is expected (1 Adv., Art. 4). According to the familiar OT figure a "day" of assize is the usual conception, "day of J." (Lit., Matrim.) or "day of the Lord" (Commin. Pref. Exh., VS Exh.), which is "after this life" (VS Exh. ³).

(3) The Range of Judgment. The judged are represented as being not merely heathen nations, or sinners within the covenant, but all classes of men, just and unjust. Nor is there any limitation of time, but "all men" of all ages are included, "the quick and the dead" (QV., Ap. Cr., 1 Adv., VS Exh. ³, Matrim., HC and Sea Conf., Art. 4).

(4) The Basis of Judgment. The standard is character, and the test of character is: (a) Conduct during this life—"All men . . . shall give account for their own works" (QV.), "for" their "own faults" (VS Exh. ³), for all "wickedness" done in "stubbornness of heart" (Commin. Exh.), seeing that sin "in every person . . . deserveth God's wrath and damnation" (Art. 9); (b) Faith: in the words of the Marcan appendix, "he that believeth not shall be damned" (Bapt. ³ Exh. aft. G.), while "there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptised" (Art. 9), and innocent baptised children "are undoubtedly saved" (Bapt. ¹ Rubr.).

(5) The Quality of Judgment. The J., being Divine, is absolutely just (Commin. Exh.). It is "without respect of persons" (VS Exh. ³), and because of its inherent truth it is "dreadful," and the pronouncement thereof "terrible" for the condemned to whom it is "the extreme malediction" (Commin. Exh.), yet is it indeed "fearful" for all (VS Exh. ³).

(6) The Issue of Judgment. The verdict pronounced is not only irreversible, but is plainly conceived as being in the duration of its issues everlasting. Thus, pr. is made for deliverance "from ev. damnation" (Lit.) and "from ev. (or 'eternal') death" (Cat., Burial), lest men be numbered among the "condemned," and "perish" (HC Absol.) "everlastingly" in "ev. fire" (QV., Commin. Exh.), in contrast to which is "ev. salvation" (cp. "not to destruction, but to salvation," Ord. ³).

(7) Related Phrases. Many have been noted in the above references. Among others there is "the day of vengeance" when "shall appear the wrath of God" (Commin. Exh.). Various allusions are made to the danger of receiving "the Sacr. of the Body and Blood of Christ" unworthily, derived from 1 Cor. 11 29 ff., e.g., "increase your damnation" (HC Exh. ¹), "eat and drink our own d." (Exh. ³), "to their condemnation" (Art. 29), "purchase to themselves d." (25). It is well therefore for communicants to "judge themselves" that they "be not judged of the Lord" (HC Exh. ³) and "come to destruction both of body and soul" (Exh. ¹), while for neglect of the ordinance "sore punishment hangeth over" their "head" (Exh. ³).

II. As to divine J. in the present time, thanks are offered for God's mercy "in the midst of J."

2. Minor Points Review.

by "common sickness" (Occ. Th.), and He is asked to "judge between" combatants in battle (Sea).

The references to man's J. call for little notice. Objectors to old ceremonies "shall perceive cause to reform their Js." (Of Cer.), for "right J. in all things" we pray (Whit.), and there is an OT allusion to "perverting J." (Commin.). In the disciplinary question to those about to be ordained priests submission is expected to the "godly Js." of "chief ministers" (Ord. ³), and, according to the Arts., wilful infringement of justifiable traditions and ceremonies "through private J." ought to be dealt with openly (34).

III. In the PB references to J. the dominant note is thus distinctly eschatological, and it may reasonably be inferred that "bitter pains," "fire," etc., are intended to be taken in the material sense. However out of contact with modern thought-forms, the naïve literalism of the PB has descended directly from Jewish and early Christian apocalyptic literature. The symbolism mostly prominent to-day is Johannine rather than Synoptic, evolutionary rather than catastrophic. The eyes of the faithful are usually directed by thoughtful teachers towards a consummation which shall confirm and complete a present inexorable process of divine J. The truth behind the older imagery of belief and devotion is unaffected, though each age finds different forms suitable for the intellectual expression thereof.—K2 ⁴.

E. W. WINSTANLEY.

JURE DIVINO.—The authority of those who bear office in Ch. and State has been generally upheld by pleading Divine Right for it. But the phrase has acquired a narrower sense as meaning the right of some one form of government to the exclusion of all others. Thus, under the later Stuarts, an extreme doctrine of the sacredness of the Throne was developed. The RC. doctrine of the Papacy, and the teaching of certain Ang. theologians on Episcopacy, are instances of similar developments. Dr. Donne, the famous Dean of St. Paul's, has left an eloquent, yet temperate, statement of the idea in relation to the State. "Of all things God had an idea, a preconception; but of Monarchy, of Kingdom, God, who is but one, is the Idea; God Himself in His Unity is the Model, He is the type of Monarchy" (Sermons 2 399).

For the general subject see further, ORDER; and, for its application to the Ministry, see APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, EPISCOPACY.—A2. G. HARFORD.

JURISDICTION.—See COURTS, HIERARCHY, ORDER.

JUS LITURGICUM.—See RITUAL, §§ 62-65.

JUSTICE.—J. is used in the Lit. and Pr. for Church Militant in the phrases "execute, or minister J." i.e., of a just administration of the law without partiality. In the Pr. for Parliament it occurs in the phrase "truth and J." in practically the same sense. J. is used in connection with the execution of God's judgment in the Communion Service (Exh.). In the PB Version of the Pss. the word J. does not occur, whereas in the AV it occurs three times for "righteousness" (89 15), "thing that is right" (119 121), "see . . . have right" (82 3), in the PB version.—K3.
J. R. DARBYSHIRE.

JUSTIFICATION.—The words "Justify" and "Justification" occur in the following passages in the PB: Sent. (Ps. 143 2); Coll. for 1st S. aft. Easter; Ep. for Tues. in Easter week; Gospels for 11th and 13th Suns. aft. Trin.; Art. 11, and title of Art. 13.—The words come to us through the Latin. They are used in the Vulg. to translate the Greek δικαίων, δικαιοσύνη, etc., and these mean, as verbs ending in ω derived from adjs. of moral meaning always do mean, to reckon, declare, or treat as righteous, not to make righteous (see Sanday and Headlam, Comm. on Rom., pp. 30-31 and 36).

Before we can approach God as worshippers and use aright the language of the PB, we must have experienced what the Ep. to the Heb. calls the sprinkling of our hearts from an evil conscience (10 22)—what St. Paul calls J. (Rom. 4 25). The great problem of the awakened conscience in all ages is: How can a man be just with God (Job. 25 4)? In OT times the Hebrew saw, as no other then did, the Righteousness of God (e.g., Ps. 7 10-12) and the unrighteousness of man (Ps. 143 2, 14 4). His conscience would not let him forget the sins of his past. He wanted a Salvation, which would atone for past sin and secure his acceptance with the Righteous Judge of all. This salvation, foreshadowed in prophetic vision (Is. 53) and in legal sacrifice (Heb. 9 7-13, 10 1-18), was manifested in the life, death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus. He was "the Holy and Righteous One" (Acts 3 14; cp. 1 Pet. 3 18, Acts 7 52, 22 14, 1 John 2 1). He identified Himself with us sinners and suffered, the Righteous for the unrighteous, that He might bring us to God; His resurrection was the proof that this sacrifice of Himself did avail to the putting away of sin; He rose again for our J., i.e., for His sake the Righteous God accepts henceforth as not sinners but righteous all who have faith in Jesus (Rom. 3 26).

But, it is objected, is it not an immoral idea that God can attribute (impute, reckon) righteousness to an ungodly man (Rom. 4 5)? Assuredly not, when the meaning is rightly grasped, for:—(1) Whole-hearted trust (faith) unites the penitent sinner to the Saviour, who has already identified Himself with sinners. (2) The Spirit of the Master enters into and takes possession of the believer. (3) The reckoning of the believing, penitent sinner, thus identified with his Lord, to be righteous before Him is, as St. James says (2 22), a prophecy that "by works faith will be made perfect." He who sees the end from the beginning sees on the one hand the sins of the past becoming impossible to the believing soul, and on the other the righteousness of the Saviour becoming dominant and manifest in the life of the believer. (4) Righteousness and Holiness, separable for clearness of thought, are not separable in life. The same Union with Christ, which secures the one, secures also the other (see SANCTIFICATION; and cp. Sanday and Headlam on Ep. to Rom., pp. 37-38, 128-9, 152-3).—Pd. J. BATTERSBY HARFORD.

KEYS OF CHURCH.—Commonly, when a clerk is inducted into a benefice, the person pronouncing the words of Induction takes his hand and lays it upon the key of the church door, in token that he is thereby put into possession of the church and the temporalities of his benefice, the key being both an apt symbol and an instrument of physical control. The use of the key in this manner is, however, not essential to the Induction service.

The control of the use of the church is mainly vested in the incumbent, and he is accordingly the proper custodian of the keys of the church. The churchwardens are only entitled to have access to the church for the discharge of their duties, and may not even have a duplicate key of the church door without the consent of the incumbent.—A4.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

KEYS, POWER OF THE.—See DISCIPLINE, REPENTANCE.

KING CHARLES THE MARTYR.—See STATE HOLY-DAYS.

KING'S EVIL.—See TOUCHING FOR THE KING'S EVIL.

KISS OF PEACE.—The KP. (or Pax) is a custom recognised in all ancient Liturgies and is probably apostolic (see Rom. 16 16, etc.). The Faithful by a mutual embrace testified to the brotherly love that ought to exist between them. The Pax usually occurred after the commencement of the Missa Fidelium and before the Consecration. In the Roman Liturgy it occurs just before the Communion. At the present time it appears to have been dropped in the Greek Church. In the Malabar Liturgy the finger tips only are touched with the lips. In the Roman High Mass the kiss is exchanged ceremonially between the Celebrant and assistants. It is ordinarily omitted at Low Mass, but it is sometimes given by a small metal tablet (Osculatorium or Pax), which the priest, after kissing the altar, kisses and hands to the server, who presents it to the people. In the Anglican Service Books the words of the Invitation, "and are in love and charity with your neighbours," emphasise in a different way the duty which is symbolised by the Pax.—R2. J. F. KEATING.

KNEELERS in wood are made either fixed to the inside of the pew-ends and supports, or separate. If fixed, they should be hinged so that they may be raised for sweeping. Height from 3 in. to 5 in., according to height of pew-backs. Pads are sometimes more convenient where the pews are narrow. K. should be well-padded and level, not sloping. It is impossible to kneel comfortably on an inclined plane.—R5. G. VALE OWEN.

KNEELING.—See POSITION AND POSTURE OF MINISTER AND PEOPLE; POSTURE OF REVERENCE; COMMUNION, MANNER OF, § 2.

KNELL (Anglo-Saxon cnyllan, to strike noisily).—The sound of a bell struck, esp. for a death or burial: hence, metaphorically, a sign of death or extinction, "the curfew tolls the K. of parting day" (Gray); or any doleful cry, "a K. of sobbing voices" (Shelley).—OC. T. L. PAPILLON.

KNOWLEDGE occupies, as will be seen from the refs. collected below,¹ an important place in the PB conception of religion, for it is that spiritual activity by which man apprehends TRUTH. It is that kind of commerce with reality, by which its existence, nature and meaning are consciously discerned and affirmed by man, who reaches K. by a rapid or slow scrutiny of events. Reality as known is called Truth, and is conveniently parcelled out into regions answering to man's intellectual or practical interests. The supreme Object of K. is God, and the PB is concerned with this highest ¹ The principal occurrences of K. (or the verb) may be grouped as follows. 1° K. of God, of Christ, or of both—adelphikim (10 out of 17). 2° K. of Scripture or of God's word or truth—fiak. 3° K. as identical or closely parallel with faith—abode. 4° K. as received on authority—bpg. 5° K. as the complement of action—do. 6° K. as contrasted with eternal fruition—am, or leading to it—gh. The phrases referred to are these: (a) Epiph. Coll., "K. thee now by faith"; (ct. "after this life have the fruition . . ."); (b) Bapt.¹ Exh.⁴, "things which he ought to K. and believe to his soul's health"; (c) Bapt.¹ Pr.³, "K. of thy grace and faith in thee"; (d) "Ord.² Exh., "agreement in the faith and K. of God" (ct. "error in religion") and "Ripeness . . . in Christ" (ct. "viciousness of life"); (e) Ord.² Pr. bef. Ord., "increase in the K. and faith of thee and thy Son"; (f) Ord.² Q.³, "such studies as shall help to the K. of (Scripture)"; (g) MP Coll.², "in K. of whom standeth our eternal life (quam nosse vivere)"; (h) St. Ph. and St. Jas. Coll., "whom truly to know is ev. life"; (i) ib., "know thy Son Jesus Christ to be the way, the truth, and the life"; (j) MP Pr. of St. Chrys., "in this world K. of thy truth and in the world to come life ev."; (k) Pref.², "by hearing of Scripture profit more and more in the K. of God"; (l) Bapt.² Exh.⁴, "grow in grace and in the K. of our Lord Jesus Christ"; (m) HC Pref.⁴, "brought out of darkness and error into the clear light and true K. of thee and of thy Son . . ."; (n) Confirm. Pr.¹, "the spirit of K."; (o) ib. Pr.³, "lead them in the K. and obedience of thy word"; (p) Bapt.¹ Exh.⁴, "that they may K. these things the better . . . bear sermons"; (q) Cat., "my good child, K. this."

1. Introductory.

sort of K. (see n.), including along with it the K. of man, who only truly knows himself as in and under God.

The question has been raised whether in this spiritual realm some special and higher faculty or function of the spirit is involved than in ordinary K. In the interests of the unity of man's spiritual being it is desirable to see first whether the everyday powers of the mind are not sufficient.

1° Our common K. is marked by individuality. No one can know a thing for another. K. is a peculiarly personal acquirement. 2° In its most intimate and assured form it is directly based upon experience. It is such a re-viewing of an event in the light of other events as enables us to see into the heart of it, or at least to seize some aspect of reality revealed by it. 3° But a large part of our K. does not possess, at least in the first instance, this immediate character. It is derived, not straight from experience, but through the channel of testimony. There is thus a certain duality in common K.: some of it is first hand, and some is second-hand. But this turns out to be only a distinction of convenience, which cannot be pressed. The second-hand K. has been itself derived from experience, and may have been more correctly inferred than the first-hand K., which may turn out to have been falsified by haste or prejudice. Moreover, the one kind may pass into the other, and either may come first. The progress of educational method will illustrate the relation of K. to experience and testimony. Three stages may be indicated. (a) "Sugar is sweet: salt is bitter." Testimony alone, or bare authority. (b) "Sugar is sweet and salt bitter: taste them and you will see." Authority with a reference to experience. (c) "Taste these two white powders: one is sweet, the other bitter. We call the sweet one sugar, and the other salt." Experience, in the form of experiment suggested by authority, yields the K., and then authority supplies the accepted label, the class-name.¹

We do not hesitate to call that K. which is drawn direct from experience, but we commonly use a different word for what we learn from testimony, viz., belief.

3. K. and Faith. But the K. derived from experience is belief in the testimony of our own senses, and generally also in our mental inferences from the sense impressions; i.e., all K. presupposes the trustworthiness of the Universe. So K. and faith, as mental activities, are fundamentally one, and the familiar collocation of them in the PB (see § 1, n. 3°) is justified. But, alike in common life and in religion, knowing and doing—the theoretic and the practical sides—are so intimately related, that the knowing is assumed to carry with it the appropriate action. Hence in the PB both K. and faith usually include also that inward devotion to their Object which is their proper outcome, though sometimes (§ 1, n. 5°) this outcome is separately named alongside of K. And as K. is always of events, the acts of trust and deeds of love and justice, in which an early stage of the K. of God eventuates, become material for a later and more assured degree of K. This is the truth that lies at the heart of the modern philosophical system of Pragmatism. We do not make propositions true by acting as if they were: but that is how we find out if they are true. Action is always based upon some view of things assumed as known, and that view is tested in the process of the action.

¹ From the illustration also we may learn the distinction between the innocent error arising from ignorance, and the culpable error caused by a defect of will. It is one thing to take salt for sugar when handed by mistake, and another to make the original mistake to save trouble in making sure. We observe, too, that the correction must come from a fresh event. "Here are two white powders." I may take the risk of assuming both are sugar: that is not K., but convenient action out of which K. will come; or I may create the new event of experimental tasting, in order to find out. In either case fuller knowing comes from further doing.

From this follows the certitude of K. That assemblage of sights and sounds and familiar objects which makes up the exter-

4. Certitude. nal world, so far as we have occasion constantly to use it, we know with an intuitive certainty: it is its own evidence, and our life is a continuous experience reaffirming the broad outlines of our K., even if correcting and enlarging it in details. The difference between common sense and true science is not the difference between ignorance and K., but between a K. which is both limited in range and mainly implicit in habitual actions, and a wider K. explicitly worked out. Probably the most crucial proof, as well as the most precious example, of assured K. in common life is to be found in our K. of persons. We can only see the outside of one another, and receive with the ear such mechanical vibrations as the speech organs emit. Yet the K. that a man has of his fellows has advanced until an evolutionary writer is compelled to accept, as one of the implications of morality (which he finds everywhere), the treatment of other people as ends in themselves, as persons, i.e., and not things.¹ The plain man, and the philosopher who is not a sophist on this point, are alike sure that they know their friends, who for them are not soulless automata, but spiritual beings. The mystery of personality has not been solved, but the existence and many aspects of the nature of the soul are solidly assured. The joy and charm of family and social life are the fruits of this K. and the pledges of its validity. It is for philosophers to justify and explain them if they can: man will never let his soul be filched away from him, now that he has won the consciousness of it from that furnace of life which has already purged out so much of its dross.²

The Bible is the richest treasury of the K. of God, and for that reason is "the most valuable thing that this world affords" (Coron. service). As gold is the universal medium of exchange and standard of value, so the religious terms and phrases of HOLY SCRIPTURE—"more

¹ "The moral emotions are essentially directed towards sensitive and volitional entities" (Westermarck, Origin and Development of the Moral Emotions, 1906, 1 326). For early differentiation see Crawley, Idea of the Soul, 1909, and for later developments Illingworth, Personality, Human and Divine, 1894.

² Royce, The World and the Individual, has developed at length the capacity of the human mind to deal with the infinite, by the analogy of the infinite series of natural numbers, 1, 2, 3, etc., each term formed by adding one to the previous precious than gold, yea, than much fine gold"—are the current coin of the Catholic religion. Mined from that inexhaustible quarry, and minted freshly from the crucible of the soul, the same sure K. is diversely expressed in the Confessions, the Imitation, the Divina Commedia, the English PB, Paradise Lost, the Pilgrim's Progress, Newman's and Robertson's Sermons, In Memoriam, and A Death in a Desert.

The living CHURCH is the appointed channel of the K. of God. And just as in the business world the security of credit (in other words of a particular kind of K. or faith) is maintained by bankers' clearing houses, and London is becoming the clearing house of the world, so the Ch., taken in a wide sense as including thoughtful and devout Christian worshippers everywhere, is becoming the clearing house of religious ideas and terms, witness, e.g., the successive modern conferences on various bases (cp. COUNCILS, § 4-8). This K. is formulated in CREEDS and ARTICLES (cp. also DOCTRINE). By some these are regarded as enshrining a fixed deposit, "the faith once delivered to the saints," by others these documents are looked upon as protective caskets to preserve the delicate fabric of a living faith, a self-adaptive Knowledge.

So, in regard to the defence of this Divine K., several policies are held. There are Conservatives who favour the plan of the Roman Ch., to keep believers within a ring fence of permitted ideas under the shelter of an infallible Ch. or Book. There are Liberals who rely upon an unlimited resort to free inquiry. And there are central Churchmen who cannot believe that all the faithful are called to study vexed questions in theology, any more than they are bound to go into the theory of medicine, music, or electrical engineering. But they hold that the expert students and professors of theology should with reverent freedom study all relevant domains of K., and set the old faith in such new light as they can find. And, as connecting links between the theories of the professors and the practice of the pious, they long to see a body of pastors in such close touch with real life as to check theoretical and critical vagaries, and so alive to new K. that they can wisely prune the excrescences and guide the developments of popular religion. Thus, by a series of intercommunicating grades of knowers, inquiry should be steadied by experience, and experience fertilised by inquiry.

See further, AUTHORITY, GOD, CHRIST, MAN. A. C. Fraser, Philosophical Basis of Theism, is perhaps the most edifying and least technical introduction term. This familiar instrument of mental labour, itself the creation of the mind, is not only itself infinite, but contains within itself an infinite number of diversely unique series, all infinite also, e.g., the odd numbers, the prime numbers, the squares, cubes, etc., of the natural numbers, and so forth. The bankruptcy of Herbert Spencer's system, a supposed known superstructure on a supposed unknowable foundation, is an impressive warning of the danger of fitting the universe to a system instead of adjusting the system to the κόσμος and its κοσμοκράτωρ.

to the philosophy of religion; cp. Gwatkin, The K. of God, 2 vols.; Illingworth, Reason and Revelation.—U. G. HARFORD.

KYRIE.—After the Pr. for purity the First PB of Edward VIth retained the nine Ks. of the Mediaeval Liturgies, but gave them in English: "iii. Lord, have mercy upon us. iii. Christ have mercy upon us. iii. Lord, have mercy upon us." In 1552 the redundancy of these petitions was modified by expanding them, and referring them severally to the Ten Commandments, which were introduced into the Service. Possibly the idea was suggested by the Reformed Liturgia Sacra of Strasburg, which had been published by Valerandus Pollanus in 1551, and which directs the use of the Decalogue with the Response (corresponding to the English form) after the 10th Commandment, "Vouchsafe to write it (the Decalogue) in our hearts by Thy Spirit," etc. The point of the tenfold Response is twofold: (1) for forgiveness of the past; (2) for grace of amendment in the future (cp. Jer. 31 31-34, Heb. 8 8-12 and 10 15-17, Ps. 119 22, 35, 36).

The petitions, "Lord, have mercy upon us; Christ, have mercy upon us," etc. (Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison), take us back to the earliest days of Christian worship, when even at Rome itself the service was in Greek. This Greek form was adopted into the Latin Service Books, when exactly is not known (cp. Arrian, 2nd cent.; Comment. Epictet. 2 2; Apost. Const. 8 6; Peregrin. Sylvia 24 51), and it formed the nucleus or germ of all Litanies, e.g., the ancient Eucharistic Lit., of which it was said: "The Office (i.e., the Introit) expresses our sighs, the Gloria our praises, the K. eleison, thrice repeated three times, our petitions" (exprimis in Kyrie eleison ter triplicata preces). The Pre-Reformation K. was sometimes added to at festivals, as e.g., "O Lord, fountain of goodness," at Epiphany.

(See further, Scudamore, Not. Euch., p. 527; Maskell, Ancient Liturgy, p. 32; DCA, art. Litany; Edm. Bishop, Kyrie eleison; Procter and Frere, BCP, p. 393.)—H. J. F. KEATING.

LADY DAY.—See FESTIVAL, § 14.

LAITY.—The position and functions of the L.—those members of the Church who are not in

1. Limited Powers.

Holy Orders—are important in every branch of the Church, since a large majority of churchmen are laymen. It is also likely in these days to be a vexed question, since the tendency in civil affairs, and in contemporary thought, is strongly democratic. Power goes with numbers: the majority rules. In civil affairs at any rate power must be "broad based upon the People's will." But, whilst in one aspect the Church as the Christian Brotherhood is the most intensely democratic institution in existence, it is equally true that Power in the Church is in a peculiar degree derived not from below, but from above: not from majorities, but from God. Such matters as the statement of Christian Doctrine, the limits of Church Order, the grace of Sacramental Rites, are not to be, and cannot in the nature of things be, settled by majorities.

Accordingly, the powers, whether rights or duties, of laymen in the Anglican Church are restricted as regards such matters, analogously to the restrictions on the powers of legislative or executive authorities imposed, for example, by the Constitution of the United States. But there is this difference, that the Constitution of the Church is not set out in any one document, which he who runs may read.

In the Church of England in particular the matter is again complicated further by the fact that in theory, and by virtue of its alliance with the State as a National Church, any baptised person has some sort of prima facie right to consider himself a lay member of it. Hence there has been great difficulty in defining the position of the L. at all. It is clearly not to the interest either of the Church or of the individual that casual adherents, possibly little instructed and little practising, should be given share in the government or administration of a body to which their allegiance is but slender. Rights ought to be the reward for the fulfilment of duties. On the other hand, the restriction of the qualification of a layman to those who are regular communicants is to be deprecated on the ground of the extreme undesirableness of making a test of the HC.

2. Problem in England.

The matter is unfortunately still further tangled by the fact that the Church of England is not free to manage her own affairs, and that the responsibilities of administration which would prove so valuable a stimulant to the L. are at present in the hands of Parliament, which has long ceased to be a body of churchmen, or even a body necessarily Christian. Moreover, other functions which ought to be exercised by the L., such as the election of Churchwardens, are exercised by the Easter Vestries, which any ratepayer may attend, and at which he may vote, regardless of whether he be a churchman at all or not. It is high time that this survival of the days when the ratepayers actually were churchmen were swept away.

The position of the L. in the Church of England at present is illogical and chaotic.

2. Working Definition.

But steps have been taken to provide machinery for the purposes of administration in the hope that Parliament may eventually give the necessary power to use it. This has produced a good working definition of a layman, namely:

"A Lay Member of the Church of England who (i) has the Status of a Communicant, that is to say, either (a) is an actual Communicant, or (b) has been baptised and confirmed and is admissible to Holy Communion, and does not belong to any religious Body which is not in Communion with the Church of England, and (ii) has signed the declaration as to qualification contained in the Schedule to the Scheme for lay representation." This declaration is as follows: "I.....of.....declare that I have the status of a communicant lay member of the Church of England." To this declaration there is appended a note defining the status of a Communicant as above. (See further FRANCHISE.)

Such for all practical purposes is a layman in the Church of England. He has a right to the services and sacraments of his Church so long as he do not fall under ecclesiastical censure. In the present abeyance of ecclesiastical discipline this qualification is very nearly inoperative. This clearly involves the position that in return for his rights he is under no legal duties. He may take what the Church must offer him: he need give, and he frequently does give, nothing in return. It would be profitable if the layman would regard his position as a Church member from the opposite point of view, and would ascertain his duty to the Church of which he is a member, and consider his rights as accruing only from the performance of his duties. That is the ordinary view of things in other departments of life. The layman's duty is to assimilate the spirit of his Church; to desire to serve her, rather than to desire that she should be conformed precisely to his own personal tastes; to submit himself to her methods; to inform himself as to her position and history; and, finally, to join in her worship and share in her Sacraments.

When he has done this, his activities will rightly be available according to his tastes and capacity. The work of the layman in COUNCILS, of the CHURCHWARDEN and SIDESMAN, of the Lay Reader or the Teacher in SCHOOLS, is dealt with in other arts. There is further the whole sphere of FINANCE, which the clergy would be only too thankful to hand over to competent and sympathetic laymen. The layman will find in performing his duties on these lines that he will achieve his rights naturally and without effort. The weight of his influence and of his opinion in the affairs of his parish or diocese will be in direct proportion to the enlightenment of his churchmanship, and the consistency of his practice of it.

In view of the peculiar position of the Church of England, any comparison of the position of her L. with those of other Churches

5. Contrasts and Comparisons. is difficult and not directly practical. The theory, for instance, of the Congregationalists and of other kindred bodies that the Church is a voluntary association, whose ministry derives its mission from the congregation, places the L. in such a body in a position so totally different from that occupied by them where the unit of authority is the bishop, and the mission of the ministry is held to derive from God through the Bishops and not through each individual congregation, that any detailed comparison is apt to be misleading. Among the Congregationalists the "Church" consists of a body of "members," i.e., communicants; new members being admitted by a Church meeting after approval by the deacons, who are members elected to that office for a term. The deacons elect the minister, who upon election has the "oversight of spiritual matters," thus deriving his authority in that respect directly from the L.

Similarly, there is great difficulty in comparing the position of the L. in other branches of the Anglican Communion where the Church has the power of self-government, and the L. is clearly defined and in possession of its proper powers, which in England are denied to it and held by Parliament. But, whatever be the actual position in any branch of the Church, the L. has a theoretical and historical place in the Church, and towards the attainment of this in her own case the Church of England must aim. (See further, ANGLICAN COMMUNION, CANONS, OLD CATHOLICS, and Bp. J. Wordsworth's Report on the Position of the Laity).—A2.

T. SYDNEY LEA.

LAMBETH ARTICLES.—See CALVINIST.

LAMPS.—L. are probably of older Christian use than candles, and were hung from the ciboria or altar canopies of early chs.; they were also used in connection with the dead from the 4th cent. onwards. Less frequent than candles in mediæval times, they were found in the richer chs. bef. the Euch., altars or relics, or bef. pictures or images specially venerated; occasionally before the holy oils. Endowments for lights bef. the rood or the reserved Sacrament were sometimes spent in candles, sometimes in lamps; the light bef. the reserved Sacr. was not universal, even in Italy, in the 16th cent. Previous to the Reformation, Durham Cathedral possessed three L. constantly burning bef. the high altar to symbolise the watchfulness of the monks there, but such a use of L. was unusual. On the whole L. seem to have been relatively more frequent than candles in the earlier chs., and at all times in the East. The use of seven sanctuary L. bef. an altar where there is nothing of special reverence, such as the reserved Euch., appears to be a modern innovation, perhaps copied from the Irvingites, although there is some similarity between it and what is recorded of Durham, as well as the numerous L. used in the East. Occasionally L. were lighted during service time, like candles; e.g., beside the three at Durham mentioned above, there was another which was only lighted during Mass.—R5.

F. C. EWLES.

LANGUAGE, LITURGICAL.—The general principle underlying 1 Cor. 14 2-28, that worship should be in a tongue "understood of the people," was followed in the early Ch.; Origen says that everyone prays and sings praise to God as he best can in his mother tongue (Contra Celsum 8 37; see the whole passage). But difficulties arose, owing to more than one L. being spoken in the same place, and to the varieties of, and changes in, dialects.

Greek was for at least 200 years after Christ the lingua franca of most of the Roman Empire; St. Paul seems to have always used it in preach-

1. Greek. ing—he and St. Barnabas clearly did not know, or preach in, Lycaonian, though some of their companions may have used it in preaching in the country villages round Lystra and Derbe (Acts 14 7, 11, 14); St. Peter probably also used it outside Palestine, and this would be the meaning of the statement (Eusebius, HE. iii. 39 15) that St. Mark was his Interpreter (i.e., from Aramaic into Greek). Even at Rome the first Christians spoke and worshipped in Greek; St. Paul wrote to the Romans in that L., and Clemens Romanus, Hermas, and Hippolytus employed it in their works. Polycarp of Smyrna must have used Greek when he celebrated the Eucharist at Rome on the invitation of Pope Anicetus, A.D. 154 (Eusebius, HE. v. 24 17). The old Roman Cr. (the original of the Apostles' Cr., c. 140?) was composed in Greek. Several traces of this usage remained in the Roman services after they had become Latin; such as the Kyrie, and the Trisagion (Agios O Theos, etc.) in the Good Friday offices; lections were long read in both Ls. (for other instances see Scudamore, p. 243, and DCA, 2106). Pope Victor was apparently the first Roman bp. to write Latin (189-199), and before him the list of Roman bps. contains only two Latin names (Harnack, Expansion, p. 381). The Ch. of Gaul was Greek at the end of the 2nd cent.; Irenæus' works and the letter of the Chs. of Vienne and Lyons in 177 (Eusebius, HE. v. 1) were written in it; the names of the martyrs mentioned being chiefly Greek, though some are Latin. The African Ch. originally spoke Greek, and Tertullian wrote in both languages; Perpetua (c. 202) heard in a vision the hymn, "Agios, Agios, Agios," though she ordinarily spoke Latin; it is doubtful if this is a reminiscence of the liturgical SANCTUS (Acta Perpet. 12). In Magna Graecia (South Italy), with its Greek colonies, that L. naturally survived longer than elsewhere; in some cases till the 9th cent. or later.

It was probably in Africa that Latin first became the liturgical L. Cyprian (De Domin. Orat. 31) cites the SURSUM CORDA in Latin. Tertullian in Africa and Novatian in Rome were the first Christian Latin writers of eminence. At Rome Latin was perhaps used as a liturgical L. side by side with Greek in the 2nd cent.; but the Roman Ch. did not become predominantly Latin till c. 250 (Harnack, Expansion, p. 381). Hermas (c. 150?, perhaps earlier) does not mention bilingual worship in Rome; but the Latin versions of his Shepherd, and of Clement, and of the Roman Cr., were made before 200. Perhaps, as there were several places of worship in the city, Greek was the liturgical L. of some, Latin of others. The spread of Latin over Western Europe made it a lingua franca, and it became the liturgical L. of all the West. Even though Ulfilas had translated the Bible into Gothic in 360, we do not find that that L. was used for the prs.; for these Latin was universal in Western Europe. When it ceased to be generally understood, it was still retained in liturgical worship from conservative motives, though the vernacular was substituted in one or two instances, as in parts of the Marriage and Bapt. services.

In countries where the people spoke a vernacular, but Greek was readily understood, the sermons and lections were usually read in, or else translated into, the spoken language.

2. Bilingual Churches. Interpreters are found in Egypt (Sarapion's PB 25, c. 350), and in Syria and Palestine: see Epiphanius, Exp. Fid. 21; Pilgrimage of "Silvia," 75, where the presbyter interprets the sermon of the bp., who, though he knows Syriac, always speaks Greek—this is at Jerusalem; Eusebius (Mart. Palest., longer Vers.), where Procopius is a reader, interpreter, and exorcist; and the story of St. Anthony who, though he knew no Greek, yet followed the Gospel when read, and as a consequence sold his possessions (Athanasius, Vit. Anton. 2 f.). Yet in all these countries the prs. seem usually to have been said in Greek. As, however, liturgical services were in a somewhat fluid state till the 4th cent., their wording being not so absolutely fixed as it afterwards became, they would be capable of oral translation to suit the needs of each place. After the universal adoption of fixed written liturgies the difficulties must have become acute. Irenæus preached at Lyons (Contr. Haeres., pref. 3) in the "barbarous dialect" of the Keltae, whatever that was; but he seems to negative the idea that the Bible or the prs. had been translated into the tongues of the "barbarians," who "have salvation written in their hearts by the Spirit without paper and ink" (Contr. Haeres. iii. 42). In North Africa the vernacular was Punic; but the Punic element in that Ch. is not mentioned by Tertullian or Cyprian, though strong in Augustine's days. Probably the Bible and the prs. were not translated into Punic, though the lections and sermons would be in the vernacular (cp. Harnack, Expansion, p. 415). In France at the present time the Gospel is habitually read at a High Mass, first in Latin at the altar, and then in French from the pulpit.

From the period of the growth of written liturgies (4th cent.) these are found in the various languages.

But nearly the same conservatism is found in the East as in the West, for, while the spoken Ls. have greatly developed, the prs. have always been said in the classical tongues (in Russia Slavonic is still used, in Greek-speaking countries classical Greek, and so on), and these are not as a rule more intelligible to the people than Latin to an Italian. Yet lections are often read in the vernacular; and the Orthodox, in forming new colonies, translate their liturgies into the L. there understood. (See EASTERN CHURCHES, § 2.)

At the Reformation the Ch. of Eng. adopted English instead of Latin in public worship, and asserted in her 24th Art. (1563, a stronger form than the corresponding Edwardine one) that the holding of public pr., etc., in a not-understood tongue is repugnant to Scripture and to primitive custom. At the same time (1551, 1560, etc.), a Latin version of the PB was officially published, for schools and colleges; and at various times versions have been put out by authority: in Welsh (first in 1567), Irish Gaelic (1608), Scottish Gaelic (1794; the Scottish Com. Office in Gaelic, 1797), French for the Channel Islands (1549); and in modern times the PB has been translated into most or all of the L.'s used in the Mission field. (See further, VERSIONS OF THE PB, MODERN; VERSIONS OF THE PB, OLDER; WELSH VERSION OF THE PB.)

In all countries where there are many dialects, as is the case where there is little or no vernacular literature, there is difficulty in making the liturgical L. intelligible to the whole community. Each small district, sometimes each village, speaks differently. This is a difficulty much felt in Foreign Missions. And, further, liturgical L. must not be too colloquial; for example, a member of an old Eastern Ch. is apt to consider pr. in his own spoken dialect irreverent. We who possess a PB in Shakespearean English should be sorry to exchange its L. for the sometimes unseemly vernacular used in extempore prayer. So much may be said on the one side. On the other hand, the want of vernacular services destroys the worship of the people. Individual worship may be maintained, but there is little idea of true congregational worship in which the people all join, if the services are said in an obsolete tongue; the Euch. is considered to be the priest's, rather than the people's, sacrifice of pr. and thanksgiving. The audible responses of the whole congregation were a great feature of primitive worship; this was no doubt the reason why the "prayers in common" were so called by Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 65). The moral for ourselves is that we should not be too conservative in retaining misleading or misunderstood archaisms of speech in our PB.

(DCA 2 103, art. Liturgical Language, which gives many more details than space allows here; Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, ed. 2, p. 243; Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, Eng. trans., 2 270, 381, 400, 413 ff.; and the various Commentaries on Art. 24.)—B2.

A. J. MACLEAN.

LANTERN.—The idea of a L. tower illuminating the crossing of a church above the nave and transept roof is, like that of the cruciform plan, of Byzantine origin. Adopted at Ravenna and Venice and afterwards in Rhenish Germany, it was brought to its highest development by the Norman and English builders.

Norman Ls. exist at Winchester and St. Albans. At Salisbury and Wells, 13th cent. Ls. remain above later vaulted ceilings. The broad 14th cent. octagonal crossing at Ely and the central tower of York are our grandest Gothic Ls. and are only rivalled by the dome of St. Paul's.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

LAPSE.—A patron of a vacant benefice, neglecting in due time to present a qualified clerk, is deprived of the presentation for that turn. If the patron fails to fill the benefice within six months, the right falls to the Bp.; on six months' failure by him, to the Abp.; and, after a like failure by him, to the Crown.—TA.

R. J. WHITWELL.

LATITUDINARIANS.—This cultured school of theologians dated their rise from the time of the Commonwealth, when a number of eminent thinkers, popularly known as the "Cambridge Platonists," began to advocate enlightened principles of religious liberty and toleration far in advance of the spirit of the age. These liberal views had first been propounded by William Chillingworth and John Hales in the reign of Charles I, but others such as More, Cudworth, Whichcote, John Smith, and Edward Fowler, soon adopted their opinions. Although firmly attached to the Ch. of Eng. the L. were strongly opposed to the persecution of Christians whose sincere convictions prevented them from conforming to its worship, and they therefore zealously advocated the principle of toleration and comprehension. The movement was, in fact, largely a reaction from the narrow and dogmatic theology of the Puritans on the one hand, and the rigid and exclusive eccles. views of the Arminians on the other. The L. specially emphasised the ethical, moral and humanitarian teaching of the Bible, and encouraged the free play of reason in determining matters of Divine revelation. Bp. Burnet, one of their early sympathisers, says, "They studied to assert and examine the principles of religion and morality on clear grounds and in a philosophical method, and allowed a great freedom both in philosophy and divinity" (His Own Times 1 188).

Abp. Tillotson, the most eminent and moderate exponent of their theological opinions, placed special importance on bringing religion to the test of reason. "Christianity," he says, "is the best and the holiest, the wisest and most reasonable religion in the world"; "If your religion be too good to be examined, I doubt if it is not too bad to be believed" (1 448-Serm. 5; 4 84-Serm. 58). The excessive stress placed by some of this school on reason and the cultivation of moral conduct to the comparative neglect of revealed Christian doctrines tended to eliminate the supernatural element from Christianity. Thus by the middle of the 18th cent. Latitudinarianism had degenerated into Unitarianism or Deism, and its teachers were associated with those who opposed the doctrine of the Trinity or the obligation of subscription to the 39 Arts.—A1.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

LAUDS.—The office to be recited at daybreak. It has remained practically unchanged from the remotest antiquity. Its principal parts are these: five Pss. with antiphons, short chapter, hymn, the cant. Benedictus, and the Coll. The 1st Ps. is, on Sundays and Festivals, 93, and on other days, 51. The 2nd Ps. varies for each day of the week. The 3rd is always the same, viz.: 63 and 67 together. The 4th "Psalm" is a canticle from the OT, varying for each day of the week. The 5th is always the last three Pss. (148-150) together. (See HOURS OF PRAYER.)—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

LAVABO.—The ritual washing of the celebrant's hands at the Offertory. This was accompanied by the repetition of Ps. 26 6, Lavabo inter innocentes manus meas. See New English Dict., which adds that the name L. was also given to (1) the small towel used to wipe the priest's hands, (2) the basin used for the washing. (See also ABLUTION.)—R2.

B. HOBSON.

LAW, ECCLESIASTICAL.—Before the Reformation the Corpus Juris Canonici, with its supplements and the special English constitutions synodically promulgated, constituted a distinct body of Eccles. Law (see CANON LAW). After the Reformation, the ACTS OF UNIFORMITY and other statutes affecting the Ch., together with common law, the CANONS OF 1604, and a mass of related documents, made up the "King's Eccles. Law." Its main sources, and the principles affecting it, have been outlined under RITUAL LAW. The titles of many relevant arts. will be found under App. A 2-7, Ma, Oa, R, TA.—A4.

G. HARFORD.

LAWYERS, ECCLESIASTICAL.—The supersession of the Canon Law, the transference of matrimonial and testamentary suits from the eccles. courts, and the gradual decay of the disciplinary system of the Ch., have very greatly restricted the number of lawyers conversant with eccles. law and procedure, and, of those who take it up, few are able to afford to dispense with general practice. The unsatisfying discussions and decisions in modern eccles. suits have been partly due to the lack of competently instructed lawyers.—A4.

G. HARFORD.

LAY BAPTISM.—There is nothing in the NT confining the administration of the rite of Bapt.

to ordained men, and there are statements indicative of its being performed by laymen. Christ Himself did not usually baptise (impf. ἐβάπτισεν), but His disciples (Jn. 4 2); and they did so before their definite appointment recorded in Mk. 3 14. The charge of Mt. 28 19 probably includes more than the Eleven within its scope (cp. "but some doubted" in v. 17; and the appearance to over 500, 1 Cor. 15 6). The Apostles can hardly have themselves baptised the whole 3,000 on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2 41). St. Peter "commanded" Cornelius and his household to be baptised (Acts 10 48), the rite being presumably performed by lay brethren from Joppa. St. Paul appears to have owed his bapt. to Ananias, who may have been a lay disciple (Acts 9 10, 18, 22 12, 16). He himself laid hands on the twelve disciples of John, but he is not said to have baptised them (Acts 19 5, 6); while, in 1 Cor. 1 17, he says that Christ sent him not to baptise but to preach.

The early Church generally regarded lay Bapt. as irregular and to be avoided wherever possible.

2. Witness of the Early Church.

It was occasionally forbidden entirely (e.g., Ap. Const. 3 10); but usually it was considered legitimate and even obligatory in cases of extreme urgency, nor was its validity questioned. Tertullian (De Bapt. 17) says that laymen "should be content to act in emergencies, whenever the conditions of time, place or person are imperative"; while he even goes so far as to add that the layman "will be guilty of the loss of a soul, if he neglects to confer what he freely can." Bapt. by women was specially disliked, and frequently forbidden (e.g., Tert., De Vel. Virg. 9, De Bapt. 17; Ap. Const. 3 9). But the general voice of the Church was that Bapt. by any Christian was valid, irrespective even of his orthodoxy or character. The Roman and Greek Churches have both authoritatively declared lay Bapt. valid; and the same view is held by the reformed bodies, excepting the Calvinists.

In mediæval England, lay Bapts. were frequent, and in Elizabeth's reign midwives still received written permission from the Bps. to perform the rite in cases of emergency (a form dated 1567 is quoted in Strype's Annals i. 2 337). The Sarum Manual allowed it, and provided a form. The rubrics of our first three PBs also mention it with the same approval, adding to the Sarum the injunction that those present should first "call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord's Pr." (the mention of the latter seems to derive from HERMANN'S CONSULTATION). But the Puritans were anxious to abolish lay Bapt. entirely, because of former abuses through clerical laxity; e.g., Luther (De instit. Ministris eccles.) denounces the Roman priests for ceremoniously "baptising stones, altars and bells," while they despised that of infants as beneath their dignity. Some, with Cartwright, maintained that the minister is of the essence of the sacrament. The irregularity of lay Bapt. was so strongly and widely felt that in 1604 the rubrics of the PB were altered so as to make no mention of any other than a "lawful minister," and in 1662 they were still further revised in the same direction.

But, although no positive sanction for lay Bapt. survives in our present formularies, its validity is beyond question.

4. Validity of Lay Baptism.

As against the view that the minister is "a subordinate efficient cause," Whitgift, Hooker and Abbot laboured to defend the validity and lawfulness of "Bapt. by any man in case of necessity." King James himself, in spite of his strong prejudices against lay Bapt., expressed at the Hampton Court Conference his view that the minister is "not of the essence of the sacrament," although "he is of the essence of the right and lawful ministry of the sacrament." This has always been the opinion of the Ch. of England; and in 1841 the Court of Arches decided (in the case of Martin v. Escott) that "the law of the Church is beyond all doubt that a child baptised by a layman is validly baptised." The only essentials are the use of the proper matter (viz.: water) and the proper words (viz.: invocation of the three Persons of the Trinity).

(Literature. See especially Bingham's Scholastic History of Lay Bapt.; and Elwin, The Minister of Bapt.—12. HORACE MARRIOTT.

LAY COMMUNION.—That communion or fellowship with the Ch. which a layman enjoys, and to which a clerk in orders may be reduced by voluntary renunciation of ministerial functions or as a penalty for an eccles. offence.—A2. G. HARFORD.

LAY READER.—See READER.

LAYING ON OF HANDS.—(Imposition of the hand or hands: ἐπιθεσις τῶν χειρῶν, Acts 8 18, 1 Tim. 4 14, 2 Tim. 1 6, Heb. 6 2; χειροθεσία; χειροεπιθεσία: manus or manuum impositio, more frequently the former.)

The original meaning of the act of laying on of hands is to be found in pre-Christian religions, and particularly in the Jewish. Its significances appear to be two, (a) benediction, and (b) consecration; that is, (a) the conferring of a blessing, and (b) the setting apart for a particular purpose (cp. Gen. 48 14, Num. 27 18, 23, etc.). St. Augustine gives a very wide meaning to the action when he says (De Bapt. contra Donat. 3 16): "Quid est enim aliud (manus impositio) nisi oratio super hominem?" And the laying on of hands has in the NT and ecclesiastical usage so wide a meaning that it is difficult to employ any narrower definition.

The imposition of the hand is a sacerdotal action, and cannot be performed in the Christian Ch. by anyone below the rank of Priest (for an exception see Cyprian, Ep. 18 1, where the imposition of the hand on penitents in case of necessity is allowed to deacons). The laying on of hands in Confirm. and Ordination belongs solely to the Bp.—as also, properly speaking, in the Reconciliation of Heretics. In early times, when the penitential discipline was public, the Bp. was the regular minister of Absolution. But, with the change of practice, the administration of Penance is everywhere now committed to Presbyters. As for the various Benedictions, they can be performed by a Presbyter, but are sometimes limited to Bps., rather on account of the dignity of the function than by necessity of the case.

In the NT the laying on of hands is the outward act with which is connected the gift of the Holy Spirit, both together making up the sacramental rite of Confirmation (Acts 8 17, 19 6, Heb. 6 2; cp. 2 Tim. 1 6, Acts 9 17). The action of laying on of hands at Confirm. soon died out in the East. It is mentioned, indeed, in comments on the passages of Scripture which refer to it, and in some books of the Church Order series (e.g., Apost. Const. 3 16, 7 44; Can. Hippol. 19 136; see Maclean, The Ancient Church Orders, pp. 105-6, Cambridge, 1910), but very rarely in ancient Greek Fathers. Unction with CHRISM is the Eastern method of Confirm., and the only one that has left any trace on liturgical books. In the West, both unction and the imposition of hands co-existed from the earliest times: sometimes one, sometimes the other, is mentioned; often the same author mentions both, particularly divines of the Carolingian periods, who seems to have been desirous of preserving both actions without prejudice. In the Mediæval period the imposition of the hand sank very much into the background, and an extension of the hands was all that actually accompanied the Pr. for the gift of the sevenfold Spirit; often even this disappeared.

2. In Confirmation. In the First PB of Edward VI an imposition of the hand was prescribed for Confirm., preceded by a signing with the sign of the cross, and accompanied by the words N., I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and lay my hand upon thee: In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. In the Second and all subsequent PBs the signing is omitted together with the words given above. In their place is substituted the present formula, Defend, O Lord, this thy child, etc., accompanied only by the laying on of the hand, a practice justified by Scripture and patristic quotations, but with little liturgical precedent.

Many impositions of the hand are found in liturgical books during the Bapt. rites, among the ceremonies of the catechumenate. In fact the phrase imposition of the hand came to be a synonym for admission to the catechumenate (for examples see the note of Valesius on Eusebius, Vit. Const. 4 61). The same action was likewise particularly connected with Exorcism, as may be seen in the Roman rite of Bapt.; a signing with the sign of the cross was associated or alternated with it. This laying on of the hand vanished from our PB at the Reformation, but the First PB still retained the crossing at the beginning of the service. This survival of the old form of admission to the catechumenate was omitted in the Second and all subsequent PBs.

3. In Preparation for Baptism. When the Bapt. which a heretic had received was considered invalid, he was counted as a heathen, and, if he turned to orthodoxy, he was catechised, baptised and confirmed. If, on the other hand, this Bapt. was accepted, then the method of Reconciliation appears to have been a sort of Confirmation; that is to say, the form of Confirm. was followed (unction in the East, imposition of the hand in the West), and the Holy Spirit was believed to be imparted thus to the convert. Such at least is the language of canon 95 of the Trullan Council and of St. Gregory the Great (Ep. 11 67), though, even in the East, the liturgical books mention an imposition of the hand.

In the Reconciliation of Penitents, an imposition of the hand was universally the symbol of Absol.; indeed, according to Bp. Chase, 1 Tim. 5 22 refers to this. At the present day an elevation of the hand is substituted for it in Western practice, and in the East no action is prescribed. Through some have suggested that the imposition of the hand is the matter of Penance, as might be thought from the importance attached to it in early times, yet this is not the view of the Ch., and St. Thomas Aquinas, after a discussion of the point, decides against its necessity (Summa Totius Theol. iii. 84 4).

The PB contains no form for the Reconciliation of Heretics, and does not enjoin any imposition of the hand in the Absol. of Penitents. The author of the Homily Of Common Prayer and Sacraments (Hom. 2 9), however, obviously considered it necessary in the latter case, and it is found in A Form of Penance and Reconciliation of a Renegade or Apostate from the Christian Church to Turcism, etc. (anno 1635; see Hierurgia Anglicana 3 10).

When Ananias restored St. Paul's sight he laid his hands on him (Act 9 12, 17), and St. Paul used the same action in healing the father of Publius (Acts 28 8)—both carrying out an injunction of our Lord, according to the writer of the close of St. Mark's Gospel (Mark 16 18). So, in some ancient orders of VS, the priests and ministers (or the priests and the faithful who are with him) are enjoined to lay hands on the sick person (Martene, Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. 7 4, Orders 4, 5, 14—vol. 1, pp. 305, 307, 322, ed. 1788, Bassano).

5. In Healing. No trace of this occurs in the PB; but it is found in TOUCHING FOR THE KING'S EVIL, as the following example will show. In an Office of date 1662 (given in Hierurgia Anglicana 3 176), while the Gospel (Mark 16 14-20) is being read, at the words, "They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover," is this Rubric, "Here the infirm persons are presented to the King upon their knees, and the King lays his hands upon them."

The imposition of the hand has been also employed for a large number of benedictory purposes, a use strictly in accordance with the most fundamental meaning of the action.

6. In Blessing. We may instance the consecration of abbots and abbesses, the dedication of persons to the religious life, and (sometimes) the consecration of kings. In many of these an extension of the hand has taken the place of actual touch, and in this form it is frequently employed for blessing in general, both in the Ch. of Eng. and elsewhere.

For Imposition of hands in Ordination, see arts. ORDINAL, ANGLICAN ORDERS.

(Chase, F. H., Confirmation in the Apostolic Age, 1909; Duchesne, L., Christian Worship, SPCK, London, 1904; Bingham, J., Antiquities of the Christian Church xii. 3, etc.; DCA, vol. 1, pp. 828-9.)—R2. T. THOMPSON.

LAYMEN, HOUSES OF.—See CONVOCATION, § 6.

LEAP YEAR.—See CALENDAR, § 2, 5, 6, 7, 10.

LEARNING.—Christianity claims to be the ultimate religion and to contain absolute truth about God and man. If this claim is to be sustained, all partial and fragmentary truths must be consistent with the Christian system and find their place in relation to the whole.

As the Church emerged from the obscurity of the 2nd cent. she found herself confronted by pagan philosophy. She was necessarily challenged to justify her doctrine to the reason of the thinker, as well as to show that her teaching could rouse the conscience and sway the affections of ordinary men.

1. The Early Church.

The schools were mainly in the hands of pagans, and pagan authors formed the text-books for the study of grammar and rhetoric. Intellectual life was nowhere more vivid and many-sided than at Alexandria, and it was there that a great catechetical school arose under Pantænus, Clement, Origen, Heraclas and Dionysius, in which an effort was made to assimilate all that was good in the teaching of Paganism and to represent Christianity as the truest philosophy. It may perhaps be said that all the arguments which have since been urged against Christianity and the answers to them are to be found in Origen's reply to Celsus. Dionysius (Euseb., HE vii. 7) exhibits the true spirit of the Alexandrian school when he declares that he reads everything, and, in refuting, hates what is false the more. Jerome on the other hand, whose L. was profound and wide, blamed himself for reading Virgil, almost as John Bunyan reproached himself for playing hockey.

In the centuries which followed ancient philosophy disappeared as a living force. Charlemagne (800) tried to attract to his court the best scholars from Britain and Ireland, and the schools which he founded became centres of L. in the Middle Ages. In Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274) a reconciliation was effected between theology and philosophy, and Aristotle, who was only known through a Latin translation from the Arabic version of one or two of his treatises, became almost canonised as a Christian Father. At the time of the Reformation the representative leaders of the English Church, like Cranmer, Parker and Laud, were steeped in patristic learning. While declaring, in their struggle against mediæval corruptions, that Scripture is the ultimate and final authority in matters of faith, they yet appealed to the early Fathers as authoritative interpreters of Holy Writ. Cranmer asserted with passionate earnestness, as against Rome, that the doctrine embodied in the English PB was in accordance with antiquity and Scripture. Similarly Richard Hooker (1553-1600), in defending the Church against Puritans and Anabaptists, argues on grounds of reason and common sense, and supports his views by marshalling a great array of early Church authorities. [Jewel, Bramhall, Andrewes and Jackson were examples of learning in high places. That the ideal of the leaders was not more widely reached by the rank and file was due to no indifference or slackness on the bishops' part, but to the rapacity of one generation of lay despoilers of Church property, and to the failure subsequently of lay patrons to take the responsibility of making their so-called "livings" adequate, a failure which has now become chronic.]

In the same way in the subsequent controversies the Church writers of the time, such as Pearson, Bull, Butler and Waterland, made, with massive L., the double appeal to reason and to antiquity, and met Socinians and Deists upon their own ground.

The leaders of the Oxford movement invoked the authority of the Fathers against the Latitudinarian tendencies of the period. This was done, however, with an imperfect sense of historical perspective. The teachers of an earlier age should be studied rather as illustrating the development of theological thought, and as examples of the way in which great problems may be faced, than because their conclusions are to be considered as binding upon subsequent generations. (See further, AUTHORITY, § 8.)

The need for L. is not less conspicuous in the present day than in the past. We have been passing through a period of reconstruction with regard to the knowledge of subjects connected with theology, comparable to the time of the Renaissance and Reformation.

The theory of evolution and the investigations of geology have wrought a revolution in the conception of the duration of the world and of the length of the chain of life, similar to the revolution effected by the Copernican theory in the conception of the position of the earth and of the magnitude of the universe, and they have profoundly modified and illuminated our ideas as to the process of creation and the history of the development of man's bodily and mental life. History and literary criticism have transformed our ideas as to the date and authorship of most of the books of the OT, and are dealing with the growth, composition and authenticity of the Gospel narratives. The science of comparative religion has opened a wide field of research, and shown that Christianity must not be isolated from all other examples of man's instinctive striving after God, but that much light may be thrown by a study of the great book-religions of the East on the capacity of the Christian faith to satisfy the highest and most universal aspirations of man. Philosophy pursues her unwearied search after the unity and reality underlying phenomena, in which religion would fain trace the purpose, holiness and love of a Heavenly Father.

Such speculations are no longer confined to the student. The results are familiar to the unlearned, and there is in consequence some unsettlement of religious belief. The Church may meet all this new thought in one or other of two ways. She may adopt the method of attempted suppression as set forth in the Papal Encyclical, Pascendi Gregis, against Modernism, screw down the safety-valve, shut eyes tight and await results. She may on the other hand appeal, as in the past, to sound L. and enlightened and reverent common sense, recognising that reason no less than faith is a gift of God, and that the intellect has its rights and its responsibilities as well as the heart. True faith is fearless, and invincible belief in truth and unquenchable love of the light will lead the Church to prove all things that she may hold fast that which is good. Bad criticism must be met by good criticism and false philosophy by that which is more profound. It is only when the stand is taken on the impregnable rock of ascertained fact that security can be assured. Living belief and loyalty are indeed something more than the last conclusion in a chain of syllogisms. Faith is given in answer to prayer and springs from single-hearted devotion to truth and goodness, but to shut our eyes to any truth is not an act of faith but of timid faithlessness.

2. The Reformation.

The battles of theology are fought and won in the study, and a great international confraternity of scholars is ever grappling with the problems which are raised. The parish clergyman, even if not learned himself, must endeavour to follow their arguments and test their conclusions, and to turn all his acquisitions to use in the sphere of practical life and religious teaching. There must be no divorce between the head and the heart, between reason and religion. "In the English Church," it has been said, "faith is not afraid to reason, and reason is not ashamed to adore."—re, u.

JOHN T. MITCHELL.

LECTERN.—Pre-Reformation Ls. were principally (1) Sanctuary Gospel Ls., as at Westminster Abbey in 1532 (English Altars, Alcuin Club); (2) Choir Ls. for music books, still used abroad (San Giorgio, Venice). Various shapes (brass or wood) were in use: EAGLE, Pelican, desk, double or fourfold revolving desk, and (rarely) stone desk in wall. Desk Ls. were often covered with a cloth.

Fine Pre-Reformation examples are: (eagle) at Southwell Minster (from Newstead Priory); and (double desk with figure of Henry VI on top) Provost Hacombleyn's at King's College, Cambridge. Of Post-Reformation Ls. (used for Lessons), fine brass examples are at Wells Cathedral (double desk, 1660), and (eagle) York Minster (1686). The Puritans destroyed the eagle L. as "an abominable idoll." Ls. were again used at the Restoration, but many were afterwards disused.

Wheatley (1720) speaks of Reading Pews with two desks. "one for the Bible, looking towards the body of the Church to the People." As late as 1840, a writer in the Ecclesiologist complains of the disuse of many fine old Ls., even that at King's College. But by 1875 many eagle Ls. had been introduced, and they "will never now, I believe, excite the most sensitive spirit into theological strife" (Beresford Hope). The L. is now in general use, but poor specimens abound. It is the church ornament "which most often goes wrong" (Micklethwaite). Before purchasing one, size, design and material should be most carefully considered in connection with the surroundings. The L. is, as it were, the Throne on which God's Holy Word is placed in the midst of the church. It should therefore be thoroughly good and beautiful.—R3.

W. A. WICKHAM.

LECTION.—See EPISTLE, GOSPEL, LECTONARY, PROPER LESSONS.

LECTIONARY.—The earliest Church services appear to have consisted of (1) the Liturgy,

(2) Vigil-services—like the Easter Vigil, (3) Missae Catechumenorum (= ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE), and

(4) Vespers—similar in character to the Mozarabic or the Ambrosian Vespers; to which (5) a service of Mattins (i.e., Lauds), constructed on the model of Vespers, was added at an early date. Of these services the Missa Catechumenorum and the Vigil (which was only an enlarged Missa Catechumenorum) consisted of little else than a series of lessons. But there were no lessons at Vespers¹ and rarely at Mattins; and there was no "course" of Psalmody at any service (i.e., no arrangement by which the Psalter was gone through as a whole), but only selected Pss., and the lessons were selected passages, though often taken in order from a suitable book of Scripture (see EPISTLE).

When the monks came to the front they introduced sets of services of their own of a novel character, which consisted almost entirely of Pss. arranged in a "course" by which the whole PSALTER was gone through in a definite time. The chief of these monastic services were the Nocturns (or night-services); and it was not long before the reading of Scripture was introduced into the monastic Nocturns of the West; but this Scripture-reading differed in character from the lessons of the previous non-monastic services, for instead of selecting certain passages for certain services the monks appointed certain books which were to be begun at certain seasons and read continuously and ad libitum, so much of the book being read at each service as the abbot chose, and the reader beginning again next day where the reading was left off the day before. Moreover, instead of a set of lessons from different classes of books—e.g., the Law, the Prophets, Epistles and Gospels (see ANTE-COMMUNION)—only one book was in reading at a time, though the passage read on any particular day was divided up into three (or four) lessons between which RESPONDS were sung. (When there were three Nocturns, as on Sundays and festivals, the course of Scripture-reading was usually confined to the first Nocturn—on Saints' days the lessons being specially chosen so as to be appropriate to the day; and at the second Nocturn was read—on Sundays a homily, on Saints' days the life of the Saint; and at the third Nocturn on both Sundays and festivals a commentary on the Gospel for the day.) The oldest rules for this Scripture-reading extant prescribed that Isaiah shall be begun in Adv., followed by Jeremiah and Daniel after Christmas, and Ezekiel, Job and the Minor Prophets after Epiph. A week before Lent (in later times at Septuagesima) they were to begin the Pentateuch and to continue with Joshua and Judges until Palm Sunday. In Holy Week suitable parts of Isaiah and Lamentations were to be read; in Eastertide the Catholic Epistles, Acts and the Revelation. After Pentecost, Samuel, Kings and Chronicles, the books of Solomon, Esther, Judith, Maccabees and Tobit up to Adv. In the third Nocturn the Pauline Epistles were to be read.¹

¹ Certain apparent exceptions, e.g., Lenten Fridays at Milan, are in reality Vigil-services and not true Vespers.

When the different elements of these services were collected into one volume called the Breviary, it became necessary to assign definite passages to the successive days; and in the small portable Brev. the length of the passages chosen was reduced to a mere shadow of the original.

The (so-called) "Reformed Brev." of Quignon was the result of a reaction against this state of things and in favour of a more systematic

3. Quignon's reading of Scripture; QUIGNON'S Breviary.

BREVIARY, however, could not properly be styled a reformed Roman Brev., as it was an entirely new scheme, parts of which were suggested by ancient rites and accounts of early but obsolete services. In this Brev. three lessons were appointed for each day (like the Ambrosian rite); of these the first was from the OT, the second from the NT—so that the principal part of the former and almost all of the latter were read in the course of the year—(cp. Cassian's account of ancient Egyptian monastic services), and the third lesson (if a Saint's day) was from the life of the Saint (cp. Ambrosian), otherwise from the Epistles (cp. Rule of St. Benedict). (Quignon may have partly founded his lesson-system on notices in the Rule of Aurelian, and on a misunderstanding of the Missae Catechumenorum of the Mozarabic rite.)

Quignon's L. was ingeniously worked out. Isaiah was begun in Adv., followed by appropriate selected lessons from the other prophets; after Christmas the Sapiential books till Septuagesima, when Genesis was read till Passiontide, when again appropriate selected lessons from the prophets were read till Easter. After Easter Genesis was resumed and read till the octave of Corpus Christi—Ascension Day, Pentecost and Corpus Christi having their own proper lessons. Then follow parts of Exodus, Sam., Kings, Daniel, Tobit, Judith, Esther and Job till Adv. For the second lessons, Luke is begun on Adv. Sunday and read (up to c. 21) till three weeks after Christmas; then some of the Pauline Epistles till Septuagesima. From Septuagesima till Passiontide are read St. John's Gospel and Epistles, and James. The Passions from the four Evangelists fill up Passiontide; and the four accounts of the Resurrection fill up Easter week. Then follow Rom. and, 1 Cor. up to Pentecost, when Acts is begun. Acts is followed by the remainder of the Pauline Epistles, Matt., Mark, 1 & 2 Pet., Jude, and part of the Revelation. After this the Pauline Epistles omitted after Epiph. complete the year.

¹ The allusions in the early Fathers to lessons of Scripture read in the regular services are not to such services as these monastic services, nor to the course of Bible reading used at these services (see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE, § 3).

It is known that in drawing up the PB Cranmer was greatly influenced by Quignon's follow Quignon's general scheme very closely. In the end however, while adopting Quignon's plan of taking the first and second lesson from the OT and NT respectively, Cranmer dropped the third lesson altogether, and unfortunately threw over the ancient method of arranging the lessons according to the Ecclesiastical Year (with the exception of the assignment of Isaiah to Adv.), and invented a new method of arranging the Scripture-reading according to the days of the Calendar, with only the fewest possible exceptions for the great holy-days of the Dominical year. The course of lessons was even made to begin with January instead of after Christmas.

4. PB of 1549. Brev., and his previous draft-schemes (see Gasquet and Bishop's Edward VI and the Bk. of CP)

Under this system the greater part of the OT and part of the Apocrypha were read through in the course of the year, beginning with January, in the order of the books as in the Bible, except that Isaiah was reserved for the close of the year. The Gospels were read through thrice in the year at MP, and the Acts and Epistles thrice at EP, Revelation being omitted altogether. (For the Proper Lessons under this scheme see art. PROPER LESSONS.) These Calendar lessons continued with very slight alterations until 1871, except that in Elizabeth's (and later) PBs the ferial lessons on Saints' days were displaced to make room for Proper lessons.

In the "New Lectionary" of that year the Calendar lessons were revised throughout, the average length of a lesson being reduced. The NT, except Revelation, was now appointed to be read through once a year at MP, beginning in January, and once a year at EP, beginning in July, Revelation (except three chapters) being read at both MP and EP during the latter part of December. Though this revision contained many improvements, yet it was carried through with altogether insufficient pains, and with a complete ignoring of the ancient lectionaries of the Church. In the divisions which marked the beginning and endings of the particular lessons (in which the old division into chapters was very rightly ignored) the state of NT scholarship at the time warranted the expectation of a much better result than was obtained, for many and glaring blunders were made, and some of the new divisions were even more contrary to sense than the worst of the old chapter-divisions (the divisions of Acts may be specially referred to); and the L. was soon felt to be quite unworthy of the scholarship of the day—an unworthiness which grew ever more apparent with the progress of NT scholarship. Accordingly, in 1878, an improved L. was drawn up by the Lower Houses of both Convocations, which was carried out with far more care, and avoided many of the faults of detail in the L.

5. Lectionary of 1871.

of 1871. This proposed L., however, did not deserve to be accepted, for, in spite of influential remonstrances, the revisers perpetrated the chief fault of the old system—viz., the arrangement of the daily lessons according to the Calendar instead of the Ecclesiastical Year—with the consequent clashing of the daily and Sunday systems. The scheme was abandoned in deference to complaints raised by the printers that they would lose money on their stock of PBs on hand if any alteration were made in the PB. That it is quite possible to arrange a L. according to the Ecclesiastical Year may be seen in various Lutheran lectionaries, as also in the "Irvingite" L., and in a proposed L. recently put forth by the Very Rev. Provost Staley. See Church Book for the use of Evangl. Lutheran Congregations by the authority of the General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Ch. in N. America, Philadelphia, 1892; (Irvingite) Liturgy and Offices of the Church; Staley, Revision of the Lectionary. In the New L. of 1871 the number of lessons from the Apocryphal books was reduced. In the Irish L. of 1878 these lessons were abolished altogether, although the statement in the Art. was retained that "the Church doth read" these books.

The Rule of St. Benedict directs the lessons to be read "super analogium" (which probably means

6. Ceremonial of Lessons. an ambon); and both reader and hearers sat. In the Sar. Customary they are ordered to be read "in pulpit," and similarly at Barnwell. Mr. T. Thompson informs me that the "pulpitum" was the loft over the screen at the West end of the choir, in which there was often a projection "like unto a pulpit" over the quire-door with a desk (or desks) in it facing East for the lesson books. The legenda were (sometimes at least) read from a lectern in the quire, but this was a later custom (see Rites of Durham, pp. 11, 12). The place from which the lessons were read in parish churches in mediæval times seems to be wrapped in great uncertainty; but there does not seem to be any instance of the use of a lectern for this purpose.

The Injunctions of Edward VI (1547) ordered that a chapter from the NT should be read at the Latin Mattins, and a chapter from the OT at the Latin Vespers, from the same place as the Epistle and Gospel were ordered to be read, viz., "in the pulpit or" where there was no pulpit "in such convenient place as the people may hear the same" (see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE). This was a return to the primitive ante-monastic usage, and was generally followed, though in college chapels and some parish churches (and even cathedrals) the lessons were read from desks placed on either side of the stalls—possibly a survival of some ancient custom. The use of lecterns for the purpose in cathedrals is mainly due to the Caroline divines, and the general use of lecterns for the lessons in parish churches is one of the mistakes of the 19th cent., the normal use of the mediæval LECTERN being to hold the antiphoner rather than the lesson-books—the primitive custom in the case of the early and non-monastic lessons being to read them from the ambon or pulpit. (For bibliography of ancient lectionaries, see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE, § 7.)—CI. W. C. BISHOP.

LECTURER.—Before the Reformation there were lectureships provided by endowment or voluntary contributions in a few parishes. The number of these was largely increased in the year 1626, when twelve persons were legally empowered to purchase impropriations, with the proceeds of which they were allowed to provide parishes where the clergy were not qualified to preach with Ls. to preach instead of the parochial Clergy. This was found to be somewhat subversive of Church order. Consequently Abp. Laud in 1633 procured a bill, exhibited in the Court of Exchequer by the Attorney-General, against the twelve persons who purchased the impropriations, charging them with misapplying their trust by appointing Ls. who did not conform to the Ch. of Eng. The money was confiscated to the King's use, but in many parishes the Ls. still continued, maintained by private contributions.

In 1641-9 a portion of the confiscated revenues of the Bps. and ejected clergy was used to provide Ls. for the vacant parishes. Most of these were dispossessed of their positions and incomes by the Act of Uniformity (1662), which required declarations which they were unable to make. The endowed lectureships still existing are the relics of the old system. In any parish where there is a L. the Bp., if he thinks fit, with the consent of the incumbent, may require the L. or preacher to perform other ministerial duties as assistant curate or otherwise, and may vary the duties from time to time. If the duties so prescribed are not performed, the defaulter may be removed from his office (7 and 8 Vict., c. 59, ss. 1, 6).—A3. LUCIUS SMITH.

LEGEND.—The vol. containing all the matter to be read by way of lessons in the Nocturns. It comprised: (1) several series of lessons from Scripture, to be read in the 1st Noct., each series being called a History; (2) lessons from the writings of the Fathers, called Sermons, read in the 2nd Noct.; (3) expositions of the Gospels for Sundays and Festivals, called Homilies, read in the 3rd Noct.; (4) lessons from the lives of the saints, read on their festivals in the 2nd Noct. From this last item we derive the common meaning of the word Legend.—B2. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

LENT (Quadragesima; τεσσαρακοστή, mod. Gk. σαρακοστή; Fr. Carême; Gaelic Carmhas; Welsh Garawys; Syr. "The great fast").—The earliest definite reference to the fast bef. Easter is in Irenæus (Eusebius, HE v. 24 23), who speaks of a variety of usage as of long standing in his day. Some fasted one day, some two or more days, some forty continuous hours. Many of the (4th cent.?) Church Orders speak of a two-days' absolute fast, relaxed in the case of a sick person to a fast on the Saturday (Maclean, Ancient Church Orders, p. 135). This custom is probably connected with the fast bef. Bapt., as Easter was the great occasion for that sacrament (see FAST, § 3). At an early date Holy Week was treated as a partial fast, with bread, salt and water (a "xerophagy"), usually ending with a two-days' absolute fast; see Tertullian, De Jej. 2, 9, 15; Dionys. Alex., Ep. ad Basiliden, can. 1, who speaks of a variety of custom; the older Didascalia 5 14, ed Funk; Canons of Hippolytus 22 195 ff. The Montanists added an extra week to the fast, but excepted Saturday and Sunday (De Jej. 15; Tertullian's language is vague, and he does not here refer to Pascha, but he says that the Montanists had only two weeks of xerophagies in the year). We do not read of a forty-days' fast bef. the 4th cent., a supposed reference to it in Origen (Hom. in Lev. 10 2) being probably due to his translator, Rufinus. At Nicaea (can. 5) the "forty days" are only named as a well-known season, before which synods were to be held; and in the Test. of our Lord (c. A.D. 350?) they are only a solemn season for pr. and for preparation for Bapt. In neither case is the fast mentioned. And we find a similar state of things at Alexandria early in the 4th cent. Athanasius, under influence of Rome, urges his people to fast for the whole forty days in his 12th Festal Letter (as commonly reckoned), c. 340. Bef. that they seem only to have observed the season much as we keep Advent (see further, Duchesne, Chr. Wor., p. 242). The spread of the custom of fasting for forty days is perhaps connected with that of receiving the candidates for Bapt. (competentes, φωριζόμενοι) forty days bef. Easter, as ordered by the Council of Laodicea, c. 380 (can. 45). Sometimes the Forty Days included Holy Week (as in the Test. of our Lord, where they are not a fast, and in the Edessene Canons, can. 7, where they are, and as at Rome and Alexandria), and sometimes excluded it, as at Antioch and Constantinople (cp. Chrys., Hom. in Gen. 30 1; Apost. Const. 5 13, 18; Pseudo-Ignatius, Philipp. 13). "Silvia" (c. 385) describes an eight-weeks' Lent at Jerusalem (§ 4). In the 5th cent. Socrates (HE 5 22) testifies to great variety of usage; at Rome they fasted for three successive weeks, elsewhere for six weeks (Illyricum, all Greece, Alexandria); in other parts L. lasted seven weeks, but they fasted only at three intervals, for five days at a time. Yet all called the fast τεσσαράκωστή (so also Sozomen, HE 7 19). This last fact is probably to be accounted for by the original object of the season having been not for fasting but for pr. and vigil; it astonished Socrates, who had not the clue to the matter which we possess (see also below, §3).

1. Origin and Variety of Usage.

At Rome all the days were fasts except Sundays; Socrates (l.c.) says that Saturdays also were excepted at Rome in his time; but this was not

2. Days Excepted.

THE CHRISTIAN, § 5). At Constantinople Saturdays and Sundays were excepted, and this was the case also at Alexandria (Athanasius, Fest. Letter 6 13, A.D. 334), and at Milan (Ambrose, de Elia et jejuniis 10, c. A.D. 380). But the Council of Agde (Agatha) in South Gaul expressly orders a Saturday fast; in L. (can. 12, A.D. 506). There was great variety in the food eaten in L.; some ate only fish, some fowl also; some abstained from eggs and fruit; others, having fasted till the ninth hour, afterwards ate any food without distinction (Socrates, l.c.).

As Sundays were not fasted, L. at Rome, even in the time of Gregory the Great (Hom. 16 in Evang.), 3. Beginning of Lent.

consisted only of 36 days of actual fast, beginning on the "first Sunday in L." Accordingly, in the 7th cent., some time before the Gelasian Sacramentary, four days were added, and L. thus began on Ash-Wed. (Feria quarta in capite jejunii, or F. qu. cinerum). But in the Ambrosian rite L. still begins with the following Sunday, called "Dominica in capite Quadragesimae," and this was the Gallican custom. The name "Ash-Wednesday" comes from the benediction of ashes on that day, all the faithful attending church as penitents, and having ashes placed on their foreheads (see also COMMUNION). The days before L. are called "carnival" (Fr. carnaval; Ital. carnovale; Low Lat. carnelevamen "solace of the flesh"; late Gk. ἀνάρκεια).

The Greeks now begin L. after what we call Quinquagesima Sunday, but do not eat meat in the preceding week (Shann, Euchology, p. 263). The E. Syrians fast for fifty days before Easter, beginning at Quinquagesima, and in practice fasting even on the Sundays.¹ The Armenians have an eight-weeks' fast (cp. "Silvia," above).

The first Sunday in L. is called Quadragesima (so PB in the Tables). The last three Sundays are called:

4. Special Names and Liturgical Features.

Refreshment or Midlent Sunday (the former name because of the Gospel for the day); Passion Sunday, "Dom. in Passione Domini" (because the Gospel speaks of the preliminaries to the Passion); and Palm Sunday (see HOLY WEEK). There is good reason for calling the last fortnight "Passiontide," but there is no authority for calling the last week but one "Passion Week," which only leads to confusion with Holy Week, the name being given to the latter both by some early writers and by a common modern custom. The Ash-Wed. Coll. is appointed for daily use in L. in PB; a similar rule applies to all days up to Maundy Th. in the Sarum missal, which orders a memorial for penitents (p. 135, Burntisland edition). Special masses are provided in the Gelasian Sacramentary for every day in L. except Thursdays. The Sarum and present Roman Missals provide them daily. The E. Syrians provide for a Liturgy daily in the first, fourth, and last weeks (called the "weeks of the mysteries"), but not on Saturdays except Easter Even, and also on every Friday in L.; they call the middle Wed. "The Division" and observe it as a sort of carnival, but do not break the fast. The Greeks, following the Council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 380, can. 49), only celebrate the Euch. in L. on Saturdays and Sundays; on the other days they use the Liturgy of the Presanctified, as expressly ordered by the Trullan Council, A.D. 692 (can. 52). In the 1662 PB the seven penitential Pss. were ordered to be said on Ash-Wednesday; six in the ordinary place, and one in the Communion Service. The proper lessons for Ash-Wed. date from 1871. The Amer PB contains proper lessons for every day in Lent.

While the PB reckons "the 40 days of Lent" as "days of fasting or abstinence" (1662), it gives no rule as to the way in which this and other fasting seasons are to be observed. And in view of the change of modern habits, especially as to the amount of food taken at each meal, ancient rules would hardly be applicable to the present day. The first Homily on Fasting gives as the object of fasting the subjection of the flesh to the spirit, that the spirit may be more fervent in pr.; and makes this discipline a sign of our submission to God; it permits two meals on a fasting day. But the manner of the observance of L. is left largely to the discretion of the individual. In the 16th cent., however, the civil law made strict enactments on the subject. In 1548 abstinence from flesh on fast days (including all Fridays and Saturdays in the year) was ordered, both for spiritual reasons and for the preservation of the breed of cattle, the encouragement of mariners and increase of shipping. In the 1552 calendar prefixed to the NT several vigils are called "fyshe dayes." In Elizabeth's reign proclamations were put out (1560-2) enforcing fasting in L. and forbidding butchers to kill flesh then; and persons were punished for having flesh-meat in their houses at that season. Solemn sermons in this reign were preached on each Wed. Fri. and Sat. of L. and the Queen, dressed in black, attended them. Dispensations were granted, but very sparingly, for the sick to eat flesh-meat and for the butchers to kill in L., by Abp. Parker (1559-75) and Abp. Whitgift (1583-1604). In the 17th cent., at least till 1639, the clergy gave licenses for this purpose (see Hierurgia Anglicana, 2nd ed., 1 248-250, 3 106-114).—The old prohibition of marriage in Lent (and certain other seasons) was retained for many years, apparently till the Rebellion (ib. 3 116). Cosin proposed in 1661 to insert the prohibition in the PB, in the form of a statement of custom (ib. 3 119).—C3, G20.

¹ So, in practice, they fast even on Christmas Day, if it fall on a Wednesday or Friday. Their own Canon Law forbids Sunday fasting. (See Maclean-Browne, Catholicos of the East, p. 340 f.)

A. J. MACLEAN.

LENT, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.

—On Ash-Wednesday, being the first day of Lent, the Church strikes, so to speak, the key-note for all the Lenten services. This key-note is penitence, its outward expression being fasting, and its fruit reconciliation with God. Hence the COMMINATION Service, with its solemn exhortation to repentance, is read to-day and the seven PENITENTIAL PSALMS are said. The Collect, which is to be used daily during Lent, prays for the gift of "new and contrite hearts." The portion of Scripture appointed for the Epistle (Joel 2 12-17) records Joel's call to fasting and repentance; and the Gospel (Matt. 6 16-21) gives our Lord's rules about fasting. The special OT Lessons set before us Isaiah's call to reality in religion (Is. 58 1-12), and Jonah's preaching of repentance (Jonah 3); while the NT Lessons contain Christ's prophecy with regard to his disciples fasting (Mark 2 13-22), and the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews on the true purpose of God's chastisements (Heb. 12 3-17).

In the Collect for the 1st Sunday in Lent we pray for the grace of abstinence, in order that we may subdue the flesh to the spirit. The Epistle (2 Cor. 6 1-10) speaks of apostolic self-denial and altruism; St. Paul and his fellow-apostles were thus "workers together with God." The Gospel (Matt. 4 1-11) gives us our Lord's moral conquest over Himself, as shown in the record of His Temptation. The special Lessons are full of Lenten teaching: Lot's escape from the deadly associations of the Cities of the Plain (Gen. 19 12-29), Abraham's offering up his son Isaac (Gen. 22 1-19), the burial of Sarah (Gen. 23).

The Eucharistic suggestions of the 2nd Sunday in Lent are the following. (1) The Collect pleads earnestly, on the ground of our helplessness, for God's protection to both body and soul. (2) The Epistle (1 Thes. 4 1-8) sets forth the duty of moral self-control. (3) The Gospel (Matt. 15 21-28) records Christ's conquest over evil in another; the Syrophenician woman's faith is rewarded, and her appeal answered, by the expulsion of the devil from her daughter. (The connection between the three is admirably worked out in Reynolds' Handbook to the BCP, p. 171.)

The subject of the special Lessons is the contrast between Jacob and Esau. So we have Esau's loss of his blessing (Gen. 27 1-40), Jacob's vision of divine protection (Gen. 28), and the meeting of the two on Jacob's return from Padan-aram (Gen. 32).

The Gospel (Luke 11 14-28) for the 3rd Sunday in Lent contains in the words, "If I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you," the key-note to the services for the day. It speaks of the kingdom divided against itself and the return of the evil spirit, and teaches us that the source of all conquest of evil, whether in self or others, must be divine. In the Epistle (Eph. 5 1-14) St. Paul again warns us of the danger of giving way to temptation; the "children of light" must "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," or they will lose the moral strength which comes from union with God. And the Collect fitly places on our lips a prayer for defence against all our enemies. A little reflection will show us the appropriateness of the special Lessons for the day: Joseph betrayed by his brethren (Gen. 37), his conquest over temptation (Gen. 39), his life in the prison (Gen. 40).

The Eucharistic suggestions for the 4th Sunday in Lent are the following: (1) in the Collect, acknowledgment of punishment deserved, and petition to be "mercifully relieved"; (2) in the Epistle (Gal. 4 21-31), children of the bondwoman and of the free, Christian freedom from the Law; in the Gospel (John 6 1-14), the feeding of the five thousand. The significance of this Gospel is best seen if we compare it with those of the last three Sundays. In them we had Christ's conquest of evil; and now Christ by miracle sustains the life of the multitude, thus manifesting power, and suggesting that He can supply the food, not only of the body, but also of the spirit. The special Lessons (Gen. 42, 43, 45) set forth Joseph as a type of Christ, providing food for his brethren and his father's house, and thus saving them from death by famine.

The services for the 5th Sunday in Lent have a character of their own. They are intended to lead up to and prepare for the solemn associations of Holy Week.

So in the Collect we pray to be "governed and preserved evermore, both in body and soul"; the Epistle (Heb. 9 11-13) speaks of Christ's eternal priesthood, and its superiority to that of the Levitical law; while the Gospel (John 8 46-59) sets before us His personal claims and His pre-existence. He calls Himself "I am," thereby asserting His oneness with the Being who spoke to Moses in the burning bush, and afterwards revealed Himself by the name Jehovah (Ex. 3, 5, 6 1-13—the special Lessons).

[For the 6th Sunday in Lent and following days, see HOLY WEEK, RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR.]—G20. W. J. SPARROW SIMPSON.

LESSER LITANY.—The earliest form of the LITANY was the repetition of Kyrie eleison, three, six, or even up to 300 times. When it is said only once, it is understood to be addressed to the 2nd Person of the Trinity, but it was the general custom to repeat it three times, as addressed to the Three Persons.¹ The Western Church altered the second line to Christe eleison. The Lesser Lit. precedes the Lord's Pr. when that pr. is not eucharistic, and the Doxology does not commonly follow when it is used [exceptions are in Churching and Prs. at Sea]. (See KYRIE.)—D3. BERNARD REYNOLDS.

LESSON.—See LECTONARY, PROPER LESSONS.

LETTERS DIMISSORY.—When a Bp. is desirous of ordaining one or more candidates, but is unable for any cause to do so, it is customary for him to send LD. to another Bp. asking him to ordain in his stead. In such a case the Bp. who sends the LD. is responsible for the fitness of the candidates, and not the Bp. who ordains.—ra. J. W. TYRER.

LETTERS OF ORDERS.—Letters of orders are a certificate, in the form of letters patent, under the hand and seal of the Bp., testifying that on such a day and at such a place he ordained the person named in the document. Letters are given on ordination, both to the diaconate and to the priesthood. They are on parchment and should be preserved with the greatest care, as no second issue or copy can be made. If lost, there might be difficulty in proving the fact of ordination, though it is, of course, recorded in the Bishop's register. Letters of orders have to be produced on various occasions, such as admission to a benefice or licensing to a curacy. The practice of granting letters of orders to the newly-ordained is one of great antiquity. Gratian, 2. q.1. legum, cites a dictum of Hincmar of Rheims in the St. Medard Council of Soissons, 862, as to the duty of a Bp. to give these certificates to those whom he ordains. The practice can be traced still further back, as Gregory the Great, in a synod at Rome in 595, forbids "a notary to sell his pen" at an ordination—i. q. 2. sicut. As the gloss in the Corpus Juris says, this clearly refers to the preparing by the Notary of the "writing which the ordained receives from the ordainer." Lyndwode calls the certificate litterae ordinum, the same expression that we still use.—ra. E. G. WOOD.

LETTERS TESTIMONIAL.—Before any one can be ordained he is required by canon 34 of 1604 to produce testimonials in writing of his good life and conduct from some college in Cambridge or Oxford, or from at least three beneficed clerks who have known him for the last three years. These are called LT. They are also required before any clerk can be instituted to a benefice or licensed to a stipendiary curacy.—ra. J. W. TYRER.

LICENCE (LICENSE).—A. L. is a FACULTY or DISPENSATION. The grant of a L. is an Episcopal

¹ This is commonly called the Lesser Lit. Sparrow calls it "this most humble and piercing supplication," and quotes from a canon of Vaison (529) that this "sweet and wholesome custom of saying Kyrie eleison, with great affection and compunction, hath been received in the whole Eastern and most of the Western Church."

Act, and is purely discretionary. Generally speaking, a L. must be under seal, but by special enactment it may for certain purposes be under hand only. The Bp.'s SECRETARY is charged with the entry in a book, styled the Bp.'s Act Book, in chronological order of (inter alia) all Ls. granted by the Bp. A certified extract from an Act Book is received as evidence in Court. A L. can always be revoked, either by the Bp. granting it or by a successor, but in some cases an Appeal to the App. is prescribed. Ls. do not necessarily lapse on a vacancy in a See. In a proper case the King's Bench Division of the High Court will call upon a Bp. to show cause why a particular L. should not be granted.

The subject matter of Ls. covers a wide field. Among others the following may be mentioned.

(1) Licences to Clergy only: (a) to a Stipendiary Curacy (see CURATE'S LICENCE); (b) to officiate (general); (c) to a Lectureship; (d) to a Chaplaincy or Assistant Chaplaincy (the form varies according to whether the Private Chapels Act, 1871, is, or is not, applicable); (e) to a Perpetual Curacy (by statute such a L. is equivalent to INSTITUTION and INDUCTION); (f) for NON-RESIDENCE; (g) for holding services in unconsecrated buildings (HC. authorised where due provision is made, but, as a rule, not Bapt.); (h) for publishing Banns and solemnising marriages in chapels and unconsecrated buildings (governed by 6 and 7 William IV, c. 85—to relieve the inhabitants of populous districts remote from the parish ch., though they may still, if they think fit, resort thither); (i) for burying in unconsecrated ground adjacent to burial ground pending consecr. (in case of emergency only); (k) for removing unnecessary part of a glebe house (Eccles. Dilapidation Act, 1871, s. 71).

(2) Other Licences:—(a) to marry—1. "special" by Abp. of Canterbury, 2. "general" by a Diocesan Bp. (1. covering marriage at any time or place, 2. limiting it to the parish Ch. of the parish in which one of the parties is resident); (b) to take up and remove remains of deceased persons buried in consecrated ground (see art. BODIES, REMOVAL OF); (c) to a Lay Reader or Lay Helper (no statutory provision); (d) to a Deaconess.—A4. T. H. ARDEN.

LIGHTS.—It has been suggested that the use of L. (lamps or candles) in the primitive Church took its origin from the utilitarian use of L. in the services commonly held before dawn—the "antelucanis cœtibus" mentioned by Tertullian. It is doubtful, however, whether this can account for the whole of the circumstances. For in the early Church we find a variety of uses of artificial light from the 4th cent. onwards.

(a) Lamps hung from the canopy over the altar and in other positions in the church (such lamps were given by Constantine to the Lateran Basilica). (b) L. were lit at the Gospel as a sign of joy (as recorded by St. Jerome, Contra Vigilantium 7). (c) Candles were carried in procession (as shown in a 5th cent. ivory at Trier). (d) Candles or torches were carried especially in funeral processions, continuing a pagan custom probably utilitarian in origin.

L. were borne before the Pope as a mark of dignity (probably in imitation of the L. carried before an emperor).

In mediæval times, when the canopy over the altar, resting on pillars, was replaced by the tester hung from the roof, the lamps that hung from the canopy appear to have given way to candles, then placed on top of the pillars which remained. Indeed, the more favourite lamps of the early ages gave way very generally to the use of candles. About the 10th cent. it became customary to place another candle on the altar itself, close to the celebrant's book, to give him light to read by. At first the candle was shifted from side to side of the altar with the book, but afterwards two candles were provided on the altar: and ecclesiastical regulations enforced the use of one or both of these candles—passing by the L. of more ancient origin, which appear to have gone out of fashion in many cases, and to have disappeared along with the pillars which supported them. There seems to be no evidence that more than two candles ever stood on the altar before the Reformation in England or on the Continent generally; and these were on the altar slab itself and not on a shelf at the back of it, and were generally removed at the conclusion of the service for which they were used.

2. Medieval Use.

Other L. were used in the church, and especially the primitive custom of carrying L. in procession and at funerals continued throughout the period.

The Injunctions of Edward VI (1547) ordered that the other L. in the churches should be done away, "but only two L. 3. Reformation Period.

upon the high altar before the Sacrament which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they" (the authorities) "shall suffer to remain still." After the First PB was issued an attempt was made to issue further Injunctions which should forbid the use of these two L., but these never got beyond the stage of a draft.¹ Nevertheless, in the reign of Elizabeth the use of these L. was very generally abandoned in practice, but a revival of the custom began in the reign of James I and continued up to the Civil War.

After the Restoration there appears to be evidence of the use of two L. on the holy table from about 1680 to 1750, but by the

4. Modern Use.

19th cent. the practice had fallen into abeyance. The practice was revived about 1850, and was pronounced legal by the Court of Arches in the suit Westerton v. Liddell, but condemned as illegal by the Privy Council in Martin v. Machonochie (first suit) and subsequently.

In the Lincoln case (1890) the presence of two lighted candles on the holy table during the whole of the Communion Service was pronounced lawful, provided that there be no lighting or extinguishing of them during the service: and the Privy Council on appeal evaded the necessity of either agreeing with or disagreeing from the Archbishop's Court on the ground that there was no evidence to show that the bishop was responsible for the lighting of the candles.

See Lowrie's Christian Art and Archaeology;

¹ [See, however, RITUAL LAW, § 6.]

Read and others v. the Lord Bishop of Lincoln; Frere, Religious Ceremonial; Table I, nos. 31, 32, at end of RITUAL LAW.—R2.

W. C. BISHOP.

LINCOLN USE.—See USE, § 14.

LITANY.—In the history of worship there is no finality: one can seldom reach the primal cause or assert the ultimate development; worship is the aspiration of human nature Godwards, and changes as human nature changes in touch with its environment and progress. This fact is particularly evident with regard to the Lit., which is the expression of the sorrows of humanity, as in a lesser degree the Te Deum is the expression of its joys. The expression of joy is more constant than that of sorrow, therefore it has not been felt necessary to alter the Te Deum for many centuries, but the Lit. has received many alterations, and is still in need of more. Hence there are divergent ideas as to the origin of the Lit., some claiming an Eastern, some a Western, some a Christian, some a Jewish, some a pagan origin. In a sense all are right. They have traced the form of expression with which we are so familiar in the Lit., but it is quite impossible to say when humanity first expressed itself to God in the words "Lord, have mercy upon us" and "deliver us from evil." In the Lit. we are dealing with the most ancient of our services except the HC. to which indeed it is related. It was the first to be adopted, the last to be altered (cp. Amer. PB) except the Coronation Service—the one most in touch with modern and ancient life. It is at once Anglican and Catholic.

1. Origin of Litania.

The word Litany (Aravela, Litania, Letania) is Greek, and simply means supplication. Like its

2. Connection with the Kyrie.

Western equivalent rogatio, it soon however acquired its technical meaning of responsive or dialogue pr., repeated in various ways. The Greek word Lit. was early adopted in Rome, where the first Christian services were probably in Greek, and at the beginning of the 6th cent. it was well known in Gaul, as the wording of a canon of Orleans in 511 shows, "rogationes, id est litanias." The term is also used for the processions with which Lits. were associated: it has survived the Latin name. The KYRIE may be taken as the origin of the Lit., and the origin of the Kyrie is deep down in human nature. Ps. 51, which begins with "Have mercy upon me, O God," has been called David's Lit. The solemn supplication (Joel 2 17), "Spare thy people, O Lord," was a Lit. The prayer of the publican (Luke 18 13), though the word deison is not used, is of the same character. So one is not surprised to find in the early Eastern liturgies that Lits. were used at the Holy Euch. In the Apostolic Constitutions (c. 378-425), bef. the dismissal of the CATECHUMENS, the deacon, "ascending some high place," bids the ecclesie or deacon's Lit., each prayer being followed by "Lord, have mercy" (Apost. Const. 8 6, S.P.C.K., p. 39). In a similar manner the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom begins (Robertson, Divine Liturgies, pp. 232 ff.).

As processional services, with which Lits. in later times were so closely connected that the litany-book was called the Processional, it is obvious that in times of persecution their use would be restricted. They were, however, known to St. Basil (370), who

2. History of which they now practise. The origin of the Lit. is twofold, liturgical and processional. These sources are independent, though often merged in later times.

In nearly all the ancient Eastern liturgies dialogue prs. are to be found after the sermon and before the Mass of the Faithful. In these the deacon bids the people pray for certain persons and objects, and they respond with Kyrie eleison. Such an ecmene or synapte may be seen in any of the well-known books. Perhaps the most accessible form is the Liturgy of the Apost. Const., S.P.C.K., pp. 46-50, where a beautiful and ancient deacon's Lit. is translated. Mr. Atchley suggests the connection of the diaconal Lit. with Justin Martyr's earliest description¹ of the Euch. (The People's Prayer, Alcuin Club, Tract VI).

We are not on such certain ground when we come to the West, but it is probable that at Rome in early times a Lit. formed the initial portion of the liturgy (Duchesne, Christian Worship, p. 164). However, in the West, unlike the East, the eucharistic Lit. disappeared, and only survived in the ninefold Kyrie at the mediæval mass, while the Lit. form received independent development.

The Gallican Church was more in touch with the East, and, although the Gallican use has almost disappeared, Duchesne has reconstructed it from the description of St. Germain of Paris (576) and other sources. In that rite the Pr. of the faithful begins with a diaconal Litany.

The first recorded evidence of the processional use of Lits. is in the East in 398, when St.

4. The Processional Litany.

Chrysostom introduced processions in Constantinople to counteract the effect of similar Arian processions. The Arians, not being allowed to use the city churches, paraded the city singing heretical anthems and hymns, and so proceeded to their place of worship outside the gates. Chrysostom's processions were accompanied by considerable pomp, but both were suppressed on account of the two parties meeting and coming to blows.

The processional use of Lits. in the West is probably of earlier date; such services were originally to implore God's blessing on the fruits of the earth. This lustration of the lands had been observed by the pagans.

On April 25 the Romans observed the Robigalia, a festival in honour of the goddess Robigo, who was supposed to preserve the crops from mildew. They started in procession from the Flaminian Gate towards the Milvian Bridge, chanting pr. in dialogue, to a sanctuary on the Claudian Way. The Christian procession which superseded this procession on the same day followed the same route as far as the Milvian Bridge, whence it proceeded to St. Peter's; this was the litanía major, or greater Lit., and was distinct from the extraordinary Lit. at Rome on the same day in 590.

About the year 470 Mamertus was Archbishop of Vienne in Gaul, a city which had suffered much from war and wild beasts, and in addition was convulsed by earthquakes. On Easter Eve at the vigil service, the royal palace was struck by lightning. The people fled in panic, leaving Mamertus kneeling alone before the altar. He determined to organise Lits. on the three days before Ascension Day. This is the origin of ROGATION DAYS, a custom extended by the first Council of Orleans, 511, to the whole of Frankish Gaul.

¹ "Then we all stand up together, and offer up prayers; and our prayers being over, bread and wine and water are brought in." "We offer up common prayers . . . both for ourselves and for all other persons in every part of the world" (1 Apol. 67, 65).

An important occasion in the history of Lits. is St. Mark's Eve, 590, when to avert a pestilence Gregory the Great exhorted the people of Rome to meet in seven churches in their orders of clergy, laymen, monks, virgins, married women, widows, poor and children, and go in procession singing Lits. to the Church of St. Mary the Great. This is the origin of the St. Mark's or Sevenfold Lit., called also in Rome the Greater Litany.

The first form of service used in the English Church was the Lit., which St. Augustine and

5. The English Litany. his companions sang as they went to their memorable meeting with King Ethelbert in 597.

The Roman form of Lit. naturally came into England. One of the 11th cent. may be read in Procter and Frere, Hist. of PB, p. 411. As it is the parent of our present Lit., it will be read with devotion.

The Lit. was the first service to be used in English, which is natural as it expresses the people's prs. English versions dating from the 14th cent. may be read in Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia 3 227 ff., and Henry Littlejohn's Primer 2 40 ff.

At the Reformation a marked change of mind took place with regard to the Lit. In 1543 processional Lits. were ordered on account of agricultural distress and the "miserable state of Christendom," and Cranmer brought out his Lit. (1544). He was not content with translating current Latin Lits., but he evidently consulted Greek sources and also Luther's Lit. (1529). (For the influence of Luther on our Lit. cp. Dr. Dowden's Workmanship of the PB, App. H., and his Further Studies in the PB, viii.) Cranmer's Lit. was originally a processional one, but on account of "contention and strife" and "challenging of places in procession," which have not been fully explained, processions were forbidden at the beginning of Edward VI's reign. In the PB of 1549 the Lit. is printed after the HC without rubric, but in the Injunctions it was ordered to be sung or said "before high mass," all kneeling; this being a return to primitive custom. The prohibition of processions was only temporary, and although it was repeated in the Elizabethan Injunctions of 1559 except with regard to the Rogation PROCESSIONS, yet processions were held in London and Windsor on St. George's Day from the beginning of that reign. The Lit. has not been much altered since, and important alterations will be considered below. One controversial sentence was introduced by Cranmer, the assertion of the Double Procession, of which Dr. Dowden (Workmanship of PB, p. 155) writes, "From a liturgical point of view here is an ugly blot and it should without doubt be removed." The Lit. in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, 1559, is printed in Parker Society, Qu. Eliz., pp. 9 ff.

The Puritan party consistently objected to the Lit. They wanted to change its character from expressing as it so pathetically does the "people's prayers." They objected to short prs. (they wanted to lengthen the Colls. 1), and proposed more than once to change the Lit. into one solemn pr., as Baxter did.¹ They objected to the Obscurements, which they termed "a certain conjuring of God," and described this service as "certain suffrages devised of Pope Gregory."

The mediæval Lits. contain many invocations of the saints; over 150 are found in an English Lit. ascribed by Mabillon to the 8th cent. They do not appear before the 7th or, at earliest, the 6th cent.; originally they were prs. to God that the saints might pray for us. They were discarded by Luther, but Cranmer in 1544 retained three such invocations: (1) to the Blessed Virgin; (2) to the angels and archangels; (3) "All holy patriarchs, and prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors, and virgins, and all the blessed company of heaven pray for us." These were omitted in 1549.

Cranmer inserted (in the Lit. of 1544) in the "Invocations" the words "miserable sinners" instead of the original terse and ancient "Pater de coelis Deus, Miserere nobis." It should be remembered that he intended to produce other Lits. of a less mournful character, and seems to have prepared some for festivals (cp. Dowden, Workmanship, p. 153), but nothing came of his purpose. Perhaps he wished to keep up the rhythm of "Miserere," but one can sympathise with those who on first hearing these words felt that they were an innovation on what they were accustomed to hear for which they could find no adequate reason.

The assertion of the Double Procession is noticed above. The Puritans consistently objected to the words "sudden death," especially at the Savoy Conference. We may regret that their proposals were not adopted; the mediæval Lits. generally make it clear that it is unprepared death that we are praying against. It is surely wrong to force the people in what are essentially their own prs. to pray against what many of our holiest have prayed for. What is a greater mercy than "sudden death" like Liddon's and Bp. Wilberforce's? In this same "Deprecation" in 1549 occurred the words "from the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities." These were omitted in 1559, and it was proposed to revive them in the time of James I. But surely in the Lit. especially we do not wish to remember the divisions of the Church. In 1662, very naturally, the words "rebellion" and "schism" were added, and one can appreciate the fervour with which our predecessors said them after their recent sufferings. "Bishops, Priests, and Deacons" was inserted in 1662 instead of Luther's "all Bishops, pastors, and ministers of the Church." The "Amen" has been omitted by a printer's error from the Pr. "O God, merciful Father"; it is in the Elizabethan forms.² The Amer. PB has altered the words "From fornication," etc., to "From all inordinate and sinful affections"; it also inserts a petition, "That it may please Thee to send forth labourers into thy harvest," besides one or two other verbal alterations.

¹ One of the Puritan recommendations at the Savoy Conference with regard to the PB was that "the particulars thereof (i.e., of the Lit.) may be composed into one solemn pr. to be offered by the Minister" (Cardwell's Conferences, p. 306).

² See also ANTIPHON.

The Lit. expresses most forcibly "The People's Prayers," which Mr. Atchley has made the title of his helpful book. We have in the 8. Suffrages, etc. Lit. the outpouring to God of the sorrows of the past; but modification and enrichment are needed in view of the wants of the present.

Certain prs. against special dangers have naturally been discarded, e.g., "from persecution by Pagans and all our enemies," "from the incursions of the Northmen." When the service is next amended, it may be made more in touch with modern needs if we pray for missionaries, for the doctors, nurses and patients in our hospitals, for fishermen, for the unemployed. It is hard to see why prs. for the locality have been discarded, for the city in which we live, "for all parishioners whereso they be on land or water."

The history of the Lit. suggests its use as a preparation for the Euch. The custom, which began in Elizabeth's time, of running Mattins, Lit. and HC into one service has obscured this. In some places there was still an interval between the two forms, e.g., at Worcester Cathedral and Merton College Mattins were said up to the end of 18th cent. at 6 or 7 o'clock and the Lit. at 10 (Atchley, op. cit., pp. 22, 23).

The connection between the BIDDING PRAYER and the Lit. is obvious. (See also FALDSTOOL.)—F. BERNARD REYNOLDS.

LITURGY.—See COMMUNION (HOLY), esp. § 1-7.

LOCUM TENENS.—This term is commonly employed to designate a person who is employed temporarily to discharge the functions of another. Ecclesiastically, it is used of a clergyman who is taking the place of an INCUMBENT during his absence. As explained in the article ORDINARY, his status then is that of one having jurisdiction, or authority to act, delegated to him by the incumbent, in whose name he acts. He cannot, however, perform some legal acts, such as certifying copies of entries in the registers, which can only be done by the incumbent or a licensed assistant curate. In most dioceses the Bp. makes regulations regarding the employment of a LT. for more than a very short period; such regulations should be very carefully adhered to. Care should be taken not to engage a stranger without inquiry into his position and character, as unfortunately many very undesirable persons make a practice of acting as a LT., and even some who are not in Holy Orders. In all cases he should be asked to produce his LETTERS OF ORDERS, and according to canons 50 and 52 (of 1604), his licence to preach in some diocese.—R. A. E. G. WOOD.

LORD'S DAY.—See SUNDAY; WEEK, THE CHRISTIAN, § 1, 2.

LORD'S PRAYER.—The LP. has been handed down to us in two forms, and as delivered on two distinct occasions. St. Matthew 1. The Two-fold Form. has a fuller form, and gives it a place in the Sermon on the Mount (6 9-13). St. Luke records a shorter form as given on a later occasion after the Galilean ministry and during our Lord's last journeyings to Jerusalem (11 2-4). No valid reason has been given why our Lord should not have taught the same pr. more than once or even twice, nor why he should not have varied the wording of it. Indeed it is what we should have expected. We are too apt to think liturgically, and quite arbitrarily to limit our ideas of the LP. as it fell from His lips. The language of devotion, until stereotyped in liturgical forms, tends toward variation; and while St. Luke's words ("When ye pray, say") justify set forms of pr., St. Matthew introduces the pr. with the word οὕτως ("after this manner"), guarding against slavish adherence to the most venerable of forms. There were variations even in the pr. which "Our Saviour Christ Himself hath taught us." Failing to realise this, the early copyists enriched St. Luke's form of the pr. by making it correspond more closely with that of St. Matthew. Thus the LP. in St. Luke, as given in RV, is—"Father, Hallowed be Thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Give us day by day our daily bread. And forgive us our sins: for we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And bring us not into temptation." The original language was Aramaic, yet there must have been a common Greek basis on which both the evangelists rested, since that most peculiar word ἐπιούσιος ("daily") can hardly have been chosen independently.

The Doxology ("For Thine, etc.") is found only in some later MSS. of St. Matthew, and is undoubtedly a liturgical addition, which has crept into the text, possibly from having been written in the margin of an older copy. Its early use is proved from its presence in the Didache, where it is found not only as an ascription of praise after the LP., but also after the Great Euch. Prayer, the actual form slightly differing from that found in St. Matthew.

The LP. is both a form of prayer and also a type or standard of prayer. In either case it teaches the true order of our intercessions. It falls naturally into two parts; (i) for God's glory; (ii) for man's bodily and spiritual needs; each part consisting of three petitions:

- (i) (1) Hallowed be Thy Name, } As in heaven
- (2) Thy kingdom come, } so on earth.
- (3) Thy will be done,
- (ii) (1) Give us this day, etc.
- (2) Forgive us our trespasses, etc.
- (3) Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.

Three critical points are important, for the discussion of which we must refer to the Commentaries.

4. Three Critical Points. (1) The relation of "as in heaven so on earth" to the previous clause only; or to all three, as above. (2) The derivation and meaning of ἐπιούσιος (see a most interesting discussion by Bp. Lightfoot, Fresh Revision of NT, pp. 195-234, who favours the meaning "for the coming day," but adds, "Thus the familiar rendering 'daily,' which has prevailed uninterruptedly in the Western Ch. from the beginning, is a fairly adequate representation of the original; nor indeed does the English language furnish any one word which would answer the purpose so well"). (3) The meaning of ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. Τὸ πονηρὸν may mean either "evil" or the "the evil one" according to NT use, and either meaning suits the context here. The evident contrast, however, between the clause and what precedes it ("And lead us not into temptation") suggests the naming of the tempter ("the evil one"), and this has the support of both Greek and Latin fathers (Lightfoot, Fresh Revision, App. 2). On the other hand, Luke 6.45 and Rom. 12.9 suggest the neuter. Modern scholars are much divided.

We are not left for long without witness to the regular use of the LP. in the Christian Church.

"Pray ye not," says the Didache, 5. Primitive Use. as "the hypocrites, but as the Lord commanded in His Gospel, so pray ye." Then follows the LP. in the longer (St. Matthew's) form, with the injunction, "Thrice a day in this way pray ye." We cannot but connect this with the daily hours of pr. in the early Church, which were naturally evolved out of the three Jewish hours of pr. (Acts 2.15, 'third'; 10.9, 'sixth'; 3.1, 'ninth'), and are called by Tertullian, "horæ insigniores, apostolicæ" (De Jejun. 10). Thus the earliest references to the use of this pr. do not connect it with the Euch. Service, but rather with private devotion, and the daily offices. Tertullian also speaks of its being a suitable "foundation" on which our other petitions should be built ("præmissa legitima et ordinaria oratione, quasi fundamento, accedentium desideriorum jus est superstruendi extrinsecus petitiones"—Tert., De Oratione 10).

Gregory the Great (Opp. 3.940 f., ed. Ben.), however, mentions a tradition that the only Pr. of Consecr. used by the Apostles at HC was the LP., and undoubtedly the earliest liturgical setting in which we find it is at the close of the Canon or "Prayer of Consecration." Thus Cyril of Jerusalem places it between the Consecr. and the Communion, and Augustine with other fathers give it the same position. The witness of the Liturgies, both Eastern and Western, is almost unanimous in closing the Canon with the LP.; the Clementine Liturgy (Apost. Constit.), that of the Abyssinian Church, and the Pontifical of Serapion being the chief exceptions. This is undoubtedly the use of the LP. which is most characteristic of the earliest Christian service-books, and it was only displaced from this position in the English Ch. by the great structural changes of 1552.

Another liturgical use of the LP. which must be noted is that of serving as a prelude or introduction to a service of pr. Instances of this use are found in the opening of our Communion Office, and in the more definite service of pr. which follows the Creed at Mattins and Evensong. The origin of this may be traced to the words of Tertullian quoted above (cp. canon 23 of the Third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397: "Fuit hoc exemplo Christi, Qui, discipulos docens orare, exordium precatationis ad Patrem direxit"). This use was current among the monastic orders, who were enjoined to say the LP. and Creed before the Hour Offices ("antequam verbum Deus in adiutorium decantent"), a custom followed in 1549, when the LP, formed the introduction to Matins and Evensong, and served as a brief but fitting mode of access to the throne of grace.

7. As a Prelude to Worship.

Passing to the Use of Sarum, which we take as a type of the several mediæval Eng. Uses, we find that in the Missal it held the two positions just named. Its chief use was as the culminating point of the long Pr. of Consecr., where it was introduced by the well-known preface, "Præceptis salutaribus moniti, et divina institutione formati, audemus dicere : Pater Noster." These words of encouragement and appeal are common to Greek, Gallican, and Roman liturgies, were retained in 1549, and were restored in the Scottish PB of 1637. ("As our Saviour Christ hath commanded and taught us, we are bold to say, Our Father.") Such words make the Pr. a simple, trustful pleading of the example and words of Christ, and might well be restored in the new position now assigned to the LP. in our Eng. Office.

8. Its Position in the Missal.

We may here notice another characteristic of the liturgical use of the LP. (chiefly Eastern), namely, the Embolismus, or "insertion" (ἐμβολισμὸς), which followed the recital of the Pr. itself. This was an extension of the Pr., or rather an expansion of the two last clauses before the Doxology. One of singular beauty is found in the Syriac Liturgy of St. James: "Lead us not into temptation which we, being without strength, are not able to bear, but also with the temptation make a way of escape, that we may be able to bear it, and deliver us from evil through Jesus Christ" (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. Coll. 2 39). This method of expanding, or expressing more clearly, certain clauses is more marked in Eastern than in Western Communion Offices, and has found no place in our own.

9. The Embolismus.

The LP. is also found in the Sarum "Ordinary of the Mass" for private use, as part of the priest's preparation before proceeding to the altar ("dum sacerdos induit se sacris vestibus"). It then formed part of a short service consisting of the Veni Creator, the present Coll. for purity (Deus cui omne cor patet), Lesser Lit., Lord's Prayer, and Ave Maria. A main part of Abp. Cranmer's plan was to make the priest's prs., as far as possible, identical with the prs. of the people, and accordingly the LP. and Coll. for purity became, in 1549, the public preparation of priest and people for the Communion Office. This probably accounts for the customary recital of the LP., at the commencement of the service, by the priest alone.

10. In Priest's Preparation for Mass.

In the Breviary the LP. and Ave Maria are enjoined for private use before certain of the Hour Offices, the actual Service

11. In the Breviary and Manual, etc.

commencing (incipiat servitium) after their recital with the Versicles, Dominelabias, etc. Cardinal Quignon, in his short-lived Breviary (1536), made the LP. the opening of the public service, an example followed by Cranmer in 1549.

The public use of the LP. in the Brev. was at the commencement of the definite service of pr. which followed the Pss. and Lessons. This is found in Prime and Compline, on which services our own Matins and Evensong are partly based. Prefaced by the Lesser Lit., and followed by Versicles and Colls., it forms the normal sequence of a service of intercession in the Western Ch., and is retained as such in our own daily services and in most of the occasional offices. Here, once more, it strikes the opening note of pr. and illustrates Tertullian's saying, "Dominica oratio pro fundamento" (see § 5).

The same prefatory character may be assigned to it in the various offices of the Sarum Manual, in nearly all of which the above-named sequence occurs (after the reading of Scripture) :—Lesser Litany, Lord's Prayer (sometimes with Ave Maria and Credo), Versicles, Collects. It is thus found in such services as Marriage, Churning of Women, Visitation of the Sick, Burial, and In Capite Jejuni (Ash-Wednesday); on these our own corresponding services have been largely formed, and accordingly illustrate this use of the Lord's Prayer.

The LP. is also found at the close of the mediæval Litanies, and of the Bidding Prayers ("Bidding the Beeds"), being apparently employed in the former as a comprehensive summary of the petitions that precede it; in the latter as a comprehensive response to the varied appeals for intercession ("Ye shall pray for Christ's Holy Catholic Church, etc.).

In the method of public recital there was a marked difference of use between Eastern and Western Churches. At first it was regarded as "the Prayer of the Faithful," and its public use was restricted to that part of the ancient Liturgies at which only "the faithful" were present (i.e., after the Canon). In the East, the people said the whole pr., to which the priest alone added the Doxology, the people answering Amen. In the West, the priest alone repeated the Pr. secretly, raising his voice at the clause, "And lead us not into temptation," to which the choir responded, "But deliver us from evil," the priest adding Amen.¹ The Doxology was never said in Western Services before the 17th cent. (see § 14). This Western mode of public recital was generally retained in 1549, the people only responding, "But deliver us from evil. Amen"; and it did not disappear until the last revision (see Lit. and Occasional Offices). Thus, in the repeated rubrical direction to the minister to say the LP. "with an audible voice," or "with a loud voice," and to the people to "repeat it with him . . . wherever used in Divine Service," the Reformers were reverting to Eastern and more primitive order.

12. Mode of Recital.

¹ "Dominica Oratio apud Græcos ab omni populo dicitur. apud nos vero a solo sacerdote" (Gregory the Great, Opp. 2 941, Ben.).

We have now before us the lines on which the study of the LP. in the Eng. PB must proceed.

In the Daily Services it serves: (1) 12. Its Position in the PB. Conf. and Absol. as a fitting way of access to our offering of praise and prayer; and (2) as the opening note of that special ministry of intercession which follows the Creed. In the Occasional Offices it also serves the same purpose as a foundation on which to base our prs., the well-known Western sequence being followed. In the HC it again opens the gate of heaven as we approach the Holy Table, and follows the Pr. of Consecr. as in all Liturgies—but with a well-known difference. In 1552 the actual Communion was placed so as to sever the LP. from its old recognised position at the close of the Canon. This is not the place to discuss the altered structure of our Office, but the purpose of the change in 1552 seems clear, namely, to link inseparably the Communion of the people with the Consecr. of the Bread and Wine, the LP. in consequence being slightly moved from its old position, and placed after instead of before the Administration. It should be remembered that at the same date (1552) this pr. was removed to a similar position in Public Bapt., and it holds the same position in the Office of Confirm. In all three cases it ushers in the closing service of thanksgiving and prayer. In the Lit. its position as a closing summary of the long series of petitions is somewhat obscured by Cranmer's addition of various versicles and prs. which hardly belong to the Lit. proper. In the Bidding Pr. it still retains its old position and use. It is singular that the LP. found no place in the mediæval service of Confirm., and was not added in the English service until 1662.

In the PB as a rule, the LP. is either introduced by the Lesser Lit. or followed by the Doxology. In two places it has both these additions—the Churching of Women, and Prs. for those at Sea: at the opening of the HC and in Confirm. neither of these appears. This varied "setting" of the prayer has been guided by no severely applied principle; but, speaking generally, when the Lesser Lit. is used, the tone is that of approach to God in penitence and prayer; on the other hand, when the Doxology follows, an eucharistic note is struck, and the intention is that of thanksgiving and praise. We have seen how the Lesser Lit. is always used in the normal order of a service of pr., while the Doxology is before the Pss. in the Daily Prayers, and added at the euch. close of the service of HC and in the Service of Thanksgiving after childbirth. But there are notable exceptions. We should have expected the Lesser Lit. in its use at the beginning of the Communion Service; and certainly the addition of the Doxology would have been fitting at the close of Public Bapt. The Doxology, however, was not added to the LP. in Western Services until 1637, when it was adopted, in certain places, by the compilers of the Scottish PB. From that interesting but ill-fated book it was introduced into our own services at the last revision, not with perfect consistency, but with the result of adding some brightness to our worship. In any future Revision of our PB these considerations will doubtless receive fuller attention.—D.T.

T. W. DRURY.

LORD'S SUPPER.—"The Supper of the Lord, and the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass," was the title affixed to

1. Alternative Title. the reformed Liturgy in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI (1549). The last four words disappeared from the Second Prayer Book (1552) and have never been revived, not because the term Mass is in itself objectionable, nor because the rite, as now celebrated, was regarded as essentially different from that for which provision was made in the mediæval Missal, but because associations had gathered round its use which it was desirable to break. The word MASS is the least expressive of all the titles used to designate the rite to which it is applied, being simply the English form of the late Latin Missa (Missio), the term which gradually supplanted all others in the Western Church, and is derived, as it is said, from the sentence Ite, missa est, the formula twice repeated with which worshippers were dismissed. It is probable that the dismissal in this case was that of the catechumens after the sermon and before the mysteries were actually celebrated. The Second Prayer Book also altered the portion of the title which it retained, giving us the form adopted by the present book: The Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion. The name Lord's Supper is biblical (1 Cor. 11 20), and, though properly belonging to the Agape, or Love Feast, which had not yet been separated from the hallowing of the Bread and Wine, it was transferred to the permanent institution, the conjunction of which with the Agape was the primary ground of St. Paul's rebuke. The name was well understood and frequently used in ancient times, even if not employed as an official title. It is otherwise with the term Holy Communion, which is derived from the untechnical use of the word "communion" or "fellowship," 1 Cor. 10 16, 17. The word "communion," without the epithet "holy," appears with this reference in writers of the first four centuries, though it is not very common. In the English Church it has become the universally accepted official title, and in the heading of the service it is usually printed in larger characters than the alternative name.¹ Another title found both in the PB and in the Articles is "the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ," which has patristic, though somewhat less primitive, authority. To these must be added the term Eucharist, which, unless "the Breaking of the Bread" in Acts 2 42 be regarded as a title, brings us nearest to apostolic authority, being immediately suggested by such passages as Mt. 26 27, Mk. 14 23, Lk. 22 19, 1 Cor. 11 24, and being found in Ignatius (c. 115 A.D.). The word is not actually found in the PB, but occurs as equivalent to Lord's Supper in the Latin version of the Articles and in the Homily "Of the worthy receiving, etc."

¹ "The Communion" is used in the PB nearly as often as "Holy Communion" and is the running headline of pages. A common name for the PB was "The Communion Book."

While Communion exhibits the rite as an act of fellowship, Eucharist expresses its character as a thanksgiving. The PB expressions, "Lord's Table" and "Holy Mysteries," though scarcely titles, are alike ancient. The latter is borrowed from such rites as those practised at Eleusis and elsewhere in the Hellenic world, and is especially characteristic of those ages which guarded the "open secret" of the Eucharist from those who had not been initiated by Baptism.

The institution itself must be considered apart from the associations inseparable from the names by which it came to be known. What Christ established in the community of His disciples was a sacred ceremony, the most obvious characteristics of which are those of a common meal preceded by an act of thanksgiving pronounced over the food subsequently shared. The nature of the thanksgiving we are nowhere told, though conjectures based upon known forms of Hebrew benediction have been suggested (see Dr. Beeching's Bible Doctrine of the Sacraments, Lect. IV; cp. Didache 9, 10). Viewing the narrative as it stands, with reference only to the universal analogy of the common meal, communion or fellowship would appear to be, not only a prominent aspect, but the fundamental idea. The Euch., as celebrated by Christ Himself at the Last Supper and as committed by Him to His apostles, was the solemn realisation of that corporate unity which joined in one body the band of brothers who looked to Jesus as House-father and Master of the Feast. Whatever fellowship in Christ involves, that is expressed, concentrated and conveyed, though not exhausted, by an act at once natural, social and religious. That the principle of this unity is common participation not only of what Christ gives but of Christ Himself, through essential union with His own personal life, arises out of the words with which He accompanies the invitations to eat and to drink, "This is my body," "This is my blood." "Then we spiritually eat the flesh of Christ and drink His blood . . . we are one with Christ and Christ with us" is the language of the 3rd Exhortation.

2. Fellowship
the
Primary Idea.

But we can only proceed further in the elucidation of the rite by interpreting its meaning against the background of our Lord's teaching and the circumstances and context of the institution. The method of attempting to arrive at a result by a minute and rigorous examination of the terms employed, taken in isolation from their milieu, is irrelevant and indecisive. It is indecisive, because the meaning of a phrase like "this is my body" can only be interpreted in its context, apart from which it may mean anything from a rhetorical figure to a physical fact. It is irrelevant, because there is nothing in common between the realisation of corporate fellowship with Christ through the participation of the congregation in a common meal, and the presence or absence of Christ under the forms of bread and wine. The latter question only obtains an interest, as history proves, for those who are concerned to affirm or to deny the localisation of the Presence of Christ otherwise than in and through the mystical community of His disciples. There would appear to have been a rabbinic doctrine concerning Messiah as the food of his people which may contain the germ of the teaching of Jesus Christ based in the Fourth Gospel on the Feeding of the Five thousand. What is there said of Christ as the Bread of Life has no doubt a close relation to the subsequent institution of the Eucharist. The language of Jesus is not satisfactorily explained as indicating the assimilation of His words or teaching. For it is recognised as a hard saying, involving the loss of many disciples, which would not have been the case if the words were merely a rhetorical figure.

The clue to the utterance, not at the time fully intelligible even to those who remained faithful to their Master, is to be sought in the division of the Bread of Life into flesh and blood. This would convey to Hebrew ears, as Westcott points out, the notion of sacrifice, and involved the death of the victim (Westcott's St. John, note on 6 53). Messiah was to die, and through vital and intimate union with His sacrifice, in a manner which only the consummation of that sacrifice would disclose, His followers were to have spiritual life in themselves. That the Eucharist is intimately related to the cross is attested not only by the immediate circumstances of its institution, but also by the designation of the Cup as "my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many." Fellowship with Christ in and through His Sacrifice is exhibited in the very form of the rite, and that this spiritual union was really effected was attested in the experience of the Christian community. Apart from this testimony of the Spirit, it could never have been determined whether the symbols were intended "verily and indeed" to convey, or merely to represent, the merits of the Passion. St. Paul, from the terms of the institution which set forth the Bread and the Cup as joint memorials of Christ in His sacrificial covenant, argues that its celebration is a proclamation of the Lord's Death, and appeals to the experience of the Corinthians when he asks whether he is not right in describing the reception of the elements as a fellowship in the Body and Blood of Christ. [Cp. BODY, § 14.]

4. Relation to the Cross.

The analogy which he establishes between the Table of the Lord and the table of demons, by which he means the food of the pagan sacrifices, brings out clearly the essentially sacrificial character of the Eucharist,¹ as food consecrated or dedicated to God in order that through it the final end of sacrifice may be achieved, namely, communion with God. This aspect is still further developed and defined by the Paschal associations of the rite. It has been thought that the

¹ See further, § 9 below, and SACRIFICE.

Last Supper was not in any sense of the word a Paschal celebration (see Beeching's Bible Doctrine of the Sacraments, Lect. IV). But, while it is probable that the Fourth Gospel rightly represents our Lord as dying at the hour when the passover lambs were killed, and that in consequence He was recognised as "the very Paschal Lamb" (Jn. 19 36), this very circumstance, no less than the primitive view of the Euch. as the Christian Passover, and the intimate relation which, as we have seen, it bears to the Cross, makes it probable that the phrase "for a memorial of Me," which occurs in St. Paul's tradition of the institution, is charged with a meaning more solemn than that of ordinary remembrance, and legitimately gave rise to the conception of the Sacrament as carrying the associations of worshipful commemoration attached to the memorials of Hebrew ritual and service, of which the Passover was a conspicuous instance, and made the Eucharistic Feast a "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving" for "the sacrifice of the death of Christ" and "the benefits which we receive thereby."

It must, however, be borne in mind that the Euch. was not in its origin a liturgical rite, that it was left to Christians them-

6. A Caution. selves to discover that its celebration satisfied the ends which a prescribed ceremonial of worship is intended to serve, and that there is no authority either in Scripture or in the primitive church for requiring any view of its implications as a test of membership. Such definitions retard rather than promote that free action of the Christian spirit which, as spiritual perception grows, can detect new glories in its comprehensive simplicity.

If, as is now generally supposed, the narrative of Luke has been interpolated from the Pauline version of the institution, there is nothing in the Synoptic tradition to indicate that the Lord's Supper, as celebrated in the Christian Ch., was based, like Baptism, upon a positive command of Christ. But the fact of its immediate adoption in the primitive community as the characteristic bond of the common life makes it obvious that it was so regarded by the apostles themselves; and the prominence given by all three evangelists to the initial celebration, and to the actions which accompanied the delivery of the Bread and the Cup to those who in the first instance received them from the Lord Himself, leaves no doubt as to the reason why this incident of the Last Supper is singled out for special record. Its omission in the Fourth Gospel, which is similarly silent on the institution of Christian Baptism, arises out of the purpose of the writer, who aims at exhibiting not the origins of the Christian system, which were sufficiently recognised, but the spiritual principles manifested in the Person and Work of its Author. If no mention is made of either Sacrament, the divine truths which they severally embody are clearly indicated (Jn. 3 and 6).

7. Authority for Observance.

St. Paul leaves no doubt that the Eucharist, as he had "received" it, rested on the authority of Christ Himself (1 Cor. 11 23-26). The Twelve were present in the upper room as representatives of all those that should believe on Christ through their word (cp. Jn. 17 20), and not only they, but the whole body of the faithful, were to eat and drink "often" till the Lord should return (1 Cor. 11 26).

It is clear that St. Paul himself had established the rite in the Corinthian Church, as in all the communities of which he was the spiritual father, and that he regarded it as part of his apostolic commission so to do. For in describing the delivery of the rite to the Corinthian Christians he uses the same form of words in which he expresses the proclamation of the Gospel itself (cp. 1 Cor. 11 23 and 15 3). It has been supposed that a supernatural revelation of the facts is here intended. This, however, is unnecessary in either case and is not consistent with the method of spiritual enlightenment. It is sufficient to understand that the vision of the living and exalted Nazarene illuminated for him, as did the post-resurrection appearances for the Eleven, events which would otherwise have had no evangelical significance. A prominent feature in St. Paul's apprehension of the Gospel was the intimate relation in which the Eucharist stood towards it. The radiance of one vivid experience encircled both.

The channel along which the spiritual teaching of the NT passed into the gross and rationalistic conceptions of the Middle

8. Through Mysticism to Medievalism.

Ages is the mysticism of the second century. That phase of Mysticism was the twilight between the heavenly glory of Apostolic times and the light of common day in which the popular mind of Mediæval and Western Europe viewed the doctrines of Christianity. On the one side it has affinities with the spiritual, on the other with the sensuous. When Ignatius calls himself Theophoros, or "God-bearer," his ideas seem to oscillate between the experience of St. Paul, when he declares "Christ liveth in me," and an almost physical conception of incorporation with Christ. His conception of the Incarnation has the same shade of difference from apostolic teaching, an exaggerated emphasis, in opposition to Gnostic heresies, on the physical as distinguished from the personal manifestation of the Son, the trend of thought that issues in Eutychanism. From this follows eucharistic phraseology which seems to recognise no distinction between the sacramental body and the natural flesh of our Lord: "The eucharist is the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which flesh suffered for our sins" (Smyrn. 6¹). Justin Martyr (c. 155) in a celebrated passage (I Apol. 65-67) develops this language. That he, too, is dealing with mystical ideas is apparent from his reference to the analogy of the rites of Mithra. But he advances something like a theory of the process: "Jesus Christ our Saviour became flesh;" on the eucharistic food "our flesh and blood are nourished by conversion." The mean between these two propositions would appear to be the identification "by conversion" of the flesh and blood which our Lord became with the hallowed bread and wine: "So also were we taught that the food over which thanks are given . . . is both flesh and blood of that Jesus who became flesh." This is substantially the mystical doctrine of the East concerning the transformation of the elements, which is sometimes considered as identical with the Latin doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

¹ On the other hand in Trall. 8 he speaks of "faith which is the flesh of the Lord" and "love which is the blood of Jesus Christ," and in Philadelph. 5 of the Gospel as "the flesh of Jesus."

This, however, is probably not entirely accurate.¹ Transubstantiation, as held by Western Christians to whom mysticism was not congenial, arises out of the adoption of language which came to be interpreted with the baldest literalism. And, further, the exigencies of popular accommodation seemed to demand the absolute identification of visible symbols with spiritual realities, if the latter were not to be lost to an unimaginative and pagan intelligence. The delicate nuances of devotional language were beyond the concrete minds of the peasantry of the West. Thus, as the centuries advanced, the mystery of the altar grew into a miracle whereby the elements became the natural flesh and blood of Christ, till in 1059 Berengar, who had thrown doubts on the popular teaching, was compelled by Pope Nicholas II to sign a retraction, which asserted that "the true Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ" were "in truth handled and broken by the hands of the Priest, and ground by the teeth of the faithful." This doctrine represents the crudest form which was assumed by the teaching of the Latin Church, and the definitions alike of scholastic theologians and of the Council of Trent are an attempt to express the doctrine in terms more agreeable to reason.

Intimately bound up with this development of the doctrine of the Presence is the evolution of the conception of sacrifice as applied to the Euch. The language of the NT, as noted above, sufficiently brings the rite within the circle of sacrificial ideas, so that fellowship in the Lord's Supper may be recognised as a legitimate realisation of that "altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle" (Heb. 13 10). But the ancient sacrifices of living beings included not only the immolation of the victim and its solemn surrender upon the altar which the Epistle to the Hebrews regards as satisfied for ever by the Death of Christ, but also the concurrent presentation of oblations as a material embodiment of that "sacrifice of praise" which Christians, like the Israelites, are to offer to God continually through Jesus. Whether a solemn presentation was suggested by the form of Christ's own thanksgiving it is not possible to determine. But from the second century what is known as the Oblation of the Elements had its place in the Liturgies and is recognised in patristic teaching. Thus Justin Martyr speaks of a thanksgiving as offered "for these gifts," when the Bread and the Cup are placed upon the board (cp. Iren., Contr. Hæres. iv. 17, 18). To this was naturally added: (1) the oblation of "ourselves, our souls and bodies," of which food is the symbolic expression and which is necessarily involved in communion with Christ's sacrifice, and (2) the presentation of thanksgivings, supplications and prayers on behalf of all men who are either actually or potentially associated with the worshippers in the fellowship of His body. Commemoration of the departed (3) followed almost as a matter of course as those who had been included, some of the more distinguished by name, in the prayers of the congregation passed into the invisible fellowship of "the spirits of just men made perfect" in the "general assembly and church of the firstborn" of which the visible Church was a part. And lastly (4), the memorial of the passion, which is implicit in the institution and connects each celebration of the Euch. with the action of Christ "in the same night that He was betrayed," was seen to have affinities with the solemn memorials of the Mosaic Law. It was thus that all the prayers and oblations were gathered up and presented to God through Him who is "the High-priest of our offerings" (Clem. Rom., Ad Cor. 36).

The fact which led to developments inconsistent with the primary meaning of the Euch. was the gradual lapse from weekly communion on the part of the great majority of Christians.

This led to the consolidation of the oblation of the elements, the prayers and intercessions, the commemoration of the departed, and the memorial of the passion, into a sacrificial rite, of which the analogy is those forms of burnt offering from which the communion of the offerer with God through participation in the offering, declared by Robertson Smith (Religion of the Semites, Lect. XI) to be the final end or consummation of all sacrifice, had disappeared. The identification of the symbolic elements with the natural Flesh and Blood of Christ assisted this transformation, by seeming to provide an actual, present victim (host) correlative to the spoken memorial as the bread and wine was correlative to the first thanksgiving. Thus the Church succumbed to what appeared the practical necessity of securing the attendance at the Euch. of those who refused frequent communion, by dissociating the sacrificial idea from the reception, and by elevating aspects and accessories of the communion into what was virtually a substantial and independent rite. While through all changes reception in both kinds on the part of the celebrant himself remained an integral portion of the office, the emphasis was shifted to the act of consecration, as though the sacring of the Mass were not the introduction to communion but the consummation of the office. Communion became one of many consequences of consecration, which included Reservation for purposes of worship, Procession of the Blessed Sacrament, and (later) Benediction. All such practices stand or fall with the idea, which the terms of the institution do not warrant, that the object of the consecration is, not to communicate the merits and risen life of an already present Christ to the congregation, but to make Christ present.

¹ M. Khomiakoff, in his Essay on the Church given in Birkbeck's Russia and the English Church, says: "Concerning the Sacrament of the Eucharist the Holy Church teaches that in it the change of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ is verily accomplished. She does not reject the word Transubstantiation: but she does not assign to it that material meaning which is assigned to it by the teachers of the Churches which have fallen away."

Thus in the imagination and current teaching of mediæval Europe each "new sacrifice"

11. "The Sacrifices of Masses." of the Lord's Supper or Mass, an idea not in itself open to objection, became a repetition of the sacrifice of Calvary, availing for the actual sins of men, as the Cross availed for the remission of original guilt (see Article 2). The development of the doctrine of Purgatory, and the claim of the Church to benefit by its prayers the souls there enduring the temporal punishment of sins (see PURGATORY), led to a still further extension of the purposes of the Mass to include intercession for the departed, and this ultimately became the dominant conception. The multiplication of altars in cathedrals and other churches was to some extent the result of legitimate causes, as for instance the foundation and endowment of chapels by trade guilds and other societies; but the establishment of "chauntries for soules" also played a conspicuous part, until the leading ideas of the primitive Eucharist were almost entirely swallowed up in those of "the sacrifices of masses."

Reformation began with the teaching of the Schoolmen, notably in the 13th century Thomas Aquinas. The doctrine,

12. Thomist and Lutheran Theories. which Berengar had been compelled to sign, was felt to be gross, unintelligent, and contrary to experience. With the aid of terminology borrowed from the realist philosophy these writers maintained that the substance of bread and wine ceased to be (a theory explicitly denied by earlier theologians, e.g., Pope Gelasius, A.D. 492), and that the substance or reality of the Body and Blood took its place, while the accidents or appearance of bread and wine remained. This is what is properly known as Transubstantiation. Wyclif (1380) attacked this view, which had become the official teaching, as contrary to Scripture, but retained a theory of the real presence as contained in the Host.¹ Luther, in spite of the new appeal to Scripture, was content to repeat essentially the scholastic doctrine, rejecting only the theory of a substantial change as involving a deception of the senses, and maintaining a commixture of the substance of the Body and Blood with the substance of bread and wine (Consubstantiation). Thus he continued to follow the lines of scholastic explanation, while his refusal to identify the Sacrament with the thing signified saved him from the practical inferences of the Roman theory. Most reformers rejected the Lutheran assumption, gratuitous if the deductions of papal practice were to be disallowed, and unnecessary as the condition of participation in a gift "under the form" (theologians like Ridley did not object to the phrase if properly guarded¹) of the sacramental elements. Most, if not all of them (see Hooker, EP v. 67 § 9, on the doctrine of "the Sacramentaries," i.e., the Zwinglians), held that Christ was not only truly present at the Eucharist but that He imparted to believers the gift of His Body and Blood through reception of the bread and wine. But to Cranmer and the controversialists of the 16th century "Real Presence" meant the material presence of Christ effected in consequence of the conversion of the species into His natural Body by the act of consecration. This teaching covers not only the precise definitions of Trent or the received scholastic explanation, but any view which in effect localises Christ within the elements in such a way that for practical purposes they are identified. Hooker did not refuse the phrase as interpreting the gift imparted to the worthy receiver (EP v. 67 § 6). And, similarly, most of the language of the mediæval divines is patent of a sense not inconsistent with the principles upon which the rite was founded. But, when matters have come to this pass, it is clear that something in the nature of a new start is required, if the genuine doctrine of the Eucharist is to be extricated from a web of false associations. The vice of the whole scholastic theory is the substitution of theological inference for spiritual experience.

The return to a healthier atmosphere was made by the Ch. of Eng. when the reformed

13. Anglican Restatement. PB and the Articles substituted the words of the NT for the technicalities of the Schoolmen in describing the inward meaning of the Eucharist. "The Bread which we break is a partaking of the Body of Christ . . . the Cup of Blessing . . . a partaking of the Blood" (1 Cor. 10 16). The Cat. describes the outward part as "Bread and Wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received" (= the reception by the Lord's command of Bread and Wine). Christ did not say "This is my body," but "Take ye; this is my body" (Mk. 14 22). The language of the third Exh. is again that of the NT: "Then we spiritually eat the flesh of Christ and drink His blood, then we dwell in Christ, and Christ in us" (cp. Jn. 17 23, 26). This does not mean that the reality is nothing but an inner state of feeling, suggested by the outward symbolism, but that the divine gift communicated through the Sacrament is recognised in personal, spiritual experience. The merit of the reformed teaching is not the adequacy of the language to express all that the common experience of the Ch. contains, but the recovery of the appropriate method for correlating that experience so as not to depart from the purpose of the Institution. It seizes the fundamental idea of communion, personal and spiritual relations with the Son of God through sharing His crucified and risen Life. It leaves room for the recovery of the thought of fellowship one with another in the Body of Christ, which is essential to that of fellowship with Christ in the teaching of St. Paul and of St. John, but which the growth of a materialistic conception of the Presence had obscured. It opens the way for the restoration in due course and in their true relations of those aspects of sacrifice, intercession, and commemoration of the faithful departed, which had been so exaggerated and perverted out of all proper proportion to the central idea, that the Reformers themselves, though they recognised each of them, could hardly be expected to realise them for themselves or to present them to others with their proper richness, but which Anglican theology in the Caroline and subsequent epochs has re-established on a sound basis.

¹ See Creighton's Papacy, vol. 1, c. 2, pp. 123-4.

¹ See Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, c. 22, § 7 n.

To emphasise communion, as the English PB does, is not to suppress the Eucharistic Sacrifice, but to reaffirm it on the only grounds that are not illusory, by linking it with the Cross as the sacramental presentation of that union with the sacrifice of Calvary on the part of "the comers thereunto," which a comprehensive view of sacrifice, as given in the comparative study of religion, reveals as its final end (see Robertson Smith, l.c.). It is common, but not wholly accurate, to describe the commemoration of the Death of Christ made at the Eucharist as pleading the passion, and therefore as in some sense an offering or re-presentation of His Sacrifice. This, however, is to throw the weight of the service on an action which, though an inseparable accident of the rite, is not its essential heart. But, if the communion of the Ch., and of its individual members, with the Body of Christ, "not as now it is, but as then it was" (Bp. Andrewes) when He gave It in sacrifice for the sins of the world, be an act of identification with, or of incorporation into, that oblation, the Euch. at once becomes an effective part of Calvary, without being in any sense a repetition of it. The modern conception, which endeavours to avoid the extravagances of mediæval doctrine by representing the Godward action in the Euch. as concomitant with a continuation of the Passion which Christ is accomplishing in heaven through the presentation of the Blood, is based on a misunderstanding of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the fixed point of which is not the heavenly intercession but the Cross itself. Christ is there said to have once entered into the Holiest through, not with, His blood, and as now sitting at God's right hand (Heb. 9 12). The theologians of the Middle Ages were right in perceiving that the Death of Christ was the central idea of the Eucharist, they were wrong in misrepresenting its relation to the Cross. The proper "great oblation" of the liturgy is that true participation in the Body and Blood which covers all our offerings of worship, intercession and service, by making the Lord's Supper not a formal but a living remembrance of "the sacrifice of the Death of Christ." In this large sense, which is consistent with OT usage (Ex. 34 25, 1 Sam. 16 2, 5, 11, Zeph. 1 7) and the witness of Comparative Religion, it is quite congenial to PB language and teaching to use the phrase "the Eucharistic Sacrifice," but it does not occur in official Anglican documents.¹

The limitations of Anglican teaching on the subject of the Eucharist are not closely drawn.

Only one type is definitely rejected as contrary to Scripture, namely, that which arises out of, or involves, the Tridentine doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. It may, however, be properly urged that, inasmuch as the 28th Article asserts that "the Supper of the Lord is not only a sign," any exposition of the meaning of the Sacrament which, in the words of the 15th Homily of the 2nd Book, treats it as an "untrue figure of a thing absent" is contrary to the mind of the Ch. of Eng. But it is not easy to prove that any Christians who retain the rite entirely deny the spiritual grace (see Hooker on the Zwinglians, as cited above). On the other hand, the positive teaching which has always been maintained among English divines, who cite with approval, to use once more the language of the official Homily, such expressions of "the ancient catholic Fathers" as "the salve of immortality and sovereign preservative against ¹ The Archbishops, in their reply to the Papal Bull on Anglican Orders, described the Eucharistic Sacrifice as taught in the Church of England as follows: "We truly teach the doctrine of Eucharistic Sacrifice, and do not believe it (the Eucharist) to be 'a nude commemoration of the sacrifice of the Cross' . . . But we think it sufficient in the Liturgy which we use . . . while lifting up our hearts to the Lord, and when now consecrating the gifts already offered that they may become to us the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, to signify the sacrifice which is offered at that point of the service in such terms as these. We continue a perpetual memory of the precious death of Christ, who is our advocate with the Father and the propitiation for our sins, according to His precept, until His coming again. For first we offer the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; then next we plead and represent before the Father the sacrifice of the Cross, and by it we confidently entreat remission of sins and all other benefits of the Lord's passion for all the whole Church; and lastly we offer the sacrifice of ourselves to the Creator of all things, which we have already signified by the oblations of His creatures. This whole action, in which the people has necessarily to take its part with the priest, we are accustomed to call the Eucharistic Sacrifice." These sentences are tedious and indeterminate, and fail to touch the point at issue, viz., what is the divinely given "covering" of this series of oblations and pleadings. The Roman answer is, the immolation of Christ for the Church as a victim in the act of consecration. The Anglican answer ought to be, the fellowship of the Church with the Body and Blood once offered upon the Cross through participation in the consecrated elements. Roman doctrine first narrows the conception of sacrifice and then invents an illusory oblation to satisfy it.

death," "a deifical communion," "the conservatory to everlasting life," by which they describe the Supper, would cover that more advanced type of thought and feeling in reference to the Holy Mysteries, which only became pagan and anti-scriptural when a later and uncritical age crystallised into dogma the unmeasured utterances of devotional fervour. While it is not only possible but necessary to define the Church's faith concerning the true Deity of Jesus Christ as the confession on which entrance is gained to the fellowship of believers, it is unwarrantable to anticipate the spiritual experience of those who exercise their right as believers to participate in the common Eucharistic meal by imposing, as a test of admission to the Lord's Table, any narrower definition of the inward part or thing signified than is given in the Catechism. The Euch. is an institution, not a doctrine; a matter of practice, not of faith. Belief in Christ is the one condition of the reception of either Sacrament. The formula attributed to Queen Elizabeth—

"Christ was the Word that spake it,
He took the bread and brake it,
And what that word did make it
That I believe and take it"— though wholly inadequate as an expression of the collective experience whether of the Eng. Ch. or of Christendom at large, is sufficient as a basis of common action. The pledge of a general conformity to the spirit of the Eng. Ch., as expressed on the one hand in its formularies, and on the other in the writings of representative theologians, must be sought in those practical regulations, which, while they forbid the use of the consecrated Bread and Wine for any purpose other than Communion, are scrupulous in their efforts to secure reverence for the sacred Elements.—HD. J. G. SIMPSON.

LORD'S TABLE.—The Holy Table has been called both Table and Altar alike in early times, in the Middle Ages, and since the

1. Name. Reformation. The word ALTAR is not in the present PB because the 16th cent. Reformers wished to emphasise the then neglected aspect of the Euch. as the Communion Service. But it occurs in the CORONATION Service, in the SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE, in the AMERICAN PB (Institution of Ministers), and in the writings of numerous and representative Anglican theologians; also in the First PB, which the Act enforcing the Second PB called "a very godly order." Scudamore (Notis Euch., 2nd ed., p. 98) points out that "the whole Primitive Ch., to which the English Reformers professed implicit deference, as the only trustworthy witness to the sense of Holy Writ, spoke constantly and with one voice of the Holy Table as an Altar." He believes that in the literary remains of the first three cents. the name Table occurs but once,¹ but that from the 4th cent. it became more common, until at length we find it preferred in the East, the word Altar in the West. In the East at the present day the word used is Holy Table, and the place whereon it stands is called the Altar. The word Table has all along been retained in the Latin rites, although Altar has long superseded it in common use. It was laid down in the 7th canon of 1640 that the LT. "is and may be called an Altar by us in that sense in which the Primitive Ch. called it an altar, and in no other."

Wood seems to have been the general, or at least the common, material in the earliest times, and is referred to by Athanasius,

2. Material. Optatus, Augustine and others, though in the 5th cent., if not earlier, stone was also in use. Since the Council of Epaone in 517 decreed that none but stone altars be consecrated, stone became increasingly the rule in the West. In mediæval times, as under the Roman obedience to-day, the law required stone, or at least the use of a consecrated stone super-altar, i.e., a small slab large enough to hold the host and the greater part of the chalice. But wooden altars long survived in places; St. Wulfstan, Bp. of Worcester c. 1080, is said to have replaced all wooden altars by stone ones throughout his diocese, and wood seems to have been in common use in Ireland in 1186. As late as the 13th cent. the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London, enquired of the visitation of their chs. in Essex and Herts, whether the altars were made of stone and duly consecrated. In the East there is less uniformity as to the material of the Holy Table: in some districts stone is more common, sometimes metal is used, but it is said that the most usual material is wood. In Eng. there was a universal return to wood at the Reformation, nearly all the old stone altars being destroyed; but stone has sometimes been used since, in both the 17th and 18th cents., not infrequently in combination with a wooden or metal frame. The notion that the LT. must be of wood is comparatively modern and is chiefly due to the decisions of the civil courts in the cases of Faulkner v. Litchfield (1845) and Liddell v. Beal (1857), which are difficult to understand, as there was no eccles. law on the subject of the material the LT. being called an Altar, though passages in the NT (Matt. 5 23, 24, Heb. 13 10), Ignatius (Eph. 5, Trall. 7, Philad. 4), and Irenæus (Contr. Hæres. iv. 8 3, iv. 18 6), have been sometimes so interpreted. (b) Lord's Table is now and then used of the Euch. feast—so 1 Cor. 10 21, and occasionally Origen (e.g., Esk. Martyr. 40) but usually with reference to the passage in 1 Cor. (c) There are two instances of the use of the word Table to signify the structure on which the Euch. is celebrated, both in Dionysius of Alexandria, c. 260 ("Table," Ep. 9, apud Eusebius, H.E. vii. 94—the passage referred to by Scudamore; "Holy Table," Ep. Canon., canon 2). (d) The evidence is scanty, but, so far as it goes, it seems to show that Greek-speaking Christians were, from the very beginning, and not merely from the 4th cent., wont to speak of the Table rather than the Altar; did we possess more of 3rd cent. Greek epistolary literature, we should probably find this conclusion confirmed.

On the other hand, Altar is (with one doubtful exception, De Aleator. 11) the regular name for the LT. in Latin Christian writers of the 2nd and 3rd cents. This difference never roused any controversy between East and West, and appears to have been thought a matter of no importance.—J. W. T.]

¹ [Scudamore has made a mistake here. The facts, so far as Greek Christian literature of the first three cents. is concerned, seem to be the following. (a) There is no certain instance of

of the altar, the only requirement being its movableness, and in practice several immovable altars had been erected without question. The canons of 1571, which never received the royal assent, required the Communion table to be ex asseribus composita juncta; but in 1638 Bp. Mountague in Visitation Arts. inquired, "Is your Communion Table, or Altar, of stone, wainscot, joiner's work, strong, fair and decent?" In Scotland and America stone altars are exceedingly common. Lutheran chs. frequently retain the mediæval stone altars, and Scottish Established Presbyterians sometimes have stone communion tables.

Great insistence seems to have been laid in primitive times upon the then universal custom of having but one altar in each ch.,

2. Number. a rule still adhered to throughout the East, and in the West at Milan till not so very long ago. A second altar in the East, where one exists, is always in an entirely separate CHAPEL. Even the numerous side or low altars of the mediæval West were usually in screen-enclosed chapels. Latterly, the exceptions to this rule increased: altars were erected on the nave-side of rood-screens, and in more recent times on the Continent the Roman dislike of screens has led to altars being set almost anywhere in the ch., regardless of orientation and with little to suggest either mystery or reverence. Most wisely, Eng. Chancellors usually refuse faculties for second altars except they be in separate chapels as of old—a rule which forms a valuable link with primitive and Eastern practice, and which it is to be hoped will never be relaxed.

The older Didascalia (3rd cent.), the Testament of our Lord and the Apostolic Constitutions (4th cent.), and the later Church Orders

4 Church Orders. derived from the last, expressly describe the celebrant as having his back to the people. The East Syrians, or Nestorians, the most conservative of all Easterns, invariably have their altars built into the east walls of the churches. Hence it is by no means certain that in the earliest days of the Church the LT. was accessible on all sides, or that the celebrant faced the people. In the basilican practice, which we find in existence after the peace of the Ch., the LT. stood in the chord of the apse, with the bishop's throne and the seats for the clergy around the wall behind it, as is still the case in the Orthodox East. In certain cases, particularly in Italy, and specially where the apse was at the west end of the church, the celebrant faced the people across the altar. The basilican arrangement appears to have been generally followed in the West from the 4th cent. to the 9th, and in many places much later, although it is not clear to what extent this was due to Roman missionaries, as there is Celtic evidence which seems to point another way.

In the early Middle Ages the bodies of saints began in the West to be placed in elevated shrines immediately behind the altar, the end of the SHRINE forming a kind of REREDOS.

Thereafter, especially in smaller chs. and those without apses, the altar came to be set against the east wall, a change which, together with the growth of the reredos, Mr. Edmund Bishop traces to the introduction of the great shrines just referred to. It is not clear that this explanation holds good in every case, for there are early square-ended chs. in Celtic districts with remains of altars against the east wall, which probably represent a tradition older than, and separate from, any that arose from the shrines. The primitive LT. was foursquare, as it still is in the Oriental chs., and it stood beneath a large canopy, called a ciborium, resting on pillars between which hung curtains which were drawn during the more solemn parts of the service. The seats for the clergy were round the apse behind, that of the bp. being in the centre. The altar was frequently built over the grave of a martyr, and it was not till the 9th and 10th cents. that the custom arose in Transalpine districts of elevating the body of a saint in a costly raised shrine behind the altar. The development of Gothic ARCHITECTURE and the changes in the plan of Transalpine chs., connected largely with provision for monastic choirs, so far changed the arrangement that the ciborium was very greatly modified, or one might almost say broken up into its component parts. The Euch. had of old been suspended beneath the ciborium (where an AUMBRY in the wall was not in use), and, in districts such as Eng. and the North of France where the hanging PVX survived, the canopy frequently remained in a modified form, such as a little silken tent (Lat. tabernaculum) or a flat tester. The ciborium-pillars became thin, and were unconnected with any such survival of the canopy, or frequently they disappeared. The north and south curtains still remained close to the ends of the altar, the western curtain disappearing or surviving only in the changed form of the Lenten VEIL. Latterly, the altar was elongated from north to south, sometimes very considerably, esp. in Eng.; and, later still, the end curtains, or riddels as they are sometimes called, disappeared, particularly in Teutonic parts of the Continent where large triptych reredoses were used, and in Spain where the altar stood beneath a great screen covered with imagery. In the average Eng. parish ch. in later mediæval times the altar was very long, with curtains close to each end at right angles to the East wall, and a low reredos (or upper frontal) filling the space between the mensa and the base of the large window which was the chief decorative feature of the east end, and formed what, in popular, though inaccurate, language, might be described as a large reredos of painted glass.

5. Position and Arrangement.

At the Reformation wooden Ts. were substituted for those of stone, at first without regular Ch. authority. Inventories of Edward VI's time show that under the First PB these Ts. were frequently ornamented exactly as the old stone altars had been, while in some places, under the influence of the more extreme Continental type of Reformers, they appear to have been arranged with seats all round for the communicants. This was afterwards the practice of a strong section of the Puritans, and occasional examples have survived from a later period to the present day. But the more common Elizabethan practice was to move the LT. into the middle of the choir for the Euch., the celebrant standing at its NORTH SIDE as placed lengthwise for the occasion; at other times it remained in its ancient place. During the 17th cent. it became customary to leave it there at all services and to adorn it in the old way. Seventeenth cent. altars often approach the foursquare type, perhaps in imitation of Primitive and Eastern practice and as a protest against the long Ts. on trestles set up by the Puritans, who sat at each side of them (as was also the case among Scottish Presbyterians till well on in the 19th cent.). While it is not clear that the words "north side" in the rubric before the Communion Service did not originally mean, or at least include, the north side of the west face of the T., it is certain that they were taken literally when the Ts. were brought down into the chancel, and that they were afterwards interpreted as meaning "north end" when the Ts. were allowed to remain once more against the east wall. In the Lincoln Judgment the late Dr. Benson, Abp. of Canterbury, gave reasons for believing that the EASTWARD POSITION also had occasionally survived.

The altar has, from primitive times, almost always been kept covered, generally with silken or other rich materials. In addition to, or instead of, these, one or more linen cloths were, in the West, placed upon the mensa; indeed, mediæval Canon Law, of Roman origin, required three of these in mass-time. The altar itself, while sometimes of costly material, was oftener a plain structure (it seems to have been universally so in England); in either case, not merely the top, but also the lower part, was covered in service time by a hanging (or frontal), generally but not always of a textile material. This at one time (e.g., 13th cent.) hung loose, at another gathered (often in 14th cent.); later, it hung flat, as most frontals do now. In the 17th and 18th cents. there was a partial return to the looser forms of covering. After the Reformation the LT. was often elaborately carved, but it was almost always kept covered, except by the Puritans. Canon 82 of 1604 requires it to be covered in time of divine service by (1) "a carpet of silk or other decent stuff," and (2) "a fair linen cloth at the time of the Ministration" (see CARPET and FAIR LINEN CLOTH). On the Continent during the 17th cent., esp. in France, the idea seemed to grow up that an altar of very rich material need not have a frontal. The destruction that went on in France at the time of the Revolution and the laziness of sacristans combined to extend this licence to any altar with a decorated front, till naked altar-fronts have become the rule, not only in France but in chs. of the Roman obedience here and in America, notwithstanding the rubrics of the Missal. Unfortunately, this has lately been rather widely copied in certain Ang. dioceses. In the Orthodox East the holy T. is always covered by frontals on all four sides.

29—(2422)

In the early Ch. the LT. was looked on as too sacred for anything to be placed upon it save the holy vessels and the book of the Gospels, LIGHTS and other ornaments being attached to the ciborium or otherwise placed round about. In the Middle Ages it became usual to place one or two candlesticks (rarely more), the cross and reliquaries upon the altar; and on Festivals rich plate was used to deck it, as is still done in conservative chs. (e.g., at a Coronation in Westminster Abbey). Flowers in vases, common and popular though they be at the present day, have strictly no authority for us, and seem to be first met with in a Roman book at the end of the 16th cent. The two lights, the epistle and gospel books set upright against the reredos, the service-book on its cushion, the display of plate on great occasions, are all ancient ornaments, widely spread in the Ch., which have been handed down in the Ch. of Eng. continuously. It should be added that the form of linen cloth covering the front as well as the ends of the LT. is not of Post-Reformation introduction, but equally ancient and widespread with the other kind, which only covers the top and ends. Shelves or GRADINES to hold the ornaments behind the altar are very modern; on the Continent they came into occasional use about the time of the Reformation, and were used in one or two cases in Eng. in the 18th cent., but did not become common till the second half of the 19th, and are now again going out of use. They are out of keeping with a Gothic ch., and destroy the primitive simplicity of arrangement which continued with all the elaboration of mediæval detail. The tabernacle, now so prominent in the midst of a Roman altar, with the "throne" for Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, branch-candlesticks, altar-cards, and the row of six lights (see CANDLESTICKS), are without any Eng. authority.

The five crosses cut upon mediæval altar-slabs marked the places where the altar was anointed when consecrated. The consecration of a mediæval altar generally included the enclosing within it of the relics of some saint. This was not universal in Western Christendom, and in England it was frequently omitted. In the East relics are not enclosed in the altar, but are sewn into the silk corporas or antimission. For further information as to this, see Three Chapters in Recent Liturgical Research, Ch. Hist. Soc., No. 7, SPCK. 19. Forms for blessing the Holy Table were sometimes used in Post-Reformation times. See English Orders for Consecrating chs. in the 17th cent. (HBS), 1911.

On the mediæval altar, see: J. B. Thiers, Dissertations ecclésiastiques sur Les Principaux Autels, La Célébration du Chœur, et Les Juhés des Eglises, Paris, 1688; Legg, Ancient Liturgical Customs now Falling into

7. Consecration of Altars.

8. Bibliography.

Disuse, in Transactions of St. Paul's Ecclesiological Society, II (repr. Essays on Ceremonial 37, London, De la More Press, 1904); Comper, The Gothic Altar, in Trns. St. Paul's Eccles. Soc. III (repr. in Some Principles and Services of the Prayer Book, London, 1899, p. 41); Comper, The Reasonableness of the Ornaments Rubric illus. by a comparison of German and English Altars, in Trns. St. P. Ec. S. IV; Edm. Bishop, On the History of the Christian Altar, in Downside Review, July, 1905.—R3. F. C. EELES.

LOVE.—L., more usually designated as Charity, is everywhere insisted upon in the PB as the crowning Christian grace, without which "all our doings are nothing worth"; we may trace it, as we may trace FAITH, through the various parts of that book, and discern the importance which is attached to it in every stage of the Christian life. The Coll. and Ep. for QUINQUAGESIMA Sunday specially dwell upon this grace; the Coll. shows us that L. is the very essence of the spiritual life and the bond which unites all other virtues in peaceful union. In the Ep. for ADVENT Sunday we are taught to "owe no man anything but to love one another, for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." Thus the Christian year opens with the teaching of L. as the primary duty of Christians. To "be in charity with all men" is insisted upon as a requisite for the right reception of the great feast of L., the HC. Cp. GRACES, THE CHRISTIAN.—K3.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

LOW SUNDAY.—A name sometimes given to the 1st Sunday aft. Easter, as being a kind of repetition of Easter Day on a smaller scale (see FESTIVAL, § 19).—O31. J. W. TYRER.

LUKE, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 38; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 19.

LUTHERANS.—As early as 1527 Lutheran opinions had begun to influence a small group of Oxford students,¹ and in 1534 Henry VIII made his first overtures to the German Protestant princes. In the following year he despatched two English envoys, Bishop Fox and Dr. Heath, to confer on religious matters with the Wittenberg Reformers, and in 1538 three German delegates came to England at the King's request and held conferences with a select committee of Anglican divines, of which the 13 Arts. published that year are supposed to have been the outcome.² Henry several times invited Melancthon to come to England, and Cranmer at first entirely sympathised with the views of the German Reformers. The Litany which he compiled in 1544, and which is mainly the same as that now in use, was drawn largely from one published by Luther in 1529. The baptismal offices in the PB of 1549 were also, through the medium of HERMAN'S CONSULTATION, considerably indebted to a compilation of Luther's in 1523, while the 42 Arts. of 1553, with the important exception of the teaching on the Eucharist, are largely traceable, through the 13 Arts., to the AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

But during the reign of Edward VI the English Reformers inclined to the Swiss rather than to the Lutheran opinions, and thus the changes made in the PB of 1552 show no trace of Lutheran influence. Still, even after Cranmer had adopted the Calvinistic view of the Eucharist, he made repeated attempts to secure the presence of Melancthon in England with a view to a general synod of Protestant divines which should attempt "an agreement upon the chief heads of ecclesiastical doctrine," and especially on the Lord's Supper.¹

In Elizabeth's reign, however, there seemed to be a certain reaction in favour of Lutheranism, as, in spite of the strong preference shown by the bishops and leading clergy for the judgment of the "Reformed" divines on ritual matters,² the changes that were made at the revision of the Articles in 1563, again with the exception of those on the Sacraments, were drawn from a distinctly Lutheran formula, the "Württemberg Confession." The 2nd and 5th of our present ARTICLES are taken almost verbatim from this Confession, while the 12th and the additions made then to the 10th, 11th and 20th are derived from the same source.³—B1. G. FOSTER CARTER.

LYCH-GATE.—The word "lych" or "lich" is derived from the Saxon lic = dead body. It appears in various combinations in English, as Lichfield, the field of the dead; lich-owl, the harbinger of death; lichwake, the watching over the dead (still used in this sense in Scotland); and lych-gate or lich-gate, the gate at the entrance of a churchyard to which the mourners bring the dead body, and there await the reception by the clergyman. For this reason it is usually roofed over in view of inclement weather.—R6. G. VALE OWEN.

MAGNIFICAT.—The Song of Mary, Lk. 1 46-55, falls into four strophes, advancing from the subjective to the objective in order to return to the subjective, though in a higher form" (Harnack):—

1. Biblical Meaning.

(a) vv. 46, 47: An outburst of praise in which the speaker's whole nature takes part. (b) vv. 48, 49: The cause of this outburst in the choice by God of the lowly maiden for the carrying out of His purpose, to her exaltation, and the manifestation of His holiness. (c) vv. 50-53: The mercy of God towards the pious, specially shown in His disregard for the judgments and distinctions of men. (d) vv. 54, 55: The final manifestation of God's truth and mercy, according to promise, toward the Chosen People has now begun.

The "regal" nature of this song, noted by some, is not very prominent; in spite of the angelic message (v. 32) there is no Davidic allusion; it is rather the song of one of the people, expressing joy that one so lowly has been chosen by God for high honour; its tranquil gratitude is contrasted with the elated tone of the preceding Song of Elizabeth. Its relation with the OT is close, especially with the Song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2 1-10), though it has many echoes of the Psalms (Plummer, Lk., pp. 30, 31); but in tone and temper the speaker moves upon a higher plane. Its simple faith, its joyful hope, its humble gratitude and its calm submission bear eloquent testimony to the character and spirit of her who was chosen to be the mother of the Lord.

(a) Early references.—Combined with the Benedictus it formed one of the nine chief canticles of the Church, and is found in the collection following the Pss. in Cod. A. It occurs in the sixth cent. African list of Verecundus, and

¹ Cranmer's Letters, CCXCVIII.

² Strype's Annals, p. 237, vol. i, Oxford, 1824.

³ Cp. art. FOREIGN INFLUENCES ON THE PB AFTER 1549.

¹ Hardwick, Hist. of Reform., p. 180.

² Hardwick, Hist. of Articles, p. 60.

is referred to by Sophronius of Jerusalem (seventh cent.).

(b) Liturgical use.—It was at first a morning hymn; in the east it was used at Lauds in Abbot Nilus' monastery on Mt. Sinai, and it still forms one of the ὠδαί for the 'Ἀκολουθία τοῦ ὕμνου' (Lauds) of the Greek office; Niceta R., however, refers to its use at Vigils; in the west it was a hymn for Lauds in the rules of Cæsarius († 542) and Aurelian († 582) of Arles, and in the Book of Mulling (Irish ninth cent. copy of seventh cent. work) it forms the opening hymn of a morning service.

Its use as an evening hymn seems to be Roman in origin; St. Benedict makes it the climax of Vespers, a use which Honorius of Autun says that he borrowed from St. Ambrose; this probably implies that it was the contemporary use of the Church of Milan, which had already felt Roman influence in other ways. It was also used in the Mozarabic liturgy on the Festival of the BVM., Dec. 18th.

As our evening office is the outcome of the combination of Vespers and Compline and the assimilation of the results to Matins, the M., once the climax of Vespers, now follows the first lesson from the OT, and forms an expression of grateful recognition of the promises of mercy therein set forth.

Three old Latin MSS. (a, b and l [rhe]) read Elizabeth in v. 46, supported by Niceta of Remesiana (De Ps. bono 9 and 11), Jerome's

4. Authorship. translation of Origen's Fifth Homily on St. Lk. (which notes the reading as a variant), and two MSS. in one passage of Irenæus, iv. 71, the third MS. reading "Maria"; in another passage, iii. 102, all the MSS. agree in reading "Maria."

The evidence seems to point to an original reading 'καὶ ἑλὲν' without any name; Mary's name was inserted generally, save in a small group of Old Latin MSS. which inserted Elizabeth'; Niceta must have used this version, which would be known to Jerome, while the variant in Irenæus would be introduced by the translator or a copyist. If 'καὶ ἑλὲν' be the original reading, the question of the name to be supplied must be argued on grammatical and internal grounds. Professors Harnack and Burkitt support 'Elizabeth' for the following reasons.

(a) The subject of 'ἑλὲν' must be the last speaker, v. 41. (b) The expression ἔμεινε δὲ Μαριάμ σὺν ἀβρῆ, v. 36, suggests that Elizabeth has been last referred to. (c) ταπεινωσις, v. 48, is the word used in the LXX, 1 Sam. 1 11, to denote Hannah's reproach, and would therefore be most natural on the lips of Elizabeth. (d) The close and undoubted connection with the Song of Hannah, 1 Sam. 2 1-10, would be best explained if the circumstances of the speaker were the same. (e) The M. on the lips of Elizabeth forms the counterpart to the Benedictus of Zacharias, and satisfies the phrase, ἐκλήσθη πνεύματος ἁγίου, v. 41. Against these arguments it may be urged that—(a) καὶ ἑλὲν is used by St. Lk. to mark a change of speaker, e.g., 2 49. (b) ἀβρῆ, v. 36, may be accounted for by the desire to avoid the name 'Elizabeth,' which is almost necessary at the beginning of v. 37. (c) ταπεινωσις has a wider meaning than the reproach of childlessness alone, and the second half of v. 48 is much more suitable on the lips of one who was to be the mother of the Messiah. (d) While the connection with Hannah's song is undoubted, the words in the OT specially applicable to childlessness, 1 Sam. 2 5, 6, have no counterpart in the NT hymn. (e) The counterpart to the Benedictus is the Song of Elizabeth, vv. 42-45, which is just as much a prophecy, metrical in form (see Plummer, Lk., p. 27), as the other three songs of the gospel.

This last fact, obscured by the neglect of the Song of Elizabeth in liturgical use, has an important bearing on the whole question: as long as Elizabeth's words are regarded as a prosaic greeting to Mary, it is possible to conceive that 'καὶ ἑλὲν' might introduce a change, not of speaker, but from prose to poetry; but no author could introduce such a phrase in the middle of a poem. Further, the Song of Elizabeth is complete in itself, and it is not likely that an artistic writer like St. Lk. (cp. his selection and handling of the Pauline speeches in the Acts) would record two songs from the same lips or ascribe two songs to the same person. As vv. 42-45 form the Song of Elizabeth, vv. 46-55 must belong to some other character, and the only alternative is Mary.

Commentaries: T. D. Bernard, Songs of the Holy Nativity; Cabrol, DAC, art. Cantiques

5. Bibliography. Evangeliques: Bäumer, Geschichte des Breviers; C. W. Emmett, Expositor, December, 1909.—E2. M. LINTON SMITH.

MAN.—The PB, in one form or another, has now become the ritual directory of a world-wide Communion, within which the

1. The PB for Man. great enterprise of FOREIGN MISSIONS is being actively prosecuted.

It is, moreover, more than a ritual directory, it is the embodiment of a particular conception of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION. Its supreme purpose is edification (RITUAL, § 4), i.e., the building up of a perfected manhood. Yet, since its last English revision, those bodies of Christians who reject it have so increased and multiplied in England that only about half the nation is even nominally within the pale of the old Ch., while in all other English-speaking countries, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, the United States, and the Colonies, the Ch. of the PB comprises but a minority, and is by no means everywhere the largest denomination (see Pan-Ang. Papers). There are not a few signs that a centripetal movement of attraction is beginning gradually to overcome the centrifugal tendency of separation which has been so active in the last cent. But lovers of the PB need to inquire whether, in the application of its system, due heed has been paid to the variety and complexity of human nature as it stands revealed in the manifold world in which we live. And any suggestions made for or against revision can only be adequately considered by those who keep in mind (1) the PB system as it is, and (2) the nature of man as it is. The present work as a whole is an endeavour to mirror the first faithfully; the second it is the purpose of this art. to sketch in the light of recent study.

Holy Scripture speaks unmistakably about man. The whole OT is the single though multiform unfolding of the tragic contrast between the earthly origin and impulses of this being, formed out of the dust of the ground and returning to the dust, and that

2. The Bible and Man. Divine breath in his nostrils which marks him as created in the image of God and so capable of fellowship with Him and destined for such fellowship. He is like the animals, yet radically distinct; born to rule, yet perpetually enslaving himself; a great sinner, yet with a place for repentance; failing to find perfection, yet handing on the torch of Messianic hope (cp. Gen. 1-3; Pss. 8, 51, 103). To the last great prophet, Ezekiel, the title "son of man" is applied in a solemn representative sense as child of the race and commissioned agent of God, and between the Testaments it is even given to the Messiah in the Book of Enoch. In the Wisdom literature, broad as life and profound as its depths, one secret, echoed here and there in the Pss., is told, that death is not the predestined end of man. The NT, which opens for us with the fourfold portrait of the perfect Son of Man, and the story of all that He began to do and teach, goes on in Acts to tell of His enlarging activity through His mystical body; and in the apostolic letters and writings we have the reflection of the transformed humanity being built up, not with the old leaven of nature, but with the quickening Spirit of the Second Adam (cp. esp. Rom. 1-3, 1 Cor. 15, Eph. 1-4, John 1 1-18, 1 John 1, Heb. 1-2).

In the Ch. there have constantly appeared writers who cherished great thoughts about

3. The Ch. and Man. man. The early Apologists presented their faith as crowning and completing, not contradicting or condemning, the upward striving soul of man, the only conscious seeker after God upon this world. Tertullian is best remembered by his intuition that the soul is naturally Christian (Apol. 17). Athanasius, in his early tract On the Incarnation, takes like ground, following upon the Alexandrian humanists, Clement and Origen. Only when the rights and powers of the natural man were pressed so far as to endanger the scriptural dictines of the guilt of sin and the necessity of Divine grace did the greater Ch. Fathers and Doctors as Augustine and Bernard in opposition to Pelagius and Abelard, overweight the balance seriously in the opposite direction. The Renaissance and the Reformation were each movements of the spirit of man under the impulse of a new idea as to human nature, and in revolt against scholastic theories and formalistic methods in religion and learning.

4. Matter and spirit. From the Bible and the Ch. we turn to Science, History and Philosophy for fresh and further light on human nature.

Man has been called the Microcosm, or Little World, reflecting in miniature the elements contained in the Great World. Lotze's classical examination of the nature of man in his Microcosmus (Eng. trans., two vols.) is still worth study. The first problem that man presents is concerned with the contrast of matter and spirit. The relation has been very variously conceived. They may be thought of as two absolutely distinct forms of being. That is dualism. Or spirit may be thought to be a very fine kind of matter. That is materialism. Or matter may be regarded as merely the vivid creation of the mind. That is idealism. Or, lastly, matter may be understood to require spirit, the two being inseparable factors in a whole which includes them both. That may be called spiritual realism.¹ On this view, wherever there is matter there must be spirit. Now the ruling truth in the world of matter to-day is continuity. There are no real gaps in matter. Space is never empty, so far as we know it. Unseen and unfelt, the mysterious ether fills full the vast spaces which divide us from the stars, the passage of light proving that a pathway leads without a break from the furthest of them to our planet. The same strange ethereal medium occupies all the interstices between the particles of the human body, or of a pane of glass, just as water fills the pores of a sponge. And everywhere the ether and the atoms or electrons that throb and quiver in it have quality and character. We try to interpret this spiritual side of matter, which is illustrated by the indefinite pervasiveness of the ether, by talking of the "laws of Nature." But, if we wish to explain why, e.g., cork sinks in air but floats in water, while gold sinks in both, we are thrown back upon Spirit, an unseen Energy like the human will, imposing upon each their character. On this first and merely physical level, order, faithfulness, power can already be discerned. But no nearer finite end than the Universe itself has disclosed itself. Man, however, just because, in one real aspect, he is (cp. BODY) a material part of the Universe conceived as a continuous plenum, is, even as regards this level of being, the object of the ceaseless activity of God as Immanent Spirit.

At the next stage in the state of being, it is seen that the creative Energy is charged with a fuller potency. A new form of

5. Elementary Life. activity emerges, centralised, organic, purposive. Life, in an elementary mode, is at work within the simplest unicellular organism. The cell is said to be alive, because it is the centre of an active fellowship, directed to two ends partially opposed (i.e., holding to one another a relation of polarity), nutrition and reproduction. This fellowship has two concentric spheres, a narrower and a wider. The first sphere of fellowship is the cell itself, with its nucleus and envelope making up what we might call by analogy its brain and body. The second is its environment from which it assimilates its food and into which it discharges its waste products to be reabsorbed. The two related ends for which the cell exists may be distinguished further. Nutrition benefits the individual, reproduction the species. The characteristics of life just described persist in all forms.

But the ascending stairway early branches into two mutually related lines of development. Those cellular organisms which tend towards the plant-form sacrifice¹ their freedom of movement so as more effectually, with their relatively fixed roots, to fulfil their function of storing up food drawn from the inorganic world. Those which tend towards the animal-form sacrifice¹ their power of drawing food direct from air and soil in order through freedom of locomotion to realise a closer and more centralised organic fellowship. Plants store up food for animals, and receive benefit by the enrichment of the soil. So the law of fellowship ramifies.

¹ What is usually called psycho-physical parallelism would come under this head. By "realism" it is not intended to suggest that "real" means tangible or physical, but the compound phrase is used to mark any view which holds all substance or reality, however diverse in mode of being or appearance, to be continuously dependent upon spirit, and penetrated by it.

6. Plant and Animal

One other notable bifurcation in the pathway of developing life is revealed by the contrast between insects and the higher animals. Several recent inquirers concur in ascribing to instinct, as distinct from intelligence, even the most wonderful adaptations of insect activity to circumstances, whereas the higher mammals, with their developed brains, show real intelligence. Instinct is more perfect, but it is limited to inherited aptitudes, and prompts the same reactions in all individuals. Intelligence may be at fault, and varies with the individual, but it can utilise the experience of the single life. The burnt moth flies back to the flame: the dog will not burn his paw twice.

7. Instinct and Intelligence

It is, then, through the animals with the larger brains, that most modern biologists trace, on its physical side, the descent of man. And they connect the further brain development, which gave the physical basis for true human life, with the conjectured stimulus of a crisis when one species of the Quadrupana was driven to forsake the limited life of the tree-dweller, and walk erect about the business of his life to be, the ruling of earth. So from the dust of the earth, up the long stairway of the ascent of life, urged ever by the age-long pressure of the creative Word, and ever at each fresh forking of the ways choosing the higher road, marched the pre-human ancestors of our race, till the progress had attained the goal of manhood, and the First Man stood forth, a being who could know good and evil, and do either. How much he had sacrificed!—the almost indestructible persistence of the elements, the plant's insensibility to pain, the insect's instinctive perfection, the protective hide or scales of great beasts and reptiles, the elephant's strength and bulk, the lion's teeth, the bird's easy command of air, the fish's freedom of the water. All these he had left behind, on one side or the other, to gain, first himself, and then, in and through himself, God. With more needs than any other creature, he can only satisfy them by entering into fuller and ever fuller fellowship with his world, finding that all things work together for good to him, as he learns and follows the secret law which binds all things in unity.

8. Descent of Man

The race, moreover, is unmistakably one. White, black, brown, yellow—all men everywhere come of one stock. The wide families, and the distinct races, and the varying individuals, all differ from one another, for there have never yet been even two men alike; but they are all of one blood, all made in the same Divine image, all compacted of the same corruptible flesh, all gifted with capacity for the life of the spirit. And the word which men use to conceal their ignorance about the mysterious thread of generative life, which, as it unites and divides, incessantly links the human generations together, is heredity. Setting aside technicalities, it may be said that recent research has made several important points clear about heredity.

¹ The word "sacrifice" is not meant, of course, of conscious surrender, or even of a balance of loss; e.g., the animals by their improved powers of locomotion are able to move to better feeding-grounds.

9. Unity of Mankind

(1) A man's parentage decides the configuration and constitution of body and brain with which he starts life, and we call those elements inherited which only need nourishment and not cultivation to develop them. Blue eyes, a tenor voice, an aptitude for figures are inherited, for no amount of cultivation will produce them where the appropriate organs are not either inborn or a growth of time.

10. Heredity

(2) It is not proved that any "acquired characters" (i.e., habits, whether virtuous or vicious, harmless or hurtful, which have been formed by either parent after birth by cultivation) can be transmitted to the children. The weakness which made the parent susceptible to certain vices or diseases may be inherited, but the child need not fall a victim to the same evil, though the inherited weakness may lead to a quite different vice or disease, cultivated as was the parental failing. Instances which seem to contradict this are sometimes due to pre-natal infection from a vicious and diseased mother.

(3) As the creative life Energy, working in and through the combined germ cell from which each new member of the race takes beginning, develops the speck of protoplasm into just one, and not another, unique and individual nature, the growing embryo rapidly recapitulates the pre-human life history of the race, and after birth there is some ground for believing that the evolution of civilised man is reflected in the successive phases of feeling and tendency which normally colour and characterise the stages of childhood and youth. The beast, and the primeval savage, that is to say, are there within us beneath the surface of consciousness, and remain there, it may be added, to the end of life. So is explained the desire ready to flame forth "to satisfy men's carnal lusts and appetites, like brute beasts that have no understanding," and so too the presence of the "old man," with his contrariety to the Spirit. So, also, the distribution of various gifts, like "the gift of continency," and the "gracious gift" by which "mankind is increased," is part of the function of the principle of heredity.

(4) Lastly, no known living creature owes so little to heredity, so much to environment and training. Hardly a single pure instinct—in the proper sense of the word—survives in man, so early and so forcefully does the world into which he is born act upon him, through the one organ in which he surpasses all other terrestrial beings, the brain. How precisely has the Ch., in theory, acted in advance in accordance with this observed fact of modern science when she welcomes God's human children, born within her pale no later than in earliest infancy into the mystical Body of their Lord; but how ineffectively, in actual practice, has she utilised the enormous powers of influence available for the consecration of life from its beginning!

11. Environment

That branch of science which is concerned with the study of Early Man, as known from the relics of his activities and inferred from the observed actions of the more backward races, is commonly called Anthropology. It cannot reveal Primitive Man to us, for, as J. G. Frazer, in a recent inaugural lecture at Liverpool, pointed out, the earliest man of whom we have evidence has behind him a long history. But all knowledge of the past may and should aid the interpretation of the present, and the elementary stage of man's racial growth, which we may (after St. Paul) call the childhood of mankind, has not a little to teach us. There we see human life in its undifferentiated unity. The individual does not clearly distinguish himself from his tribe, or one part or element of his nature or experience from another. Events and objects are just strung together on the thread of life. And, as we bring our analysis to bear, in breaking up this unity that we may grasp the diversity implicit within it, we gain at once an impressive proof of the complexity of human life, and a storehouse of hints in regard to educational method. For, whether the view stated above in § 10 (3) be true or not, the mere limitation of their experience must make the moulds of thought and action, which fitted early man and fit backward races, also in certain instructive particulars suit children and backward individuals.

The analysis of the material collected by anthropologists may be summarised under ten heads.

12. His Life Analysed. 1° Language is the primary distinctive mark of man. The discovery of means of expression by words, signs and gestures revealed the birth of spirit in mortal dress. Development was slow: a tribe has been found whose members were so dependent on signs that they could not communicate at night. 2° In this process the giving of individual names, involving some sort of defining judgment, marks a stage. Adam progressed through naming the beasts. 3° Presently stories are told to preserve the memory of dead heroes and explain the wonders of the world of experience, and so legend and myth arise. 4° If articulate speech differentiates human from animal intelligence, the use of *tools*¹ similarly marks the practical activity of man as distinct from the purposive actions of beasts. With tools may be reckoned weapons, toys, and the implements of "medicine" or magic (cp. RELIGION, § 16). 5° Practical ends lead to the elaboration of speech at the palaver where points of policy are discussed, and to the training of the young braves by the elders of the tribe. 6° Practical needs similarly lead to the use of numbers (the ten fingers furnishing the universal modulus), and of class names (as house, dog, fire). But some tribes cannot count beyond 4 and have no proper class names. 7° Conduct is moulded by inflexible custom, and tradition marks certain persons, places and objects as sacred. 8° A strict system of etiquette witnesses to the feelings of relationship which find expression in it, and a customary order of ritual similarly represents the religious sentiments. 9° Certain actions are forbidden by solemn sanctions known as taboos, and the ideas held about the Divine beings are reflected in myths. 10° The corporate conscience becomes articulate and effective in tribal laws, and finds embodiment in various forms of tribal organisation.

¹ Devices for the kindling of fire mark a very important stage towards civilisation.

The science which deals with man's life in civilised society is called Sociology, though now often merged in an enlarged Anthropology. There is no sharp line between this stage and the last; but the two are very different, and need to be distinguished. The unity, which we saw was a marked feature of uncivilised life, is now broken up. Men, women, slaves seem all to be diverse. Division of labour has cut up workers according to their occupations. Morality is too often divorced from religion. The sacred is marked off from the secular. Work and play, war and peace, liberty and law, and the like, are opposed realms. Yet the most careful analysis fails to discover any radically new element. Man at this stage shows more clearly what he is, but that is all.

The various elements of experience already identified may now be traced in their more developed forms. 1° Language has flowered forth into literature, the arts of pure representation, and music, all forms of soul expression. 2° Out of the impulse to name objects has sprung logic, that form of thought which aims at definition and criticism. 3° In the alembic of this logic legend is resolved into history and mythology into philosophy. 4° The practical activities of man can now be grouped as industry, sport, and war, while magic long lurks in the backwaters of civilised life. 5° The palaver of the savage is replaced by the oratory of council and assembly, and the training of the young by the old has been supplemented by a system of education by professional teachers. 6° A calculus of numbers has been elaborated into the useful, though but half real, realm of mathematics, and the single class-names are now grouped into the ordered catalogues of science, and connected by convenient generalisations, misnamed "laws." 7° The regulation of conduct is now assigned to the domain of morality, and all that is held sacred is relegated to religion. 8° In matters of etiquette and ritual nearly every one is naturally conservative. Archaic elements, therefore, persist, and, in spite of eventual changes of a far-reaching kind, the same two descriptive terms will serve for both ancient and modern man. 9° Taboos, mainly irrational, are succeeded by reasoned systems of ethics, with their cardinal virtues, or their way (tao), or their noble eightfold path; and incongruous and often immoral myths are rationalised or allegorised into some kind of theology, with an ordered pantheon, or a single effective Saviour-God, or a group of related deities. 10° Unwritten tribal laws are elaborated into statutes and codes of law, and the loose and elastic tribal organisation has crystallised into some form of government, State, Church, or Church and State, or Church-State, whether in the mould of autocracy, aristocracy, or democracy.

Neither is this tenfold division without its confirmation in the life and teaching of that Son of Man in whom the Ch. has learnt from St. Paul to see the Divine "summing up of the universe" (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα ἐν τῷ Χριστῶ—Eph. 1 10). A short chain of NT sentences will illustrate this claim.

13. The Perfect Man.

universe" (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα ἐν τῷ

1° Imaginative vision—"Consider the lilies." 2° Intuitive judgment—"Thou art Peter." 3° Historical insight—"Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these"; philosophical criticism—"A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth." 4° Industry (the life of the practical will)—"Jesus the carpenter of Nazareth." 5° Practical teaching—"And he taught them out of the ship." 6° Use of Number—"And he chose twelve"; use of classification—"Blessed are the poor . . . the meek . . . the merciful. . . ." 7° Heart-religion—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" ("Not my will, but thine be done"); heart-morality—"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" ("He went about doing good"). 8° Gentle manners—"When thou art bidden to a feast, take the lowest room"; reverence in ritual—"Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." 9° Ethical discernment—"It was said to them of old time . . . But I say unto you"; theological penetration—"God is not a God of the dead, but of the living." 10° Love of Order—"Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's."

It is time now to ask whether philosophy, after its age-long scrutiny of man, can suggest any closer synthesis of this tenfold division. It would be out of place here to discuss or even to state conflicting theories. It has been usual to make a threefold analysis of the human spirit, into mind, will, and feeling. Sometimes conscience has been admitted as a distinct element. It is, however, generally admitted that, except for convenience, it is a mistake to speak of these as separate faculties, as though each had a special organ. Whatever divisions there are, are distinctions within the unity of the spirit's life, though these may, as to their physical basis, be plausibly connected with certain regions in the cortex of the brain. The division here suggested, however, is fourfold, and is in the main derived from Benedetto Croce.¹ Looking at the ten divisions of our analysis of the being of man as displayed in his life, it is quickly apparent that the first three activities are concerned with knowing as their end, while the last seven all have doing as the formative element in the purposes which prompt them. The life of the spirit has, that is to say, a theoretical and a practical side. These are indeed inseparable, for man cannot act without some basis of knowledge (every deed presupposes a known situation which it is the purpose of the deed to affect); and man cannot know without some basis of event as material for knowledge (every thought presupposes some situation constituted by the acts of his own or other finite spirit and of the Universal Spirit). It is as useless to discuss whether knowing or doing came first as to ask whether hen or egg can claim priority. But no amount of thinking can either separate knowing from doing or resolve the one into the other.

¹ His philosophical system is contained in three volumes published at Bari: (i) Estetica [Eng. trans. by D. Ainslie, 1909]; (ii) Logica, (1909). La filosofia della pratica, (i) Economica, (ii) Etica, 1909. Throughout the paragraphs following, cp. the Tables at the end. Limits of space compel the choice of one system for display, and Croce's is chosen because, in spite of its intrinsic helpfulness and worth, it is not generally accessible to English readers. It should, however, be noted that the exposition is an independent development on the basis of Croce's system. E.g., the Tables and the term "heart" are not borrowed, and there is no direct quotation.

Each of these two sides or aspects of the life of the spirit proves, on examination, to possess two distinct grades, the four resulting modes

12. Imagination, corresponding to the divisions marked 1°, 2°, 4°, 7° above. Taking first the side of knowledge, we observe that language, though it can lend itself to all ends, is most itself when it realises the single æsthetic end of Expression and is the vehicle of pure Imagination, which is the first grade of knowledge, taking in past and present, the real and the dream worlds, memories and hopes, deeds and desires, achievements and ideals. It is the response of the soul to the impressions made upon it by the varied experiences of life. It includes memory, which is just the imagination of past experiences.¹ It reaches its highest level in the lyrical outpourings in which the poet's soul finds expression, and in the visions of glory or judgment in which the seer, sometimes hardly knowing whether in the body or out of the body, shadows forth what he has discerned.

The second grade of knowledge is doubly dependent upon the first. It is the function of the spirit as 19. Reason. Reason to detect and define the real: it must detect it amidst the mingled panorama of the real and the unreal which the imagination unrolls, and it can only define it by the help of that language which is the peculiar product of imagination. It is the knowable past and the eternal which can alone satisfy the critical scrutiny of the reason: the possible and the future can be food only for the imagination (the lower grade of the mind).² Our prevision of future events may in many instances (say, of to-morrow's sunrise) almost reach certitude, but the apostolic counsel is endorsed by philosophy, that against all plans for to-morrow the mark of contingency must be set—Deo volente. As surely as the sun's disk shows above the horizon, a radically new event at that moment comes within the ken of the reasoning observer.

The practical side of the life of the spirit is also double. The first grade, that of the Will, covers the whole area of possible effort. It

20. Will. Will presupposes the theoretical side. It must start from a necessary present situation, more or less perfectly known, made up of the unalterable past and the unchanging Eternal. Reason uses imagination to represent so much of these as the will allows¹ as relevant to the situation and convenient at that juncture. Imagination describes, sufficiently for the purpose of decision, the possible alternatives open to the will. Then the will makes the choice, and a deed is instantaneously done. It may be only a resolve in regard to future action: it is a true deed, even though the resolve be recalled and the future action varied. So the signalman has acted, when he has touched the button which opens the points and drops the danger signal, though the train has not yet changed its course, and though, before it arrives, he may by another act have replaced the signal and the points. The end which the will realises is the man's own finite and personal end. It may be more; it cannot be less. It is this quality attaching to the act which constitutes its freedom. There is therefore no real conflict between FREEWILL and necessity: both are indispensable elements in that ceaseless process of choosing which covers the whole stream of our waking moments. How this freedom should be used, it is the function of the highest grade of the life of the spirit to decide.

¹ This very cursory mention of memory is sufficient for the purpose of this art., which has to be limited to the discovery and definition of elements that may be regarded as philosophically distinct. It may, however, be noted that the function of memory is, from the standpoints of psychology and psychophysiology, of fundamental importance. It agrees with this that imagination is the primary grade on the view of the text.

² This may sound paradoxical. But all that is meant is that the mental act of making a forecast of events falls within the province of the imagination. Such an act prolongs the past into the future. Imagination first re-constructs the real past in accordance with the judgments of reason, and then constructs such an image of the possible future as will best fit on to the past. Reason can then step in and criticise—not the future event before it has occurred (that is impossible)—but the imaginative forecast. And this action of rational criticism does not transfer the act of prevision into the province of reason any more than a criticism of such a dramatic construction as the murder of Desdemona transforms Shakespeare from a poet into a historian; though even poetic creation has to fit on to a real world: it must be possible.

The first and lower grade of the practical activity is concerned with utilising the things of time and space (and persons 21. Heart. treated as things) for the sake of advantage: it may be called economic, for it seeks what will pay best. The second is dependent on the first, and, just as reason detected the real amidst the mingling of the real and the possible in the mirror of imagination, so the regenerate Heart yearns after and embraces the right alternative amongst all those presented to the will.² The endless attempts of non-Christian moralists to identify right with pleasure crumble into ashes before the fire of a moment's true moral indignation. Their seeming plausibility is easily explained. He who does right has made the right his personal end. It is his pleasure so to do. But he does not so act because it is his pleasure.

It is not easy to define the new element added (cp. CONSCIENCE, § 1). But Westermarck³

22. Morality and Religion. concludes a chapter on the nature of the Moral Emotions with a sentence which may give us a clue.

"Almost inseparable," he says, "from the moral judgments which we pass on our own conduct seems to be the image of an impartial outsider who acts as our judge." The essence of a right action is then that it is one by which we win or keep (or deserve to win or keep) the approval of persons with whom fellowship is our proper relation. A man who wants to keep straight will ask himself, What would my mother, my wife, my innocent children, or the friend I look up to, think if they saw me in this place, heard these words, knew of this conduct? Not fear, but shame, distinguishes guilt from failure. But the saint (with no risk of meeting any holier earthly eye, for his life rebukes his whole circle) has solved the problem. Duty is always duty to God. That is right which a man, under the eye of his Father in heaven, owes to his neighbour, God's other child, whose redemption like his own cost the blood of the Son of God. Morality, when genuine, is implicit religion. Religion, when genuine, is implicit morality. Love—disinterested, impartial, holy—is of God, for God is Love. And the only explanation of conscience and the sense of obligation is St. Augustine's Fecisti nos ad Te, et inquietum cor nostrum donec requiescat in Te.

¹ The difference between thinking for the sake of thought, and thinking with a view to action, is that the will is latent and subsidiary in the first case, but patent and dominant, and therefore constitutive, in the second (cp. § 25).

² The word "heart," which in the Bible stands for the whole inward man, is now commonly used to denote the centre of feeling. But feeling is here defined as a mere accompaniment of will (§ 24); and, as it is usually unselfish impulses, and not selfish emotions, which are in modern speech associated with the heart, this term has been employed in the text for the good will, i.e., the will as yoked with a higher directive mode set on universal ends, the will proper being set on personal ends. The heart loves God in Himself or in His creatures. The will—if pulling against the heart—gratifies lusts or mere liking (cp. Table I below, and § 22; also RELIGION).

³ His work on The Origin and Development of the Moral Emotions, two volumes, 1906-8 (see I 107), represents a purely evolutionary standpoint, and very inadequately appreciates Hebrew and Christian ideals (as contrasted with the average morality of professing Jews or Christians), but is an invaluable storehouse of data in regard to the moral judgments and practices of mankind, especially among the uncivilised races.

It is impossible to draw out in detail the consequences of the primacy of the cleansed heart in the life of the spirit. They

23. Vocations. are sufficiently indicated in the table below. Two points, however, need to be cleared up.

(1) The occasions of direct moral choice or initiative do not exhaust the moral life. Certain vocations (e.g., those of a clergyman, a doctor, a policeman, a nurse) carry peculiar opportunities of exercising moral influence. But others, whose lives are dedicated to art, to research, or to some handicraft or business, have it for their duty, not only to live for the love of God as they should in the leisure margins of their days, at home or in the world, but for God's sake and as in His sight to put all distractions aside, and pursue beauty, truth, utility with might and main, doing all heartily, as to Christ and not to men.

(2) Nothing has been said of feeling, a word used in so many senses as to be fatally ambiguous. In its most obvious sense it is an invariable accompaniment of the exercise of will.

24. Feeling. It is often largely of the body and nervous system. When pleasurable, it results from the will reaching a desired end without obstructions, or after the conquest or removal of the obstructions. When painful, it follows from the hedge of necessity barring the way to some desired end now seen to be impossible of attainment, and leaving only alternatives (e.g., death or the surgeon's knife) neither of which is desirable for its own sake, or else from the tantalising perception that, among several desirable courses, to choose one is to forego the rest. Feeling is a delusive guide, because it is most powerfully governed by bodily sensations and immediate superficial impressions: the moral or prudential satisfaction in being up early in winter is not so intense, considered as feeling, as the comfort of lying longer in bed. So, to measure the value of public worship by the inclination or feeling of the moment is folly. But there is something wrong, either with health or temper, or with the pursuit adopted, if after repeated experiment it fails to bring some feeling of satisfaction in normal circumstances.¹

¹ It should, however, be noted that, as the will is associated with one or another of the modes of man's being as spirit, the accompanying feeling acquires a specific quality. The several satisfactions which are associated with the taste for beauty, the thirst for truth, or the aspiration after goodness, are characteristically different from the pleasure derived from merely getting one's own way.

TABLE I.

MAN'S BEING AS KNOWING AND DOING: THE FOUR MODES OF ACTIVITY OF THE SPIRIT.

Mode or Grade of the Activity of the Spirit.	The active Being or Subject.	Distinctive Function.	Activity Theoretical or Practical	Object Matter of Activity.	Process.	Product.
1. Through his Imagination 2. Through his Reason 4. Through his Will 7. Through his Heart	Man is a	Witness of the possible and the real : Judge of the real : Pursuer of the useful and interesting : Servant of God and the Right :	he knows he does	appearance. reality. what he wants. what he ought.	Description Definition Decision Devotion	Language Logic Life Love

TABLE II.

CHART OF THE MAIN PRODUCTS OF THE SPIRIT OF MAN: ARRANGED UNDER THE MODE OR MODES OF ACTIVITY MOST PROMINENTLY¹ CONCERNED IN EACH.

	Mode or Grade of the Activity of the Spirit.	Early Products of the Spirit of Man.	Later Products named and defined.	Analogous PB Material (refs. to App.).
1	Imagination (including memory; cp. § 18).	Expression (word, sign, gesture).	Language (Literature, Art, Music). The soul seeking expression for the sake of expression.	Rites and Ceremonies, (s2, r1-4, q).
2	Reason (cp. § 19).	Individual names.	Logic (Definition and criticism). Man reaching truth. Common sense tested and clarified.	Answers in Cat., etc. (κ, υ).
2	Reason + Imagination.	Legend, Myth.	History (representation of real events). Philosophy (exposition of the real). Things as they happened and as they are.	Prefaces and Creeds (α1, β1, υ).
4	Will, § 20 (involving feeling, cp. § 24).	Tools, toys, weapons, "medicine."	Life (realising the possible and utilising the real). Industry, Sport, War, Superstition.	Finance, Fabric and Fittings (α6, r5, r6).
5	Will + Imagination.	Palaver. Training of youth.	Oratory, Education, Desires. Plans, Habits, Rules.	Exhs.; Confirm. (κ, λ, x).
6	Will + Reason.	Numbers. Class names.	Mathematics (manufactured truth). Science (classifying and cataloguing the real).	Calendar; Lit. (c; f).
7	Heart (§ 21 f.).	Customary conduct. Traditional sacra .	Love (uplifting life and guiding will). Morality and Religion.	Decalogue; Duty (κ1, κ3).
8	Heart + Imagination.	Etiquette. Ritual. Outward Sacrifice.	Ideals (visions of the actual transformed by love). Etiquette. Ritual (sacrifice of praise and prayer).	Prs.; Ritual (s2, r1, r2, κ3 ⁶ , κ).
9	Heart + Reason.	Taboos. Myths.	Ethics, Theology. (Relationships manward and Godward thought out).	Cat.; Creeds, Arts. (κ3; κ2, υ).
10	Heart + Will.	Tribal laws and organisation.	Laws and institutions. Codes and Creeds. State and Church.	Act of Unif.; Rubrics (α).

¹ The closing paragraph on the unity of the spirit (§ 25) needs to be carefully compared, or this Table will be misunderstood.

The above Tables summarise what has gone before. The sharp divisions of the analysis exist of course only on paper. The relative prominence of the several modes of the spirit can fluctuate subtly and swiftly. The poet will turn preacher for the space of a couplet, or the preacher sink to the breadwinner as he weakens the force of a sentence. At every moment of that complex activity which we call human life the four modes or functions of being coexist, distinct but inseparable. Each mode is always discernibly present, but sometimes as primary or dominant, sometimes as co-ordinate but secondary, sometimes as concomitant but subsidiary,¹ and often as a mere faint undercurrent. As the precise ends, to which this life-activity is directed, shift and change, by a kind of rhythmic circular movement one mode becomes dominant, and then calls a second to succeed it as primary, or associates another with itself as secondary. But it is hoped that the graphic method of exhibiting the related elements of man's inner life may tend to clear thinking, and enable the point of view taken in other articles to be better appreciated.

25.
Conclusion:
Tables.

For imagination, see ARTS AND CRAFTS, RITUAL; for reason, see AUTHORITY, HISTORY, KNOWLEDGE, TRUTH; for will, see ORDER; and for heart, see RELIGION, MORALITY, CONSCIENCE, DUTY. Cp. also (besides the works cited, by Westermarck, Lotze, and Croce), McDougall, Body and Mind, 1911; Archdall Reid, Laws of Heredity, 1910; Walker, Hereditary Characters, 1910; Maccabe, Evolution of Mind, 1910; Drummond, Ascent of Man; Inge, Faith and its Psychology, 1909, and The Ch. and the Age, 1912; McDougall, Social Psychology (²), 1910. In regard to psychology it has been impossible to do more than attempt to outline those philosophical principles on the basis of which alone a sound psychology can be built up. An abundance of literature on psychological processes is available; and, when used with a firm hold on principles and a constant reference to experience, it is invaluable as a guide to educational and pastoral work.—KI, U. G. HARFORD.

MANDATE.—The Letters Patent from the King, certifying to the Archbishop the ELECTION of a bishop, signifying the royal assent, and directing the archbishop to proceed to Confirmation and Consecration. The form follows with slight changes the precedent first made in the year 1416 (ARCHBISHOP).—T3. T. A. LACEY.

MANIPLE (Old Eng. Fanel).—The M. is a small ornament worn, hanging from his left wrist, by the priest at Mass. It seems originally to have been a handkerchief or napkin. See DCA, art. Maniple; Duchesne, Christian Worship, c. II.—R3. J. W. TYRER.

MANUAL, MANUALE (see RITUALE).—A book of ritual offices prescribed for the use of the parish priest on occasions such as Holy Bapt., Espousals and Holy Matrimony, Churching of Women, Visitation and Unction of the Sick, Burial, and other offices of the Dead such as the DIRGE and Commendation. It was sometimes found convenient to bind up in the same volume, at least before the days of printed service-books, the special contents of the Processionale. More proper to the M. itself are

¹ The higher grades of both the theoretical and practical sides of the spirit always involve the recognisable concomitance of the lower. Man can only know reality in and under appearance, for reason, as the master-principle, is essentially dependent on imagination, as the indispensable servant. Similarly, man only does what he ought, when that is also what he wants (Table I), for heart, the sovereign-principle, is equally dependent for executive efficiency upon will, as the prime minister in all action. But imagination and will can each, for the time, seem to monopolise the arena of the conscious spirit, and the man is, as it were, resolved into pure imagination or pure will.

"the occasional ceremonies for Candlemas, Ash Wednesday, and Palm Sunday,"¹ and the Benedictions of Easter lamb, Easter eggs, seed, fruit, bread, meat, cheese, butter, and "what you will" (ad omnia quacunque volueris), boat or ship, church bell, the Blessing of a pilgrim, recluse or anchorite, blind person, leper, etc. There were sometimes added to the M., besides a Calendar at the beginning, certain forms useful to the parish priest, e.g., in making a parishioner's will, publication or certificate of banns of matrimony, blessing and sprinkling of holy water and holy bread, and bidding of beads (or "bedes"), on Sundays, the Communion or "greater cursing," the compotus relating to the Calendar, the canon missae, and a few occasional or votive Masses. It was moreover useful to the bishop and his chaplain, coming to any parish in the diocese, to find included in the M. on the spot the Confirm. service (which of right belonged to his Pontifical), as well as the "Benedictions" to be performed by "bishops and suffragans," all written or printed in a convenient volume.²—B2. CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

MANUAL ACTS.—This term is usually employed to designate the hand-gestures which the Rubric of the PB directs the celebrant to make when, in consecrating the bread and wine at the Euch., he recites our Lord's words and actions at the Last Supper. As now worded and arranged, this Rubric dates from 1662. The earliest extant copies of both Oriental and Latin liturgies contain no directions for the performance of these acts at this place, though most or all of them indicate a signature of the elements with the cross before or after consecration. In one form or another, however, the MA. make their appearance in liturgical practice at a very early date. An eminent French liturgist points out³ that in ecclesiastical functions sometimes the words employed are the cause of certain actions being used, sometimes the actions necessary to the accomplishment of the rite are the cause of the forms of words which accompany them. We may probably here find the origin of the MA.; the recitation of our Lord's actions drew the priest to imitate them. When the MA. do appear they assume a great variety of forms, as each liturgy has its own use, and sometimes the various editions of the same liturgy differ from each other on this point. We cannot enter on a detailed examination of this complex subject here; to do so would carry us beyond our scope; it may be enough to say that the Rubric in our PB is in general harmony with the directions found in other liturgies. (But see art. FRACTION.) It must not be supposed that the performance of the MA. is essential to a valid consecration of the Euch., but they are valuable as helping the celebrant to direct his intention aright and to keep his attention alert at a most solemn moment of his highest ministry; and their reverent performance adds a dignity to the sacred rite which is a great help to the devotion of the people, and to their realisation of the truth that the priest is acting in persona Christi.¹—R2. T. I. BALL.

¹ See Memoir of H. Bradshaw, by G. F. Prothero, 1888, p. 425.

² A York M., with Sar. M. in appendix, is in Surtess Soc., vol. 63.

³ Explication des Cérémonies de l'Eglise, De Vert, 1720, I 203.

MARK, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 30; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 10.

MARRIAGE.—It is a significant fact that the Church in the PB attaches the title Holy to four Divine Institutions only:
1. Marriage Bapt., HC, Matrimony, Orders.
as a State Why? Because she considers that of Life. each of these is of Divine origin, and that each introduces the recipients of the grace given through its means into a consecrated state. Hence those Christians who enter on the married state are specially consecrated to God in a new sphere of action and of covenanted grace.

For Christians therefore the physical facts of M. become sacramental, for God Himself consecrates these physical facts and makes them His ministers. If
2. Consecration we rightly think thus of M., we shall of its strive to set its physical side in its Physical Side. right aspect before the young at the proper age (not too late) from the lips of father, mother, pastor, or friend. It is quite possible to do this without a suggestion of evil, without a thought of sin coming to the mind of either teacher or taught and so doing harm. The plain unvarnished statements of the PB are frequently disliked, but they set forth primary truths which are too often ignored until it is too late.

The Ch. considers M. to be a means of grace, and so it is. The pr. put on the lips of the priest for the newly-married is that, because in M. is represented the mystical union of Christ and His Ch., therefore the life of the man and his wife is to rise to high levels of unselfishness and love and peace, and for this God's grace is asked. Why is this view of M. so agreeable to the Christian consciousness? Because the family reflects the Divine Nature, so far as we are permitted to comprehend that Nature. M. completes the human personality. The two natures joined should raise, strengthen and purify each other, each supplying what the other lacks.

Many people stumble at the vow of obedience, but:
(i) Obedience implies no servile submission to a tyrant, nor does it imply moral or mental inferiority in those who promise it.

4. The Vow of Obedience. (ii) The principle of subordination runs through every department of life, and further we seem to find it in the glimpses we obtain of the relations of the Godhead. (iii) The vow of obedience does not imply that the wife is to yield blind obedience, or to submit to injunctions which tamper with principles of morality. Nor has the husband any right to interfere with his wife in that department of her religious life which is only concerned with her own individual self. Nothing is clearer in the Gospels than that our Lord sets a value on the individual soul; that woman is not a mere possession of man (a view which is suggested by the Ten Commandments), but has a personality as valuable to man as his is to her. Therefore M. is no mere contract. But in all associations there must be a head, and in what concerns their united life the husband should lead. How very little room there comes to be for obedience in an ideal Marriage! The husband and wife take counsel together, each has his (or her) own department of work, and should reign supreme in it, but each respects the wishes, tastes, pursuits and opinions of the other.

¹ [Hence the importance of the MA. being done "before the people."]

St. Paul's views as to women's inferiority have been much disliked by opponents of the Church's view of Marriage. Now there is only One who shows Himself for ever above all temporary and local influences, whose words come to us down the ages with perennial power. Inspired as we know the writers of the OT and NT were, still each was influenced by his own peculiar environment. St. Paul was influenced by the spirit of his time. But we must not forget that he is never disposed to claim infallibility when he is speaking in his own person, and that he rises in his Epistle to the Ephesians to the highest conception of Marriage.

Nothing destroys the completeness of M. so much as the selfish temper which leads a man to consider himself the most important person in the union. There is a temper of mind found in some men and due in part to evil education, which allows those who possess it to express contempt for women as a class, and who, with no claims to any personal superiority, sneer at women's education and women's religion. Such have no sympathy with the sufferings of women, and will not stretch out a finger to rescue those whom their own sin has degraded. We find this temper in many of those who come to be married in church. It can only be driven out by more training in unselfishness at home during childhood, and by the influence of the Holy Spirit.

The Ch. prays that the persons who have just entered on this holy estate of matrimony may have the gift of children, and may live to see their children brought up virtuously. "The Family," says Bp. Westcott, "includes three primal relations, husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister. And these three relations reveal the essential law of all human fellowship. They are... the original sacraments of society."

There is nowadays a dislike of numerous families. We have put this very mildly. It is not so much a dislike of large families which is prevalent, as a dislike of children at all. In the PB there is no idea of a childless M. being desirable. Unfortunately, many women deliberately refuse motherhood, or at any rate refuse to bear more than one child. This is the evil which right views of M. should drive out. We are taught in the Bible and in the PB the intense value the Lord sets on children, and our own common sense informs us that the family is the foundation of national life and prosperity. The ideals of the PB should be proclaimed aloud; and part of the religious training of boys and girls should be the consideration of what the Ch. teaches about Holy Matrimony, its sacredness, and the high calling of fatherhood and motherhood.

In the M. Service, as in other Offices, the Church strikes at the root of selfish individualism. Its ideal is that man and wife should live for each other's sake, should make their earthly homes churches in miniature, and bring up their children to serve God all the days of their life. It ought to be possible for pastors and teachers to invest ordinary home life with the spirit of romance, to enable men and women to see behind all its cares and worries, joys and sorrows, the perpetual uplifting presence of God. And it is in homes such as the M. Service sketches that other vocations are found, and the divine voice is heard calling to other states of life.

Christian Marriage, Christian Homes, are the ideal of the PB; no ideal of untroubled happiness is set forth, no immunity from care is promised. "For better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health." That is the solemn promise. Out of this constancy on both sides by the grace and blessing of God innumerable blessings have flowed out on Church and country. And no greater ill could come to both than that a low view of the privileges, happiness and responsibilities of M. should be put in the place of the ideal of the PB.

(For details of the MARRIAGE SERVICE, see separate article.)—ME. E. ROMANES.

MARRIAGE, CHRISTIAN.—Marriage is the regulated union of man and woman. Its origin is assigned by our Lord to God (Mt. 19 4-6, Mk. 10 6-9): God "made them male and female"; God "hath joined them together." The Christian Church, following our Lord's teaching, looks to God as the Founder of M., and seeks the laws of M. in the institution of the Founder, rather than in the terms of the contract between the parties, or in the facts of the sexual union as it has been variously practised in the history of fallen man. In this the Christian Church takes different ground from many theorists who regard M. as a merely civil status or contract; and from many systems of human law. To the Roman law, more perhaps than to any other in history, M. was simply a contract which held no more than the terms of the contract had put into it. Thus, husband and wife were held free to rescind the contract by mutual consent. A modern group of students of origins tends to regard the regulated M. of later times as a development from loose beginnings in promiscuity or polyandry, which are presumed to have marked the race in its emergence from a lower type. But it is admitted that no such uniformity of progression from lower to higher types can be proved. The Church of England, in the opening Exhortation of the "Form of Solemnisation of Matrimony," specifies three "causes for which matrimony was ordained." These causes are (1) the procreation of children, (2) the avoidance of sin, (3) mutual society, help, and comfort. Of these the first (Mal. 2 13, Gen. 1 27, 28) and third (Gen. 2 18) are stated in Holy Scripture to have been Divine purposes. The second may not have been regarded in the original institution, but is become important under fallen conditions (1 Cor. 7 2). The most marked feature of the union is that it is an union in one flesh. Our Lord asserts that this character essentially characterises the Divine joining: "And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain but one flesh" (Mk. 10 6-9, Mt. 19 4-6). The result of such Divine joining is that man may not put it asunder. As described in Holy Scripture, the primeval M. was the union of a single pair, nor was there in the Divine institution any facility of divorce: "from the beginning it was not so" (Mt. 19 8). The history of man, so far as we can trace it, shows the general prevalence of both polygamy and divorce; and both these practices were suffered among the Israelites in OT times. Of DIVORCE (which see) our Lord says: "Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives" (Mt. 19 8).

With the coming of Christ, and the founding of the Christian Church as His Body, there came the consequence that the strictness and sanctity of the original ordinance were reverted to. In the regenerate no sinful declension from the primal ordinance was admissible. At no time has polygamy been suffered in the Christian Church. And from the first the Christian community combated the prevalent laxity of divorce.

For the Christian, M. was early felt to be not only the original sacred ordinance, but that ordinance now taken up into a higher sanctity. The unity of husband and wife was to St. Paul a mysterious counterpart of the unity of Christ with the Church (Eph. 5 32). It was also the unity of two persons, each of whom was a member of the body of Christ, and a temple of the Holy Ghost. As such, when united in marriage, they not only remained each blessed by the Spirit as before the M., but the grace of the indwelling Spirit working through the Divine institution of M. made the M. union a deeper, more mysterious interpenetration of being than it had been even in Paradise. In such a sense M. may be styled sacramental. The grace of Christian M. may be said to be the abiding grace of Baptism passed into the mould of the Divine institution of M. What is new would seem to be not so much the bestowal of grace from a fresh and independent source, or by a fresh and independent channel, as the development of the indwelling grace of the baptised in the Divinely ordered estate of M. now undertaken by the persons.

1. The first of the essentials of Christian M. is Consent. It does not appear that among Oriental peoples before Christ the consent of the parties was regarded as essential. But to the Roman law consent was the one essential feature. Without it, says Quintilian, it would be "of no service to have sealed the tables" (Inst. v. 11 32). The Christian Church alike in the East and in the West entirely adopted this feature of the Roman law. The sanctity of the person of each member of Christ's Body made it more than ever acceptable. No M. is held valid in Christian countries, whether in ecclesiastical or civil courts, where consent is found defective.

2. Next as to Solemnisation. The benediction of the Christian bishop or priest was no doubt commonly sought at a very early date in Christian history (Tertullian, Ad Uxor. 2 9, Clem. Alex., Pædag. iii. 11 63). The ordinary solemnities accompanying a M. would at first be those of Roman law and custom, with this prayer of benediction somewhere introduced. The benediction came in time to be regarded as the central feature of the solemnities. But, summing up the first thousand years of Christianity, it is sufficiently clear that where a marriage which Christian rules did not bar had been celebrated with the usual civil forms it was accepted as valid, and that no priestly benediction was required as a condition of validity.

In later theology there has been a tendency in the Eastern Church to require the priestly benediction as an essential feature of Christian M.; while in the West M. effected by consent and the copula without due solemnisation in the face of the Church was held irregular but valid. In England before Lord Hardwicke's Act in 1753 persons who had united themselves irregularly might be recognised in an ecclesiastical court as married persons, and ordered to proceed to solemnisation in facie Ecclesiae. Since Lord Hardwicke's Act solemnisation has been required for validity. It follows from what has been said that ecclesiastically the priest's part in the M. service is not to effect the M., but to witness the effecting of it by the parties, and to bless it when effected: while from the point of view of English law the solemnisation and registration by the recognised official, whether priest, registrar or other person, may be said to effect the M. It may also be concluded that the marriages of Christian persons before a registrar may be accepted as ecclesiastically valid, however incomplete or irregular.

3. Theologians in the West have in a majority not inclined to regard the Copula as an essential of Christian M.: but the courts everywhere treat physical incapacity as a ground for declaring nullity of M. And in the Latin Church any unconsummated M. may on occasion be dispensed by the Pope.

4. An important condition of Christian M. is that the parties to it should be Christians. The M. of a baptised person with a person unbaptised is forbidden by long Christian tradition, and was treated as null and void by various ecclesiastical canons before the Reformation. It does not appear that a priest has any authority to solemnise M. in such cases. Nor is it easy to see on what authority a bishop would assume to dispense, notwithstanding some well-known historical instances.

5. The age at which capacity for M. is recognised by the Western Canon Law is for men fourteen years, and for women twelve years. No change in this respect has been made since the Reformation, and these ages are still the ages for valid M. by the law of England. They are the ages at which the Roman civil law found it convenient to recognise puberty. But in countries or provinces where the law of the land requires a higher age such requirement will naturally find acceptance. Thus in the Indian Christian Marriage Act, 1872, sec. 60, it is laid down for native Christians that "the age of the man intending to be married shall exceed sixteen years, and the age of the woman intending to be married shall exceed thirteen years."

The Christian Church is bound by the requirements of the Institution of the Divine Founder, as re-imposed by the Lord Jesus

4. Relation to State Law.

Christ. These requirements have been interpreted in detail by the many centuries of Christian practice and Church law. The Christian citizen is also bound where conscience admits by the enactments of the State. But grave inconveniences arise where the regulations of the State are not in harmony with those of the Church. So grave are they that in a country with several religions such as India there can be no one state law of M., but it is found necessary to give civil validity to the personal law of each person according to the requirements of his religion. In England till very recent years the law of the land was simply the canon law of the Christian Church adopted and ratified by the State. But in 1857 the Divorce Act admitted divorce with the right of re-marriage for certain specified causes, and in 1907 the Deceased Wife's Sister Act made valid the M. of a man with the sister of his deceased wife. In neither case is the change in accordance with the canons or formularies of the Church, and in neither case has the Church in any formal way accepted or ratified the action of the State. As regards the officers and members of the Church they must in such essential matters be understood to stand where they stood before. (See DIVORCE, § 3.)

In the missionary work of the Church some grave M. problems arise. There are the problems of (1) polygamous converts, (2) the re-marriage of converts, and (3) mixed Ms. between Christians and non-Christians.

5. Missionary Problems.

(1) As regards polygamous persons the undoubted answer of all Christian precedent is that no baptised person can be permitted to continue in the M. relation with more than one partner at the same time. A difference of opinion is expressed as to the case of the converted wife of a polygamous man, such wife being herself entirely faithful to the man. (2) St. Paul's instruction in 1 Cor. 7 12-16 (the privilegium Paulinum) instructs the converted partner to retain as wife or husband the unconverted partner, if such partner "be pleased to abide." But, if such partner χωριεται, depart, or rather, as St. Chrysostom understands it, be the cause of separation, "a brother or a sister is not under bondage in such" circumstances. This has been in the history of the Church very commonly understood to admit re-marriage. (3) The weight of Christian precedent is against sanctioning the solemnisation of any marriage between a baptised person and a person unbaptised.—ma. O. D. WATKINS.

MARRIAGE SERVICE.—The essence of M. is the mutual consent of the contracting parties, whereby in the presence of witnesses they accept one another as husband and wife. But as this may be but a civil contract, Christian folk naturally seek the benediction of the Church, and the civil contract becomes Holy Matrimony or Christian M. Thus, in primitive Church days, the definitely Christian element was the celebration of the Euch. with a solemn benediction of the wedded pair.¹

The Church practically took over the heathen M. rites of pagan Rome and christianised them, replacing of course the sacrifices to the gods by the Nuptial Mass. The close correspondence of details may be seen in the following analytical comparison, parallels being marked by the same letter.

Heathen (Roman) Marriage Rite.—(i) Sponsalia (Betrothal): (a) Presents (arrhae) i.e., "earnest" money; (b) The Kiss; (c) The giving of the Ring; (d) The joining of hands. (ii) Confarreatio (Wedding proper): (e) (Blood) sacrifices to the gods; (f) Veiling (velum, "flammeum"); (g) Crowning with flowers; (h) Prayers; (i) Partaking of the sacrificial cake. Procession, ceremonies at bridegroom's house, coena nuptialis. Christian Marriage Rite (as described by Pope Nicholas I to the Bulgarians in 866).—(d) Sponsalia (espousals); (c) Subarhatio (giving of the ring by the man to the woman); (a) Conveyance of dowry by attested documents; (e), (h), (i) Nuptial Mass (with Communion of the bridal couple); (f) Solemn Benediction, the veil being held over them; (g) "Crowning," as they leave the church.

The early Roman Sacramentaries (Leo., Gel., Greg.) provide for the Nuptial Mass the usual Colls., a special Pref. and a Benediction (after the Consecration).

The Sarum Services consisted of (1) Espousal, (2) twofold Benediction, (3) Nuptial Mass, in which after the Fraction the husband and wife kneeling at the altar step received the solemn "sacramental Benediction." The features (1) and (2) were practically reproduced in the 1549 PB, which explicitly enjoined (3) in the concluding rubric "The new married persons (the same day of their marriage) must receive the HC."

The 1549 M. Office, "of Solemnisation of Matrimony," was a virtual reproduction of the Sarum Ordo ad faciendum Sponsalia, and, as much of the Ordo was generally conducted in the mother-tongue, the change was less apparent. It may be thus analysed:

(A) Marriage Service Proper (in the body of the church): (a) Opening Exh. (first and last sentences Sar., remainder from Hermann's Consultatio); (b) The Betrothal ("joining of hands," an age-long, essential custom); (c) The

¹ "Unde sufficimus ad enarrandam felicitatem ejus matrimonii quod ecclesia conciliat, et confirmat oblatio, et obsignat benedictio, angeli renuntiant, Pater rato habet?" (Tertullian, A. Usor. 29).

Rite proper; (d) Solemn Declaration of the Marriage; (e) First Benediction. (B) Post

4. Marriage Service in the PB. (f) One of two psalms (128 or 67); (g) Versicles and Responses; (h) Prayers for (1) blessing in domestic life, (2) fruitfulness of the marriage, (3) mutual service; (i) Second Benediction; (k) Exhortation (a cento of appropriate passages from Holy Scripture).

In subsequent revisions of the PB very slight changes were made, only the sign of the cross (in each of the Benedictions of 1549) was removed in 1552. The office, as it now stands in the PB, is, of all our present services, most nearly identical with that of the Sar. Manual.

In the Irish PB of 1877 the opening address is shortened, but whether it is improved is very doubtful. In these days plain teaching on purity of life is, alas! still greatly needed. At the end of the office (after the sermon or address) the minister adds the Pr. "O Almighty Lord and everlasting God" (2nd Coll. at end of Communion Service), and, if there be no Communion, "The Grace of our Lord," etc. All that is effected by this is however a false sense of completeness; whereas the original English rite of 1549 was so compiled as to indicate (by the very abruptness of its ending) that its true completion was to be found in the Nuptial Euch. The Amer. PB contains the first part of the Service only, all appointed to be said at the altar being omitted.

From very early days (circa 4th cent.) Ms. in Lent were forbidden on the natural ground that, as they are occasions of happiness and great rejoicing, it was not fitting that their celebration should disturb the Lenten solemnities and self-denial. In a later age this prohibition was extended to Advent and Rogation-tide. But, although it was suggested in Convocation (1661) that no M. should be solemnised within the periods between (1) Advent Sunday and Epiphany Octave, (2) Septuagesima and Low Sunday, (3) Rogation Sunday and Trinity Sunday, this embargo was not inserted in the PB. But it still remains the law of the Church.—mb.

6. Times of Marriage. H. E. SCOTT.

MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN.—There is nothing in which the contrast between primitive Christianity and later developments is more striking than in the attitude taken towards our Lord's Mother. In the Gospels she appears as a spotless Virgin, humble and devout, chosen by God for the singular honour of being, in a unique way, the mother of his dear Son. But she stands out prominently only in connection with the Incarnation and Nativity; then she retires into a subordinate position, out of which she seldom emerges. In the Acts we catch one glimpse of her; she is among the disciples in the upper room after the Ascension praying for the coming of the Holy Ghost (Acts 1 14). She is mentioned only once in the rest of the NT, and that in an incidental manner and not by name (Gal. 4 4); though features taken from her history are found in the

H. E. SCOTT.

1. The BVM in Scripture and the Primitive Church. MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN.—There is nothing in which the contrast between primitive Christianity and later developments is more striking than in the attitude taken towards our Lord's Mother. In the Gospels she appears as a spotless Virgin, humble and devout, chosen by God for the singular honour of being, in a unique way, the mother of his dear Son. But she stands out prominently only in connection with the Incarnation and Nativity; then she retires into a subordinate position, out of which she seldom emerges. In the Acts we catch one glimpse of her; she is among the disciples in the upper room after the Ascension praying for the coming of the Holy Ghost (Acts 1 14). She is mentioned only once in the rest of the NT, and that in an incidental manner and not by name (Gal. 4 4); though features taken from her history are found in the apocalyptic description of the woman in Rev. 12.

Passing from the NT to the Fathers of the 2nd and 3rd cents., we find it just the same. Apart from the Incarnation and Nativity, our Lord's Mother is rarely mentioned. To take one instance only, there is no reference to her in Cyprian, On the Dress of Virgins, where we certainly might expect to find one; and it is the same all through his works (which are of considerable extent, occupying 842 pages in Hartel's ed.), except when he quotes Scripture, or speaks of Christ's birth. Indeed it may be safely asserted that no trace of pr. to her, or of seeking her intercession, can be found till the 4th cent.; and even then such traces are slight and infrequent.

It was not till the condemnation of Nestorianism at the Council of Ephesus, in 431, brought the BV. Mary into prominence that invocations of her and prs. to her became at all common. In the popular Christianity of those days, Christ the Mediator had been to a great extent lost sight of in Christ the Judge. And so men naturally sought for other mediators in the saints, and especially our Lord's Mother. After a time popular custom re-acted on the services of the Ch., and that in two ways.

(a) Invocations of Mary were introduced into public worship, at any rate by the 7th cent., not in Colls. or liturgical prs. proper, which have always been addressed to God, but in anthems, hymns, and prs. of an ejaculatory nature, of which the Hail Mary is the most familiar. In the East it is found in the Liturgies of St. James and St. Mark (though not in St. Basil and St. Chrysostom), but in the older MSS. it is prefaced by the clause, "Remember, Lord, the Archangel's voice, which says, Hail," etc. This made it merely a historical reference to the Incarnation; but, about the 12th cent., the prefacing clause was dropped, and so it became a direct address to the BV. Mary. The Ave Maria came into vogue in the West about the same time, and was constantly used in connection with the Lord's Prayer. But it was not until the 15th or 16th cent. that the final clause, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death," was added. The Hail Mary was, of course, discarded, with other devotions to our Lord's Mother, by the Ch. of Eng. at the Reformation, as unscriptural and unprimitive.

(b) The oldest Festivals of the BV. Mary are the Purification (end of 4th cent.) and the Annunciation (7th cent.); in these, however, our Lord was originally the more prominent figure. In the 8th cent. we find two more Festivals:—Sept. 8th, Nativity of the Virgin; Aug. 15th, her Falling Asleep (Assumption): and to these were added, in later times, a considerable number of others. The Ch. of Eng. has retained, as Red-letter Days, none but the two scriptural ones, the Purification and the Annunciation; and, as Black-letter Days, the Visitation (July 2nd), the Nativity, and the Conception (Dec. 8th).

In conclusion, mention must be made of the latest development of the worship of the BV. Mary—the doctrine of her Immaculate Conception, by which she is placed almost on an equality with Christ Himself. This doctrine, unknown before, appears first in the 12th cent., and was strongly opposed by many eminent theologians. It spread gradually, however, in the Roman Ch., until it was adopted as an article of faith by Pope Pius IX in 1854. But it is universally condemned, as unscriptural and false, by all other bodies of Christians, including the Ch. of England. (See also FESTIVAL, 8, 13, 14.)—C2. J. W. TYRER.

MASS.—The word M. is formed from the Latin mittere (past participle missus) = to dismiss. Its earliest use is in the latter part of the 4th cent. (St. Ambrose's Epp., and the Peregrinatio Silviae). Primarily it applied to any service, being even used of Mattins and Vespers. It now connotes: (a) The Euch. service proper. In Post-Reformation times it has been practically appropriated in the West by the Roman Church. Yet to this day it is used in Sweden and Denmark as a title of their (Lutheran) Communion services. (b) The Rite or Form of service used in the celebration of the Euch. Thus Bp. Cosin says to his opponent, "Will you deny that our service is a M.?" (P. Smart, Van. superst. Popish cerem.), i.e., has every essential possessed by the Roman M. (c) The musical setting of the parts of the office rendered chorally and instrumentally. (d) The action of "saying" (or celebrating) Mass.

The term to many English minds is so inextricably bound up with the Tridentine doctrine of Transubstantiation that in ordinary use it connotes this Roman philosophical error. Further, on account of similar associations it may be held to emphasise unduly the sacrificial aspect of the Euch., and more particularly the priestly element in that sacrifice. It was omitted in all revisions of the PB after 1549, probably because it cannot be found in Holy Scripture. Etymologically (though not by custom) it is unmeaning as applied to the Euch., and therefore inappropriate as a title of the Sacrament to which it has become accidentally attached; whereas the PB titles of the Euch. are scriptural, and "Holy Communion" emphasises its primary purpose. Yet it is to be remembered that the formal and official disuse of the word¹ as a liturgical or doctrinal term involves no sacrifice of truth or grace, and that in the PB Order of HC, through the operation of the Holy Ghost, the faithful receive the fullest Euch.

¹ Cp. Creighton, Ch. and Nation, p. 307: "It may be said that there is nothing in a name; but when a word is associated with a long-standing controversy, it is a great mistake to attempt to revive it. Words gain a significance which cannot be removed. The revival of a word inevitably creates suspicions that what it has long been held to signify is being revived also. Few things have done more mischief than the needless use of this word, partly from a modern tendency towards brevity, but more from a desire to obliterate old distinctions, and to restore unity by agreement in words when there was no corresponding unity in the thing signified. The same desire has led to an antiquarian revival of many of the accompaniments of the Communion Service, which had been discarded as not directly appropriate to its true meaning."

blessings which are annexed to the promises of Christ. Furthermore, the word M. has remained embedded in English speech in the terms Christmas, Michaelmas, Lammas, Candlemas, and (less familiarly) Childermas (Holy Innocents).—HB. H. E. SCOTT.

MATRIMONY.—See MARRIAGE, MARRIAGE (CHRISTIAN), MARRIAGE SERVICE.

MATTHEW, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 37; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 17.

MATTHIAS, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 29; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 8.

MATTINS.—See COMMON PRAYER, § 12; NOCTURN; LAUDS.

MAUNDY THURSDAY.—See HOLY WEEK, § 2; HOLY WEEK (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 5.

MEANS OF GRACE.—The phrase occurs in the General Thanksgiving (1662); "We bless Thee for . . . the means of grace."

1. Tridentine Doctrine. It represents the media gratia of the mediæval theology, a term limited to the Sacrs., on the theory that the Sacrs. (in the sense of the sacred elements duly ministered) so contain grace that the reception of the Sacr. involves the reception of grace ex opere operato, and that grace cannot normally be obtained by other channels. The Council of Trent (Sess. vii) devotes several canons to this function of Sacraments; see particularly § 6: "If any man saith that the Sacraments of the New Law do not contain the grace which they signify, or that on those who oppose no obstacle they do not confer very grace, as if they were but outward signs of grace or righteousness accepted through faith, and were but certain tokens of Christian profession . . . let him be anathema." Upon this theory, Sacrs. alone are "means of grace," the medium, the intermediary channel, through which grace is lodged within the being of man. Other things assistant to the spiritual life are "occasions of grace." Prayer, praise, acts of humiliation, surrender and obedience, the hearing and reading of the word of God, or of good words and books generally, do not bring new grace into the man, but stir up into more vivid exercise the grace already in him through the sacramental "means." The two ideas may be illustrated from the incident (as in the Received Text) of John 5 4. There the pool received its healing waters through the proper channels, while the advent of the angel stirred their virtues into efficacious activity.

It does not seem possible to support this well-defined theory by the witness of Scripture, nor does it appear to have been

2. PB View. present to the mind of the Reformers, against whose wider and less mechanical doctrine indeed the canon of Trent above cited seems to be directed. Even in the strict High Anglican school represented by the late Dean Hook the rigid Roman definition is not accepted (see Hook's Ch. Dict., edn. 1859: "Means of Grace: the Sacraments and other ordinances of the Church, through which grace is conveyed to souls prepared by faith and penitence to receive it"). In the PB the word "means" recurs at the close of the Ordination of Priests: "Grant that we may . . . receive what they shall deliver out of Thy most Holy Word, or agreeable to the same, as the means of our salvation"; words not likely to be used by those who limited to Sacraments the mediation of grace. The great inclusive word, "salvation," is here linked with the ministry of the word as its mediating channel. This, it is scarcely necessary to point out, is in line with the language of Scripture. See for example 1 Pet. 1 23: "Being born again, not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, by means of (διὰ with gen.) the word of God," and compare 1 Cor. 4 15: "I have begotten you by means of the Gospel." Such language would not naturally be used in presence of a theory like that of Trent.

It is further to the purpose to ask what, in the light of Holy Scripture, appears to be the true notion of "grace," a word all important for study in connection with many spiritual and ministerial problems. In the mediæval theology grace appears as a mysterious somewhat, an almost physical agent, if we may venture the phrase, capable of being contained and carried by a material vehicle, and which, received into the man, gives him a new "habit," or type, such as will (not of itself, but under proper impulses) come out in holy virtues. Compared with this, the Scriptural view of grace appears as at once freer and deeper. It is scarcely too much to say that in the apostolic teaching it is nothing less than "God for us" in free pardon and acceptance, and "God in us" in divinely potent action on the will and affections; "HĒ" rather than "it". Of such grace the "means" will be as various as are the ways of our spiritual contact with the Eternal Spirit: Word and Sacraments, normally, on the side of God; repentance, faith, love, obedience, worship, spiritual use of ordinances, on our side.—K5.

HANDLEY MOULE.

MEDITATION.—Meditation may be regarded as that spiritual exercise (of conversation, or intercourse of the mind and heart, with God) whereby the soul absorbs into itself from devout study the peculiar message and strength of Holy Scripture. Such an exercise distinctly enriches the intellectual faculty, recalls to the memory revealed truth, stimulates the understanding in penetrating its meaning, and moves the will to obedience. Such at all events is the Ch.'s ideal of the study of Scripture as she sets it forth in the Coll. for the 2nd Sunday in Advent—the true "Bible Sunday" of the Christian year. It is plainly indicated there that, to assimilate the power of the written word of God, we must (1) read, (2) mark, (3) learn, and (4) inwardly digest it.

To read means, in the first instance, to grasp the passage as it stands before us, using all the helps to interpretation which lie within our reach, so as to arrive at the meaning of the section as a whole; never forgetting that there is nothing more fruitful of ill than so to isolate any Scripture that its due connection with other Scriptures is forgotten or ignored. This paramount need of comparing Scripture with Scripture comes out the more clearly when we begin to mark the passage (in the PB sense of the word). By "marking" is meant noting the leading or dominant truth, arriving first at the main lesson, and then turning to the subsidiary truths which flow from it, either immediately, or by inference, or by comparison with other places of Holy Writ. Then follows the exercise of memory in the effort to learn either the ipsissima verba or some portion of them. This will enable us to grasp and master them thoroughly, and so they will become an abiding possession. But the final aim of M. is to be found in inwardly digesting what has been explored by the intellect and retained by the memory. By this last assimilative action of the soul the will is centred upon the particular mystery or truth, until a resolve is made to act upon its teaching—not a mere general or nebulous resolution, but a definite intention which is itself the germ of action. Thus, a fruitful M. upon Col. 19 would probably issue in a resolution to pray when least inclined to do so, and to practise intercessory pr. for the needs of others.

Before entering upon M. there should be a definite attempt to put the soul into right relation with God. For this purpose the help of the Holy Ghost may be sought by the devout use of the Veni Creator, the Coll. for the 2nd Sunday in Advent, and the Lord's Prayer. At the close of the M. the natural instinct of the devout heart would be to offer Thanksgiving coupled with such a petition as that of the 3rd Coll. at the end of HC ("Grant, we beseech Thee, etc.").—K1.

H. E. SCOTT.

MERCY.—M., from Latin mercedem, used in the PB of "God's pitiful forbearance towards His creatures, and forgiveness of their offences" (Murray, Eng. Dic.). In the Bible the sense of pardon does not enter primarily into the word which represents Hebrew רָחַם and רָחַם , and Greek ἔλεος and ολεωπότης. In the PB the emphasis also is not on God's forgiveness of sin, but His quality of gracious forbearance and tenderness from which redemption and forgiveness proceed. Thus, in the Lesser Lit., "have M." = "have pity on." In the Exh. at MEP, M. is practically synonymous with goodness. The phrase "shewing M." (11th Sun. aft. Trin.) represents "parcendo," but in the general prayers after the Lit. "whose property . . . is to have M. and to forgive" represents "misereari semper et parcere," and in the same pr. "the pitifulness of thy M." = "misericordia tuas pietatis." It is not, therefore, synonymous with pardon, as in the phrase "He M. sought and M. found." The plural is used in the sense of unmerited blessings freely bestowed, and the adjective "merciful" in sense of compassionate, but almost "forgiving" in the Pr. "in the time of War and Tumults."—K3.

J. R. DARBYSHIRE.

METHODIST.—The Methodist movement grew out of a burning compassion in the hearts of a group of pious Oxford Church-

1. Origin. men for the great masses of the population living in irreligion and sin. It was a period when organised religion had, both in the Ch. and among the Dissenters, lost its hold upon the people as a whole. The devoutness of this group and their devotion to good works soon brought upon them the derision of those round about, and "Methodists," "Holy Club," "Sacramentarians," "Bible Moths," "Enthusiasts," were among the designations applied to them—simply because they took their religion seriously, and observed, amid prevailing laxity, the ordinances and teaching of their Ch. The three outstanding members of this group of Oxford Ms. were John and Charles Wesley, and somewhat later George Whitefield, whose eloquence was the wonder of his age, but who lacked the more solid qualities of his two associates.

Pious and devout as they were, we find them passing, in the year 1738, through a very definite spiritual change, an awa-

2. Development. kening to a new sense of the obligations of their discipleship; and out of this sense was born the Evangelical Revival and the M. movement in the wider field. Men to whom such an awakening had come were unable to stay in the scholarly retirement of a University. The people were outside the churches, and no amount of faithful preaching from parish pulpits would reach those who needed it most.

Whitefield was the first to recognise the need of field preaching, and we find him swaying vast crowds in London, Bristol, and elsewhere. To John Wesley this was very distasteful, "having been all my life (until very lately) so tenacious of every point relating to decency and order that I should have thought the saving of souls almost a sin if it had not been done in a ch." (Journal, March 29, 1739). Four days later, "I submitted to be more vile, and proclaimed in the highways the glad tidings of salvation, speaking from a little eminence in a ground adjoining to the city, to about three thousand people" (April 2). The same disposition led him to regard the sacred work of preaching as belonging exclusively to ordained ministers and he frowned on breaches of that rule. He closes his reference to the first relaxation of this rule with the words, "It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good." This twofold surrender of preconceived ideas in the interests of evangelisation is characteristic of his disposition throughout his career, and explains at once his success, and the antagonism aroused among religiously-minded people. We cannot be surprised if the worse type of clergy resented what was an emphatic rebuke to their own shortcomings. Moreover, many a devout and unselfish incumbent, enthusiastically loyal to the worship and discipline of the Eng. Ch., would be shocked at the irregularities and the extravagances which seemed to accompany the movement, and would find it hard to believe that anything but evil could come of it.

Nevertheless, it was the fixed idea of those who launched the M. movement to work within the Ch. of Eng., and not outside. John Wesley's conception of his societies [was] that they should be leavening influences within the Ch., as the Religious Societies of the previous period had been: and all his rules were first framed upon that principle. In no case were the special services of the Ms. to be held during Ch. hours, and it was many years before the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper came to be administered in any of the M. chapels.

However, the closing of the pulpits of the Ch. to him drove Wesley more and more to the necessity of building special preaching places for the needs of his societies, and the exclusion, in many parishes, of Ms. from the Lord's Table led them ultimately to demand administration in their own chapels. The majority of these had no tender associations with the Ch. as Wesley had; and therefore would not feel his scruples about breaking her order. Eventually Wesley reconciled himself to the far more drastic step of ordination, separation from the Ch. being still deprecated with earnestness and sincerity.

His attitude to the PB is thoroughly illustrative of his disposition in these matters. In a letter dated Sept. 10, 1784, he writes: "I have prepared a Liturgy little differing from that of the Ch. of Eng. (I think the best constituted Ch. in the world) which I advise all the travelling preachers to use on the Lord's Day in all the congregations, reading the Lit. only on Wednesdays and Fridays, and praying extempore on all other days." In the preface he writes: "I believe there is no Liturgy in the world either in ancient or modern language which breathes more of a solid and scriptural rational piety than the Common Pr. of the Ch. of Eng. And, though the main of it was compiled considerably more than 200 years ago, yet is the language of it not only pure but strong and elegant in the highest degree." But side by side with this laudation must be placed the freedom with which he alters it to suit his purpose—much more than a "little"! Venite, Benedicite, Benedictus, Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, and Athanasian Creed are omitted, as are "most of the Holy-Days so called, as at present answering no valuable end." In the Minutes of the Conference of Preachers in 1788 we come upon the following entry: "Q. 21. What further directions may be given concerning the Prs. of the Ch. of Eng. ? A. The Assistants shall have a discretionary power to read the PB on Sunday mornings where they think it expedient, if the generality of the Society acquiesce with it, on condition that Divine Service never be performed in the Ch. hours on the Sundays when the Sacrament is administered in the Parish Ch. where the preaching-house is situated, and the people be strenuously exhorted to attend the Sacrament in the Parish Ch. on those Sundays." But were such exhortations likely to have effect upon those who had no traditional regard for the Ch. of Eng., who had been brought out of darkness not by services of ordered beauty but by preaching of compelling power, and who moreover could not fail to realise that in so many respects their great leader brushed aside the restrictions of his Ch. where they militated against what he knew to be his mission? Canon Overton therefore states the plain irresistible truth when he says: "It is impossible not to come to the conclusion that from the very first the Wesleyan movement, so far as it concerned organisation, never was and never could have been a Ch. movement. . . . What was the tendency of the movement from the very beginning? Where did the followers of Wesley find their religion? Where was the true motive power?

Surely not in the Ch. system but in their own separate organisations" (Hist. of the Eng. Ch., 1714-1800, p. 75).—A1. W. FIDDIAN MOULTON.

METROPOLITAN.—The bishop of the chief see of a province. See ARCHBISHOP.

MICHAELMAS.—See FESTIVAL, § 41; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE), § 18.

MINISTER.—The word minister is used either technically or in a wider sense. Technically it has a threefold signification, first as regards the ranks of the clergy, secondly liturgically, and thirdly in connection with the Sacraments. A familiar division of the clergy is into Bishops, Priests and Ms. In this sense M. means one who in different ways assists the members of the two higher orders in the discharge of their functions, and so immediately ministers to them (Bishops or Priests) and mediately, through his ministry to them, ministers to God. In this sense M. includes not only Deacon and Sub-deacon but the Minor Orders also. Liturgically, the sacred Ministers are the Deacon and Sub-deacon, or as they are also called the Gospeller and Epistler,¹ assisting the Priest or Bp. in the celebration of HC; inferior Ms. are such as acolytes, or servers, provided they have been properly admitted to office by the Bp. or by his authority. In regard to the Sacraments we must distinguish the Divine M., who is the Holy Ghost, and the human M. The latter has to minister the outward and visible sign, while it is the Divine M. who gives, or ministers, as one of the functions of His temporal mission, sent from the Father by the Son, the inward spiritual grace to the soul. Only in one case can a layman be properly said to be a M., and that is in regard to baptism. He is an "extraordinary M." of that Sacrament in case of necessity. In any other matter only a "clerk" is properly a M. By a "clerk" ("Clericus") is not necessarily meant one who is in Holy Orders. A clerk is one who is either in Minor, or in Holy, Orders. Thus a reader is a clerk, if he has been formally admitted to the office by the Bp. The term lay-reader is an unfortunate one. Those so called are now usually admitted solemnly to their office by the Bp., and should be called "readers," and therefore Ms., so far as they perform the duties authoritatively assigned to them. The choir-men, or psalmistae as they were formerly called, are also, if properly admitted to their office, Ms., and are in that case Ms. in regard to those functions they are appointed to perform. The title lay-clerks is a contradiction in terms, and can only mean that persons who are laymen are paid to perform the duty of clerks, psalmistae, without having been admitted to be clerks.

In a wider sense all who belong to the sacred ministry of the Church may as such be called Ms., as being in different ways and degrees, and by the discharge of different functions, engaged in the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. In the Book of Common Prayer the word Minister is constantly used in this wider sense and is frequently equivalent to the term officiant. That is particularly so in the offices of Matins and Evensong, though in places it is clearly provided that the officiant should be a Priest.¹ It would be easy to construct theories or explanations as to why the term Minister is used in one place and why the term Priest is used in another, but such explanations would only in some cases be satisfactory.—ra. E. G. WOOD.

¹ [So canon 24 of 1604; there seems to be a deliberate intention to replace the older terms, used also for separate Orders, by unambiguous words.]

MINOR CANONS are in a few cases by custom appointed by the dean, but generally by the whole chapter. Their number is not to exceed six nor be less than two, with normal stipends of not less than £150. A minor Canon may take and hold together with his canonry a benefice that is within the limit of six miles from his cathedral or collegiate church. (See also canons 24, 42, 44.) For further information see VICARS CHORAL.—A3.

R. J. WHITWELL.

MINOR ORDERS.—The Minor Orders of the Ch. had their origin in the first half of the 3rd cent. Cornelius of Rome (Euseb., HE. vi. 43 11) gives a list of the Ch. officials in the city: "one Bp., 46 presbyters, 7 deacons, 7 subdeacons, 42 acolytes, 52 exorcists and readers together with doorkeepers, more than 1,500 widows and afflicted persons, all of whom the Lord's grace and goodness feeds." Of these offices some were developed out of the diaconate, namely, that of the subdeacon, perhaps because the number of deacons was limited, and those of the acolyte and doorkeeper, possibly in imitation of heathen temples (Harnack), but more probably from natural needs. Readers and exorcists, here classed together, seem before this time to have occupied a superior and independent position as laymen, and were generally subjected to the others as their duties became less important till they formed a clergy of minor rank. They were all appointed or ordained without the imposition of hands (a single exception in the case of readers in the 4th cent. Apostolic Constitutions), but with the delivery of the symbols of office: in the case of subdeacons the empty chalice and paten from the bp. and a ewer and towel from the archdeacon (7th cent.), of acolytes a linen bag (Rome, 7th cent.) or a candlestick and pitcher for the eucharistic wine (Gallican), of exorcists and readers a book, and of doorkeepers a key (Gallican). This porrectio instrumentorum was extended to the Major Orders in the 11th cent., and is now sometimes considered essential in the Roman Ch. As the MO. had become mere steps towards the priesthood and were frequently conferred on boys, they were dropped at the Reformation, though the problem of training the clergy was not taken in hand, except in so far as the Universities were intended to be the place of their education. There seems to be no object in reviving them. On the other hand, with the church revival has arisen a need for men to do the work originally done by them, and a large body of lay acolytes, sacristans, servers, catechists, clerks, vergers, etc. has been called into existence.

See further, SUBDEACON, CATECHIST, EVANGELIST. READER, SACRISTAN, SERVER: also Dearmer, Parson's Handbook; Bingham, Ant. iii. 1; Wordsworth, Ministry of Grace, c. 3; Duchesne, Origins of Christian Worship, c. 10, for forms of ordination; Maclean, The Ancient Ch. Orders, pp. 78-87; Harnack, on the origin of the readership and of the other lower Orders, in Sources of the Apostolic Canons, Eng. tr., 1895; Report of the Committee of the Conv. of Cant. appointed to consider the question of restoring an order of readers and subdeacons in the Ch., 1904, No. 383, Nat. Soc. (an admirable and concise survey of the whole question); Regulations respecting Readers and other Lay Officers, 1905, S.P.C.K.—A3.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

MISDEMEANOUR.—A modern term for public offences, not amounting to treason or felony. Such may be either of commission or omission—and cognisable on indictment, or by process specially enacted. It includes perjury, battery, libel, conspiracy, and public nuisance. The punishment is by imprisonment and fine. A comparative table of felonies and misdemeanours is in J. F. Stephen, Gen. View Crim. Law (1890) 4 65, 66.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

MISSA CATECHUMENORUM, MISSA FIDELIUM.—The names applied in the early Middle Ages to the two parts into which the Office of HC has always been divided. The former, MC. (so called because it was open to the CATECHUMENS), consisted mainly of Lessons and Sermon. The latter, MF., contained the Consecration and Communion, at which only baptised Christians (Fideles) were allowed to be present. The MC. has been from the beginning, and is still, sometimes used as a separate service (see ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE).—HB.

J. W. TYRER.

MISSA FIDELIUM.—See MISSA CATECHUMENORUM.

MISSAL, or Mass-Book (missale).—A Service-book for the Mass, which we call the Communion Service. In the M. of the 13th or 14th cent. and onward there were usually contained in somewhat varying order: (1) a Calendar; (2) the variable parts of the service proper for seasons (Temporale, or proprium de tempore) from Advent to the end of the Trinity season; (3) in some convenient part of the volume the Ordinary and Canon—fixed portions of the Mass invariably used on every occasion, the order for reception of the Euch. by the priest being included; (4) the variable parts of the service proper for such Saints' days as were furnished with a proper office (Sanctorale, or Proprium Sanctorum); also (5) the like parts of service for classes or orders of saints (Commune Sanctorum proprium non habentium), to be used in cases where "proper" forms were not provided; (6) Votive Masses, and other Masses and prayers for several occasions, including matrimony, funerals, dedication festival, etc.; and (7) other supplementary matter, among which sometimes an accentuary was added to guide in pronunciation of hard words without false quantities, as well as a tabula of contents. The Sar. M. has been edited in

¹ [The use of the term M. in the CANONS of 1604 to signify the higher order of ministry, in contradistinction to the diaconate, should be noted; e.g., 32, "None to be made Deacon and M. both in one day."]]

Lat. by F. H. Dickinson, 1861-83, a translation by A. H. Pearson, 1868 and 1884.—Hb.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

MISSION, A PAROCHIAL.—The idea of providing for special religious efforts, occasional in character, and specifically evangelistic in purpose, does not seem to have occurred to the minds of the compilers of the PB. The nearest approach to anything of the kind is to be found in the Communion Service on Ash-Wednesday, in which, after a solemn recognition of, and acquiescence in, God's judgment against open and flagrant sin, an appeal is made to sinners very much in the form of a M. sermon. In this remarkable address an earnest and impassioned appeal is made to those who are living in wilful sin to repent and turn to God; and words of the most solemn and terrible warning are blended with exhortations to forsake sin and accept the pardon offered in the Gospel. The exhortation is followed by penitential utterances, designed to give expression to the sense of contrition, and the desire for amendment that its earnest words may have excited. But there the thing ends; and no provision is made for dealing personally on that occasion with those who may have been convicted of their guilt and need.

We have to look elsewhere in the pages of the PB for any such provision, and we find it in the Exh. which follows the announcement of HC. "And because it is requisite," so runs the passage, "that no man should come to the holy Communion, but with a full trust in God's mercy, and with a quiet conscience; therefore, if there be any of you, who by this means" (i.e., a full trust in God's mercy) "cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word, and open his grief; that by the ministry of God's holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice, to the quieting of his conscience, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness."

If the Exh. in the Communion Service may be regarded as affording our Church's sanction of what is now pretty generally understood by the term M. preaching, this direction in the Communion Office witnesses to the importance, one may almost say, the necessity, of that personal dealing with individual souls which is so prominent a feature of all properly conducted Ms. The points in this direction that need to be carefully observed are these. First, the "anxious inquirer," to use a term with which recent evangelising efforts have made us familiar, shall apply not to any and every one who happens to have been admitted to priests' orders, but to a discreet and learned minister of God's Word—a spiritual specialist, in fact. Second, we notice that it is as a minister of God's Word that he is to be approached, and it is by the ministry of that word that the penitent is to be brought to receive the benefit of Absol., not by the mere utterance of an authoritative sentence of remission, without the condition precedent of the ministration of the word. Third, the reception of God's Absol. is to be accompanied with such spiritual help and guidance as the learning and discretion of the minister may enable him to impart.¹ It is not too much to say that these two passages in the PB witness to the need of some such agency as Parochial Ms., although the thought of thus meeting the need never presented itself to the mind of the compilers. It was reserved for a later age to devise means, whereby stirring Gospel preaching might be followed up by the offer of such direct personal help as an awakened soul usually requires in its endeavour to obtain the blessings of pardon and peace.

It was in the later sixties that parochial Ms., under that name, first began to be held within the Church of England. There are three names at least that call for special mention in connection with the inception of the movement: Robert Aitken of Pendeen; Father Benson of Cowley; and the late Primus of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, George Howard Wilkinson.

Robert Aitken, after a very remarkable spiritual experience which occurred some years after his ordination and changed the whole course of his life, found so little sympathy with his burning evangelistic zeal within his own Church at that time that for a number of years he preached wherever a door was open to him, and largely amongst the Methodists, and with extraordinary success. Subsequently he returned to the discipline and order of the Church, and in the year 1848 became the first incumbent of the remote parish of Pendeen in Cornwall. From the seclusion of his home in the far West he used occasionally to sally forth, as doors were opened to him, to hold what in those days were called "Revival Services" in churches in various parts of England, and with very remarkable results.

G. H. Wilkinson, when Vicar of Bishop Auckland, Durham, came into contact with some of the clergy who had been influenced by these efforts, and conceived the idea of conducting such evangelistic services on what seemed to him soberer and more distinctly Church lines. His early attempts in his own parish and elsewhere bore such good fruit that, on his removal to London, he was keen to organise throughout the Metropolis a great united effort of the same type.

Meanwhile Father Benson of Cowley, impressed with the study of Ms. in the Roman Church, was carefully training the most gifted members of his Confraternity for this special work, though on somewhat different lines from those which commended themselves to either of the other originators of the movement. He made no secret of his intention to make auricular confession the prominent feature of his Ms.; and it has continued to be so with missionaries of his school of thought. To him probably, however, more than to anyone else, we are indebted for the useful term M., which has on the whole been of great service to the movement.

It was in consultation with the Cowley Brotherhood, and also with Dr. MacLagan, the late Archbishop of York, and with some leading Evangelicals, that the great London Twelve Days' M. of 1869 was organised and held, which, although it excited a good deal of criticism and no small amount of opposition, produced a profound impression upon the religious life of the nation. It was very widely felt by the more earnest clergy that some such agency as this was just what was wanted, to raise the tone of the Church's spirituality, and to reach those who had hitherto seemed impervious to spiritual influences. All over the land there arose a cry for Parochial Ms. ; and the little handful of men who had any pretensions to be M. preachers were in great request. The apparent success of many of these early Ms. was extraordinary, stirring, as they did, whole neighbourhoods, so that for the time being hardly anything else was thought of or talked about, emptying public-houses and crowding churches, and reaching the careless and irreligious outside the churches as well as the unspiritual formalist within. Of course, such efforts must necessarily lose their novelty in process of time, and with it their capacity of attracting vast multitudes of people ; but the work remains as necessary to-day as it ever was, and, if there is less of curiosity and excitement, the results attained are none the less solid and abiding.

¹ [See also REPENTANCE, § 9, on Private Absolution.]

The history of the movement having been briefly sketched, a word or two upon the reasonableness of this method of procedure may not be out of place. (a) We have reason to believe that the awakening action of the Holy Spirit on the human heart is usually occasional and intermittent rather than continuous. If we then are "workers together with Him," we shall show our wisdom in assimilating our methods to His, while we make it our earnest pr. that He will find in our special effort His own Divine opportunity. (b) The very word Awakening points to the presence of a spirit of slumber amongst our people. It will hardly be disputed that this is deplorably prevalent. What multitudes of nominally Christian people seem to be living completely out of touch with the realities of the spiritual world ! Now we all know that it is the unusual that awakens the sleeper. A man may learn to sleep soundly through all the din of a London street, when once he is used to it, whereas half the amount of noise introduced into a quiet country village would spoil the night's rest of nearly all the inhabitants. Even so we may get used to the regular ministrations of our local clergy, however faithful these may have been. If, with the flight of years, we have grown familiar with the manner and the matter of their preaching, and yet no awakening has followed, is it at all probable that it will ever come to us through them ? Is not some special agency urgently called for to bring this about ? Now in a M. everything is out of the ordinary routine. New and unfamiliar hymns and tunes, new forms of pr. and the free use of extempore pr., a new style of preaching, and new opportunities of obtaining direct spiritual help and of arriving at a definite moral decision—all these and other special features of the effort are of a kind to rouse the sleeper from his lethargy, and to force upon his attention some sense of the reality and supreme importance of spiritual things. (c) It is clear that the NT recognises the gift of the Evangelist as something quite distinct from that of the teacher or pastor. And experience and observation show that a man may be an excellent and useful preacher, and yet have no aptitude for this kind of work, while others who are perhaps in many respects his inferiors are evidently endowed with this special faculty. "Are all evangelists ?" is a question that incontrovertible facts will permit us to answer only with an emphatic negative. Surely then, if God has given to some this special gift, He intends that those to whom He has imparted it shall have an opportunity of exercising it ; and we are only recognising that diversity of gifts which is characteristic of the Divine administration, when we both select for this work those who are specially gifted for it, and also set apart times in which this work shall take precedence of all others.

3. The Rationale of Missions.

To be successful, a M. needs to be carefully prepared for, both by pr. and active effort.

4. Mission Methods.

It is necessary to impress on the minds of the people that something unusual is about to occur, and that the opportunity offered is not one to be slighted. Special meetings for intercessory pr. and well organised house to house visitation, along with the distribution of suitable literature, the formation of a special M. choir and the congregational practice of some of the M. hymns, are amongst the familiar features of a proper preparation.

True M. preaching will be characterised by definiteness of aim, and clearness of statement of simple Gospel truth. It must be no mere exposition of doctrine or of Scripture, although it will have both doctrine and Scripture behind it. It must be, to use Bunyan's famous phrase, a veritable pleading with men. The skilled evangelist will appeal alike to the reason and to the emotions of his hearers, but above all he will seek to "commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God." He must feel as if he had not only a case to present, but a cause to carry, and, trusting himself to the power of the Holy Ghost, he will lay himself out to carry it. From first to last his sermon will, to use a very intelligible phrase, mean business. He is not there to air his rhetoric, nor to give an intellectual treat to admiring hearers, but to win souls for His Master.

In order to gain this end he must needs establish a certain rapproch between himself and his hearers ; he must gain their ear, if he would win their hearts. And, moreover, he must make his message not only intelligible but attractive. Hence the value of illustrations and even, within certain limits, of really telling and appropriate anecdotes. He will need the power of true sympathy, so that he may speak not as a cold and cynical censor, exposing the weaknesses and follies of mankind, but as a true "son of man," who knows what human nature is, and feels for the sinner even while he turns the search-light of Divine truth upon his sin. And hence his sermon will be strong in its application. "Thou art the man" will be his message to those whose case calls for it, as much as ever it was the message of Nathan to David.

The After-meeting, as it is usually called, is not the least important part of a M. service, and certainly its conduct is the most delicate and difficult part of the Missioner's work. In it there is usually delivered an INSTRUCTION upon some particular point connected with the way of salvation. This should be very simple and very brief. Its object should be not merely to clear away difficulties, but to bring about decisive moral action between the soul and God. Ms. are sometimes quite spoiled by the delivery of a second sermon on these occasions. This public talk should last for about five or ten minutes at most, and then, in some way or other, at any rate after the first two or three days of the M., opportunities should be sought of personal conference with those who have been impressed. The awakened and convicted soul, anxious to obtain pardon and peace, and yet sorely perplexed and bewildered, must have his opportunity of "opening his grief," so that "by the ministry of God's Word he may receive absolution." Let us follow the PB in insisting that it is by the ministry of the Word that the absol. is to come, and then that absol., when faith has claimed it, will be a Divine reality and not a perilous human self-deception.

5. Work with Individuals.

Different missioners have different ways of seeking to come into contact with individuals. Some will ask for some outward sign of a desire to be helped, such as the raising of a hand, or a rising to the feet while all are kneeling around. Sometimes it is possible to induce those who need such help to meet the missioner and his helpers in some particular part of the church, or in the vestry; sometimes, after duly intimating to the congregation his intention, and leaving it to them to remain or retire as they prefer, the preacher and his assistants will pass from seat to seat, finding out for themselves who it is that may need their help; sometimes this part of the work is mainly carried on in private interviews offered at other times in the day. This is not the place to discuss the rival merits of these various methods; all that needs to be insisted upon is that, without the provision of such help in some way or other, the M. will certainly fall short of its proper purpose, although we dare not presume to say that it will do no good at all.

The permanent results of a M. will largely depend upon the way in which it is followed up by the local clergy and workers, just as the M. itself will largely depend upon the preparation work. Bible readings, Communicants' Unions, and the enlisting of all recruits as far as possible in work for their new Master, are amongst the most obvious and efficacious means of following up such a season of blessing.

The question is often asked whether the results of such special efforts are sufficiently abiding to justify the outlay of time and labour, and perhaps of expense, that they involve. The answer must depend upon what these results have been, and upon the means subsequently used to deepen and consolidate them.

The primary object of a M. is to bring about real conversions to God, and, where these do actually take place, a long experience and a wide opportunity of observation would lead us to the conclusion that, although there may almost always be some backsliding, a proportion of satisfactory and permanent results may be confidently expected, quite as high as usually follows any other form of spiritual effort. Indeed there are not a few parishes in which the M. has marked a distinct spiritual epoch in the history of the place, changing for the better and lifting to a higher plane the whole tone and character of its Church life. And indeed what is often true of a particular parish is probably true of our whole Church to-day. If we see around us to-day a higher spirituality, greater earnestness and evangelistic vigour, and stronger and deeper interest in Missionary work abroad than were to be found in our Church half a cent. ago, we are persuaded that this change for the better is largely due to the influence that has been exercised by Parochial Missions.—J10.

W. H. M. H. AITKEN.

MISSIONS, FOREIGN.—See FOREIGN MISSIONS.

MITRE.—An episcopal ornament worn upon the head by bishops (and some abbots) in the West. In the 10th cent. bishops appear to have worn crowns, as being princes of the Church, but it was not till later that the present form or shape became general. From the M. two narrow pendants or lappets depend, hanging down behind upon the neck and shoulders. The M., though not specified amongst the episcopal ornaments of the PB of 1549, has been nevertheless adopted by many bishops of the Anglican Communion in modern times. Some writers consider that the M. was originally borrowed from the head-gear of the Jewish high priest. In the frontispiece of Archbp. Cranmer's Catechism, put forth c. 1548-9, the bishops are represented wearing mitres. See Staley, Ceremonial of Eng. Church 179, 180; Hierurgia Anglic., new ed., 123-235; Dearmer, Ornaments of the Ministers 108 ff.—R3.

V. STALEY.

MIXED CHALICE.—By the MC. is meant the custom of consecrating in the Euch., and administering to the communicants,

1. Definition. not pure wine, but wine mixed with water; though it is sometimes (improperly) used to signify the mixing of the wine and water publicly in the service.

The Euch. was instituted at the feast of the Passover, and doubtless the bread and wine used were those prepared for that feast.

2. Jewish Custom. Now it was the custom amongst the Jews to mix their wine with water, and this was specially the case at the Passover (see Lightfoot, Horae Hebraicae on Matt. 26 27, and Edersheim, The Temple 12, p. 204). This renders it probable that the cup which Jesus consecrated was mixed.

The use of the MC. was universal in the early Church. Few, if any, ecclesiastical customs are better attested than this. As witnesses we may mention Justin Martyr (c. 155), who in his account of the Euch. describes the elements as "bread and a cup of water mixed with wine (σφρηγιον ὕδατος καὶ κρᾶματος)," and again, "the consecrated bread and wine and water" (1 Apol. 65). Irenæus (c. 185) speaks of the "mixed cup" in the Euch. (Against Heresies v. 23). And we have similar testimony from the Epitaph of Avircius (c. 190), Clement of Alexandria (c. 200—Paedag. ii. 2 20), and Cyprian (c. 255—Ep. 63 13). This testimony comes from all parts of the Christian world, Cyprian bearing witness for Africa, Clement for Egypt and Irenæus for Gaul, while the witness of Justin and Avircius covers all countries from Assyria to Rome. A custom so universal must have been already of long standing in the Church in Justin's time, the middle of the 2nd cent., and can hardly have originated later than the apostles' days. Thus this line also of testimony renders it probable that Jesus used the MC. And the agreement of the two entirely independent lines of witness raises it from a probability to a practical certainty.

3. Early Church Custom.

The MC. remained in use in all branches of the Church down to the time of the Reformation, with the single exception of the Armenians, who, from the 7th cent. at any rate, have used unmixed wine (Council in Trullo, 691, canon 32).

The MC. was of course the custom of the Church of England before the Reformation, and was expressly continued in the 4. Church of England.

PB of 1549 by the following rubric: "putting the wine into the chalice . . . putting thereto a little pure and clean water." This rubric was omitted in 1552 and has never been re-inserted. Hence the MC. fell out of ordinary use in the Church of England, and many thought it unlawful. The legal question was fully heard before Abp. Benson in the Bp. of Lincoln's case. And the Abp. decided that, while the above omission rendered it illegal to mix the cup in, and as part of, the service, it was perfectly lawful to use a cup mixed beforehand. The Privy Council, to which appeal was made, took the same view, thereby reversing their former judgment in the Purchas case. As this decision is not likely to be challenged, we must consider the legality of the MC. in the Church of England finally settled. In the Episcopal Church of Scotland it has always been customary (see Dowden's Annotated Scotch Communion Office, Appendix J. 1), while on the other hand the Church of Ireland has expressly forbidden it in her 37th canon.

While the MC., as we have seen, has been practically the universal use of the Church, there has been no such agreement as to the time of

5. Time of Mixing.

In the East it usually takes place during the private office of preparation of the elements in the vestry before the public service. In the Roman use, as in the PB of 1549, it is done publicly at the Offertory. In the Sarum it occurred between the Epistle and Gospel. The law of the Church of England is best observed by pouring the water into the wine or into the chalice either in the vestry or in church before the service begins.

In the Church of Rome only a small quantity of water is mixed with the wine. According to some authorities the merest drop will suffice

6. Quantity of Water.

(see Tracts on Mass, p. 208, HBS). In the Greek Church the only rule appears to be that there is to be more wine than water in the chalice.¹ According to Renaudot (Lit. Orient. Collect. 1, p. 178) the Copts make the quantity of water vary with the strength of the wine. If strong wine be used, there may be as much as one-third water; if weak, as little as one-tenth. On the other hand, the ordinary East Syrian practice is to use half wine and half water, and, in case of scarcity of wine, the quantity of water may be greater still (The Catholics of the East and his People, Maclean and Brown, p. 250). From the pointed way in which Justin speaks of the water in the Eucharistic cup, it seems not unlikely that the ordinary East Syrian custom represents best the use of the early Church. And at any rate it is perfectly safe, and not unfrequently desirable, to mix the chalice with two parts wine and one part water.

The symbolism of the MC. is fourfold. (a) It is a sign of temperance in all things. This is expressly mentioned in some minor Eastern 7. Symbolism.

Liturgies (e.g., Matthew the Shepherd). (b) The wine typifies Christ, the water his people, and the mixture the indissoluble union between them (Cyprian, Ep. 63 13). (c) The wine and water typify the blood and water which flowed from Christ's pierced side (Gennadius, De Eccles. Dogm. 75). Many service-books, both Eastern and Western, order John 19 34 to be said while the chalice is being mixed. (d) The wine signifies our Lord's Godhead, the water his manhood, and the mixture the union of the two natures in one Person (Anastasius Sinaita, Hodegus 112). This probably explains the reason why the Armenians who are strict Monophysites use the unmixed cup.

DCA, art. Elements; Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 388-397; Abp. of Canterbury's Judgment in case of "Read and others v. Lord Bishop of Lincoln"; Martene, De Antiq. Eccles. Rit. i. 37.—R2.

J. W. TYRER.

MONITION (now to be preferred to Admonition in technical use). An eccles. censure of a "preparatory" nature, "a warning or command, to be followed in case of disobedience by some coercive sanction. It appears to have been a general rule that monition ought to precede suspension or excommunication. It might be the sentence or part of a sentence upon the merits pronounced at the end of a cause" (L.R., 6 H.L. 433). Failure to comply with a monition is punished as a contempt of court by the penalties appropriate to contumacy and disobedience. Monitions are chiefly issued (1) to enforce residence on a benefice, (2) in connection with suits to restrain ritual alleged to be unlawful under Church Discipline and Public Worship Regulation Acts.—A4. R. J. WHITWELL.

MONUMENTS.—It is part of our instinctive nature to rear memorials to our beloved dead, and our churches contain many examples of various styles. On the north side of the chancel, within the sacrum, we often find the founder's tomb, a stone coffin covered by a slab with a cross incised upon it, and over the tomb a canopy.

¹ I owe this fact to the kindness of the Rev. Archimandrite Yannulis, Greek Priest in Liverpool.

Sometimes a life-sized recumbent effigy of the founder rests on the slab, carved in stone, wood, or alabaster, usually a knight in full armour, and by his side there is often an effigy of his wife. Some knights are represented with their legs crossed, and popular fancy has woven the legend that these crossed-legged figures signify that the persons represented took part in the Crusades. There is no warrant for this belief. It was usual to paint these effigies so as to represent the habit and features of the deceased, but few traces of colouring are left. Some persons have left bequests in their wills for bread to be distributed from their tombs, a custom which has only in recent years been abandoned. England is especially rich in brass effigies, which from the 13th cent. onward record the memories of the dead.

The unpictorial costume of the present day somewhat militates against the general use of figures incised in brass or monumental effigies, unless the person represented be entitled to wear robes of state, academic costumes, or priestly vestments. Brass memorial crosses are free from these difficulties; they have ancient authority, and many beautiful modern examples exist, e.g., King's Weston Church, Somerset, and Dorchester, Oxon. Heavy mural slabs in churches with fulsome praises of the dead, such as are found in many churches, are to be avoided, and also the execrable taste which dominates the tombs in the Campo Santo at Genoa. The flaunting of personal grief before the eyes of the world is unnatural to English minds. The bad taste of past years has filled our churchyards with hideous stone slabs with rounded heads, which happily have now given way for the most part to the use of the Christian symbol of the Cross, expressing the ever-enduring hope of Resurrection and Re-union. Sometimes the broken column appears on Christian graves. This is evidently a Pagan notion, and is unfitting as a Christian memorial of the dead. Grotesque verses are found on many tomb-stones. The rule that no inscription should be placed on a stone without the consent of the incumbent should in all cases be rigidly enforced, in order to prevent this. The best monument for the grave is a cross of stone or marble, and within the church a brass memorial or incised cross. The care of M. should be esteemed a duty by the rector and churchwardens. Families who have tended carefully the graves of their deceased relatives die out, and the M. are left to fall into decay. The inhabitants should take care that the memories of those who have served God and His Church in their generation should not be forgotten.—R4.

2. Modern Monuments.

P. H. DITCHFIELD.

MORALITY.—The Science of Morality, or Ethics, has until recent years been conducted as a purely speculative study, but

1. Name and Meaning. Sociologists and Anthropologists are now endeavouring to place it on an inductive basis. The main problems of which it treats are:—(1) the origin, nature and limitations of the moral faculty; (2) the duty of man in relation to himself, to his neighbour, and to God; (3) the highest good or final purpose for which man was created.

The Jews in the time of our Lord traced the origin of the moral faculty to the act of creation (Gen. 1 27). This moral faculty was impaired and limited by transgression (Gen. 8 21), but could be restored by obedience to the law of Moses. Christ adopted the code of His nation (Matt. 5 17), but restated the duty of man, basing it on a new principle which at once rendered it far more searching (Matt. 5 21 ff.) and of universal obligation. This principle was the Fatherhood of God, with its necessary corollary, the brotherhood of man. Viewed thus, man's duty resolved itself into universal love (Mark 12 30-33), and his summum bonum into the realisation of sonship (Matt. 5 45). These principles were elaborated and adapted to the complex conditions of social life by His followers with such success that the ethical system of Christianity, when brought into contact with that of the pagan world, compelled universal admiration, winning to the Church innumerable converts. Of the pre-Christian systems, only three need be referred to:—(1) that of Aristotle, who taught that the end of man was a perfect life in a perfect State, to be attained by conduct regulated along the line of the mean between extremes; (2) that of Zeno (Stoicism), which recommended the cultivation of virtue, or the perfect realisation of man's personal character, to secure inward satisfaction; and (3) that of Epicurus, who maintained that happiness was man's proper aim, and that it could be obtained by a life of philosophical moderation. These systems involved one common error; they assumed that all acts did or should originate and continue under the direction of the reason, thus cutting out all those spontaneous emotional virtues which are as unreasoning as they are attractive. Each also had its distinctive fault. Aristotelian Ethics lacked a "categorical imperative," there being no assignable reason why a man who disliked the state of society in which he lived should trouble to follow the judicious mean in order to prolong its existence. The Stoics failed to show why the particular virtues, which their disciples were taught to cultivate at much personal cost, were the real ends of man, or that the happiness to be obtained by virtuous living was an adequate reward for the pains of attaining it. As for the Epicureans, the principle of happiness was so vague that every man had to interpret it for himself, with the result that each behaved as he chose, just as others did with no ethical system to direct them. Of the three, Stoicism was undoubtedly by far the most influential, but the Stoics quickly recognised in Christianity a kindred spirit, more humane and yet not less self-denying than their own, and many of them became converts to the new religion.

2. Ethics in Ancient Times.

The practice of condoning offences by monetary payment disturbed the equilibrium of Christian M. in the Middle Ages, 3. In the Middle Ages. diverting attention from the principles of right conduct to a merely technical satisfaction of an ecclesiastical disciplinary system based on a speculative doctrine of merit (see Art. DISCIPLINE).

The prominence given to Christian Ethics in the PB illustrates the reaction of the Reformers from this purely ecclesiastical view of sin. In modern times both in

4. In Modern Times. Germany and England the study of Ethics has been separated from Theology. There is no necessary connection between the two;¹ indeed, as the history of the Ch. too plainly shows, there have been religious sectaries at various times who have renounced the moral code. In Germany, Emanuel Kant investigated the nature of the Moral Sense more profoundly than any previous inquirer. In England, a new form of Epicureanism called Utilitarianism for a while found favour, but its summum bonum, "the greatest happiness for the greatest number," was too vague to form the basis of an ethical system, being in fact little more than a political maxim. More recently, Socialism has propounded a theory of Ethics based on Aristotle, and open to the same objections. Its highest good is the perfection of the State, to which it remorselessly sacrifices the individual. The Ethics of Socialism commend themselves by their appeal to the brotherhood of man, but, as this is to be attained by subordinating the more important principle of Sonship, the loss is incalculably greater than the gain.

(Cp. Art. FREE-WILL. For Inductive Ethics, see Westermarck, Origin and Development of Moral Ideas; for History of Ethics, see Sully, History of European Ethics; Lecky, History of Morality in Europe; Henson, Moral Discipline in the Christian Church; for German Ethics, see Chalybaeus, Speculative Philosophy, esp. arts. Kant and Fichte; for Utilitarianism, see Leslie Stephen, English Utilitarians; for Socialism, see Bax, Ethics of Socialism.)—K3.

E. A. WESLEY.

MORNING PRAYER.—See COMMON PRAYER.

MORTIFICATION.—The verb "to mortify" occurs in the final Exh. of the Bapt. Service, and in the Colls. for the Innocents' Day and Feast of the Circumcision. In all three places it is our evil and corrupt affections, vices, worldly and carnal lusts that are to be mortified; not our passions or natural appetites, as in the common ascetic signification of the term M. In this latter sense the term includes restriction to insufficient or distasteful food, the endurance of bodily discomforts, and such like. The PB contains no recommendation of such ascetic practices. (For relation of these to fasting see art. ASCETICISM.) But it enjoins M., as is obvious from its occurrences, for the preservation of innocence, not as a method of attaining peculiar sanctity. The PB recognises no such distinctions or degrees of sanctity.

¹ [See, however, MAN, § 22, and RELIGION, §§ 8-11.]

In the Bapt. Service the word M. corresponds to the sentence "our profession which . . . die from sin," regarding the death to sin not as a crisis once experienced in Bapt., but as a constant state to be maintained by a continual fulfilling of the Bapt. vow. (See also the prayers following the vow.) The strange phrase, "Mortified from all worldly and carnal lusts" (Circumcision), may be a survival of the old chemical use of the word of transmutation of metals; see Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale 115:

"This quicksilver I wol mortifie
Ryght in youre sighte anon withouten lye,
And make it . . . good silver. . ."—pd.
J. R. DARBYSHIRE.

MORTUARY (Arch.).—A M. is defined as a place for the reception of dead bodies bef. interment. In cases of death from infectious diseases of a dangerous character a sanitary authority has power to compel the removal of the corpse to a M. and to direct that interment shall take place within a specified time. Apart from this, it would be well if the dead in all cases could be removed to a M. pending interment. No one who knows the interior of the houses of the poor either in town or country will hesitate to endorse this, and it would doubtless become a common custom, if Ms. were less grim and repelling in their appearance. A figure of an angel over the doorway in the case of a certain M. known to the writer causes it to be regarded rather as a place where the forms of the departed can be laid awhile in reverent peace.—R6. H. GIBSON SMITH.

MOSAIC.—The art of M. working dates back to late classical times. Pictures and patterns formed of small marble tesserae

1. History. were used in the floors of Roman houses even in England. Figure subjects and patterns on a gold or blue ground executed in glass tesserae were first used in Byzantium and later at Ravenna, Venice and Rome. Pavements of opus Alexandrinum, marble inlaid with M. in geometric patterns, were also very popular in Italy. Of this description is the floor of St. Mark's, Venice.

We possess two such pavements, at Canterbury and at Westminster; both appear to be of foreign

2. English Examples. workmanship, their material is partly imported and partly English marble. The sides of Henry III's tomb and the spiral columns of the Confessor's shrine at Westminster are of foreign marble inlaid with glass M. in geometric patterns in the Roman style, and there are similar antique Italian columns at Wilton Church.

The old English builders wisely avoided the use of M. pictures in their churches. Such decoration,

3. The Use of Mosaic. requiring to be used in large unbroken masses, is out of harmony with Gothic buildings whose constructive features govern their decoration, and the combination of Ms. with stained glass is an artistic impossibility, since each kills the other. The Victorian attempts to use M. pictures as reredos panels are even more unfortunate. The old artists never used Ms. near the eye; they are ineffective unless the tesserae are coarse and set in wide mortar joints. Executed in this manner and used in large masses above a plain marble dado, M. forms an effective decoration in a severely plain interior where there is no stained glass.—R4. CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

MOTET (Lat. Motetum, Motectus, Mutetus, Motellus, Motulus; Ital. Mottetto).—M., for the last three hundred years, has been almost exclusively applied to certain pieces of Ch. music, adapted to Latin words, intended to be sung after the plainchant of the Offertorium of the Roman Mass. This definition, however, extends no farther than the conventional meaning of the word. Its origin involves some very grave etymological difficulties. For instance, the form Motulus suggests a corruption of Modulus—a Canilena, or melody—and in support of this we find that, in the 13th cent. and earlier, the terms Motellus and Motellus were constantly applied to the voice part afterwards called Medius or Altus. On the other hand, the idea that the true etymon is supplied by the Italian word Mottello, diminutive of Motto and equivalent to the French mot or bon mot, derives some colour from the fact that it was at first unquestionably applied to a certain kind of profane music which was in the 13th cent. severely censured by the Church.

Composers from the earliest times have written Ms., those of the Polyphonic School culminating in Palestrina, these being for voices alone. The great masters, from Bach downwards, have also written them, with instrumental accompaniments, forming in many cases mere Ch. cantatas. At the Reformation, the Latin service being abandoned, the M. was naturally done away with, and only survives in our present PB service as the Full Anthem, many of our Anthems being the old Ms. reset to Eng. words.—Q2.

F. DARBY.

MOTHERING SUNDAY.—A name sometimes given to the 4th Sunday in Lent, as being a day when servant girls were allowed to go home and see their mothers.—G24.

J. W. TYRER.

MOURNING.—The principle of M. is the putting on of apparel which is different from, or indeed contrary to, that which is usually worn. The colour adopted for M. attire varies among different peoples. Black, which is least worn in the ordinary way, seems to be the predominating M. colour.

The Fathers of the Church give their adhesion to the principle that the wearing of M. by Christians is right, but at the same time they deprecate its excessive use.

That there is precedent in Holy Scripture for M. apparel and other outward signs of M. can be gathered from the following passages: "The people mourned . . . and no man put on him his ornaments" (Ex. 33 4); "I pray thee put on M. apparel"—Joab's request to the widow of Tekoah (2 Sam. 14 2); also 2 Sam. 3 31, Is. 22 12, and Baruch 5 1.

The true Christian note in the matter of M. for the departed was struck by St. Paul—"that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope" (1 Thess. 4 13). The need for this exhortation must have existed, otherwise St. Paul would not have given it. So too, later on, St. Cyprian and St. Chrysostom both protest against excessive M., indicative as it seemed to be of despair, when Christian hope and belief in the Resurrection should disperse gloom and grief.

The colour in England for M. has generally been black. White was, and is, used in the case of a young virgin. In Court M. violet is used, and is to be preferred to black.

In M. all that is unreal, empty, extravagant and ostentatious is to be avoided. The old fashion of our English funerals with their display of the "trappings and the suits of woe" was abhorrent and is fast dying out, but a proper regard for simplicity and modesty in M. is still much needed. A superabundance of floral accessories is to be shunned as much as plumes and mutes, flowing hat-bands and scarves. The amount of money which is so often spent in floral tributes is quite indefensible. If anything demands right feeling, common sense, and proper and reverent control, it is "mourning."—OC.

H. D. MACNAMARA.

MOVABLE FEAST.—A Movable Feast is one whose position the Calendar moves from year to year. This is owing to one (or both) of two causes:—(a) the F. is attached to some particular day of the week; (b) the F. is connected with some particular phase of the moon. Easter is an example of both. The rules for finding the Calendar dates of these MFs. in any given year will be found in the Tables of the PB immediately following the Calendar.—C2.

J. W. TYRER.

MURAL TABLET.—Mediaeval examples are rare, but there is a pretty 15th cent. T. in Barnet Church, an oblong moulded frame with an inscription in raised Gothic lettering, all painted and gilt. Elizabethan and later Ts. are more common, Westminster Abbey containing numerous specimens. At Epsom are several fine 17th cent. Ts. to the Evelyns, some framed with classical columns and pediments, others with borders of scrollwork. Here are also some good Ts. by Flaxman. English 17th cent. Ts. sometimes contain busts, more often merely an inscription and perhaps a coat of arms, but carvings of the Crucifixion and other scriptural subjects are often introduced in foreign examples.—R4.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

MUSIC, LITURGICAL.—In the Edwardine PB of 1549, immediately after the rubric at Mattins enjoining the reading of the Biblical Lessons "distinctly with a loud voice," the following direction is inserted:—"And (to thence the people may the better heare) in such places where they doe syng, there shall the Lessons be songe in a playne tune after the manner of distincte readyng: and lykewise the Epistle and Gospell." Here we have a formal recognition of the principle of liturgical chanting which had prevailed in the West ever since the adoption of regulated musical forms by Christian assemblies. The larger question of the rise and development of the whole Plain-chant system is dealt with in art. PLAIN-SONG. But it will lie within the limits of this art. to deal with those recognised melodic formulae which concerned the celebrant and his immediate assistants at the Euch. or in Divine Service. These liturgical recitatives appear to have been based upon inflected monotone, such as is natural in securing distinct utterance in circumstances where the introduction of personal declamation would be unseemly. Slight variations in pitch redeem monotone from wearisome and mechanical monotony, and they reflect, in a form which may be committed to writing, the normal inflexions of a voice which has to be intelligible throughout a large concourse of worshippers. Of all the classes into which the Plain-chant recitatives may be divided, the liturgical inflexions possess the greatest variety of forms. Absolute unanimity seems never to have been arrived at, and to this day there is nothing approaching uniformity of usage in Western Christendom, as any traveller well knows. Limitations of space preclude the discussion of comparative forms; it must suffice if the series of inflexions prevalent in England through the Middle Ages are described, as these were familiar to the compilers of the PB who framed the rubric quoted at the outset of this article.

The prayer-tones may be taken first. The Coll. proper had one simple inflexion consisting of a cadence leading into the

2. The Prayer-Tones. Amen, thus:

Other forms of the cadence were:

The ekphrasis, or closing sentence sung at the end of certain Prs. at the Euch., had a simple form consisting of a fall of a semitone, and an elaborate form which ran thus:

Sometimes the prayer-tones are found with a half-close as well as with a cadence, as in the following forms:

The ordinary versicle and response inflexions are still in general use. In these there is a drop of a minor third, which, in monosyllabic endings, rises again to a second, thus:

Normal form.

Monosyllabic form.

Some versicles are found with an elaborate cadence, as:

and:

And the usual form of Salutation was as follows:

Y. Do - mi - nus vo - bis - cum.
The Lord be with you.

Ry. Et cum spi - ri - tu tu - o.
And with thy..... spi - rit.

The lesson-tones were extremely simple, consisting either of a fall of a semitone at the conclusion, thus:

in sem - pi - ter - num.
or of a half-close as well as a final cadence, thus:

Ec - ce nunc in pul - ve - re dor - mi - o,

Et . . . non sub - sis - tam.

The inflexion for OT lessons read at the Euch. was a simple fall of a fifth, as in the third example in the prayer-tones given above. The Chapter had similar inflexions but in a different order:

Tu in no - bis su - per nos:

ne de - ri - lin - quas nos - ter.

When a sentence in the text contained a question, the reciting note was lowered a semitone, a return being made to the normal pitch near the end. The Ep. and Gospel tones were elaborations of the foregoing forms. Each complete sentence contained a half close (metrum) in the middle and a full close (punctum) at the end. The metrum consisted of the following musical phrase:

Such trust have we through Christ to God-ward:

which was common to both Ep. and Gospel. The punctum for the Ep. was as follows:

... beginning at the first verse.

That of the Gospel was:

On ordinary days.

... beginning at the first verse.

On great days.

... beginning at the first verse.

Interrogations, both in Ep. and Gospel, were chanted a semitone lower, rising to the reciting-note on the last syllable, thus:

How was it then reck - on - ed?

The final sentence was marked by the following phrase (conclusio) common to Ep. and Gospel:

for ever and ev - er. A - men.

The foregoing system of inflexions for the Euch. Lessons will compare favourably, from the artistic point of view, with the rules laid down for the Roman Ch. by Guidetti in 1582, which have been popularised in England through the medium of the Cathedral Prayer Book.

Space will not permit of the discussion of the liturgical recitatives proper to Holy Week, such as the Passion Gospels. Here again it is probable that there was no rigid uniformity of method, and that the rendering was governed by circumstances and affected, possibly, by the dramatic instinct of those responsible for the singing. It will be necessary, however, to devote a few lines to the chant used for the Euch. Preface, especially as the system of inflecting it which has become popular in some English cathedrals and in many parish chs. is based upon foreign custom, and differs in its general effect from the time-honoured cadences once general in this country. These are based upon two root-forms:

and :

Their application to the text will best be seen in the following extract from the Ascension-tide Preface :

It is very meet . . . duty, that we . . . Ev - er -

- last - ing God, through thy most dear - ly be - lov - ed Son, Je - sus Christ our Lord :

who after . . . his Ap - os - tles,

. . . and reign with him in glo - ry.

It only remains to be said that the value of liturgical chanting depends very largely upon the manner of its performance. A full-voiced, laboured and slow rendering as of a set tune will only raise a barrier between the notes of the inflexions and their esoteric atmosphere such as will produce an effect of artificiality the reverse of edifying. An appreciation of the basic principle that the words of the text are all-important, and that the inflexions only intensify their sublime import, will lead the singer towards a simple, unaffected, mezza voce style of inflecting which will be perfectly natural and beautiful in its ultimate effect.—Q2.

F. BURGESS.

MYSTICAL.—The word occurs in 5 places of the PB. It is akin in meaning to "sacramental," but points specially to the "inward part or thing signified," to that which is suggested or figured by the outward "in a mystery." The five occurrences may be grouped under three heads. (1) "The M. body of Thy Son." (a) In the Collect for All Saints' Day the expression seems to be equivalent to "Thine elect." (b) In the second Post-communion Prayer it is definitely explained to mean "the blessed company of all faithful people." Thus it is clear that the meaning is the same as in Hooker: "That Ch. of Christ, which we properly term his body M., can be but one, neither can that one be sensibly discerned by any man . . . a body collective, because it containeth an huge multitude; a body M., because the mystery of their conjunction is removed altogether from sense . . . that body consisteth of none but only true Israelites, true sons of Abraham, true servants and saints of God" (Hooker, Eccles. Polity iii. 12, 8). In other words, the "M. Ch." means what is sometimes termed the "invisible Ch." (cp. Body, §§ 11-12). (2) "Sanctify water to the M. washing away of sin": twice in the Public Bapt. of Infants (and similarly in the parallel passages of the Order for those of Riper Years), (a) in the first prayer, (b) in the Consecration of the Font. For the meaning, see Ridley's Works, Parker Soc., pp. 209-225. (3) "Holy Matrimony . . . signifying unto us the M. union that is betwixt Christ and his Ch." (from the opening Address—see Eph. 5 32). The outward union suggests the inward, invisible union between Christ and His Ch. It will be observed that the word "M." is not here used in the sense in which it is taken in the next art. Also note that in no case are the phrases in question derived from ancient sources, but occur in fresh compositions of the compilers of 1549, with the exception of No. 2 (b), which was inserted in 1662.—K1. D. HARFORD.

MYSTICISM.—The words "Mysticism, Mystical, Mystic," cover a large variety of meaning, ranging from "Absolute

1. Definition. Intuitivism," inactive Pietism, ecstaticism, and a hypnotic sort of supernaturalism, to the merest sense of a mystery everywhere underlying the outward. There is no trace in the PB of any element corresponding to the former varieties. On the other hand, there is a "mystical element of religion," which has been present in the Ch. from the very first, and has been receiving in recent years a growing share of attention and study. It is an element difficult to define, and it has received very varied definition. It may suffice to take one such as the basis of the present study. "Mysticism," according to Dr. Rufus Jones, in his Studies in Mystical Religion, "is that type of religion which puts the emphasis on immediate awareness of relation with God."

Contrast this with two other types of religion. Baron Von Hügel has described them in his monumental work on The Mystical Element of Religion. (a) There is the Institutional type, which puts the emphasis on the outward framework of religion, its rites and ceremonies, its seasons and ordered observances. (b) There is the Intellectual type, which concerns itself specially with thought and study, with the historical and philosophical, with that which appeals to the mind and reason. (c) But over and above these two types is a third, the Intuitive, having to do with heart as well as head, seeking to reach and practise an "immediate" sense of "relation with God."

These three types have ever existed, either in isolation or in harmony, in the Church. Naturally, we may look to see them evidenced in unequal proportions. Obviously, the first will bulk most largely, for it is easier for human nature to obey rules and keep up ordinances than to think and reason; and the third element will be the least in evidence, for it is the invisible and spiritual side of religion.

What place then has mysticism of this "inclusive" type in the Book of Common Prayer?

It has the very place we might expect it to have. Its proportion is qualitative, not quantitative.

It does not bulk largely on the surface, but it underlies the whole, and occupies the inner shrine. It might be supposed by some that the Prayer Book was predominantly framed on "institutional" and "intellectual" lines, and that the "intuitional" had but scant scope in it. To others the mystical "Ladder of Perfection" might seem the very backbone of the whole. There are three steps commonly described for this Ladder, viz., Purgation, Illumination, and Contemplation. They may be seen in the PB as involved in the three steps of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Communion, with all that they stand for.

Ideally, Baptism stands for "Purgation"—for "the mystical washing away of sin"—for "a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness"—"that the old Adam in this child may be so buried, that the new man may be raised up in him." It introduces the child into the whole ordered realm of the Institutions of the Church.

Ideally, Confirmation stands for "Illumination"—that, after due instruction and personal decision, the candidate may be strengthened "with the Holy Ghost, the Comforter," "lightened with celestial fire," and prepared for a life of conscious communion with God.

Ideally, Holy Communion stands for "Contemplation"—for "immediate awareness of relation with God," through union with Christ in His mystical Body the Church; that the Communicant may not only "obtain remission of sins," but also "all other benefits of His passion," including the "assurance" "that we are very members incorporate in the mystical body of Thy Son," and we pray "that we may evermore dwell in Him, and He in us."

This is a very brief and bald sketch of the sacramental framework wherein lies the "mystical element" in the PB.

2. Pervasive Influence.

No doubt, when we come to the MP and EP a less mystical note is struck, at least so far as is apparent on casual inspection or to formal use. Here again, however, much depends upon the stage of spiritual experience which has been reached; and the mystic will find the PB answer to all his needs, and feed his innermost soul.

It is not maintained that the Divines, to whom we owe our PB as it is, were in any strong sense mystics. It may be that they laid stress upon "the immediate access of the soul to God," rather than upon that immediate access of God to the soul, which is the heart of mysticism. None the less, the mystical spirit permeated the old Liturgies from which they quarried the bulk of their materials—this is specially true of the Greek elements in them: it is the basis of the whole sacramental system: it comes to the surface in such Collects as those for Easter Eve, Ascension Day, or All Saints; and the true value of all the Services, that by which they are redeemed from deadness and formality, lies in the recognition of this element, "immediate awareness of relation with God." That customary pause at the opening of each service, for which there is "silence kept for a space, all devoutly kneeling," should bring the mystic touch of God upon the spirit of the believing worshipper, preparing him for acceptable service in Church; and that similar pause after the final benediction should send him out, with the peace of God's consciously realised and abiding presence reigning in his heart, for his service in the world. (Among modern English works on Mysticism in general these may be studied: Dr. W. R. Inge, Christian Mysticism (the Bampton Lectures for 1899), and other writings; Baron Friedrich von Hügel, The Mystical Element of Religion, 1908; Dr. Rufus Jones, Studies in Mystical Religion; R. A. Vaughan, Hours with the Mystics, first published 1856; Evelyn Underhill, Mysticism, 1911.)—K3¹.

D. HARFORD.

NAME, CHRISTIAN.—It is impossible to say when the custom of repeating the Name at Bapt. arose. Though now for cents. universal in the Ch., we are not aware of any liturgical direction for it, or recorded instance of it, earlier than the case of Peter Balsamus, martyr c. 311, who, if his Acts may be trusted, received the former name at his Bapt. It may well, however, be earlier, for in the scantiness of our information such a slight detail might well pass unnoticed. There are examples as early even as the 1st cent. of converts possessing what is apparently a new C. name,¹ e.g., Theophilus, St. Luke's friend, and Lucina, who constructed the so-called "Crypt of Lucina" in the Catacomb of Callistus at Rome (Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers i. 131). Again in the 3rd cent. we read of Cs. naming their children Peter or Paul in honour of those saints (Dionysius Alex., apud Eusebius, HE vii. 25 14). These names may have been given at Bapt., but there is no proof that they were.

In the 7th cent. we are, however, on firm ground. The form of Bapt. contained in the Missale Gothicum (Gallican, c. 700) runs "Baptizo te ill. in nomine," etc., where "ill." obviously has the same meaning as the "N." of our PB, and denotes that the minister is to repeat the name. So too, when the Saxon King Caedwalla was baptised at Rome on Easter Eve, 689, "at the time of his Bapt. the aforesaid Pope" (Sergius) "gave him the name of Peter" (Bede, HE 57). By this time the custom was well established, and has continued so ever since. The Ch. of Eng. lays great stress on it in her training of children, as the beginning of the Cat. shows. It is a thing in itself beautiful and likewise spiritually helpful that a man should be reminded of his C. profession and privileges every time he thinks of his name. (See further, BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 17.)—I, K.

¹ Professor Ramsay, Letters to Seven Churches, p. 305, thinks that the giving of a new bapt. name is as old as the date of the Apocalypse.

J. W. TYRER.

NAMES, RECITATION OF.—By the 4th cent., at any rate, it was usual to pray by name, during HC, for certain particular persons, and their names were commonly read out from a two-leaved tablet called a Diptych. This use of Diptychs has long ago ceased in the West. But there are three cases in which it is still customary in the Ch. of Eng. to name the special person (or persons) prayed for:—(a) the Sovereign and principal members of the Royal Family, in the STATE PRAYERS (this is expressly ordered in the PB); (b) the Bishop, on such an occasion as ENTHRONEMENT; (c) the Sick, when the prs. of the congregation are asked for them.—Hb.

J. W. TYRER.

NARTHEX.—An enclosed vestibule to a church, a survival of the primitive court of the catechumens. The finest existing specimen is at Vézalay, but a still grander one formerly existed at Cluny. The Galilee porch at Ely resembles a N., the so-called Galilee at Durham is, however, really a chapel.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

NAVE.—N. is the name given to the body of a ch., being the place of the lay people, distinct from the quire and SACRARIUM. The Ns. of early basilicæ were reserved for baptised Christians, catechumens being admitted at times, and strangers not being allowed beyond the atrium, or porch, during the time of divine service. In many of the Roman chs. the quire occupied a low enclosure towards the upper end of the N., which opened directly into a transept or an apse without any structural chancel. Similarly in the early Norman abbeys and cathedrals the whole of the eastern limb was devoted to the purpose of a SACRARIUM, the quire occupying the space under the central tower and sometimes, as at St. Albans, Norwich, and Westminster, the eastern bays of the N. as well. Later fashions transferred the quire to the eastern limb of the ch., as was done at Canterbury in the time of Anselm, and large eastward extensions were made for this purpose.

In collegiate chs. the chapter services were not of a popular character, and, where these chs. stood in large towns, it became necessary to provide a self-contained ch. for the laity to worship in. This was done by the simple expedient of building a solid screen across the N. and fitting up a complete ch. for parochial purposes on its western side. This arrangement is seen at St. Albans, where the monks' quire extended three bays beyond the central tower. In order to provide room for a good-sized parish ch. west of the screen, the N. had to be made disproportionately long. But at Croyland and Malmesbury, where the quire stopped on the west side of the central tower, a N. of ordinary length was sufficient for parochial use. It must not, however, be assumed that all monastic

Ns. served as parish chs.; this was not the case for instance at Westminster, nor was it generally in the secular cathedrals such as those of York and Wells. The Ns. of these chs. were used ceremonially for the purposes of processions, also occasionally for preaching, and possibly for ordinary congregational purposes. They served likewise to contain chantry chapels, as at Wells and Winchester, and at St. Albans a series of altars was arranged between the pillars right down both sides of the nave. After the 16th cent. the services of the ch. were curtailed, and popular services ceased to be provided, so it became the fashion to use the quires of our collegiate chs. for all purposes, and thus their Ns. fell into disuse. After 1850, however, a great many of these Ns. came again into congregational use, a change which often involved the destruction of ancient screens and other valuable features of the buildings, but which was certainly better than abandoning them to desolation. The Ns. of our cathedrals may may well be used for part of the general congregation, but this certainly does not justify the removal of ancient screens and fittings for the sake of fancied expediency, the more so as such changes have in many cases produced very unexpected results, structurally, and from the point of view both of acoustics and of artistic effect.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

NEGLECT.—By Negligences the Lit. means probably not only sins which have been committed by carelessness rather than wilfulness, but also sins of omission in general—the leaving undone things which a Christian ought to do. Spiritual sloth is at the root of most Ns., and a study of the Duty towards God, as set forth in the Cat., will suggest the main lines in which such are to be looked for. Neglect of pr. and HC (HC Exh.³), carelessness about the observance of Sunday and other holy days of the Church, omission to guard against known temptations, or to withdraw from their influence if possible, are among the most frequent sorts of Negligence. Other examples of neglect condemned in the PB are procrastination in bringing children to Holy Bapt. (Bapt.³), and omission to make a will or settle one's "temporal estates" whilst in health (VS). See likewise the solemn language of warning against priestly N. in the Bp.'s Exh. in the Ordering of Priests; also the Exh. to Godparents in Bapt.¹ and the charge to parents and employers to see that children are instructed in the Cat. (and Rubric aft. Cat.). The corresponding Duty towards our Neighbour will suggest risks of N. not less grave. What parish worker has not constantly heard as an apologia pro vita sua that the speaker has "never harmed any one?" Sins of omission begin, and actual offences only follow, in home, business, and society.—K3.

A. R. WHITHAM.

NEW PARISH.—See PARISH, NEW.

NEW YEAR'S DAY.—The Julian calendar began with Jan. 1, and St. Ambrose says that Christians kept fast on that day to counteract the evil effects of heathen orgies. (Serm. 2, de Kal. Jan.). For calendrical purposes it is the beginning of the year in PB, as in the Roman and Sarum books, and Dec. 31 is called in PB "New Year's Eve" (see EVEN). But we find other days taken as the beginning of the year. The Greeks begin their calendar with Sept. 1, formerly with Sept. 24; the E. Syrians with Oct. 1, though their lists of saints' days often begin with Dec. 1; the Copts, Ethiopians and Armenians with Aug. 29. In early times we find much variation. The Philocalian Calendar, A.D. 354, began on some day between Dec. 13 and 25 (DCG 1263). Christmas was the beginning of the year in England from the 7th to the 12th cent.; and so in France and usually in Germany about the same time, though Easter was in some places chosen for NYD. After the 12th cent. Mar. 25, as the conventional day of the Incarnation, was treated in England as NYD. until 1753, though days before Mar. 25 were usually given a double reckoning, as Feb. 1, 1637, 1637 being the civil, 1638 the historical year. Scotland adopted Jan. 1 under James VI, A.D. 1600 (Sir Harris Nicolas, Chronol. of Hist., 1833, p. 38 ff.; for other countries see this valuable work). The Jews kept Nisan as the first month, and so the Roman-Syrian calendar accounted the corresponding month Xanthicus (cp. Apost. Const. 513, which makes our December the ninth, our January the tenth month). But in the Christian West March was often taken as the first month, as in the pre-Julian Roman calendar.

The E. Syrians have a service of benediction on the first day of each month, except in February which is "the month of afflictions." A service of prayer for the coming year on Jan. 1 is in accordance with human instincts, though it must be subordinate to the Octave of Christmas and the festival of the Circumcision (see FESTIVAL, § 12). That it does not occur in PB may be due to the fact that even at the last revision Jan. 1 was not generally considered to be the beginning of the Church's year, though the PB calendar begins with it. There is no historical precedent known to the present writer for a midnight service bef. this day, but it is hard to see any liturgical objection to it. The Greeks now call this day ἡ περιστοχὴ τοῦ νέου ἔτους, or ἡ περιστοχὴ τοῦ ἔτους. In the Irish PB there is a special prayer appointed for NYD.—Gg. A. J. MACLEAN.

2. Special Service for Day.

NICENE CREED.—The Creed which is commonly known as the Nicene, and is now used in the services of the Church, is 1. The Council of Nicaea. not altogether identical with the original Creed put forth by the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. The name given to our present Creed may, however, be justified on the ground that it embodies the great points of doctrine defined in the original Creed of Nicaea against the Arian heresy. It will be necessary to start with a short account of Arianism and the Nicene Council.

The Arian heresy sprang up first as a recoil from the opposite heresy of Sabellianism, i.e., the denial of the eternal distinction of the Persons in the Godhead. Arius, an Alexandrian priest who had been trained in the school of Lucian of Antioch, accused his bishop, Alexander, of teaching Sabellianism. In his attack Arius went to the opposite extreme and taught that the Son was not very God, but only a superior creature intermediate between God and man. Since Arius taught the worship of this creature, his heresy was practically a recrudescence of pagan idolatry within the Church. The Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) was called together by the Emperor Constantine to settle the controversy which raged round this question. When the Council met, an explicit Arian Creed put forward by Eusebius of Nicomedia was summarily rejected. Then Eusebius of Cæsarea came forward with a Creed which was said by him to be the Baptismal Creed of his church of Cæsarea. This Creed was quite satisfactory as far as it went, but it did not touch the points at issue. Its Biblical phraseology was found to be an insufficient test to exclude Arianism; the controversy was not as to the language of Scripture but as to its interpretation. The test-word in defining the nature of the Son was found in the term ὁμοούσιος—of one substance (with the Father). A Creed was therefore drawn up on the basis of the Creed of Cæsarea, with this orthodox test-word inserted.

On the history and meaning of "substance," see Strong, JTS, Jan. and Oct., 1901. The term has materialistic associations in English which do not belong to the Greek.

The creed adopted at Nicaea ran as follows:

We believe in One God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible.

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only begotten—that is, of the substance of the Father—God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God; begotten, not made; being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made, both that are in heaven and that are in earth; who for us men and for our salvation, came down and was incarnate and was made man; suffered and rose again the third day; ascended into heaven; is coming to judge the quick and dead.

And in the Holy Ghost.

The promulgation of the Creed of Nicaea marks a new epoch in the history of Church doctrine. Hitherto the various Churches had their own local Baptismal Creeds, differing on small points, but agreeing on fundamentals. The new Creed was not intended to supersede these Baptismal Creeds. It was not intended primarily for catechumens but for bishops. It was a strictly theological Creed, to be used as a test of episcopal orthodoxy. Hence the anathema which was appended, condemning Arian teaching. (See Turner, Hist. and Use of Creeds and Anathemas, 1906, p. 28.)

It will be noted that the Creed of Nicaea (following the Creed of Cæsarea) ends abruptly with the words "And in the Holy Ghost." There is evidence that clauses on the Church, the remission of sins, the resurrection and eternal life, are to be found in very early Baptismal Creeds in both E. and W., and it is most unlikely that the Baptismal Creed of Cæsarea made no mention of these points. Probably Eusebius only quoted as much of his Creed as related to the question at issue, and the bishops, in drawing up the Creed, did not see any need to go farther, since this new Creed was not intended to take the place of the Baptismal Creed. This is the view of St. Basil, Ep. 78.

We have not space to deal with the question of the relation of the Nicene Creed to the original teaching of Jesus—how far the new definitions develop or distort the primitive Gospel. Hatch (Hibbert Lectures, 1885, p. 1), contrasting the Sermon on the Mount with the Nicene Creed, says the one belongs to a world of Syrian peasants—the other to a world of Greek philosophers. Harnack and the Ritschlian school also hold strongly the view that the Nicene Creed represents the Hellenisation of the Gospel by Greek philosophy. The Anglican position is well put by Liddon (Bampton Lects., Lect. VII): "The Nicene Council did not vote a new honour to Jesus Christ which He had not before possessed: it defined more clearly the original and unalterable bases of that supreme place which from the days of the Apostles He had held in the thought and heart, in the speculative and active life, of Christendom."

It was not till after many struggles that the Creed of the Council of Nicaea was accepted by the whole Church. In the course of time many of the local Baptismal Creeds were enlarged by the insertion of the Nicene definitions concerning the nature of Christ. It was also found necessary, as fresh forms of heresy arose, to introduce some additional clauses into the Creed.

(1) The heresy of Marcellus of Ancyra. Marcellus had been one of the champions of the Nicene faith, but later he seems to have taught a kind of Sabellianism, saying that the Logos would eventually cease to have distinct personality and relapse by a movement of "contraction" into the bosom of Divinity and be finally absorbed in the Godhead. This was, in other words, to deny the eternity of Christ's reign. In the Creed of Antioch, 341, we have a clause inserted against Marcellus, and in the Baptismal Creed found in the Lectures of St. Cyril of Jerusalem (348) we find the clause since adopted into the enlarged Nicene Creed, "whose Kingdom shall have no end" (cp. Lk. 1 33).

(2) Apollinarianism. In the Creed given in the Ancoratus of Epiphanius (373 or 374) we have a clause inserted probably against Apollinarianism, which denied the completeness of Christ's humanity, " (and was incarnate) of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary."

(3) Macedonianism. In the same Creed (that in the Ancoratus) we find a paragraph (virtually identical with that in the Creed of our Communion service) added in expansion of the simple statement of the original Nicene Creed, "and in the Holy Ghost." These additional clauses were probably directed against Macedonianism which denied the full Divinity of the Holy Ghost.

The Relation of the Enlarged Creed to the original Creed of Nicaea. Epiphanius appears to claim that the Creed which he gives in the Ancoratus was the original Creed drawn up at Nicaea, but his statements are confused and untrustworthy. It has now come to be accepted among scholars since Hort's careful investigation (Two Dissertations, 1876) that this Creed given by Epiphanius is not so much an enlarged Nicene Creed as the local Creed of Jerusalem enlarged by the insertion of the Nicene clauses on the pre-Incarnate Christ, and the expansion of other clauses to meet later heresies.

It will be convenient to describe this revised

Jerusalem Creed as C., since it is generally known as Constantinopolitanum from the belief, which will be presently dealt with, that the enlargement of the original Nicene Creed took place at the Council of Constantinople in 381. The original Nicene Creed we shall designate as N.

Doubts have been cast on Hort's theory by Bp. Gibson, The Three Creeds (1908), pp. 169 ff., where the question is dealt with in detail. Dr. Burn in The Nicene Creed (1909), pp. 27 ff., replies in support of Hort. It may also be mentioned that Hort's theory has been called in question recently by Prof. Lebedeff of Moscow, who holds, with some modification, the traditional view that the enlargement of the Creed took place at the Council of Constantinople. He is of opinion that Epiphanius' text has been deliberately altered and is not to be relied on. He thinks that Epiphanius gave the original Nicene Creed and that the later text is an interpolation. His arguments are not regarded as convincing.

If we accept the view that the enlarged Creed in its full form was in existence in 373 or 374, it is impossible to maintain the view which was held until recent times that the enlargement of the Creed was made at the Council of Constantinople, 381. The Council of Constantinople (381) and the Council of Ephesus (431) appear simply to have ratified N. We have no evidence of the use of C. from its publication in the Ancoratus till the Council of Chalcedon, 451. At this Council both Creeds were read and adopted, and the authority of the Council of Constantinople is claimed for the enlarged form (C.), but this claim seems to have been based on a mistake. It has been suggested that C. may have received some sort of official sanction at Constantinople and that possibly it was submitted by St. Cyril of Jerusalem as a test of his orthodoxy, which was, there is reason to believe, under suspicion.

Another theory is that of Kunze (Das Nicänisch-Konstantinopolitanische Symbol, p. 35), that C. was the Creed used at the baptism of Nektarius, patriarch of Constantinople, who was baptised and consecrated during the Council, of which he became president (see Burn, op. cit., p. 34). The Creed which Nektarius professed at his baptism might naturally be expected to become the Baptismal Creed of his city.

It is clear at any rate that the Council of Constantinople never meant C. to be substituted for N. It was some considerable time later that this substitution took place. C. "was only gradually brought into general use after its promulgation at Chalcedon, and for some time yet in both E. and W. was still regarded as distinct from N. and given the second place; it was not until much later that the confusion between the two Creeds arose and the name of the 'Nicene Creed' was transferred to the later and fuller form" (Bp. Gibson).

It has been maintained by some scholars, such as Harnack and Seeberg, that the test-word of the Creed, homo-ousios, when it was finally accepted by the Church, had changed its meaning and had become really equivalent to homoi-ousios (of like substance). This was said to have been brought about by the Antiochenes and Cappadocian Fathers,

St. Basil, St. Gregory of Nyssa, and St. Gregory of Nazianzus, who are alleged to have surrendered the Nicene position and to have been followed by the rest of the Church at the Council of Constantinople. Thus, "a new orthodoxy was founded which was substantially semi-Arian." This view is convincingly dealt with by Bethune-Baker, Texts and Studies 71.

After the Council of Chalcedon (451) the enlarged Creed (C.) comes gradually into general use, though it had not yet received the final form which it was eventually to take in the W. Church.

3. After Chalcedon.

The Nicene Creed was not well known in the W. till a later period. It comes, however, into clear view in the W. at the Third Council of Toledo, 589, when King Reccared signalled his rejection of Arianism by calling a synod of the Spanish Church and adopting the Nicene faith. The form as recited at the synod appears to have had two additions to the form as promulgated at Chalcedon:

(1) God of God. This clause had been in the original Creed of Nicaea (N.), but had been subsequently omitted.

(2) And the Son (et Filio or Filioque) was added in the clause on the procession of the Holy Ghost.

Burn (in JTS, Jan., 1908) produces evidence from some of the most important MSS. of the Spanish Councils at the Escorial and at Madrid to show that the Council never added the words to the Creed at all. Some MSS. omit them altogether, others put them in the margin. Burn seems to think that the Creed itself was recited without the Filioque, but that it was used in the anathema appended, and then found its way by a copyist's error into the text of the Creed, and the error spread.

It had been usual for W. theologians since the days of St. Augustine to speak of the Holy Spirit as "proceeding from the Father and the Son," and this statement now found its way into the Creed which was henceforth used in the Communion Service of the Church of Spain. Before the end of the 8th cent. the Filioque clause had been introduced into the Creed as used by the Frankish Church, and it was vehemently defended by Charlemagne against a statement made at the Second Council of Nicaea (787) by Tarasius of Constantinople, who had asserted his belief in the Holy Ghost as "proceeding from the Father through the Son."

In the Stowe Missal, one of the earliest remaining Service books of the Irish Church (9th cent.), the Creed is found without the interpolation, but the Filioque has been added in the margin by a later hand.

In A.D. 809 the Filioque clause was definitely sanctioned at a Council held at Aachen by Charlemagne, who requested Pope Leo III to order its introduction generally. Leo refused on the ground that he had no authority to alter anything in the Creed. In 1014 the Emperor Henry II persuaded Pope Benedict VIII to admit the Creed with the Filioque clause into the Liturgy.

There is no essential doctrinal difference between the E. and the W. on this point, though the Filioque still marks a cleavage between the two great parts of Christendom.

The Nicene Creed has come to be the special Creed of the Eucharist, just as the Apostles' Creed is specially the Creed of 4. Liturgical Baptism.

(1) In the East. The Nicene Creed was introduced into the Communion Service by Peter the Fuller, patriarch of Antioch (476-488), and later by Timothy, patriarch of Constantinople (512-517). It is not clear whether it was the original form (N.) or the enlarged form (C.) which was then used. Dr. Burn (op. cit., p. 37) and C. H. Turner (op. cit., p. 50) think it was C. Bishop Gibson (op. cit., p. 157) seems to favour N. In 565-6 the fuller form (C.) was officially adopted by the Emperor Justin II, and henceforward it seems to have been generally used throughout the Greek Church, and soon to have assumed the title as well as the position of the original Nicene Creed.

It is said (by John of Biclarum) that Justin ordered that the Creed should be sung before the Lord's Prayer, i.e., after the Consecration. But apparently there is no evidence for the Creed occupying this position in the E. liturgies. The usual place for the Creed in E. liturgies is early in the Liturgy of the Faithful in connection with the kiss of peace, which it sometimes precedes (Syrian, Egyptian and Nestorian Liturgies), and sometimes follows (as in the Liturgy of Constantinople). See Brightman, E. Liturgies, p. 574.

It may be added that the Nicene Creed gradually took the place of the different local Baptismal Creeds in the E. It was afterwards introduced into the Hour Services, and it has now come to be the only Creed used by the orthodox Greek Church. At the Council of Florence (1438) the Greeks disclaimed knowledge of the Apostles' Creed.

(2) In the W. Church. In the W. the Nicene Creed has never been generally adopted as a Baptismal Creed. (It was so used at Rome in the Traditio Symboli from the 6th to the 10th century.)

In the Mozarabic or Spanish Liturgy the Nicene Creed is sung before the Lord's Prayer. In other parts of the W. Church it occupies the place found in the English PB, immediately after the Gospel. But the English Church alone orders its use at every celebration. In the Roman Church it is only used on Sundays and greater festivals. In the First PB of Edw. VI we find this note, "When the Holy Communion is celebrated on the workday or in private houses: then may be omitted the Gloria in Excelsis, the Creed, the Homily and the Exhortation." This note was omitted in 1552. The Nicene Creed has never been given a place in the Hour Services of the W., but it may be mentioned that the American PB permits the alternative use of either the Apostles' or the Nicene Creed at MP and EP.

The earliest translation of the Nicene Creed appears to be that which Cranmer made for the

5. The English Translation. First PB of Edw. VI. It omits the clause "whose kingdom shall have no end." Bp. Dowden (Workmanship of the PB, p. 106) has shown that the omission was probably not an accident but was due to critical inquiry. Cranmer found that he had been mistaken on this point and restored the clause in the PB of 1552. The clause on the Church varies from the correct text; there is no authority for the insertion of the words "I believe."

Bp. Gibson (op. cit., p. 175) suggests that Cranmer inserted "I believe" before "one catholic and apostolic Church" to mark a distinction between believing in the Holy Ghost and believing the Catholic Church, i.e., believing that it exists. The distinction is actually made by Cranmer himself in his Annotations upon the King's Book.

The other variation in this clause is the omission of "holy" before "catholic." This omission was also probably due to an attempt at criticism, since Bp. Dowden (op. cit., p. 104) has shown that in some early editions of works on the Councils the word is found to have been omitted by some mistake. It is a misfortune that as a result of this mistake one of the "notes" of the Church should be lacking in the Creed of our Communion Service.

See APOSTLES' CREED; in addition, The Nicene Creed, A. E. Burn (1909). On the relation of the Nicene Creed to other E. Creeds and to the Old Roman Creed, see Sanday, JTS 11 and 39.—U2.

J. SPENCE JOHNSTON.

NOCTURN.—An office consisting of Pss. each with its Antiphon, and three lessons each followed by its Respond. At Mattins on ordinary week days and minor festivals and throughout the Octave of Easter there was only one N., but three on Sundays and festivals generally. The Ns. were preceded by the INVITATORY and a metrical hymn, and followed on Sundays and festivals by Te D., except in Adv. and from Septuagesima to Easter. In the modern Roman use the Respond after the last lesson is omitted when Te D. is said. It should be noted that by "Mattins" is often meant Ns. and Lauds together, but sometimes Ns. only. In the Monastic Brev. there are on ordinary week-days two Ns., the 1st having three lessons, but the 2nd none; while on Sundays and festivals there are three Ns., each of which has four lessons. The name N. implies the time at which Mattins were originally said, viz., at midnight. But the hour gradually became later, and in modern times it has become customary to recite both Mattins and Lauds overnight, except in the stricter monasteries, where they are still said at some time between midnight and 4 a.m. (See HOURS OF PRAYER.)—B2. A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

NOMINATION.—(1) To a benefice. N. and Presentation to a Benefice commonly go together. N. is the selecting and naming the Clerk who is to be presented. Presentation is the formal application, usually by deed, to the Bishop to institute and induct the person so nominated. Commonly the same person nominates and presents. But in a few cases one person nominates and another formally presents, on the requisition of the person who nominates. The effective right of patronage is thus in the nominator, though the legal patron is the presenter. Instances sometimes occur, in the case of Colleges, where some benefactor has given to the College the right to nominate to a benefice of which he is patron, while reserving to himself and his heirs the right to formally present the nominee of the College.

(2) To a Curacy. An assistant Curate before being licensed by the Bp. must obtain a formal N. from the incumbent of the parish he is to be licensed to serve. Such N. does not give him any claim to be licensed, that being wholly in the discretion of the Bishop.—Ta. E. G. WOOD.

NON-COMMUNICATING ATTENDANCE.—

As the question whether those who do not propose to communicate at a particular celebration of HC ought to be allowed to remain throughout the service has been, and is still, much debated, it has been thought best to treat it in this art. on lines simply historical.

We begin with (1) the Institution: it is admitted on all hands that there were no non-communicants there; and it will not be disputed that this celebration was intended to be the norm to which all future celebrations should conform as far as possible. (2) Apostolic practice: there is no evidence during the 1st cent. that there was any innovation on this point in the Apostolic Ch.; this covers the whole of the cent., since St. John is believed to have survived until the end of it. (3) The practice of the 2nd cent.: the earliest reference to the custom of the 2nd cent. is found in the First Apology of Justin Martyr (c. 155); in his well-known account of the weekly worship of the Ch., which was held "on the day called Sunday," he describes the nature of the Communion Service, and says that "when our prs. are ended, bread and wine and water are brought, and the president offers in like manner (additional) prayers and thanksgivings . . . and the people assent by saying Amen, and there is a distribution made to each (c. 67). (4) The practice of the 3rd and 4th cents.: in the Apostolical Constitutions, which are believed by Liturgiologists of different schools to have assumed their present shape during the 4th cent., we find an elaborate Communion Office, with many "rubrics" as we now call them; one of them contains a direction that the bp. should first communicate, then the other clergy and clerical orders, "then the children," and lastly "all the people in order"; another rubric orders that "when all have partaken, then let the deacons carry what remains into the vestry" (Apost. Const. 8 13). These various testimonies are decisive as to the practice of the primitive Church.

When the Christian Religion was adopted by Constantine, and when, in consequence, numbers of persons flocked into the Ch. whose religious convictions were not very deep, many of them began to feel their unworthiness to communicate, and contrived to slip out before the distribution of the elements began. Very strong efforts were made to prevent this abuse, as it was then felt to be. The earliest rebuke of this practice is found in canon 2 of the Council of Antioch (A.D. 341), which runs thus: "All who come into the ch. of God and hear the holy Scriptures, but do not remain with the rest during the prs., or decline to receive the Euch., are cast out of the Ch." Chrysostom (c. 400) severely rebukes those who remain and do not communicate, telling them that they had declared themselves to be not unworthy by not departing with those who were in penitence, and that, if they stayed and did not partake, they were as unworthy of the prs. in which they had joined as of the reception which they declined (Hom. 3 in Eph.). Council after council endeavoured in vain to compel all present to stay and receive the elements according to the practice of earlier ages. The result was that NCA. was finally substituted for departure. The number of communicants by degrees grew steadily fewer and fewer until, after repeated efforts to secure a communion of each Ch. member at the greater Festivals, or at least thrice a year, the Lateran Council in 1215 was compelled to be content, so far as ordinary lay folk were concerned, with communion once a year, at Easter. [Cp. LORD'S SUPPER, §§ 10-13.]

2. Origin of Non-Communicating Attendance.

It must be borne in mind that one object of the Ch. of Eng. during the Reformation period was to restore the habit of frequent

3. Practice of Communion, which, as regards the great mass of Christian folk, had fallen into abeyance. In order to obtain this result, our Reformers celebrated the Communion less frequently, and invited non-communicants to take part every Sunday in the ordinary prs. of the Ch. Whether this policy be considered wise or not, it did at least gradually increase the number of regular communicants. We proceed to enumerate the steps which were taken. (1) Under the First PB of Edward VI non-communicants were expelled from the choir during the HC, but allowed to remain in the church. The directions of the rubric are that "so many as shall be partakers of the HC shall tarry still in the quire, or in some convenient place nigh the quire," while "all other that mind not to receive the said HC shall depart out of the quire." (2) In the Second PB of Edward VI a strong remonstrance against NCA. was inserted in a new Exh. (our present Exh. 3). After stating that not to communicate is to "offend God sore," it proceeds: "I admonish, exhort, and beseech you that unto this unkindness ye will not add any more: which thing ye shall do if ye stand by as gazers and lookers on them that do communicate, and be no partakers . . . yourselves." No pause is ordered for non-communicants to withdraw, but presumably they withdrew immediately after they were ordered to depart; there seems, however, some reason to believe that they may have departed after having made their offerings. (3) In the Revised PB of 1662 the passage which forbade non-communicants to remain was struck out of the Exhortation: this has led some to suppose that the prohibition was removed. But two reasons are given against this supposition: (a) NCA. remained practically unknown in our Ch. until the beginning of what has been called the "Catholic Revival" in the mid-Victorian period. (b) Bp. Wren, president at the revision of 1662, says expressly that "the gazers and lookers-on are wholly out of use," so that the expressions relating to them might be left out, "because the non-communicants generally do use to depart without bidding." And Bp. Morley, another of the Revisers, says of HC that "none were permitted to be present in the Primitive Ch. but such as are receivers and partakers of it."

The advocates of NCA. base their approval of it on the fact that HC has two aspects,

(a) the reception of the Body and Blood of Christ really present under the veils of the bread and wine, and

(b) the pleading of the Sacrifice of Christ, once offered for mankind upon the Cross: and that it were unreasonable to prevent those who for reasons of their own felt themselves unable to communicate at any particular celebration from remaining during the prs. of the Ch. and the Presentation and Pleading of the Great and Adorable Sacrifice. To this it is answered: (a) the only proper way in which that Sacrifice can be presented and pleaded is that which the Lord Himself has ordained, namely, by partaking of it; (b) the spectacle of a congregation assembled in Christ's Name to celebrate the Sacr. He ordained is, when the majority present decline to do what He plainly commanded, by no means an edifying one; (c) those who do not feel able to communicate should, as Chrysostom argues, regard themselves as under penitence, and should, in consequence, modestly depart; (d) if no pause is made for the withdrawal of non-communicants, the heretic, the unbeliever, and the self-excommunicate are practically invited to remain—a practice which the early Ch. energetically resisted, and which in these times does not always make for edification. Reasons may, however, be given for NCA. in special circumstances; e.g., when those who wish to remain have communicated at an earlier service, or on great public occasions such as Coronation or the Consecration of a Bp., or in the case of candidates who are being prepared for Confirmation and may therefore be permitted to stay throughout the service (as the highest grade of penitents did in the early Church).—R2. J. J. LIAS.

NONCONFORMIST.—Bishop Hooper has been called the "father" of English nonconformity because of his strenuous opposition to consecration in the old "Pontifical vestments" enjoined by the PB of 1549. He claimed that they were the "inventions of Antichrist" on account of their association with the Popish religion, and were not merely "things indifferent," because "we ought to have express Scripture for what we do in holy things" (Strype, Life of Cranmer, c. 17). The same attitude was adopted in Elizabeth's reign by the Puritans with regard to the use of the surplice for divine service and the square cap and tippet for ordinary apparel, which were required by the Act of Uniformity, 1559, and a determined Nonconformist party was soon formed. "Scripture," they urged, "ought to be the only rule of our actions, and consequently the Ch. orders we observe being not commanded in Scripture are offensive and displeasing to God" (Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref. 73). These Nonconformists, therefore, refused to wear the obnoxious "habits" which they styled "Aaronic vestments" and "rags of Popery," and also objected to several of the ceremonies enjoined by the PB, such as the sign of the cross in baptism, the custom of kneeling at communion, and the use of the ring in marriage, which they claimed were necessarily defiled from their connection with the superstitious worship of the Romish Ch. (see PURITANS). Finding it impossible to abolish these objectionable impositions, they demanded that their use should at least be optional, as they in no way dissented from the doctrinal teaching of the Ch. and had no intention of forsaking their ministry. For several years they persisted in their refusal to conform to the discipline and ceremonies, until Elizabeth ordered the bps. to resort to strong measures to establish "a uniformity of order in every ch." Accordingly, as a result of the "Advertisements" issued in 1566, a number of the Nonconforming clergy were deprived, others were forced very reluctantly to conform, while many avoided the objectionable ceremonies by acting as lecturers and chaplains in private families.

In spite of continuous persecution the majority of the Puritan Ns. refused to leave the Ch., and thus on the accession of James I the "Millenary" Petition, supposed to have been signed by 1,000 of their clergy, was presented to the King, praying that the use of the surplice and the objectionable ceremonies might not be made compulsory. The Hampton Court Conference of 1604, which met as the result of this petition, gave them no redress, and during the reigns of James I and Charles I all attempts at Nonconformity were so sternly repressed that numbers of the Puritan clergy were deprived, imprisoned, or compelled to emigrate to the North American colonies. During the Civil War the N. party, owing to the influence of the Scots, were persuaded to adopt Presbyterian tenets, although the majority of them were not opposed to the principle of episcopacy. Thus, at the Savoy Conference in 1661, they were prepared to accept Abp. Usher's scheme of modified episcopacy, consisting of suffragan bps. and diocesan synods, which had been proposed to the Long Parliament in 1641. Richard Baxter, who was their chief spokesman, distinctly stated that they had no quarrel "with the doctrines of the PB" (Life and Times 223), and the grievances which they presented were similar to the demands made at Hampton Court in 1604.

These were, however, refused, and the Act of Uniformity (1662), besides requiring every clergyman to give "his unfeigned assent and consent" to everything contained in the PB, also compelled all those who had only received Presbyterian orders to seek re-ordination from a bp. In consequence a large number of the Presbyterian or N. clergy were ejected from their livings and joined the general body of DISSENTERS. The majority were, however, still firmly attached to the principle of an exclusive national religion, and thus attempts were made, but unsuccessfully, in 1667 and 1689 to "comprehend" them again in the Ch. Even after the passing of the Toleration Act numbers of the Dissenters continued to attend their parish churches to receive the Sacrament, and this "occasional conformity," although bitterly opposed by the High Churchmen, was the indirect means of reconciling many of them to the Ch.

The survival of the old N. spirit, which, unlike the attitude adopted by the modern Dissenter, was not in any way hostile to the principle of a national establishment, continued till quite the middle of the 18th cent., and in 1748 proposals were again made for reuniting Dissenters and Churchmen.

During the 19th cent. the altered usage grew up which has made the term Ns. in ordinary speech identical with Dissenters.—A1.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

NONE.—The office to be recited at the 9th hour, i.e., 3 p.m., but in practice earlier, as we see from the common meaning of "noon." In choir on ordinary days N. was said immediately aft. the principal Mass, but in Lent bef. it. (See HOURS OF PRAYER).—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

NON-RESIDENCE.—An Incumbent is bound to reside in the house of residence, if there be one, and if not then within the parish. If, for good reasons, the latter is impracticable, the bishop can grant a licence of non-residence specifying the house wherein he is permitted to reside. Such licence is revocable at the discretion of the Bp. Licence for NR. may also be granted in the case of the illness of the incumbent, or of a member of his family, proper certificates being furnished. In such case a curate in charge must be appointed on the nomination of the incumbent. The licence is for a definite period only, but may be renewed, in certain cases, with the consent of the Metropolitan. If an incumbent is non-resident without licence, he can be called back into residence by the Bp., and if the monition be disobeyed the benefice will be ipso facto vacated. A return of the non-residents in each diocese in England and Wales has to be made annually by the Bp. to the King in Council.—ra.

E. G. WOOD.

NORTH SIDE OF THE TABLE.—The words "the Priest standing at the north side of the Table" first appeared in "The

1. The North Side Eubric.

Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper" in 1552 ("The Order of . . ." is a modern printers' error). In 1549 the words were "The Priest standing humbly afore the middes of the Altar." Under the Sarum Use the custom had been for the priest to begin Mass at the south end of the front of the Altar, hence the NS. position was completely new. The phrase, which in the Amer. PB has been altered to "right side," is a technical term based, as the Ridsdale Judgment pointed out, on "the almost universal eastward position of chs. in Eng.," and it retains the same meaning with regard to the Table even when, as in the Purchas case, 1870-1, the Holy Table stood at the west end of the church.

The removal of altars had already begun bef. it was enforced by an Order in Council in 1550, and the word altar was expunged from the PB of 1552. The Tables were movable, the Order appended to the Royal Injunctions of 1559 stating " . . . that the Holy Table in every ch. be decently made, and set in the place where the Altar stood . . . so to stand, saving when the Communion of the Sacr. is to be distributed; at which time the same shall be placed in good sort within the Chancel. . . . And after the Communion done from time to time, the same Holy Table to be placed where it stood before."

The restriction of the Table to the chancel by this Order was, however, disregarded, and it is not recognised either in canon 82 of 1604 or in our present statutory rubric. By the time of James I custom had brought prayer-desk and pulpit down into "the body of the ch.," and had placed the Holy Table, east and west, lengthwise in the central alley between the pews. But, as Bp. Harold Browne wrote in a Pastoral letter in 1875, "Neither here nor ever afterwards, by canon, rubric, or Act of Parliament, was there any injunction whatever by which the Table, which had always stood north and south, should be turned round through an angle of 90° and stand east and west." Laud had the right to require the Table to be removed to the east wall when not required for Communion, and there was reason for this in face of prevalent irreverence; but he exceeded his rights when he insisted on its being railed in as a fixture "altarwise." The Puritans on their side had exceeded their rights when they allowed the Table to remain "in the body of the ch." when not required for Communion.

On this arose the earliest known dispute as to the meaning of the phrase NS. In 1627 Williams, Bp. of Lincoln, wrote to the Vicar of Grantham: "This table is not to stand altarwise and you at the north end thereof, but table-wise, and you must officiate at the north side of the same by the Liturgy"; and Peter Stuart said in his sermon in Durham Cath., July 27th, 1628, "there are but two sides of a long table and two ends." The Puritans thus endeavoured to prevent the removal of the tables from the body of the ch. to the east end under the pretext that, a table having only two sides, the rubric could not be obeyed except when the table was set lengthwise. Those who were on the side of Laud maintained, as Bp. Wren said in his Parenthesis, that "custom of speech led" those who framed the rubric "to call the North end or North part of the Table, the NS. thereof." Wren himself was accused by the Commons in 1640 for "kneeling and consecrating at the west side of the Holy Table." Cosin was impeached in 1641 for having been "used to officiate at the west side thereof, turning his back to the people." Wren's excuse was that he had done so once, five years bef., because on that occasion the elements "stood upon the table further from the end than he, being but low of stature, could reach over his book unto them," but on that one occasion "he did stand at the NS." both bef. and after. Cosin replied, "he denieth that he did ever officiate with face purposely towards the east; but he constantly stood at the NS. or end of the Table." It is thus clear that both Wren and Cosin in 1641 admitted the illegality of the eastward position. In the Scottish PB of 1637 we find the phrase "NS. or end"; it is also found in the Durham Book, i.e., "Cosin's corrected copy of 1640-61," and in the "Bodleian fair copy" of 1661. In the Annexed Book the rubric had first NS; this was altered to "north part," but altered back to "north side." Under this rubric the "NS. or end position" was so universal that Bp. Chas. Wordsworth wrote in 1876: "There was not a single Anglican writer upon the subject, so far as I could discover, from 1662 to 1843, who had taken the other side, except Scandret (1708) and John Johnson (1714), who however, though inclined to suggest it as tending to recommend their peculiar views of the Euch. sacrifice, yet are really witnesses against it in point of fact." Yet by 1871, the date of the Purchas Judgment which condemned it, the Eastward Position had, as the Report of the Royal Commission of 1906 points out, "become widely prevalent."

The interpretation of this rubric came before the Court in the Lincoln Judgment of 1890.

2. Legal Interpretations. Bp. King, following recent writers, had adopted the theory that NS. means the northern portion of the west side. He said that "down to the Cr. he stood or knelt as required by the rubrics in front of the Holy Table and at the northern part thereof, this being the NS. of the Table as directed by the rubric." This was held by the Court "to be inconsistent with the continuous history of the rubric." The Court confessed that "Neither to Heylin, nor Bp. Williams, nor Wren, nor Cosin, in explaining NS., did it occur to find it on the west front." Yet the Court refused to condemn that position on the plea "that a certain liberty in the application of the term existed," and "such existing liberty it is not the function of a Court, but only of legislation, to curtail"—a decision which would seem to make a return to a primitive Westward position behind the Table to be also not illegal in the Ch. of Eng. The judgment also affirmed that "the imputed sacrificial aspect of the Eastward position is new and forced, and can take no effect in rendering that position either desirable on the one side or illegal on the other." It is, however, true that the adoption of that position is a return to the position of 1549, which was repudiated in 1552 simultaneously with the abolition of Altars and the substitution of Tables.

Certain changes made in the rubrics in 1662 have given rise to further controversy. A new rubric (corresponding to one in the Scottish PB of 1637) was placed bef. the Pr. for "the whole state of Christ's Ch. militant here in earth," which directed the Priest to "place upon the Table so much Bread and Wine as he shall think sufficient." The rubric before the Pr. of Consecr. was likewise amended and enlarged. In the Durham Book we can trace the successive alterations of the earlier rubric. Bef. 1662 it ran: "Then the Priest standing up shall say as followeth." The new rubric was first written, "when the Priest hath so ordered the Bread and Wine placed upon the Table as that he may with the more ease and decency take them into his hands, standing up he shall say, as followeth." The next step was to add the words "standing before the Table" and to erase the words "placed upon the Table"—phrases which contain a reference to the earlier rubric newly added. The words "standing up" were also erased as the priest would have already risen from his knees to order the bread and wine. The correct PUNCTUATION which is found in the Annexed Book, "... cup into his hands; he shall say . . .," marks the division of the rubric into the new and the old sections. In the Sealed Books the semicolon is replaced by a comma, and this printers' error has continued to the present time.

The second dispute as to NS. was based on the words of this rubric and arose about 1708-10. The statement was made that the words "standing before the Table" referred grammatically not only to the ordering of the elements, but also to the whole subsequent Prayer. Johnson of Cranbrook asserted this; Nicholls and Wheatly denied it. Lewis of Margate, in 1717, spoke of the Eastward Position as a "whim" "lately introduced." The Report of the Royal Commission of 1906 shows that in 1843 the custom was exceedingly rare, and quotes Pusey as writing in 1851 that Newman to the last consecrated at the north end. Pusey himself, although, like Keble, in favour of it, had not adopted the eastward position in 1871 when it had become widely prevalent.

4. Rubric bef. Pr. of Consecration.

In 1871, on an undefended appeal in the Purchas case, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared the Eastward position to be illegal. It was, however, strongly urged that this decision, compared with the judgment in the Mackonochie case in 1868, involved, as Canon Liddon wrote, "two contradictory constructions of the same words"; and in 1877 it was reversed by the Ridsdale Judgment, which decided that the rubric would be satisfied should the minister "order the elements," either "standing on the NS. and looking towards the south," or "standing on the west side and looking towards the east," and that "beyond this and after this there is no specific direction that, during this Pr., he is to stand on the west side, or that he is to stand on the NS." This legal decision would also, obviously, make the primitive Westward position, standing behind the Table, to be not illegal in the Ch. of Eng. The Lambeth Judgment of 1890 refers to this decision, when it speaks of the Eastward position in the Consecration Pr. as "admitted to be lawful"; and the Royal Commission Report of 1906 says that by it the Judicial Committee declared "the Eastward position during the Pr. of Consecr. to be in accordance with law, provided it did not render the MANUAL ACTS invisible to the congregation."

It must be carefully noted that these decisions of 1871, 1877 and 1890, do not affirm in favour of the Eastward as against the N. side or end position. What they actually do can best be stated in the words of a Pastoral letter of Abp. Benson, Dec. 6, 1890. He said: "I would then ask you to observe generally that the conclusions reached are simply the decision that such and such an act is, or is not, expressly or by necessary implication forbidden by the law of our Ch.—is, or is not, on immediate or ultimate consequence actually penal by that law as it now stands. It is evident that decisions of this character are far from throwing the weight of the Court's authority upon the side which it does not find to be illegal"; and he added in a later portion of the letter "those simplest forms are liturgically true," a statement which includes a reference to "the north side of the Table." [For a different view, see EASTWARD POSITION.]

—R2.

FREDC. F. GRENSTED.

NOTICE.—The formal announcing to anyone of a matter of which he is or might be ignorant. A notice should be in writing and delivered to the person affected, unless statute makes this unnecessary in a particular case. The notice that must precede any ecclesiastical suit is called CITATION.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

NOTICE BOARD.—A board prominently placed outside a church and inscribed with the hours of services, names of clergy, etc. Formerly divers Acts of Parliament were read in the churches, but the statute 7 Will. IV and 1 Vict., c. 45, § 2, provided that thereafter such acts must be posted on or near the church door. N. boards, being near the main entrance, are commonly accepted as equivalent to the church door for displaying such acts and other statutory notices (e.g., voters' lists, papers relating to election of guardians, etc.).

Usually other N. boards are fixed within the church porch to publish announcements of more temporary interest.—R5.

S. REDMAN.

NOTICES IN CHURCH.—That the Ch. of Eng. regards the HC as the most important of her services, and relies on a considerable attendance of her members at the celebrations thereof, would seem to be implied in her fixing upon it as the proper time for giving out public notices, as indicated in the rubric which immediately follows the Nicene Creed in HC. The custom of making such announcements at Mass may be traced back in our own branch of the Ch. Catholic at least to the 14th cent., and to several cents. earlier in other parts of the Christian world, with variations in the prescribed form, and a certain liberty of discretion to the local ministrant. Confining ourselves here to the prescriptions of the PB, the history of the existing rubric may be briefly stated as follows. The First PB contains no instructions on the point, but in the issue of 1552 we find the germ of the present rubric in one that was then inserted, ordering the Curate to "declare unto the people whether there be any holy-days or fasting days the week following"—a declaration which he was to make after the sermon. In 1662 the position was reversed, the notices then being appointed to precede the sermon, and amplified by the inclusion of the "BANS of Matrimony," since omitted, as well as the "BRIEFS, CITATIONS, and EXCOMMUNICATIONS" still retained in the stereotyped form of instructions, though seldom or never occurring in modern practice.

As to the Bans of Marriage, there is an apparent inconsistency in the directions of 1662, in that the forementioned rubric enjoins their publication before the sermon, while that in the matrimonial rite itself gives the time as "immediately before the sentences for the Offertory." It is unlikely, however, that the same set of compilers would have contradicted themselves; and the inference is that the rubric in the second case was simply intended to provide for occasions when there was no sermon, as not infrequently happened, and still happens sometimes. By the Marriage Act of 26 George II, c. 33, s. 1, provision was made for the possibility of there being no regular Sunday Eucharist in the order for the publication of Banns "upon three Sundays preceding the Solemnization of Marriage, during the time of Morning Service, or of Evening Service if there be no Morning Service in such Church or Chapel upon any of those Sundays, immediately after the Second Lesson." Obviously we are here confronted with a prescription at first sight at variance with the rubric, which has led to some diversity of practice in the time of publication. It is argued, however, that by the Act of Uniformity the rubrics have the force of statute law, and that in the particular case they have by no means been annulled or repealed by the said Marriage Act, the only object of which was to permit the notification of Banns at other times than the rubric directs, without superseding it. In this view the interval between the Creed and the sermon in the Communion Office is still the proper time for giving out the Banns with the other notices, a custom which is adhered to wherever a full sense of eccles. obligation prevails. In this matter the modern printers of the PB, though more or less excused by the Ritual Commission of 1870 (vide their Fourth Report, p. 18), have been censured for accommodating their text to the position, in defiance of the authority really binding upon them. "They have not only chosen to put their own construction on the statute, which undoubtedly is a false one, but they have, in order to carry out their false construction, actually omitted altogether that portion of the rubric after the Nicene Creed which directs the publication of the Banns, and also substituted a new rubric of their own at the commencement of the Marriage-service, although the statute says nothing which in the remotest degree authorises any alteration of the rubrics, but rather guards against any unnecessary deviations from them" (see the legal opinion of Dr. A. J. Stephens, as stated in his Notes on the Book of Common Prayer).

Whatever time is preferred locally for the public notices, they are usually, and almost necessarily, made to include others than those directly specified in the PB; e.g., the days and hours of special services, the names of special preachers, a list of the sick or dying for whom prayers are desired, etc., in all of which the minister is by custom left to his common sense and the exigencies of his parish, in spite of the express limitation of the Rubric, but in accordance with the spirit of liberty characteristic of the National Church.—A4. G. WORLEY.

NOTORIOUS OFFENDERS.—Canon 109 provides for the presentment of "Notorious Crimes and Scandals" in Ecclesiastical Courts. For the text of the canon see art. CLERGY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1892, § 2 n., by which its enumeration of "crimes and scandals" practically becomes statutory, so far as relates to the conduct of the clergy. As regards the laity, the procedure by Presentment is now obsolete. But the first rubric in HC gives powers of discipline to the minister. Canon 26 provides that "No Minister shall in any wise admit to the receiving of the HC any of his Cure or Flock, which be openly known to live in sin notorious without repentance, Nor any who have maliciously and openly contended with their neighbours, until they shall be reconciled." And lay offenders against canon 109 "shall not be admitted to the HC till they be reformed." This power of repulsion is carefully guarded by the above rubric, and is confined to cases in which (a) the offence is open and notorious, (b) the congregation is thereby offended; and must be preceded by a "calling" of the delinquent by the minister to "advertise" him of his intention. The minister "so repelling any . . . shall be obliged to give an account . . . to the Ordinary within fourteen days after at the farthest." The question has been discussed in several modern cases, particularly

Jenkins v. Cook (L.R. 4 Adm. and Eccl. 463, 1 P.D. 80), and R. v. Dibb n (L. R., 1910, P. 57) where the man repelled had married his deceased wife's sister.—P.D. R. J. WHITWELL.

NUNC DIMITTIS.—The Song of Simeon (Luke 2 29-32) falls into three divisions:

(1) V. 29: The acknowledgment of permission to depart as of a sentinel after a long watch, or, according to Eastern usage, of a guest after a visit. (2) Vv. 30, 31: The sign by which the permission is given—the Messianic deliverance now before Simeon's eyes—ordained of God to appear at this time before all peoples, extending to them the position of privilege. (3) V. 32 amplifies the last words, explaining the salvation as light for a revelation to Gentile darkness and glory to the Chosen People from whom it shines forth.

This, the shortest of the canticles, is at once the tenderest—in its expression of quiet confidence which comes from the personal appropriation of God's promises—and the deepest—in its insight into the purpose of those promises, not for the narrow circle of the chosen race alone, but for the whole world.

The ND, though not included among the nine chief Canticles of the Church occurs in the collection following the Pss. in for Vespers, and was so used in the 6th cent. at the monastery of Abbot Nilus on Mount Sinai; it forms the Ἀπολυτίκιον (prelude to dismissal) in the Ἀκολουθία τοῦ ἑσπερινού (Vespers) of the Greek Church. In the West, it is not included in the 6th cent. African list of Verecundus, in the 7th cent. Irish Antiphonary of Bangor, or in the Compline office of St. Benedict; this last omission probably means that either the office of Compline did not exist at the beginning of the 6th cent. in the Roman Church, or the canticle was not yet inserted in that office of which it now forms the climax. It is also used in solemn procession in the Roman rite on the feast of the Purification of the BV. Mary.

2. Liturgical Use. Cod. A. In the Apostolical Constitutions (4th cent.) it is ordered

From its position at Compline, this canticle came into Evensong, where it now forms the conclusion and climax of the act of praise, expressing the personal appropriation of God's mercies set forth in the NT just read in the second lesson, and the peace and rest which they bring.

T. D. Bernard, Songs of the Holy Nativity; Cabrol, DAC, art. Cantiques Évangéliques;

4. Bibliography. Bäumer, Geschichte des Breviers.—E2. M. LINTON SMITH.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.—In England the Oath of Allegiance to the Sovereign has to be taken before ordination to the diaconate and the priesthood, and also on consecration to the episcopate; it has also to be taken on institution to a benefice or to a canonry. The reason for the imposition of this obligation is to ensure that a person, who is admitted to a position of influence and importance, shall be pledged not to use his position in any manner inconsistent with the duty which as a citizen he owes to the Crown. The Oath does not impose any fresh obligation of allegiance upon him, if he already is either a natural born, or a naturalised, subject. He was already bound by natural allegiance: the Oath only converts that into expressed allegiance. The taking of the Oath has no relation to the due performance of spiritual functions, nor does it imply any acknowledgment of authority on the part of the Crown or the Civil Courts in regard thereto. The form of the Oath has varied from time to time; formerly it was long and verbose; as settled by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1867, it is now expressed in the following words: "I, N.M., about to be . . . do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George, his heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God."—ra

E. G. WOOD.

OATH OF CANONICAL OBEDIENCE.—This oath is taken before being licensed to a curacy, or being instituted to a benefice, or ecclesiastical dignity. It is also taken before consecration to the Episcopate, and in this case is often called the Oath of Due Obedience. The earliest form of the Oath was the solemn declaration of a bp. after consecration to obey and maintain the "Sacred Canons" of the Ch. It was not a promise of obedience to a person; and, though eventually it took a personal form, the meaning and scope was not thereby changed. The promise is not one of personal, far less of unlimited, obedience, but of obedience to an administrator. The real object of the promise is still the "Sacred Canons," meaning thereby the general discipline of the Ch., as expressed by canons, customs and constitutions, and lawfully and duly administered by the person to whom the promise is made. The obedience promised is therefore limited to what is prescribed by the law and custom of the Ch. This was very clearly stated by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Long v. The Bp. of Capetown (Brodrick and Fremantle 313): "The Oath of Canonical Obedience does not mean that the clergyman will obey all the commands of the Bp. against which there is no law, but that he will obey all such commands as the Bishop by law is authorised to impose"; that indeed is what is signified by the qualifying word "Canonical." [This interpretation does not reduce the Bp. to the position of being a mere mouthpiece to echo the explicit requirements of the law, but leaves room for all discretionary jurisdiction assigned to him by law.]

The form of the Oath of Canonical Obedience as taken by a priest or deacon is: "I N. do swear that I will pay true and Canonical obedience to the Lord Bishop of A. and his successors in all things lawful and honest. So help me God."

The oath taken by a bishop is: "In the Name of God. Amen. I N. chosen Bishop of the Church and See of M. do profess and promise all due reverence and obedience to the Archbishop and to the Metropolitan Church of A. and to their successors; So help me God, through Jesus Christ."—ra
E. G. WOOD.

OBLATION.—(a) O. is sometimes used as a name for the service of HC (so from end of 2nd cent.), or for its central act (so Scottish Communion Office and Amer. PB—Rubric indented in Pr. of Consecr.). (b) "Alms and Os."—see CHURCH MILITANT, PRAYER FOR THE, § 3. (c) Offerings made by the people in kind, not in money, are sometimes called Os.—see OFFERTORY (i). (d) Till lately, the King made two Os. at his CORONATION:—one, consisting of a rich PALL (or altar-cloth) and an ingot of gold weighing a pound, at the beginning, immediately after the Recognition—the other, consisting of bread and wine for the HC and a piece (or pieces) of gold, at the Offertory. At the last two Coronations, however, the two were combined, the first O. being merged in the second.—A6.

J. W. TYRER.

OCCASIONAL OFFICES.—The name applied to such offices as Bapt., Confirm., Marriage, VS, Burial, which are only used as occasion offers, in contradistinction from the regular services of MEP, Lit. and HC.—B1.
J. W. TYRER.

OCCASIONAL PRAYERS.—See PRAYERS AND THANKSGIVINGS.

OCCURRENCE AND CONCURRENCE.—When two holy-days fall on the same day they are said to "occur"; when on consecutive days to "concur." No rules are laid down in the PB for either event; but a Committee of the Lower House of Canterbury Convocation (1909) has proposed the following Table of Occurrence, which closely follows that in the "Convocation Prayer Book" (1880). The Table is permissive only, but suggests that the days in the left-hand column should take precedence, the Coll. of the corresponding day in the other column being said second, by way of "memorial."

1st S. in Advent.....	St. Andrew
4th S. in Advent.....	St. Thomas
St. Stephen, St. John, Innocents, Circumcision	1st S. aft. Christmas
Epiphany.....	2nd S. aft. Christmas
Conversion of St. Paul....	3rd S. aft. Epiphany
Purification.....	4th S. aft. Epiph., Sept., Sex., Quinqu.
Septuages., Sexagesima....	Conversion of St. Paul
Sexag., Quinqu., Ash-Wed., Sundays in Lent	St. Matthias
Sundays in Lent, days of Holy Week, Easter Day, Easter Mon. and Tu.	Annunciation
Easter Day, Easter Mon. and Tu., 1st S. aft. Easter	St. Mark
1st S. aft. Easter, Ascension Day	St. Philip and St. James
St. Mark, St. Philip and St. James	Other Sundays after Easter
Whitsunday, Whitsun Mon. and Tu., Trin. S.	St. Barnabas
St. Barnabas and Holy-Days till All SS. inclusive	Sundays aft. Trin.

The Convocation PB prefers Annunciation to the 3rd, 4th and 5th Sundays in Lent, and allows the propria of the superseded Holy Day to be used at an extra service, except on the Great Festivals. No provision is made for the transference or for the total supersession of the days in the right-hand column, as in the elaborate mediæval rules. And no provision is made for Concurrence. The question in that case arises in connection with the Coll. and (if such should hereafter be provided as suggested by Convocation) the lessons used on the even. The best way would probably be to follow the above Table as nearly as may be. See EVEN.—C5.
A. J. MACLEAN.

OCTAVE.—The custom of observing seven days after a festival is in the main Western. But Easter was, at least from the 4th cent., everywhere thus kept, as the Passover was kept among the Jews

(Ex. 12 15, Lev. 23 6, Num. 28 24 : see Apost. Const. 8 32; Chrysostom, Hom. 34 de Res. Chr.; Augustine, Ep. 55 32 f. Ben.). Pentecost has an O. in Apost. Const. 5 20. In the Pilgrimage of "Silvia" (c. A.D. 385) Easter, Epiphany (i.e., the Nativity, Jan. 6), Dedication, have Os. The custom was extended in the West to many festivals. In Sarum the following days have Os.: Christmas, Epiph., Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, Corpus Christi, Dedication; SS. Andrew, Stephen, John Evang., Thomas of Canterbury, John Bapt., Peter and Paul, Lawrence, Martin; Innocents, Visitation of BVM, Name of Jesus, Assumption and Nativity of BVM. All Saints' Day had no O. in the Sarum as in the Roman books. The sole relic of Os. in PB is the provision for the use of proper Prefaces for 7 (6) days after the four greatest festivals, and of the Christmas Coll. "unto New Year's Eve." In Sarum the eighth day is called "octava," the intervening days "octavae"; thus we have, e.g., "per octavas Epiphaniae."—C5. A. J. MACLEAN.

OFFERTORY.—The Latin Offertorium, from which O. is derived, has several meanings. But the Eng. word is used in three senses only, all connected with the Offering at HC: (i) the part of the Service in which the Offering takes place (so 9th Rubric at end of HC); (ii) what is said or sung during the Offering (so Rubric aft. Sermon in HC); (iii) the amount of money, etc., collected at the Offering.

(i) In the first sense the O. consists of three things: (a) the collecting of the Alms, (b) the Presentation of the Alms, (c) the placing of the Elements on the Holy Table. The variations of the ceremonies connected with (a) and (b) in the different PBs are described under ALMS (§ 2). It only remains here to show the antiquity of the people's Offering at HC. One or two witnesses must suffice.

Justin Martyr (c. 155) speaks of it in connection with the Sunday Euch. (I Apol. 67). Cyprian (c. 255) tells us further that the elements for HC were taken out of it (On Work and Alms 15). This shows us it was not merely a money collection, but in part at any rate consisted of bread and wine. We learn besides its position in the service; it took place bef. the elements were put on the altar, and apparently immediately bef., as Catechumens were not allowed to offer, and therefore the Offering must have been at the beginning of the Missa Fidelium, exactly where it occurs now. It would seem that originally everything offered was placed on the altar; for certain early canons (e.g., Apost. Can. 3) forbid this except for bread, wine, corn and grapes. Some other exceptions were, however, occasionally allowed. In later times the people's offering became obsolete, but at Milan Cathedral it is still kept up as a ceremony at High Mass (Rubr. Gen. de Miss. Rit. Ambros. 36, Milan, 1846). We owe a deep debt of gratitude to the Reformers for restoring the people's Offering at HC.¹ (With regard to the law re disposal of money collected at O., see CHURCHWARDEN, § 1.)

(c) The placing of the Elements on the Holy Table was ordered here in the First PB of 1549. In 1552 the order was omitted, but it was reinstated in the Scottish PB of 1637, and from thence passed into the Eng. PB in 1662. Its adoption was in accordance with primitive use, and was a distinct gain. Its position, too, immediately aft. the Presentation of the Alms is significant as replacing the ancient custom of the people offering the bread and wine, and is in strict agreement with the best liturgical usage (e.g., that of Milan). All this is obscured by the slovenly custom, not uncommon last cent., of placing the Elements on the Holy Table bef. the beginning of the service, and by the equally slovenly custom, not uncommon nowadays, of placing them there bef. the Presentation of the Alms. Both are direct violations of the letter and spirit of the PB. (On the question what is meant by "alms and oblations" in the succeeding Pr., see CHURCH MILITANT, PRAYER FOR THE, § 3.)

¹ Offerings in kind are frequently made by the converts in Missionary Churches.

(ii) The word O. is, as we have seen, also applied, like the Latin Offertorium, to what is said or sung during the Offering. In the Pre-Reformation services the Offertorium was an Anthem varying with the day. For this in the PB of 1549 certain SENTENCES were substituted, which might be either said or sung. In 1552 the permission to sing them was omitted; nevertheless the custom has not altogether died out. It is perfectly lawful, after one or more of the Sents. have been read, to sing a hymn until the end of the Offering, and such a hymn may well be called "the Offertory Hymn."

(iii) The fashion of calling the collection the Offertory has no sanction whatever in the PB, or in any other liturgical authority, and is merely a vulgar error of the last half century.¹—H. I.

J. W. TYRER.

OFFICE, DIVINE.—The common designation of the entire series of daily offices for the Hours of PRAYER. But in England bef. the Reformation this was known as the Divine Service.—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

OFFICIAL PRINCIPAL.—The spiritual jurisdiction of Bps. previous to the 12th cent. was, in regard to matters to be judicially determined, exercised personally, either in Synod, or with the assistance of some of the clergy summoned to take part ad hoc. The organisation of Ecclesiastical Courts as subsequently developed did not as yet exist. Gradually certain persons were appointed to assist in a more permanent capacity; these, following the usage of the Roman Civil Law, were called officiales. Mention of them is found in the proceedings of the Council of Westminster, 1173. The rise of the office of VICAR-GENERAL, to whom was entrusted the exercise of the "voluntary jurisdiction" of the Bp., such as the granting of licences, dispensations, faculties and such like, was followed by the creation of the office of officialis principalis, to whom was entrusted the exercise of the coercive jurisdiction of the Bp. The OP. thus became the judge of the Bp.'s Court. He has ordinary jurisdiction and can pronounce a definitive sentence against which there is no appeal to the Bp. The latter is, however, not excluded from his own Court by the appointment of the OP.; he can, if he chooses, sit with him, and reserve the sentence to himself. The Court is for this reason called the CONSISTORY COURT, because the Bp. sits there, or can do so, with his official; though in practice this seldom occurs. They two form unum consistorium, and, therefore, as just said, there is no appeal to the Bp., even if the sentence is pronounced by the official alone, for he exercises the plenitude of the Bp.'s coercive jurisdiction as his deputy and representative. He is called OP. to distinguish him from inferior officials, who were called Officiales foranei, because they did not reside, as the OP. was supposed to do, in the episcopal city, but in other places of the diocese, and had only limited powers, both with respect to the matters concerning which they could adjudicate, and the parts of the diocese in which they could act. Archdeacons also have their officials who exercise their coercive jurisdiction in their Courts; though still appointed, their office is now hardly more than a formality, or at best they are legal advisers to the archdeacon. The archdeacon's official is properly an OP., though it is not customary now to call him so. The OP. is required by the Canon Law to be an ecclesiastic, though Minor Orders will suffice for his qualification; at present he is usually a barrister and layman. The OP. can, as well as the Vicar-General, appoint Surrogates whom he can direct to sit in Court, and hear evidence, and perform other judicial acts on his behalf and under his direction. It has become customary in England to appoint the same person to the three distinct offices of Vicar-General, O.P., and CHANCELLOR. For a full discussion of the history and functions of officials, see Fournier, Les Officialités au Moyen Age, Paris, 1880.—A5.

¹ [It has, however, become so firmly established in the reports of religious societies and on the lips of ch. officers that even those who dislike the innovation must admit that usage has created a fresh connotation for the word.—G. H.]

E. G. WOOD.

[Abps. as well as Bps. have official principals; the Dean of the Arches being the OP. of the prov. court of Canterbury, with original jurisdiction under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, and an appellate jurisdiction from each of the diocesan and archidiaconal courts in the province. The Chancellor of the Chancery Court of York has similar powers in the northern province.]

R. J. WHITWELL.

OFFICIATING MINISTER.—This designation is usually employed in describing the clergyman who performs some eccles. duty, if he be not the incumbent or licensed curate to whom the right or responsibility of performing it properly belongs. Thus, in registering either a baptism or burial taken by a stranger, it is very usual to describe him, or for him to describe himself, as "A.B. Officiating Minister." It would seem, however, that it would be more correct if the officiant were to be described by his proper eccles. title; such as A.B. Rector of X, or C.D. assistant Curate of Y. The addition of the words "Officiating Minister" is superfluous, as the signature comes in a column of the register headed, "By whom the ceremony was performed" or such like. The designation is not properly a technical one, and its use cannot be advised. It does not serve to identify the person who performed the duty, and is therefore useless. Its convenience consists principally in furnishing a comprehensive title by which the person who will perform a clerical duty may be addressed beforehand in cases of doubt.—7a.

E. G. WOOD.

OILS, HOLY.—(1) Oil of Catechumens, (2) CHRISM, (3) Oil of the Sick. Since the seventh cent. the holy oils, formerly consecrated at any time, have been blessed by the Roman bishops in the Mass on Maundy Thursday. See Addis and Arnold, Catholic Dict., art. Oils, Holy.—R2.

V. STALEY.

OLD CATHOLICS.—This title is adopted by those congregations in Germany, Holland, Switzerland and elsewhere which have rejected the Vatican dogma of Papal infallibility, and have organised themselves independently. A short statement of the Constitution adopted by them is inserted here, inasmuch as their policy was avowedly dictated by a desire, which the Church of England also professes, to restore primitive practice so far as may be. It was also animated by characteristically German faithfulness to the model they had in view, and thoroughness in following out the theories upon which they were acting. An official account of this Constitution is given by von Schultze in his Altkatholismus (Giessen, 1887), pp. 577 ff.

He states the position thus: "At the head of the Church stands the Bishop, and at his side the Synodalröpräsentanz." This is a sort of Standing Committee composed of four clergy and six laymen. It in no way controls the power of the Bp. over his proper episcopal functions, e.g., matters sacramental, matters of teaching, jurisdiction and visitation, or matters affecting his jus liturgicum (subject to the ecclesiastical law). It is intended as a support for, rather than a control over, him. This Committee controls the Church Property, calls special meetings of the Synod, settles the agenda for Synod meetings, and maintains discipline over the clergy, with the Bp. as President. For all ordinary business of the Church the Synod is responsible. It consists (under the Presidency of the Bp.) of all the clergy and of lay representatives from each parish. Its duties are: making Church laws; giving sentence in serious cases of clerical discipline; giving decision upon complaints against the Bp. or the Standing Committee; election of a Bp. and of various other officers. Each parish is under the leadership of the parish priest, who is responsible under the Bp. for the cure of souls. For matters not clearly pastoral there exists a Church Council, for seeing to the ordinary expenses, for the appointment of officials, the care of the poor, the proper arrangement for the services (not including the manner of conducting them), etc. There is also a Meeting of Parishioners when called to elect a priest to the cure, or representatives to the Synod, or for financial matters of importance. For this Constitution Dr. von Schultze claims that it is true to the primitive ideal, and when put to practical proof it properly preserves spiritual authority, while putting no hindrance in the way of true corporate parochial life.—A1.

T. SYDNEY LEA.

OMISSION has two special references in regard to the PB. (1) It describes the dropping of some part of one ed. of the PB from one of the subsequent revisions, and the question arises whether the O. has the effect of prohibition. For this see RITUAL LAW, § 3, 4. (2) It describes the O. by a minister of the whole or part of some prescribed rite or ceremony.—A4.

G. HARFORD.

ORATORY.—An O., being a place for private pr., must be distinguished from a domestic chapel. The private Os. at Blois and Holyrood are good examples, and the wayside chapels on the bridges at Lucerne and Wakefield were probably intended for use as Os. rather than as chapels for public or corporate use.—R6. CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

ORDER.¹

I. ORDER AS A PRACTICAL PRINCIPLE.

The essential idea of O. is the shaping of action to realise ends. Each act of will (see MAN, § 20) is an attempt to order the situation in which a man finds himself, in order (our common idiom illustrates the point) to further some personal end. But we more commonly use O. to describe a predetermined plan to fit a series of similar recurrent situations. Effective action would be impossible if every situation were new, and the expedient act had to be thought out independently. So, even within the region in which his liberty of action is most complete, the individual is obliged to make out a kind of programme of expedient behaviour to fit the occasions that resemble one another. Partly he invents an O. of life unconsciously: as similar occasions recur, he disposes of them each time more promptly and with closer conformity to a type, till an O. is insensibly created. Partly he deliberately plans out this or that section of his life, fixing some points, and leaving others elastic. And success in life largely depends upon the wisdom shown in the ordering of it. It is important to notice, however, that this fixing beforehand of a prescribed O. is only wise on the assumption that on the average it will answer better to keep it than to break it. Small inconveniences and losses arising from adherence to the rule will be properly disregarded in view of the promptitude, quickness and efficiency which conformity to rule produces on other occasions. The saving of mental and nervous strain, and the release of the mind to occupy itself with wider and more distant issues, are other patent advantages of O. in the life of the individual.

The application of this principle to personal RELIGION is obvious. On the one hand, a sound rule of life must provide opportunities for private devotion and public worship, sufficiently numerous and frequent, and so planned out as to develop harmoniously the spiritual life. On the other hand, the hours of sleep, work and leisure must be also ordered so as most adequately under the individual circumstances to realise the ideal of "a godly, righteous, and sober life."

But the practical nature of O. must never be forgotten. A rule may be badly framed at first, and, if experience shows it does not work, no supposed principle of self-consistency must prevent its being modified. Again, no two recurrent situations are identical, and a rule may become inexpedient from change of circumstances. Again, the person who made the rule is ever changing and developing. A rule which helped him yesterday may cramp his growth or obstruct his progress to-morrow. A rule of life is really just a piece of advice given to and accepted by a man. Of necessity it is based on a fallible estimate of a changing future. He who is always making new rules or finding reasons for exceptions to old ones will be weak and ineffective. And he who is a slave to the advice he gave himself ten years ago will never be a counsellor or a leader.

¹ The word often occurs in the PB: (1) for the full form for any service (i.e., both the Office or words, and the regulating Rubrics), 17 times in contents and headings; (2) for the Ch. system of ritual; (3) for either grade of the threefold ministry; (4) as verb = ordain; (5) for the fundamental idea, on which other uses rest. This receives full treatment in the text.

Although O. of this private or personal kind is not the subject of this art., so much has been said for the purpose of bringing out the fundamental principle of all O., that it is essentially practical, and has constant reference to future situations, which can only be provisionally imagined from the experience of the past. In the case of public or common O. it is still less possible to make sure that the arrangement ordered beforehand shall suit all the emergencies that may arise. The element of compromise bulks larger where the O. has to fit many persons and places in differing circumstances. And the test of a wise O. will be that it settles firmly those matters which are much the same for all everywhere, allows alternatives for the exceptional cases that can be clearly foreseen, and in minor points gives discretion to persons in authority. Public O., then, is concerned with (1) rules for persons to obey or enforce, (2) the appointment of persons to enforce O. or use discretion, and (3) institutions, i.e., groups of persons and things regulated by rules.

4. Public or Common O.

Under MAN, § 25, it is shown that the most satisfactory divisions of human activity follow the groupings of the four distinctive modes of his being. O. is, we have seen, related primarily to the will, and the machinery of Ch. government as an engine of the corporate will (to use a convenient though inexact expression) is the principal matter to be considered. But it will be well first to see the function of O. in relation to those activities in which the will is grouped with the imagination, the reason, and the heart.

II. ORDER IN RITUAL, DOCTRINE AND DISCIPLINE.

RITUAL, as is shown under that art. (§ 2), is concerned with the expression of religion. It will then be the function of O. to settle what, all things considered, will be the most useful expression of truth and duty which can be devised to suit the needs and capacities of the people at the particular juncture when the O. is made, and throughout the region over which the ordaining authority has jurisdiction.

See further, RITUAL, §§ 5-13, and RITUAL LAW. In illustration of the general principle it may be pointed out that the modern study of the OT has brought out in a most interesting and impressive way the fact that Hebrew ritual was the product of a long and continuous development. It underwent, not only constant modification in details, but repeated and drastic revisions, to make it correspond to the altered ideas and habits of the worshippers. The establishment of the Christian Ch. might have merely led to a revision of the OT ritual. But the failure of the Jews generally to accept Jesus as Messiah, and the consequent cleavage between Jews and Christians, together with the successful Gentile Mission of St. Paul, led in the providence of God to the springing up of a new and independent Christian ritual. The essential fitness of this change is expressed in the sentence, "The priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. 7:12). The action of Augustine of Cant. in adapting forms to the conditions and needs of his people, on the express advice of Pope Gregory, marks this plan of local liberty of development as a Catholic method. And the various existing PBs authorised within the Ang. Communion are each the outcome of a long process of practical adjustment. (See HISTORY OF PB REVISION.)

DOCTRINE, in its more specific sense, is a department of Ch. O., which cannot and does not settle what is true, but what—

8. Doctrinal Order. being accepted as true—may usefully be embraced as fundamentally needful, formulated in such and such terms, recited, subscribed, or learnt by heart. It is a matter of O. to permit or enjoin that the Bible be translated, printed, read—by the clergy, by a select few, or by all. Authority, which is the voice of O., can by selection and publication make such convenient distinctions as those between religious and secular, fundamental and minor, simple and elaborated, truths. The mind cannot find any real dividing line between these, but the will draws its lines where it seems most convenient. Religious education, and the organisation of study, research and instruction, are matters that fall within the province of O., though they may be dealt with by voluntary associations, as well as by eccles. authority proper.

DISCIPLINE, the third department of religious life with which O. has to do, taken in a wide sense, includes the entire working system of the Ch. as directly aimed at the formation of character, the progressive renewal of the heart, the realisation of the promise and potency of regeneration—in a word, the perfecting of redeemed humanity. It covers the whole range of Pastoral Care. Authority must lay down the functions and limits of Orders of ministers, with the offices they serve, and the spheres of their several jurisdictions. (See the relevant arts. grouped under App. 1.) The task of formulating a code of morals is one that has in the past been undertaken by various portions of the Church. It is, however, one of extreme difficulty in its relation to the general law of a civilised country, and in the Ang. Communion is hardly any longer attempted with regard to the laity. The marriage laws (App. 1a) form a partial and perplexing exception. An elementary formulation is, however, contained in the Cat., which needs very slight change to make it a convenient expression for present use of admitted principles (cp. CATECHISM, REVISION OF). Beyond this guidance, teachers and taught are left to apply as best they may the precepts of SCRIPTURE and the incidental provisions of the PB (cp. also CHRISTIAN RELIGION, §§ 10 f.).

The "O. of this Ch. and Realm" is perhaps at its weakest in the administration of the pastoral charge of the people.

9. Pastoral Care.

Beyond good advice, or, at most, admonitions to which a deaf ear may with impunity be turned, the rulers of the Ch. can do little to secure more than a bare minimum of efficiency from the benefited clergy (cp. DIOCESAN BP., § 4). PREACHING, Visiting (see VISITATION), work in the SCHOOLS, the reconciliation and direction of penitents (see REPENTANCE), and the warning of offenders, are all left in the main dependent on the zeal and discretion of the incumbent and his colleagues. Organisation should not be so rigid as to cramp or distort healthy life in the Body of Christ, but it ought not to be so loosely and slightly framed that the very ends for which the Body has been constituted should be imperilled in parish after parish. In the pastoral methods of the Roman Ch., of Nonconformist bodies, of the Salvation Army, and of other Ang. Chs. and missionary jurisdictions, along with salutary warnings not a little valuable suggestion may be found against the day when the Ch. of Eng. shall rouse herself to claim and exercise a worthier share of the spirit of Order.

III. CHURCH POLITY—ITS GENESIS AND POWERS.

The aim of Ch. organisation is, therefore, that the Ch. may be ordered and equipped to discharge its threefold function of stimulating, maintaining and directing the Worship, Faith, and Obedience of its members.

9. Aim of Ch. Polity.

Thorndike, the Ang. writer who, after Hooker, has perhaps most thoroughly explored this field, makes worship the determining factor.

"The society of the Ch. standing upon the right and power of assembling for the common service of God . . . the whole extent of eccles. power must needs consist in determining the persons, the times, the places, the forms, the ceremonies, the rules and solemnities, by which, on which, at which, and according to which, the offices of Divine service . . . are to be performed, so far as by God's law they are not determined; so that the chief power in every Ch. must needs be that without which these things are not determinable."

But, while worship is thus shown to be a sufficient reason for the organisation of Ch. authority, it will be readily perceived, from what has gone before, that the departments of Doctrine and Discipline no less urgently demand an established system behind them. We have now to inquire what that system is to be.

The analysis of the nature of MAN, as well as the analogy of social life in general, would lead us to expect that in the endeavour to give effect to that yearning of the heart for fellowship with persons, the highest manifestation of which is RELIGION, the method of association would be peculiarly prominent. The history of religions shows us that this has in actual fact been the case. Early religion is an affair of the whole community. Worship is the essential mark of explicit religion, and "we may safely say that there can be no worship unless there is a community worshipping and a being to be worshipped" (Jevons, The Idea of God in Early Religions, 1911, p. 62). It was in religion that the social tie was most keenly felt, and, in a wide sense, the Ch. has constantly been the precursor or consolidator of the State.

10. Primitive Religion Social.

But "worship is, of course, a habit: if it is not a habit, it ceases to be at all, in any effective sense.

And it is a habit of the community, of the common consciousness, which is continuous through the ages, even though it slowly changes; and which, as continuous, is conservative and tenacious" (Jevons, ib., p. 61); and in this fact lies a first cause of cleavage between the worshipping community and the nation. If the enlightenment of an educated class proceed faster than the guardians of religion can keep pace with, and the "Ch." becomes identified with outgrown beliefs and a lower level of morality (cp. AUTHORITY, § 7), then the union of Ch. and State becomes formal and nominal, or breaks down altogether. If, however, the sudden wave of enlightenment comes within the circle of worshippers, and an inward transformation works a revolution in the forms of worship, then there is also a cause for cleavage, but of an opposite kind: the Ch. distinguishes itself from, and is perhaps rejected by, the World; and, again, the impulse to separate organisation is irresistible. So also, where the Ch. exists only as a missionary body, planted in the midst of an indifferent or friendly or hostile non-Christian population, the relative independence of Ch. O. is obviously necessary.

In modern Christendom, however closely in certain cases Ch. and State may be linked together, there is no longer any fusion between the two. The eccles. and civil spheres are universally recognised as distinct, though the border line may not always be clear, or be variously placed in individual cases. A grave cause of complication has arisen from the confusion between the Ch. and the World, which first became acutely felt at and after the time of Constantine (see CHURCH, § 16). And the subject of Ch. O. cannot be rightly judged unless the nature of this distinction be clearly understood. That it is a necessary distinction may be at once admitted; but is the necessity theoretical or only practical, essential or merely convenient?

Those whose thinking is largely dominated by the idea of the Ch. have tended to speak as if the administration of Sacraments by duly authorised ministers created a distinct O. of the regenerate, the baptised being, in an essential and not merely a rhetorical sense, a "new creation," a "new people."¹ The watchword of this tendency is the famous formula Extra ecclesiam nulla salus. But that this formula will not hold as more than rhetorically true is shown by the exceptions to which it is subject. Unbaptised martyrs in the ancient Ch. and the Quakers in modern times are stubborn proofs that very real "salvation" is experienced "outside the Church." On this view, i.e., the word salus has to be qualified as meaning "guaranteed or authorised salvation." It follows that eternal salvation is not finally determined by conformity to Ch. O.,¹ which has only to do with the visible Church. On the other hand, those who think rather in terms of the individual Christian can adopt the same formula, using salus in the full sense, but meaning by ecclesiam what is called "the invisible Ch.," i.e., the aggregate of persons inside and outside the visible Ch. who are actually in enjoyment of salvation. But this sense, as having no longer any application to Ch. O., lies outside our subject.

The difficulty of definition is not met by the suggestion to use "Ch." for the visible society, and "Kingdom of God" for the wider but less tangible circle. For (1) the Kingdom has the double sense in the Gospels, and (2) the question is not merely one of terminology. Perhaps light will come from a brief examination of first principles. According to the Cat., "all mankind" has been "redeemed." Then, strictly and logically, the World of men is potentially the Church. Conversely, the invisible Ch. (the limits of which are known only to God) is the World of mankind so far as its members (within and without the visible Ch.) realise their redemption (i.e., the inwardly elect people of God), and the visible Ch. is the aggregate of those who comply with the requirements for admission which are properly laid down by Ch. O. (i.e., the outwardly elect people of God). It follows that the antithesis, the Ch. and the World, is only accurate when "Ch." is the invisible aggregate of the saved, and "World" is, not the real World of mankind, but the narrower World of the unsaved, which also is invisible in the same sense in that human judgment cannot discern its limits. It follows also that the visible "Ch." and the invisible "World" are different cross-divisions of mankind. This (evil) World has always been represented among the members of the visible Ch.: there was a traitor among the Twelve, and even in the apostolic Ch. tares and wheat were mingled together.

The very important practical question of the relation of the Ch. to the World, as it is discussed under CHURCH, § 16, is a question of Ch. O. and policy: how strictly shall access to the Ch. be fenced, so as to exclude the unworthy, without unduly excluding those who, through being taken in, may become worthy? Some line must be drawn, and drawn by fallible Ch. authority.

Under Ch. O. the three functions of government, i.e., legislation, administration, and jurisdiction, fall naturally to be considered in this order. But it is to be observed that at first they flowed forth as a single stream from the fountain of apostolic authority. The mystical Body of Christ was only born into the world on the day of Pentecost. The Jewish Ch. had long been bearing within itself this child of promise, which at its birth possessed a certain definite though undeveloped structure, the effect of the call and training of the Master. Three strata or circles at least can be recognised: Peter with the rest of the Twelve, an intermediate ring of out-and-out Disciples (those who had literally left all to follow Christ), and the main body of adherents who pursued their ordinary callings. This community had no historic consciousness of any time in which it did not abide in the fourfold Apostolic O., which embraced Doctrine, Discipline (implied in fellowship), and Ritual ("the breaking of bread and the prayers").

¹ Cp. Harnack, Mission and Expansion (8), 1908, p. 244 n., and the whole chapter, with the quotation from Tertullian on p. 269, "We are of a different nature, I suppose!" repelling a charge of inhumanity. "Nay, a Christian too is a man, he is whatever you are" (Apol. 6).

¹ Thorndike (Works 2 347) reckons this as a commonplace: "It is notorious to all that understand but a little in Christianity, that it is not sin, but the notoriousness of sin, that renders a man liable to be excommunicate: even as it is not Christianity, but the profession of it, that qualifies a man to be of the Church."

Harnack, in his Constitution and Law of the Ch., 1910 (esp. App. I), over against Sohm's elaborately argued verdict that "the rise of eccles. law and the constitution of the Ch. is an apostasy from the conditions intended by Jesus Himself and originally realised," has produced a robust and individual reconstruction of the Ch. in the Apostolic and Primitive periods, as taking of necessity and by intention the form of an external organisation. But his conclusion, after noting the revolution wrought by the Lutheran Reformation, that "the nations of W. Europe still live as Catholics or as Protestants," and "are still waiting for a third kind of Ch. as the foundation of their higher life," needs to be supplemented by what may be called the Anglican golden mean. According to the unreformed Catholic view, as held in the East, Ch. O. is a complete and unalterable system of Divine appointment, while in the Roman Ch. it is rather a huge developing organism, all the main accretions or modifications of which become permanently possessed of the sacredness and Divine authority attaching to the earliest and most fundamental elements. According to the Continental Protestant and general English Separatist view, Ch. O. is the unfettered construction of a voluntary association of Christian believers linked in such numbers and groupings and with such constitutions and laws as appears convenient¹ to the members of such groups or associations, any of whom may at their discretion join other societies or form new ones without forfeiting Ch. status or Christian privileges.

According to the view of the Ang. formularies (upon a moderate interpretation of their terms) Ch. O. is the eccles. system freely accepted in the living present by the local Ch., rooted in the past yet reaching out to the future, flexible to its own internal needs, yet loyally sensitive to the duty of intercommunion actual or prospective. Such a view may find itself reflected in the NT, where we find the community from the first as a living society of concrete individuals at work in time and space, and endowed with inherent authority through persons and groups to settle matters of all kinds as they arose. New members were baptised in water, though the outward element is not mentioned in the Gospel record of the institution of Bapt., and John had contrasted his water-bapt. with the Messianic Bapt. in Holy Spirit and in fire. The Washing of the Feet was dispensed with while the Breaking of the Bread was retained. More remarkable still, the new Society shed off, in due course, the whole ritual and ceremonial system of the Mosaic law, including Sabbath observance, without any command of the Master to this effect being recorded. Not even the form of the Lord's Pr. or the Decalogue was fixed by authority.

¹ The Puritan idea of an inflexible Scriptural prescription of details of Ch. O. is now almost universally abandoned.

The Words of the Messiah echoed in the ears of His disciples as clarion calls to spiritual freedom; and were left to be put

18. "Christ's Gospel not a Ceremonial Law." on paper by anonymous editors—so clearly were they, not shackles upon the soul, nor even labour-saving moulds for turning out lives on one pattern, but liberative forces. The Ch., in a word, started without any prescribed system of O., or any rules but those imperishable Laws of spiritual O. which were first written from the beginning in man's nature, next discerned and kept by the Son of Man, and then revealed freely and fully to others in His Life, His Words, His Death, and His Resurrection. All rules of Discipline about right and wrong were henceforth to be applications of the Law of love, before which the most venerable sanctions of conduct must eventually bend and break if at variance with it. All Doctrines of men must be subject to the law of the progressive guidance of Christians by the Spirit into all truth. All Ritual, aiming at the due expression of the regenerate soul, must obey the Law of clear vision ("what I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light"), by which a strange tongue and dark ceremonies are excluded. And, finally, all eccles. rules and canons must conform to the Law of the practical end ("The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath"), so that the worth of institutions, offices, customs and laws may and should be ever and anon estimated afresh according to their effect upon life and character.

It has, however, been usual, and indeed is still, to except certain fundamental customs and rules from the revising authority of the living local Ch., as being fixed by a prior and superior authority. Such institutions as the ministry with its grades, infant bapt., Sunday, Confirm., and so forth, are regarded as belonging to a different category from (say) the PB formula for announcing the Gospel. Any other idea has been supposed to leave all institutions in a state of flux. But (1) the assumption underlying this view is that the superior authority settled these matters in the best way, and that this way is still best; (2) if this way is still the best, it may be trusted to approve itself as such, having all the prestige of authority and experience to cast into the balance in addition to its intrinsic merit; (3) it is impossible to find any valid dividing line between things settled and things left discretionary, for the one class shades off into the other; (4) in common life we need no authority to bid us eat food or wear clothes, and the scale of value of the practices enjoined by Ch. O. may be safely left to Christian experience to settle.

But (5) such theoretically unlimited authority can only safely be claimed by or ascribed to eccles. bodies which (a) allow due weight to history as the stored experience of an older and wider past than the lifetime of a generation, and (b) consider, with adequate knowledge for judgment, the effects of any fundamental change upon the future of universal Christendom. To reserve all sorts of questions to a General Council is to allow the stationary or reactionary parts of Christendom to cancel by their non possumus attitude the Christian liberty of the rest. All that can reasonably be stipulated for is that the independently deliberating part shall, with conscientious and enlightened care, act as a constituent part of a world-wide whole. The need for such a stipulation is written large in the story of the wanton sacrifice by the sects of one portion after another of the Catholic Christian heritage. Such abuse of authority is not best prevented by fencing off reserved areas, but by providing for its wise exercise.

It is not, of course, intended to deny that there are institutions which the Ch. may properly pronounce to be necessary for its esse or bene esse. But it is suggested that these need not be regarded as restrictions upon its freedom, but as Divinely indicated forms, within which, with a free discernment of their intrinsic value, the Spirit-guided Ch. moves, in the exercise of its liberty. Thus the Anglican Bps., who affirmed in 1888, and reaffirmed in 1897, the four articles of the "Lambeth Quadrilateral," equally exercised the faculty of authoritative but unfettered judgment when they set their seal upon the four fundamentals, and when they virtually expressed themselves ready to dispense with other things, once regarded as also fundamental, e.g., Ritual Uniformity, even as the primitive Ch. dispensed with the Agape. What is fixed, and binds the Ch. with the constraint of a Divine obligation, is the principle of Utility, or practical efficiency, in the realm of Ch. O., with a view to Edification.

IV. "THE ORDER OF THIS CHURCH AND REALM."

Ch. O. is equivalent to Ch. Authority in action, and its functions are legislation, administration, and jurisdiction. All these, however, presuppose a basis in some external organisation, which has—whether formally or informally—already come into being. The Eng. Ch., in that resettlement of her position which took place at the Reformation and after, in theory only threw off the usurped authority of the Papal Curia, and fell back upon the diocesan, provincial, and national organisation which had been overshadowed by it. In form, the Reformation was, as concerned polity, a return from Papacy to EPISCOPACY. In fact, it was the substitution, for the occasional interference and continual exactions of a distant Pope, of frequent interventions and more ruthless exactions under colour of a Royal SUPREMACY on the spot. The old areas, the old ministers and officers for the most part, the old Convs., the old Courts were left in being. But the Submission of the Clergy, the new eccles. legislation of PARLIAMENT, the reduction of the old CANON LAW to a condition that might be called suspended animation, the dissolution of the monasteries, the issue of Royal INJUNCTIONS, and the far-reaching exercise of the visitatorial power claimed to be inherent in the Crown, combined to alter radically the balance and mutual relations of the various parts of the machinery of government.

It can hardly be said that Ch. government has ever settled down into any very satisfactory system since the Reformation. A lay member of the American Ch., Dr. Usher, in his Reconstruction of the Eng. Ch., 1910, 14 ff., says: "When the breach with the Papacy had been finally consummated, the chief concern of Henry and his advisers was the preservation of the doctrinal unity with the Ch. of the past, and the demonstration . . . that the Eng. Ch. was not a new Ch., but the old institution strengthened through the resumption, by king and nation, of those powers in whose usurpation by the popes they had so long acquiesced. No structural changes were considered necessary. The Ch. was now what it had been, and, if anything had been altered, it was for the better. . . . Under Edward VI the struggle for unity of doctrinal belief in the Ch. became the crucial issue. . . . If the disputes over doctrine could only be ended, the Edwardian prelates felt sure that the administration of the Ch., which they now found so difficult, would become very easy. The existence of any structural defect in the Ch. itself was not suspected. . . . Like her father, but from different reasons, Elizabeth regarded the eccles. settlement as a temporary expedient. Henry VIII took no more action, because he believed no more to be necessary; Elizabeth, because she was convinced that no more was possible. To her, the firm establishment of political Protestantism was the paramount issue. . . . She could not believe that fundamental faults existed in the frame of the institution which prevented the most conscientious of bps., or most skilful administrators, from making it work well. . . . Her settlement, like that of her father, was in the main negative and destructive; the truest and best constructive work, the real construction of the Eng. Ch. [in its new phase], was left to the Jacobean leaders. . . . Reconstruction was not an attempt to elucidate the problem of the spiritual relation of the individual, but an effort to solve the difficulties of ordinary eccles. life." Not every one will agree with Dr. Usher in his estimate of Bancroft's work. But the CANONS of 1604 marked an epoch.

The subject is discussed further under ESTABLISHED CHURCH. The crux lies in the co-ordination of Parliament with some adequate Ch. conciliar system. The other Anglican Chs. have all developed a series of COUNCILS, parochial, diocesan, and often also provincial and general (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION). The principle of EPISCOPACY is uniformly safeguarded 20. Ch. O. since the Reformation.

21. Need for Conciliar System.

by the Bishop's veto, and large powers are accorded to the laity. In England the recently formed REPRESENTATIVE CH. COUNCIL may in the future become an important factor in an effective revival of Ch. government, if by the parallel creation of a system of PAROCHIAL CH. COUNCILS the lay element can be made genuinely representative of the worshipping laity, and if the Lower Houses of Conv. can be reformed by an enlarged and proportional representation of the clergy.

At the same time the irregularity of procedure in the 16th cent., as compared with previous eccles. precedents, does not carry with it the invalidity of the several stages of settlement, if the view of Ch. O. be accepted which has been already expressed, i.e., that it must "conform to the law of the practical end" (§ 18 end).

22. Procedure
Valid but Irregular.

Thorndike has an apposite saying, that "The holding of Councils is of Divine right, so far as it is manifest to common sense that it is a readier way to despatch matters determinable" (Works 1 337), where he explicitly identifies "Divine right" in matters of eccles. procedure with the "readier way." In another passage the same writer puts admirably the true ground of acquiescence in much law and custom which lacks or has lacked express synodical sanction. He says: "I conceive the Ch. was from the beginning, by virtue of the perpetual intelligence and correspondence settled and used between the parts of it, a standing synod, even when there was no assembly of persons authorised to consent in behalf of their respective [local or diocesan] Churches" (Works 2 423).

The very going on of a Ch. under a particular system, while it does not bind that Ch. never afterwards to vary the system, may be held—at least within its own borders—to validate the system independently of the methods of its introduction. The admission of its validity by other Chs. will also in the long run be properly independent of questions of procedure, and will turn on the intrinsic nature of the changes made.

The term legislation is commonly used of the making of those laws which have widest authority and highest coercive power in any community, and is therefore in England usually understood to refer to the Statutes of the Realm. But the word may also be used in a wider sense for all that process of making plans in advance which only finds in the Statute Book its exemplary product. Early law is indistinguishable from custom, and still the law of the past is being irresistibly modified and the law of the future as surely prepared for by the custom of the present. Another source of law has been recurrent administrative direction, which eventually is extended and formulated as a permanent rule. Other laws are deliberate introductions of a novel order. But all share the provisional and contingent character which has been explained in §§ 1-4. All are relative to the eternal Laws or Principles of Beauty (or fitness of expression), Truth, Utility (or good O.), and Duty (Love to God and man), as was indicated in § 18. They are jointly based on a rational judgment of past events, and on an imaginative construction of future contingencies in accordance with this judgment, but, in becoming laws, they have acquired a new and constitutive element, the determinative action of the will (cp. AUTHORITY, §§ 4-6). It follows that it is of the essence of human enactments that their terms are by due authority properly variable. The rule as to the desuetude of Canon Law is an obvious confirmation of this principle. If it be urged that the legislative authority of the Ch. is by Art. 20 (cp. Art. 34) declared insufficient "to ordain anything that is contrary to God's word written," then the action of the Ch. in regard to the 4th Commandment (cp. SUNDAY), in accordance with the teaching of our Lord, and also of St. Paul, shows that the limitation in the Art. is practically equivalent to the exceptions noted above and in § 18.

The Ch. of Eng., which expressly emphasises the variableness of ritual laws (see RITUAL, § 6), with equal clearness insists that the current laws ought to be obeyed (ib., § 12). The same principle is well set out by Thorndike (Works 1 234), who backs up his own judgment by illustrative quotations from Melancthon and Calvin.

"If the laws of the Ch., strengthened by the secular arm, bind not a man in conscience by virtue of that law of God, that enforceth obedience to their authors . . . then must all men be at their freedom to dissolve or preserve O. in the service of God as they please. . . . When there is law to constrain us, we may perhaps have reason to think that the authors of laws might have done better in ordering matters otherwise, and yet be bound ourselves to follow the course which they prescribe. They are to answer for the things they enjoin: we for our performance; when was any human law made that could not be faulted? If our obedience be delayed till it find such laws as no fault can be found with, the world must end in confusion before we practice that virtue. It is never lawful to do anything that is evil; but it is not evil, but necessary, in the sphere of things indifferent, to follow the law that standeth, though a better might stand instead of it."

The cogency of this, in regard to laws which have been recently enacted, or upheld by an efficient legislative authority, is clear. But, if the machinery for revising laws is so cumbrous and inefficient that the hope of useful amendment seems to practical men insufficient to justify the toil and cost of attempting it, the natural consequence must inevitably be that, under the "intolerable strain" of an ancient unrevised law, relaxations of all kinds are quietly assumed, and winked at by those in authority (cp. RITUAL LAW, end). The impasse is likely to grow worse in England, unless the Ch. succeeds in regaining some degree of legislative autonomy, or—with the bettering of her internal representative system—acquires such an added momentum as shall ensure the reasonable co-operation of Parliament.

23. Recurrent Need for Legislation.

The need for constant revision of eccles. laws has never been better stated than by Bacon in Certain Considerations touching the better pacification and edification of the Ch. of Eng.: "I would only ask why the civil state should be purged and restored by good and wholesome laws, made every 3rd or 4th year in parl. assembled, devising remedies as fast as time breedeth them, and contrariwise the eccles. state should still continue upon the dregs of time, and receive no alteration now for these five and forty years and more."

Much informal "legislation," in the form of customs, diocesan regulations, and by-laws of Ch. Societies, has furthered the ends of Ch. O.; but the need for such a development of the legislative function as contributes to the relatively higher efficiency (in relation to opportunity) of the sister Ang. Chs. is far more urgent than in Bacon's day.—A4, R.

The need is further exemplified in connection with administration, which is the central function of Ch. O., being occupied with the actual working of the Ch. system with a view to its great ends. The appointment, powers and functions of the persons and bodies upon whom the burden of administrations falls (the ARCHBISHOP, DIOCESAN BISHOP, ARCHDEACON, RURAL DEAN, and CURATE, and the CATHEDRAL chapter and other grades of Ch. COUNCILS) all rest upon legislation, and their efficiency is gravely affected by defects in the law. Hitherto, moreover, there has been no system of FINANCE either for the Ch. at large or for its several dioceses. Old endowments have been allowed to paralyse, where they should have stimulated, Christian liberality. A system, or want of system, which was tolerable when most parishes were in large measure self-contained, is equally demoralising to both extremes (of rich and poor parishes), which social changes have produced. The bewildering multiplication of Ch. Societies, while it has called forth an enormous amount of Christian zeal and effort, has led to a grave over-production of religious machinery. There is not too much organisation, as is sometimes said, but too little of the best sort. All the resources of Christian statesmanship are needed to co-ordinate the competitive agencies which distract the Ch. by the restless and almost indecent rivalry of their appeals for help.

The function of jurisdiction is similarly dependent upon legislation. An altogether false importance has become attached to questions as to the decisions and constitution of COURTS, just because a judgment has usually to be based on laws which expressed the mind of the Ch. two or three hundred years ago, while it has not been found practicable to introduce amendments even where it is deemed that the old laws no longer express the mind of the Ch. A system of jurisdiction, by which deliberate violations of law on the part of those charged to administer it may be effectively checked, is a condition of healthy Ch. life, which within the Ang. Communion is alone wanting to the mother Ch.

(Cp. RITUAL LAW, end of, § 35, and see further, App. A5.)

For books see list under COURTS; cp. also Hooker's EP; Overall's Convocation Book; Field on The Church; Jackson on the Creed; Thorndike's Works; F. Myers, Catholic Thoughts, bks. 1, 2; and B. Croce, Filosofia della Pratica, iii. La Leggi, 1909.—A, TA. G HARFORD.

ORDERS, HOLY.—The Preface to the Ordinal of the Ch. of Eng. recognises "these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church;

1. Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.
Introductory. We have in this art. to consider, not the history or specific character of these offices, but the question what it is that constitutes a proper and regular ministry.

From a very early period in the history of the Ch. it was the custom to recognise other officials as being within the body of the ministers of the Ch., e.g., READERS, SUB-DEACONS, etc., and in the Middle Ages in the Western Ch. it was generally held that there were seven Orders. The formularies of the Ch. of Eng., however, only recognise three, and it is therefore with these only that we are here concerned (see further, MINOR ORDERS).

We will consider the subject under the following heads: (1) What is the nature of ministry? (2) By what authority is any person admitted to the ministry? (3) What is the relation of the minister to the laity?

(1) What is the nature of Ministry? The formularies of the Ch. of Eng. do not themselves furnish us with any very complete statements with regard to this question, but they set out two principles as fundamental. (a) The ordination services make it clear that no man should be admitted to any form of ministry unless he sincerely believes that he has been called by God to this work. The first question that is asked of those who are candidates for ordination as deacons is this: "Do you trust that you are inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon you this Office and Ministration, to serve God for the promoting of His glory and the edifying of His people?" A similar question is asked in Ord. 1.¹ (b) The principle is clearly set out that for the discharge of the regular ministry in the Ch. a man requires not only the call of God, but some public appointment or authority. The words of Art. 23 are as follows: "It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching, or ministering the Sacraments in the Congregation, before he be lawfully called, and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent, which be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the Congregation, to call and send Ministers into the Lord's vineyard." This statement is obviously very cautious and restrained in its tone, but this much is clear, that the minister acts not merely in virtue of his personal qualifications, but in virtue of an authority which is committed to him.

We have thus clearly set out in the formularies of the Ch. of Eng. the conception that there are two elements which go to make up the proper qualification for the office of Minister of the Church, the call of God, and some public authority. In order to consider the significance of these conceptions we must go back to the early history of the Christian Ch., and we shall then find that both these elements are represented in the history of the Ministry in the apostolic and primitive Ch. We must at the same time be prepared to find that the conception of ministry presented to us by the apostolic and sub-apostolic Ch. is not at all clearly defined, and that it was very slowly that this took definite and complete shape. Still it may be said with reasonable confidence that from a very early date we can recognise the two elements—spiritual endowment and vocation, and public authority—as each having an important place in the Ministry of the Christian Church.

3. Primitive Usage.

The Epistles of St. Paul present us with a very living picture of the importance of the spiritual or charismatic element in the ministry. The most detailed account of this is to be found in 1 Cor. 12, and we must stop for a moment to observe his conception of the character of the Christian society. It presents itself to him as the one Body of Christ, of which the individual Christians are members, but members not only in the sense that each draws his life from the one body, but that each renders to the one body his particular and appropriate service.

4. Ministry Universal.

St. Paul conceives of each Christian as having his own endowment of the Holy Spirit: "To one is given through the Spirit the word of wisdom; and to another the word of knowledge, according to the same Spirit; to another faith, in the same Spirit; and to another gifts of healings, in the one Spirit; and to another workings of miracles; and to another prophecy; and to another discernings of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; and to another the interpretation of tongues" (1 Cor. 12 8-10—cp. Rom. 12 4-6). [See further, BODY, §§ 11 f.]

It is with this conception of the universal ministry of all Christian people that we must start if we are to understand St. Paul's conception of the order of the Ch., and we must be careful to observe that the universal ministry of Christian people does not merely mean that every one has his own vocation, and that every vocation can be dedicated to God's service; it is clear from 1 Cor. 14 that St. Paul is thinking also, perhaps especially, of ministration in the meetings of the Christian community. St. Paul also makes it plain that certain gifts seem to him to have a higher value than others, notably the gift of prophecy.

We can now understand the meaning of those two passages in which St. Paul sets out perhaps a little more formally the nature of the ministrations which God has given to the Church.

5. Graded Ministries.

"God hath set some in the Church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, then miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, divers kinds of tongues" (1 Cor. 12 28); and again, "And he (Christ) gave some to be apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers" (Eph. 4 11).

All these offices or ministrations are related to some special gift of the Holy Spirit which makes men competent for the services which they are to render to the Christian community, and we may be confident that we must include among them such more strictly official functions as already existed in the Churches. It is true that St. Paul does not refer directly and by name to those functions which are related to the titles ἐπισκοποι, πρεσβύτεροι, *διδάκοναι*¹; but it cannot be doubted that they are included in his reference.

In the address of St. Paul to the elders of the Church in Ephesus, he bids them "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock in the which the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops to feed the Ch. of God, which he purchased with his own blood" (Acts 20 28); and in the account which is given of the appointment of the Seven whose special duty it was to carry out the charitable work of the Ch. it is stated that they were to be μεν πλήρεις πνεύματος, i.e., "full of (the) Spirit" (Acts 6 3).

We need not here enter into all the complex questions of the relation of what is sometimes called the "charismatic" ministry to the more strictly official ministry; it is enough for us here to observe that in a very real sense every ministry, official as well as unofficial, is looked upon as "charismatic." And it is this principle which is expressed in the ordination services, when the candidate is asked whether he thinks that he is moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon himself a given office. Such a spiritual vocation is the proper and necessary antecedent to admission to any ministerial office.

6. All Ministry Charismatic.

When we now turn from the conception of the spiritual call to the conception of some public authorisation as a qualification for ministry, we are compelled to recognise that the statement of the 23rd Art., that no man may take upon himself the office of public preaching or ministering the Sacraments in the congregation without public authority, does not wholly correspond with the conditions of the apostolic and primitive Ch. It is clear from the passages to which we have already referred (1 Cor. 12 and 14) that among the most important forms of ministration in the early Ch. was that of prophecy, and it cannot be maintained that the prophet required any public authority to discharge his office. The Christian community, as we may judge from 1 Cor. 12 3 and 1 John 4 1, had both the right and the duty to try or test the prophet; and the same general principle is with some differences drawn out in the Didache (11 and 12). But there is no trace to be found in early Christian literature of a notion that the community could in any sense be said to appoint him. There can be no doubt then, that in the apostolic and primitive Ch. there was a very important form of ministry which did not derive its authority from any person or persons in the Ch.; and it would seem from the reference in the Didache (10 7) to be probable that this was a ministry not only of the Word but of the Sacraments.

7. Prophets Uncommissioned.

¹ "Bishops (or overseers), presbyters (or elders), deacons (or ministers)."

On the other hand, it is also clear that in the Apostolic and primitive Ch. there were forms of ministry which required public authority. Reference is made in § 9 to the account given in Acts 6 of the appointment of the Seven, and it is clear from the narrative that those officers were appointed by the Twelve Apostles with the co-operation of the Ch. in Jerusalem to discharge their functions. Our conclusion is confirmed by such notices as we have in the NT with regard to the appointment of the presbyters (Act 14 23 and Titus 1 5), and by the references to the same subject in the sub-apostolic writings (e.g., the presbyter-bishops of Clement Rom. 42, 44, Didache 15). Indeed there can be no doubt that in the apostolic and primitive Ch. the presbyters or bishops derived their commission from public authority, while it remains true that this office also represented a spiritual gift and a spiritual vocation.

2. Others Commissioned

(2) By what authority is any person admitted to the Ministry? We can now examine the question of the nature of that public authority by which the official ministers of the Ch. are appointed, and of the mode in which they are invested with this ministry. In the orders of the Ch. of Eng. there are two elements, the one represented by the appointment to a cure of souls, with licence or institution, the other represented by ordination or consecration. We must first consider the nature of appointment. No one (if we omit certain apparent exceptions such as fellows of colleges) can be ordained unless he is also appointed to a cure of souls. This principle was definitely laid down by the Council of Chalcedon, in its 6th canon, and was only abrogated in the Latin Ch. by a decretal of Innocent III (Dec. iii. 5 16).

3. Commissioning Authority.

In order to understand this principle we must again turn back to the apostolic and primitive Ch. The appointment of ministers is described in relation to the Seven in Acts 6, in relation to the Presbyters of the Lycaonian or Galatian Ch. in Acts 14 23, in relation to the Presbyters in Crete in Titus 1 5. In the first passage we read that the Twelve Apostles, finding the work of administering the charity of the Ch. to interfere with their primary duty of preaching the gospel, bid the members of the Ch. in Jerusalem select from their number (ἐκισκέψασθε) certain persons, whom they would then appoint (ὁὐς καταστήσωμεν) to discharge this function. They then chose (ἐξελέξαντο) Stephen and his colleagues, and presented them to the Apostles, who prayed over them and laid their hands upon them. In the second passage St. Paul and St. Barnabas are represented as appointing (χειροτονήσαντες) presbyters in each city. In the last passage St. Paul says that he has left Titus in Crete to "set in order the things that were wanting, and appoint elders in every city"

(ὅνα . . . καταστήσῃς κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους). We may put beside these references two passages in the sub-apostolic writings. Clement describes the Apostles as having established some of their first fruits (καθίστανον τὰς ἀρχαὶς αὐτῶν) as bishops and deacons (ἐπὶ ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους) in the various places where they preached (Clement 42), and as having provided that others should (when needful) be appointed by certain ἐλλόγμοι ἄνδρες (approved men) with the consent of the whole church (συνευδοκησάσης τῆς ἐκκλησίας πάσης—Clement 44). In the Didache (15 1), the Christian community is bidden to appoint for itself bishops and deacons (χειροτονήσατε οὖν ἑαυτοῖς ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους).

What conclusion are we to draw from these references? At first sight it might seem as though in most of these passages the appointment of the ministers of the Ch. were carried out by the Apostles or their delegates, or by those who had been first appointed. But the statements in Acts 6 and in Clement 44 seem to indicate clearly that the community as a whole had its share in the appointment, while the Didache simply speaks of the community as appointing. It may therefore, I think, be fairly said upon these passages that while in some cases the Apostolic preachers, in setting in order new churches, may themselves have appointed the first ministers, the Christian communities themselves, including the Apostolic preachers, are normally the appointing body.

10. Powers of the Community.

We may come to the decision with the more confidence inasmuch as there can be practically no doubt that the custom of the Ch. for many centuries was clear, that the clergy, especially the bps., but also the presbyters, were appointed to their offices not merely by some one officer or group of officers, but also by the consent of the whole body of the people. Two illustrations of this will suffice. Cyprian, in one of his letters, maintains that the people have in a very high measure the power of choosing worthy priests, and refusing those who are unworthy (Cyprian, Ep. 67 3). The 22nd canon of the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua requires a bp. in ordaining presbyters to have the counsel of his presbyters (or clergy) and the testimony and agreement of the people.

We are not here concerned with the history of the gradual transference of these powers to the superior clergy, or in later times to patrons, a transference which was a grave abuse on any strict ecclesiastical view. There can be little doubt that the appointment of a minister in the apostolic or primitive Ch. was connected with the authority of the community to which he was to minister, and that his ministrations were conceived of as related to their consent. As late as the 12th cent. Gratian, in discussing the position of a monk who has been admitted to the priesthood, lays down explicitly as the general principle of Ch. order, that, although such a person has received the power to celebrate the sacrament and to administer it, yet he may not exercise this power, unless he has been elected by the people and appointed (or instituted) by the bp., with the consent of his Abbot (Gratian, Decretum, c. xvi. q. 1, Dicta Gratiani ante c. 20).

11. Powers Obscured not Destroyed.

If this is true of the presbyters, it is still more clear with regard to the bp. Such phrases as Nullis in vitiis detur episcopus (Pope Celestin I, Ep. 2 s) and qui praefectus est omnibus, ab omnibus deligatur (Leo I, Ep. 89) represent the normal principle of the relation of the bp. to the people of his diocese; it cannot be doubted that the consent or concurrence of the people in the election was a necessary part of the appointment.

It is clear, then, that the minister is admitted to his office by, and discharges his office in virtue of the authority of, the Christian community, including that of the particular community in which he is to minister. He is the officer of the community and represents their authority, and the Ch. of Eng. recognises, however imperfectly, this principle in its normal rule, that no one can be ordained unless he is appointed to a cure of souls.

We can now consider what is the significance of ordination or consecration. The formularies of the Ch. of Eng. contain very little by way of direct statement upon this matter. It seems reasonable to say that the statement in the 23rd Art. refers to this, or at least that the statement includes this. But the terms of the Art. are vague and do not indicate any precise conception of the matter. The Ordination and Consecr. services do not throw much more light upon the subject; they are, quite naturally, occupied rather with the great responsibilities and obligations of the ministry than with any discussions of a technical kind. The Preface to the Ordinal does indeed state that no man is to be accounted a "lawful Bishop, Priest, or Deacon in the Ch. of Eng." unless he is "called, tried, examined, and admitted" according to the form printed in it, or has formerly had "Episcopal Consecr. or Ordination." But this is a statement of the law or rule of the Ch. of Eng., not an explanation of the nature of ordination.

12. Meaning of Ordination.

We must again turn back to the NT and the primitive Ch., and consider what may be the light in which they regard the rite of ordination.

There are four passages in the NT which have been understood to refer to this. (1) The account of the appointment of the Seven in Acts 6. We are told that the disciples at Jerusalem chose seven men to administer the charity of the Ch., and presented them to the Twelve Apostles, who prayed and laid their hands upon them (προσευξάμενοι ἐπέθηκαν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας).—(2) 1 Tim. 4 14, where Timothy is bidden not to neglect "the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (μη ἀμείλει τοῦ ἐν σοὶ χαρίσματος, ὃ ἐδόθη σοὶ διὰ προφητείας μετὰ ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν τοῦ πρεσβυτερίου).—(3) 1 Tim. 5 22, where St. Paul warns Timothy, "Lay hands hastily on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins" (χεῖρας ταχέως μηδενὶ ἐπιτίθει, ὑπὲρ κουνάει ἁμαρτίας ἄλλοτρίων).—(4) 2 Tim. 1 6: "For the which cause I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God which is in thee through the laying on of my hands" (ἀναστήρειν τὸ χάρισμα τοῦ Θεοῦ ὃ ἐστὶν ἐν σοὶ διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν μου).

In (1) the imposition of hands is clearly connected with the appointment of certain persons for work in the Ch. Professor Hort in his Christian Ecclesia (pp. 214 ff.) has pointed out that (3) is more naturally related to the exercise of some disciplinary authority than to anything of the nature of ordination; and that (2) and (4) probably refer—as the context in both cases suggests—to the original dedication of Timothy as companion and assistant to St. Paul in his work of preaching the gospel (Acts 16 1-3).

When we examine the references to the imposition of hands in the NT we find that this is related to many solemn actions.

In Acts 8 17 it is connected with the bestowal of the Holy Spirit upon the Samaritans; in Acts 9 12, 17, Ananias imposes his hands upon Saul that he may receive his sight; in Acts 13 3 the prophets and teachers at Antioch lay their hands on St. Paul and St. Barnabas in dedication of them to the work of their first missionary journey; in Acts 19 5, 6, we read that St. Paul finding some who had previously been baptised with the baptism of John, and after due instruction having had them baptised in the name of Jesus, laid his hands upon them, and they received the gifts of the Holy Spirit; in Acts 28 8 we read that St. Paul laid his hands upon a sick man that he might be healed. [Cp. LAYING ON OF HANDS.]

It is clear that the ceremony had no exclusive relation to any one religious function, but rather that it was customarily used in the Ch. in relation to any solemn action or dedication; and it seems clear that this was according to Jewish usage (Hort., Chr. Ecclesia, p. 216, n. 1; Hatch, Bampton Lectures, p. 131, n. 46).

(3) What is the Relation of the Minister to the Laity? The principle of the Ch. of Eng. is clearly expressed in that sentence of Art. 23, to which we have so often referred, namely, that "it is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching or ministering the Sacraments in the Congregation, before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same." Public preaching and the ministration of the Sacraments belong to the ministers of the Church.

14. Lay Ministry Irregular.

These phrases are distinct and clear in form, but behind this clearness there lie certain ambiguities. What is public preaching, and in what sense is the ministration of the Sacraments forbidden to the laity? It is clear that as a matter of public order these functions are reserved to the ministers of the Ch. Does this also mean that they have no reality if performed by the laity? We must distinguish between the ministry of the Word and that of the Sacraments, if we are to consider the question. Unlicensed public preaching may be an irregular and disorderly thing, to be controlled by the Church; but it would have no meaning to call it invalid. What are we to understand of the Sacraments? Are they ineffective and unreal if administered by a layman? And first as to baptism. The formularies of the Ch. of Eng. do not contain any distinct statement as to the validity or invalidity of LAY BAPTISM; but the law of the Ch. of Eng., as administered by the courts, seems clearly to recognise lay baptism as valid.¹ What are we to say as to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper?

We must again return to the custom of the primitive Ch. if we are to form any judgment upon this question.

15. Primitive Usage. The writings of the NT contain no clear evidence as to the mode of administration of the Lord's Supper.

The earliest detailed account of this is contained in the Didache,² in which we have what is generally considered to be a form of words to be used in the celebration of the Sacrament when there is no prophet in the community.³ It is noteworthy that the prophet is conceived of as the chief minister of the Ch., and he is to celebrate the Euch. with any form of words which he chooses (τοῖς δὲ προφῆταις ἐπιτρέπεται εὐχαριστεῖν ὅσα θέλουσιν, Did. 10 7). It is in his absence that the prescribed form is to be used, but there is no clear indication of the person by whom in such a case the service is to be conducted. It is possible that the sentence "ὅμιν γὰρ λειτουργοῦσι καὶ αὐτοὶ (ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι) τὴν λειτουργίαν τῶν προφητῶν καὶ διδασκάλων," Did. 15 1, may mean that in the absence of a prophet these officers are to administer the Euch., but this is not clear.

The next reference we have is contained in the Ignatian letters. Ignatius lays great stress upon the unity of the Christian communities under the direction of the bp., and in one important passage discusses this in relation to the Eucharist.

Ad Smyrn. 8: "Let no man do aught of things pertaining to the Ch. apart from the bp. Let that be held a valid Euch. which is under the bp. or one to whom he shall have committed it. Wheresoever the bp. shall appear, there let the people be; even as where Jesus may be, there is the universal Ch. It is not lawful apart from the bp. either to baptise or to hold a love-feast; but whatsoever he shall approve, this is well-pleasing also to God; that every thing which ye do may be sure and valid."

Ignatius clearly means that the Euch. was not to be celebrated without the sanction of the bp. in their churches, but it is not clear from his words who actually celebrated it.

Justin Martyr in his First Apology gives us a full description of the Eucharistic service, and he describes the president (προστάς) as conducting the service; it is no doubt most probable that by this phrase he means the ἐπίσκοπος or πρεσβύτερος if one were present.

It is fairly clear that by the middle or end of the 2nd cent. it was the rule of the Christian Churches that in normal cases the celebration of the Euch. belonged to the regular minister of the Ch. But it is also clear that Tertullian a little later held that in the absence of a regular minister the layman could celebrate the Sacraments. Bp. Lightfoot, in his essay on The Christian Ministry, has cited some of the most significant passages from his writings. The most important is the following:

"We should be foolish to suppose that a latitude is allowed to laymen which is denied to priests. Are not we laymen also priests? It is written, 'He hath also made us a kingdom and priests to God and His Father.' It is the authority of the Church which makes a difference between the order (the clergy) and the people—this authority and the consecration of their rank by the assignment of special benches to the clergy. Thus, where there is no bench of clergy, you present the eucharistic offerings and baptise and are your own sole priest. For where three are gathered together, there is a Ch., even though they be laymen. Therefore, if you exercise the rights of a priest in cases of necessity, it is your duty also to observe the discipline enjoined on a priest, where of necessity you exercise the rights of a priest" (De Exh. Castitatis 7).

It has been suggested that the force of these phrases is destroyed by the fact that when Tertullian wrote them he was a Montanist; but, as Dr. Lightfoot has pointed out, this contention has little force, as these treatises are addressed to his opponents and assume these principles as recognised by them.

It seems to be clear that we can trace in the early Ch. the gradual development of that system of Ch. order which event-

16. Lightfoot's Conclusion. ually restricted the discharge of the public ministry of the Ch. to its regular and official ministers. And for this gradual process there were no doubt many good reasons. But it is impossible to found upon this the conclusion that the validity of the Sacraments is dependent upon their administration by the minister. The true conclusion cannot be better expressed than in some closing words of Bishop Lightfoot in the same treatise: "It may be a general rule, it may be under ordinary circumstances a practically universal law, that the highest acts of congregational worship shall be performed through the principal officers of the congregation. But an emergency may arise when the spirit and not the letter must decide. The Christian ideal will then interpose and interpret our duty. The higher ordinance of the universal priesthood will overrule all special limitations. The layman will assume functions which are otherwise restricted to the ordained minister" (Phil., p. 268).

F. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia; J. B. Lightfoot, The Christian Ministry (in Comm. on Philippians); Hatch, Bampton Lect. on The Organisation of the Chr. Chs., also arts. in DCA;

17. Bibliography. T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the early centuries [a full and fair recent discussion by a Presbyterian]; J. Wordsworth, The Ministry of Grace [candid and learned]; Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood [luminous as to functions, but historically uncritical]; C. Gore, The Church and the Ministry and Orders and Unity [the latter supplements the former: both argue for a sharper and more uniform distinction between laymen and ministers in the early Ch. than is taken above. For further treatment of the subject, see APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, EPISCOPACY, ORDINAL, § 13.]—TD.

¹ See Phillimore, Eccles. Law of the Ch. of Eng., ed. 1893, pp. 492-493.

² The ecclesiastical rules of the Didache probably represent usages and ideals current in some region of Syria, if not of Palestine, about the last quarter of the first century (so e.g., Lightfoot). The mainly rural conditions contemplated account for their conservative nature at a date when the charismatic element was, in other regions known to us, already subordinate to the regular local ministry of presbyter-bishops.

³ But see EUCHARISTIC CONSECRATION, § 8.

A. J. CARLYLE.

ORDERS, HOLY (IN LAW).—See DIOCESAN BISHOP, PRIEST, DEACON.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.—In eccles. legislation (as in some branches of civil legislation) procedure by Order in C. to be made upon Schemes or Representations framed by the appropriate authorities is very commonly directed, e.g., for the formation of New Districts and Parishes under the Church Building and New Parishes Acts, for the Union or Disunion of Parishes and re-arrangement of boundaries of parishes under the Pluralities Acts, for the constitution of certain new bishoprics under the Bishoprics Act, 1878, and for a multitude of matters that may be effected under the provisions of numerous statutes relating to the Eccles. Commissioners. The schemes so ratified must be made in pursuance of the powers given by the several statutes and be within those powers; and schemes so duly made and ratified commonly have the same force as if they had been included in and enacted by Acts of Parliament. In effect the Order in C. (deriving its validity from a general Act relating to the whole class of similar cases) takes the place of a Special Act which would otherwise be required to deal with the particular case. In some matters (as in the formation of new eccles. districts) the Order in C. made in those cases upon the Scheme or Representation of the Eccles. Commissioners with the requisite consents is sufficient without any future reference to Parliament. In other cases there is such future reference, for instance in the case of a Union of Benefices in the Metropolis the Scheme of the Eccles. Commissioners has to lie for a fixed period upon the Tables of both Houses of Parliament before ratification by Order, and will not be ratified if either House objects; in other matters the Order in C. may be made, but its operation is suspended until it has lain upon the Tables of the two Houses for a fixed time without objection being made by either House. A Bill is at the present time before Parliament for enabling new bishoprics to be formed by the procedure of Orders in C. with such a suspensory provision as above described.—A7.

R. W. FOWELL.

ORDINAL.

- § 1. ORIGIN AND EDITIONS OF THE ENGLISH ORDINAL.
- § 2. ITS SOURCES.
- § 3. THE ANCIENT ROMAN RITE.
- § 4. THE GALLICAN RITE.
- § 5. SARUM ORDINATION OF DEACONS.
- § 6. SARUM ORDINATION OF PRIESTS.
- § 7. SARUM CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS.
- § 8. ORDINATION OF DEACONS IN ORDINAL OF 1550.
- § 9. ORDINATION OF PRIESTS IN ORDINAL OF 1550.
- § 10. CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS IN ORDINAL OF 1550.
- § 11. CHANGES MADE IN 1552 AND 1559.
- § 12. CHANGES MADE IN 1662.
- § 13. SUMMARY.
- § 14. COMPARATIVE TABLE.
- § 15. BIBLIOGRAPHY.

On Jan. 31st, 1550, ten months after the publication of the First PB of Edward VI, the King, by Act of Parliament (3 and 4 Ed. VI, c. 12), appointed twelve persons, six of whom were prelates, to draw up a new O. to contain "A Form and

1. Origin and Editions of the English Ordinal.

Manner of making and consecrating of Archbishops, Bishops, Priests, Deacons and other ministers of the Church," and enacted that it should "be set forth under the great Seal of England before the first day of April," and after that date it should "be lawfully exercised and used and none other." The book was published by Grafton and appeared at the beginning of March, and bears the date 1549¹ (= 1550). In 1552 after further revision the second edition of the O. made its appearance. It was, however, not issued as a separate volume but annexed to the Second PB. The third Edition, which except for one alteration followed that of 1552, appeared under Elizabeth in 1559. On this occasion it again appeared as a separate book. Finally, certain important alterations having been made in it, it appeared in its present form in the PB of 1662.

The intention of the compilers of the Ordinal of 1550 is clearly set forth in its Preface, where it is stated that "it is evident unto all men. . . that from the Apostles' time there hath been these orders . . . in Christ's Church: Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. . . And, therefore, to the intent that these orders may be continued and reverently used and esteemed in this Church of England, it is requisite that no man, not being at this present Bishop, Priest, nor Deacon, shall execute any of them, except he be called, tried, examined, and admitted, according to the form hereafter following." With this purpose in view, the compilers made use of the existing PONTIFICALS, especially that of Sarum, making such omission, addition and alteration as seemed suitable for their purpose. It should be observed that no mention is made of the sub-diaconate and other MINOR ORDERS (acolyte, exorcist, reader, door-keeper) in the Pref. to the O., and that no form of ordination was prescribed for these Orders, in spite of the fact that the Act had provided for a Form and Manner of making other Ministers of the Church, as well as Abps., Bps., Priests, and Deacons.

2. Its Sources.

The Service contained in the Pontificals presented no small difficulty, owing to the fact that it consisted of a fusion of the ancient Roman and Gallican Rites of Ordination.

The ancient Roman Rite in its earliest shape was characterised by great simplicity, and may be found in the Leonian and Gregorian Sacramentaries and in the Ordines Romani. No form of Ordination is provided for the Minor Orders, including those of Acolyte and Sub-deacon. The two latter, however, appear to have received a form of Benediction at an ordinary Mass, when the candidates presented themselves to the Bp.; the acolyte receiving as a symbol of his office a linen bag in which to carry to the priest the oblates or consecrated hosts, and the sub-deacon an empty chalice. They then prostrated themselves and were blessed by the Bp. But even this formula of blessing appears not to have been very early.

¹ For explanation of this, see BIBLIOGRAPHY OF PB, § 2.

In the case of Sacred Orders, we find a very simple ritual of Ordination, but one which was celebrated with great publicity and at stated times, these being the Saturdays of the Ember weeks, preferably in the Advent season. The candidates had been previously presented to the faithful on the Wednesday and Friday of the Ember week, and opportunity given to those present to bring forward any objection to their suitability. The actual ceremony took place during the Mass on the Saturday, shortly before the Gospel, when the candidates were presented to the Bp., who in a set formula invited the prs. of the congregation for those who were to be ordained deacons. After this all knelt, and the Lit., containing special petitions for the ordinands, was recited. Then the Bp. arose and, laying his hands on each of the candidates, recited a Coll. (or collective Pr.), summing up the petitions of the Lit., and a long Consecratory or Eucharistic Prayer. The newly ordained deacons then received the Kiss of Peace from the Bp. and took their place among the other deacons.

The ordination of Priests was conducted in a similar manner. The prs. of the congregation were invited and the Lit. recited, followed by two Prs. (a Coll. and a Eucharistic Pr. said by the Bp. and accompanied by the imposition of hands). The Mass was then continued.

The Consecration of Bps. followed the same lines. No special time in the year was assigned for this, but it always took place on a Sunday. The Bp. elect having been presented to the Pope, the prs. of the congregation were invited and the Lit. was sung, the Coll. and Consecratory Pr. following.

In the *Gallican Rite*¹ we find forms for Ordination to the Minor Orders. The candidates for each Order

4. The Gallican Rite. were instructed as to the nature of their duties. They then received from the Bp. the symbol of their office—the Door-Keepers a Key; the Readers a book; the Exorcists a book of Exorcisms; the Acolytes a candlestick containing a candle; the Sub-deacons a paten and chalice together with the basin, ewer and napkin. After delivery of the instruments the Bp. recited a Pr. and a Benediction, which contained in each case a reference to the special office conferred on the candidates.

The Ember seasons being unknown in Gallican countries, the candidates for Sacred Orders were presented to the congregation on the day of Ordination itself. After an address by the Bp., the congregation, if satisfied of their fitness, responded, Dignus est (He is worthy). (At Rome the silence of the congregation was considered a sufficient indication of their assent.) The Bp. then invited the people to pray for those that were to be ordained to the Diaconate, and pronounced a blessing, during which he laid his hands on the candidates.

The Ordination to the Priesthood followed the same lines. At the close of the Benediction, however, came an anointing of the hands accompanied by prayer. (It would appear that in some cases Deacons also received this anointing.)

The method of Consecrating Bishops was very similar. The Bp. elect was presented to the people and their prs. were invited. During the recital of the consecratory Pr. two Bps. held over his head the open book of the Gospels. After the Consecration his hands were anointed and a suitable Pr. was recited. At the Consecration of Bps. at Rome, the imposition of hands was performed by the Pope alone: in the Gallican rite all the Bps. present laid their hands on the candidate's head.

The mediæval Pontificals exhibit, as we have said, a fusion of the Gallican and Roman rites. Since the ancient Roman rite contained no forms of Ordination to the Minor Orders, these followed the Gallican use. As the Minor Orders, however, are omitted in the Edwardine O., they do not concern us here. And we at once proceed to give a brief description of the Celebratio Ordinum as contained in the Sarum Pontifical—this being the chief source employed by the compilers of the English Ordinal. The Minor Orders having been conferred immediately before the Epistle, those who were to be ordained to the Diaconate and Priesthood were presented to the Bp. after the reading of the Epistle and Tract, and prostrated themselves before him. Then followed the Lit., with special petitions for the ordinands. Next, the Bp. instructed the candidates for the Diaconate in the duties of their office, after which he laid his hand on the head of each of them in silence.¹ Then he invited the congregation to pray on their behalf, and after a period of silence a brief Coll. was recited. This was followed by a long Consecratory or Eucharistic Pr., introduced in the usual way by the Sursum Corda; after which the Bp. vested the candidates with the Stole and handed to each of them the book of the Gospels saying, "In the Name of the Holy Trinity receive authority to read the Gospel in the Church of God as well for the living as for the dead. In the name of the Lord. Amen." Another invitation to pr. followed and then a Benediction. Finally, the newly-ordained deacons were vested with the Dalmatic.

After the reading of the Gospel, those who were to be ordained to the Priesthood were presented to the Bp., who instructed them in their duties. Then, together with all priests who were present, he laid his hands over them in silence. Next, the prs. of the congregation were invited, and after an interval the Bp. recited a Coll. and a long Eucharistic Pr., introduced by the Sursum Corda. The candidates were then vested by the Bp. with stole and Chasuble, and appropriate formulæ were said. After this there was another invitation and another Consecratory Pr. Then, all kneeling, the Bp. began the hymn Veni Creator, which being sung he consecrated the hands of the candidates and presented to each one of them a paten with an unconsecrated host, and a chalice containing wine, with these words, "Receive authority to offer Sacrifice to God and to celebrate Masses both for the Quick and the Dead, in the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ." The Mass was then continued as far as the Communion. Before the Post-Communion the Bp. laid his hand on the head of each candidate, saying, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whose sins thou forgivest they are forgiven; whose sins thou retainest they are retained." Then followed the final Benediction and Exhortation.

In the Consecration of a Bp., he was first presented by two Bps. of the Province to the Metropolitan, and examined by him in the presence of the congregation. In the course of the Examination the oath of canonical obedience was administered. Then the Mass was begun and continued as far as the Collect. Meanwhile the Bp. elect was vested, and afterwards the Metropolitan gave him a brief instruction. The prs. of the congregation were then invited for him, and the Lit. sung by two Bishops. At the close of the Lit. two Bps. placed the book of the Gospels on the neck of the Bp. elect, and all Bps. present laid their hands on his head. According to some rites this ceremony was performed in silence: according to others the words "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum" were used; or the Veni Creator. A Coll. followed and a long Eucharistic Pr. of Consecration. Then came a second and third Consecratory Pr. with a Blessing; after this the unction of the head and hands, the putting on of the gloves, the giving of the PASTORAL STAFF, the blessing and bestowal of the RING and MITRE, and finally the delivery of the book of the Gospels.

7. Sarum Consecration of Bishops.

¹ Our main source of information as to this rite is derived from the Statuta Ecclesie Antiqua, a collection of canons drawn up in the province of Arles about the beginning of the 6th century.

¹ In later times the words Accipe Spiritum Sanctum were ordered to be said by the Bp. secretly.

We now come to the First Edwardine Ordinal.¹

In it Ordination is to take place on a Sunday or Holy-day, and to begin with an Exhortation "declaring the duty and office of such as come to be admitted Ministers" etc. . . .

8. Ordination of Deacons in Ordinal of 1550.

After the Exh. the candidates for the Diaconate are presented by the Archdeacon to the Bp., and then by the Bp. to the people, opportunity being given for any objection against their suitability. The Lit., with a special petition for the ordinands, follows, ending with the Coll. "Almighty God, which by Thy Divine Providence hast appointed divers orders, etc." The Communion of the day is then begun with a special Ep. (1 Tim. 3 8-16 or Acts 6 2-7). After the Ep. the Bp. administers the "Oath of the King's Supremacy and against the usurped power and authority of the Bishop of Rome." He next examines the candidates, and, at the close of the Examination, lays his hands severally upon the head of every one of them, saying, "Take thou authority to execute the office of a Deacon in the Church of God committed unto thee in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen." He then delivers to everyone of them the NT, saying, "Take thou authority to read the Gospel in the Church of God, and to preach the same, if thou be thereunto ordinarily commanded." Then one of them, appointed by the Bp., putting on a tunicle, reads the Gospel for that day. The Communion service is now continued, and all those who have been ordained receive the HC with the Bishop. At the close a special Coll. is said before the Benediction.

It would appear that the following changes have been made from the older Ordinals. (a) The Presentation of the candidates to the Bp. by the Archdeacon, and to the people by the Bp., and the recitation of the Lit., take place before the beginning of the Communion Service. (b) The Oath of the King's Supremacy and the Examination of the candidates are inserted immediately after the Epistle. (c) The instruction of the candidates is expanded and placed in the course of their Examination, which occurs at this point of the service. (d) The laying on of hands is not performed, as heretofore, silently, but with the words, "Take thou authority to execute the office of a Deacon, etc." (e) The Bidding Pr., Consecratory Pr. and vesting with stole are omitted.

The Ordering of Priests takes place in the course of the Communion Service aft. the reading of the Gospel, a special Introit, Epistle and Gospel being provided. Next, a paraphrase of the Veni Creator is sung; the candidates are presented by the Archdeacon to the Bp., and by him to the people; the Lit. is said, ending with a special Collect; the oath of the King's Supremacy is administered; and a long Exh. made by the Bishop. Then follows the Examination, and at its close a short Pr., after which the prs. of the congregation are asked, and silence kept. Next, the Bp. recites a long Coll., and then, together with the priests present, he lays his hands on the head of each of the candidates, saying, "Receive the Holy Ghost. Whose sins thou dost forgive they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain they are retained. And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of his Holy Sacraments. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen." This done, he delivers to each the Bible in one hand and the chalice with the bread in the other, and says, "Take thou authority to preach the word of God, and to minister the Holy Sacraments in this congregation." The Communion Service is then continued, all the newly-ordained receiving with the Bp., and immediately bef. the Benediction a special Coll. is inserted.

The following changes have been made in the Ordination of Priests from the older Ordinals. (a) The Veni Creator, which in the old Pontifical occurs aft. the second Consecratory Pr., is now placed bef. the presentation of the candidates, and the latter takes place not as formerly at the beginning of the service, but aft. the Gospel. (b) The short Instruction of the old Pontifical is expanded very considerably, and is followed by an Examination, a brief form of which, although not in the Sarum, is found here in certain rites of date about the 11th cent. (c) The Imposition of hands, which in the older rite took place at this point in silence, is postponed till after the prs. of the congregation have been invited and the Bp. has recited a Coll. at their conclusion. (d) The long Eucharistic Pr. is omitted (though the last-mentioned Coll. is obviously intended to represent it), as is also the vesting with the stole and chasuble. (e) The Second Bidding and Consecratory Prs. are omitted, together with the Blessing and Consecration of the hands. (f) As we have seen, the Imposition of Hands is accompanied by the formula, "Receive the Holy Ghost, etc.," taken from the second Imposition of Hands, which occurs in the Latin Rite aft. the Communion:—"Accipe Spiritum Sanctum: quorum remisieris peccata, remittuntur eis: et quorum retinueris, retenta erunt." And to it is added, "And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of his Holy Sacraments."

¹ For a comparative synopsis of all the Eng., as well as the Amer. and Irish, Os., see RITUAL, § 51-53.

(g) The ceremony of delivery (porrection) of the INSTRUMENTS now occurs immediately after the laying on of Hands, and it should be noticed that the Bible, as well as the Chalice and Bread, are presented to the candidate, with the words, "Take thou authority to preach the word of God and to minister the Holy Sacraments in this Congregation." With this formula should be compared the one which accompanies the porrection of the Instruments in the Latin Rite:—"Accipe potestatem offerre sacrificium Deo, Missasque celebrare," etc. . . . (h) The Kiss of Peace, and the Blessing and Exhortation which precede the Post-Communion in the Latin Rite, are omitted.

The Consecration of Bps. is appointed to take place in the Communion (for which a special Ep. and Gospel are provided) having upon him a surplice and a cope, is presented by two Bps. to the Abp. or his substitute. The King's Mandate having been read, the Oath "Touching the Knowledge of the King's Supremacy" and the Oath of obedience to the Abp. are administered. The prs. of the Congregation are then invited, and the Lit. is recited, containing a special petition for the Bp. elect and concluding with a special Collect. This is followed by the Examination of the candidate. Then, the Veni Creator having been sung, the Abp. recites a lengthy Collect. Next follows the Imposition of hands by the Abp. and Bps. present, the Abp. saying, "Take the Holy Ghost, and remember that thou stir up the grace of God which is in thee by Imposition of hands: for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and love and of soberness." Then the Abp. lays the Bible on the neck of the newly-consecrated Bp. with the words, "Give heed unto reading, etc.," and places the Pastoral Staff in his hand saying, "Be to the flock of Christ a shepherd, etc." This done, the Abp. proceeds to the Communion, and a special Coll. is provided immediately before the final Benediction.

10. Consecration of Bishops in Ordinal of 1550.

The most important changes which have been made in the Consecration of Bps. are the following. The instruction, the unction, the putting on of gloves, and the delivery of ring and mitre are omitted. The first and third consecratory Prs. are also omitted; the second is, however, represented by the Pr., "Almighty God and most merciful Father," which precedes the Imposition of hands. The Lit., Examination, Veni Creator and Imposition of hands have been retained, together with the ceremony of laying the Bible upon the candidate's neck and the delivery of the Pastoral Staff.

The principal changes made in the Ordinal of 1552 consist in the omission of certain ceremonies.

11. Changes made in 1552 and 1559.

In the Ordering of Deacons and Priests the ordinands are no longer commanded to have at their presentation "every one of them. . . upon him a plain albe"; the direction for the deacon who reads the gospel to "put on him a tunicle" is likewise omitted. So is also the Introit in the Ordering of Priests; and the porrection of the Instruments is confined to the delivery of the Bible, the words, "where thou shalt be so appointed" being added at the end of the formula, "Take thou authority," etc., which accompanies the porrection. The only other important change is in the Oath of the King's Supremacy. In the Ordinal of 1550 it concluded, "So help me God, all saints and the holy evangelist"; in 1552 the words, "So help me God through Jesus Christ," are substituted.

In the Consecration of Bps. the Oath of obedience to the Abp. undergoes a similar change. No mention is now made of the vesture of the Bp. elect or of the Bps. who present him. The laying of the Bible upon the neck of the newly-consecrated Bp. is omitted, as is also the delivery of the Pastoral Staff. The accompanying formulæ are, however, retained and used in connection with the delivery of the Bible, which is now substituted for the two former ceremonies.

The only alteration made in the Ordinal at the Elizabethan revision of 1559 (apart from certain changes in the LITANY incorporated into it) was in the form of the Oath which is now styled "The Oath of the Queen's Sovereignty" instead of "the King's Supremacy." It is no longer directed against "the usurped power and authority of the Bp. of Rome," but against "the power and authority of all foreign Potentates."

In the final Revision of 1662 the following changes, some of them important, should be noticed.

Three alterations have been made in the Preface.

(a) The canonical age for entering upon the diaconate is raised from twenty-one to twenty-three. (b) Ordination is now to take place normally "at the times appointed in the canon," i.e., at the Ember seasons (see canon 31). (c) The language of the first paragraph is made more explicit, in order to make even clearer than heretofore the difference between the Ministry of the Church and that of non-episcopal bodies.

In the Ordering of Deacons we find the following alterations. (a) The Ordination is to take place "after Morning Prayer is ended." (b) In 1552 no reference was made to the vesture of the deacons: they are now ordered to be "decently habited." (c) The Lit. ends with the Pr. "We humbly beseech Thee, O Father," and the Coll. which had occurred at the end of the Lit. has become the Coll. of the Communion office; we notice that in this Coll., as in other places, the word "Congregation" has been changed to "Church." (d) At the end of the formula, "Take thou authority to read the Gospel, etc.," the words, "If thou be thereunto ordinarily commanded," have been changed into "If thou be thereunto licensed by the Bishop himself." (e) A special Gospel (Luke 12 35-38) is provided. (f) Aft. the Pr. "Almighty God, Giver of all good things," the Coll. "Prevent us, O Lord," has been inserted. (g) A clause has been added to the final rubric connecting this service with that of the Ordering of Priests which immediately follows.

(a) Alterations in the opening Rubrics of the Ordering of Priests have been made similar to those made in the Ordering of Deacons. (b) Some changes have been made in the arrangement of the Service; the Presentation of the candidates and the Lit. now occur, as in the Ordering of Deacons, bef. the Communion Office, and not aft. the Gospel, and the special Coll. has been removed from the end of the Lit. and made the Coll. of the Communion Office, the words "profit of the congregation" having been changed into "the edification of thy Church." (c) A new Epistle (Eph. 4 7-13) is appointed and Matt. 9 36-38 has been substituted for Matt. 28 18-20, but the alternative Gospel (John 10 1-16) has been retained. (d) The Veni Creator has been placed later in the service, so that it may immediately precede the Pr. "Almighty God, and heavenly Father"; an alternative version of this hymn, derived from Bp. Cosin's Private Devotions, has been added, and the older version revised. (e) In the Instruction and Examination of Priests a number of small verbal alterations have been made, and the conclusion of the brief Pr. at the end of the Examination is altered. (f) In the rubric immediately preceding the Imposition of hands, the words, "Everyone that receiveth orders," have been changed into "Everyone that receiveth the Order of Priesthood." (g) The most important alteration is in the formula which accompanies the Imposition of hands. In 1550 and 1552 it began, "Receive the Holy Ghost: whose sins thou dost forgive, etc." It now runs "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the Imposition of our hands: Whose Sins thou dost forgive, etc." (h) At the delivery of the Bible the words "in this congregation where thou shalt be so appointed" have been changed into "in the congregation where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto." (i) The Coll., "Most Merciful Father," at the close of the service has been slightly altered, and "Prevent us, O Lord," has been inserted bef. the Benediction. (k) The wording of the final rubric, which provides for the case of the Ordination of Deacons and Priests on the same day, has been modified in accordance with the alterations made in the services.

In the Consecration of Bishops, (a) a special rubric has been supplied at the beginning of the Communion Service, and a special Coll. provided. (b) An alternative Epistle (Acts 20 17-35) has been added, and two alternative Gospels¹ (John 20 19-23, Matt. 28 18-20). (c) In the rubric aft. the Gospel it is ordered that the Bp. elect shall be vested in his ROCHET. (d) The wording of the rubric bef. the Lit. has been expanded and made more explicit, and in the Coll. aft. the Lit. the words "profit of thy Congregation" have been changed into "edifying and well governing of thy Church." (e) In the Examination a few slight verbal alterations have been made, and the question, "Will you be faithful in ordaining, sending, or laying hands upon others?" has been added. (f) Bef. the Veni Creator, it is ordered that the Bishop elect shall put on the rest of the Episcopal habit; and, as in the Ordering of Priests, Bishop Cosin's version of the hymn has been added. (g) In the Pr. "Almighty God and most merciful Father" a few verbal changes have been made, and the word "congregation" changed into "church." (h) Again the most important alteration is that in the formula accompanying the laying on of hands. In 1550 and 1552 it had been, "Take the Holy Ghost, and remember that thou stir up, etc."; it now runs, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the Office and work of a Bishop in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands; in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. And remember that thou stir up, etc." (i) Some slight verbal changes have been made in the words used at the delivery of the Bible and in the Coll. "Most Merciful Father." (k) As in the Ordering of Deacons and Priests, the Coll. "Prevent us, O Lord," has been added before the Benediction.

¹ In most copies of the PB of 1552 the Gospel is misprinted, as from John 4, instead of John 21.

The main objects of the Reformers in preparing an O. which should "continue" the valid succession of the threefold

12. order of the ministry was to simplify the Latin rite, and to bring into greater prominence the essentials of Ordination as set forth in the NT¹ and in the early Church,² namely, Prayer and Imposition of hands. This had been obscured in the Latin service owing to the fusion of the Gallican and Roman rites. In the mediæval books the LAYING ON OF HANDS no longer took place in connection with a great central pr., but was performed in silence at an earlier point in the service, while in the case of the Ordering of Priests a second Imposition of hands, with the words "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum," had been added towards the close. The revisers restored it to its proper position as the central feature of the service, where it is accompanied by the solemn charge authorising the candidate to execute the functions of the Order which he is receiving. It is to be noted that they retained the words of John 20 22, 23 (used in the Latin Service at the second Imposition of hands) and added to them a second clause based on Acts 6 4 (cp. also Luke 12 42 and 1 Cor. 4 1), the verse in Acts being probably chosen in order to make clear the distinction between the Diaconate and the Priesthood. Similarly, in the Ordination of Bishops, the words are taken from 2 Tim. 1 6, 7, this passage being understood to refer to the work of a Bishop. It is to be regretted, however, that the ancient Consecratory Prs., which originally were the chief feature of early rites, and which were introduced by the Sursum Corda, should have been omitted. While removing a number of ceremonies of late date, such as the anointing, vesting, etc., the revisers of 1550 were careful to retain in a somewhat modified form the porrection of the INSTRUMENTS, which was regarded by the later mediæval authorities as essential to the validity of the rite. Further, they thought it necessary to expand certain features which had been making their appearance in the mediæval books, especially the Instruction and Examination of the candidates. In order to do this, they considered it needful to supplement the somewhat meagre formulæ of the Pontificals with matter derived from a draft of Ordination services which had been drawn up by Martin Bucer especially for their benefit. The Examination is regularly found in the older rites for the Consecration of Bps. and occasionally in the Ordination of Priests, while the Instructions had always been extremely brief. In the Edwardine O. these features assumed large proportions, and, though the revisers appear to have rejected, in the main, Bucer's draft, they followed it very closely in these particulars. Thus, the Exh. to the candidates for the Priesthood and the Examination which follows are, in the main, a reproduction of Bucer's text. The Prs. of the O. are for the most part derived in a modified form from the Latin; but the long Pr., "Almighty God and heavenly Father," which occurs immediately before the Imposition of hands at the Ordination of Priests, is taken, with certain modifications, from Bucer's draft. Of the alterations made since 1550 the most important is the addition of the words specifying the office, which have been added, in the case of Bps. and Priests, to the solemn charge accompanying the Imposition of hands. For the significance of this and of other changes made in 1550 or 1662, in so far as they affect the question of validity of our Orders, the reader is referred to the art. ANGLICAN ORDERS.

¹ See Acts 6 6, 13 3, 14 23, 1 Tim. 4 14, 5 22, 2 Tim. 1 6.

² See: (a) the early Church Orders, e.g., Didascalia, c. 4; Canons of Hippolytus 2 7, 5 42; Sarapion's Pontifical 12-14; Apost. Const. 8 4, 5, 16, 17, 18, etc.; (b) canons of early Councils, e.g., canon 9 of Neocæsarea (c. 315), 9 of Nice (325), 10 and 17 of Antioch (341); (c) early writers, e.g., Origen, Hom. in Num. 22 4; Cornelius, Ep. to Fabius, apud Euseb., HE vi. 43 9, 17; Cyprian, Ep. 49 1, 67 5; Eusebius, HE vi. 8 4, 23 4, vii. 32 21; Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus (Migne, PG 46 909); Jerome, Comm. in Is., bk. 16 (on c. 58); De Altoribus 3; Ep. Clement to James 19; Clementine Hom. 3 63, 72.

The following Table will enable the reader to form some idea of the relation of the O. of 1662 to the Pre-Reformation services and to the Edwardine O. of 1550. The first column contains an outline of the Latin O. closely following the use of Sarum. Items marked with an asterisk represent the ancient Roman and Gallican elements. Those enclosed in brackets are late additions, occurring in some mediæval rites and not in others. Italics indicate items which are not proper to the Ordination service. The details are numbered in the first column; the numbers in the other columns point out parallels.

14.
Comparative
Table.

ORDERING OF DEACONS AND PRIESTS.

PONTIFICAL.

1. Mass begins.
2. Presentation of Candidates for all Orders to Bp. and *final inquiry as to their suitability.
3. Admission to Minor Orders.
4. *Litany, with special clauses.

ORDINATION OF DEACONS.

5. Instruction.
6. *Imposition of hands in silence ("Accipe Spiritum Sanctum," secretly).
7. *Bidding Pr. and *Coll.
8. *Consecratory Pr.
9. Vesting with Stole.
10. Tradition of Gospel Book, with formula, "In nomine. . . accipe potestatem legendi evangelium. . . ."
11. *Second Bidding Pr.¹
12. *Second Consecratory Pr.
13. Vesting in Dalmatic.
14. The Gospel.

ORDINATION OF PRIESTS.

ORDINAL OF 1550.

ORDERING OF DEACONS.

2. Presentation of Candidates for diaconate only, and final inquiry as to their suitability.
4. Litany, with special clauses and special Coll.
1. HC, as far as Epistle.

- Oath of King's Supremacy.
5. Examination and Instruction.
6. Imposition of hands, with words, "Take thou authority. . . ."
10. Tradition of NT, with formula, "Take thou authority to read the Gospel. . . ."

14. The Gospel.

ORDERING OF PRIESTS.

22. Veni Creator.
2. Presentation of Candidates for Priesthood, and final inquiry.
4. Litany, with special clauses and special Coll.
- Oath of King's Supremacy.

PB OF 1662.

2. Presentation of deacons and priests separately, and final inquiry.

4. Litany, with special clauses.
1. HC, as far as Epistle, with special Coll. for each Order.

ORDERING OF DEACONS.

- Oath of King's Supremacy.¹
5. Examination and Instruction.
6. Imposition of hands with words, "Take thou authority. . . ."
10. Tradition of NT, with formula "Take thou authority to read the Gospel. . . ."

14. The Gospel.

ORDERING OF PRIESTS.

- Oath of King's Supremacy.¹
- ¹ Omitted in 1865.

¹ Omitted in Sarum.

PONTIFICAL.

15. Instruction.
16. * Imposition of hands by Bp. and priests, in silence.
17. * Bidding Pr. and * Coll.
18. * Consecratory Pr.
19. Vesting with Stole and Chasuble.
20. * Second Bidding Pr.¹
21. * Second Consecratory Pr.
22. Veni Creator.
23. (Blessing and) * Consecration of hands.
24. Tradition of Paten with host and Chalice with wine, with words, "Accipe potestatem offerre sacrificium. . . ."
25. Continuation of Mass to the Communion.
26. Second Imposition of hands, with words, "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum. . . ."
27. Kiss of Peace.
28. Final Benediction.
29. Exhortation.
30. Post-Communion, etc.

PONTIFICAL.

1. Examination of Bp. elect.
2. Oath of canonical obedience.
3. Mass up to Collect.
4. Instruction.
5. * Bidding.
6. * Litany, with special clause.
7. * Imposition of hands of Bps. and of * Gospel Book, in silence ("Accipe Spiritum Sanctum").
8. (Veni Creator.)
9. * Collect.
10. * First Consecratory Pr.
11. Unction of head.
12. * Second Consecratory Pr.
13. (Third Consecratory Pr., with Abp.'s right hand extended.)

¹ Omitted in Sarum.

ORDINAL OF 1550.

15. Instruction and Examination.
17. Bidding.
18. Prayer, "Almighty God and heavenly Father"
- 16, 26. Imposition of hands by Bp. and priests, with the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost. . . ."
24. Tradition of Bible and of Chalice with bread, with formula, "Take thou authority. . . ."
25. Continuation of Communion Office to last Coll.
30. Two Collects:—(a) "Almighty God, giver of all good things. . . ." (for Deacons). (b) "Most merciful Father, we beseech thee. . . ." (for Priests).
28. Final Blessing.

CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS.

ORDINAL OF 1550.

3. HC as far as Creed, with special Introit, Epistle and Gospel.
- Presentation to Abp.
- Oath of King's Supremacy.
2. Oath of canonical obedience.
5. Bidding.
6. Litany, with special clause and concluding Pr.
1. Examination.
8. Veni Creator.
12. Pr. "Almighty God and most merciful Father. . . ."

7. Imposition of Hands of Bps., with formula, "Take the Holy Ghost, and remember that thou stir up. . . ."

PB OF 1662.

15. Instruction and Examination.
17. Bidding.
22. Veni Creator.
18. Prayer, "Almighty God and heavenly Father. . . ."
- 16, 26. Imposition of hands by Bp. and priests, with the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the Office and work of a priest. . . ."
24. Tradition of Bible, with formula, "Take thou authority. . . ."
25. Continuation of Communion Office to last Coll.
30. Three Collects:—(a) "Almighty God, giver of all good things. . . ." (for Deacons). (b) Most merciful Father, we beseech thee. . . ." (for Priests) (c) "Prevent us, O Lord. . . ."
28. Final Blessing.

PB OF 1662.

3. HC as far as Creed, with special Coll., Epistle and Gospel.
- Presentation to Abp.
- Oath of King's Supremacy.¹
2. Oath of canonical obedience.
5. Bidding.
6. Litany, with special clause and concluding Pr.
1. Examination.
8. Veni Creator.
12. Pr. "Almighty God and most merciful Father"
7. Imposition of Hands of Bps., with formula, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Bishop. . . . And remember. . . ."

¹ Omitted in 1865.

PONTIFICAL.

14. (Sevenfold Blessing.)
15. Unction of head and hands.
16. Putting on of Gloves.
17. Benediction and delivery of Pastoral Staff.
18. Benediction and delivery of Ring.
19. Benediction and delivery of Mitre.
20. Tradition of Gospel Book, with words, "Accipe evangelium, et vade, prædica populo tibi commisso. . . ."
21. Mass continued to end.

ORDINAL OF 1550.

- 7, 20. Imposition of Bible, with words, "Give heed unto reading. . . ."
17. Delivery of Pastoral Staff, with formula, "Be to the flock of Christ. . . ."

PB OF 1662.

20. Delivery of Bible:—"Give heed unto reading. . . . "Be to the flock of Christ. . . ."

21. Communion office continued to last Coll.

21. Communion office continued to last Coll.

Pr. "Most merciful Father"

Pr. "Most merciful Father"
Coll. "Prevent us, O Lord. . . ."

Final Blessing.

Final Blessing.

(A) Documents containing the ancient Roman and Gallican Ordination Rites:—Leonian Sacramentary (ed. Feltot, Camb., 1896);

15. Bibliography. Gelasian Sacramentary (ed. Wilson, Oxf., 1894); Gregorian Sacramentary (in Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus, 2 vols., Venice, 1748); Ordines Romani (in Mabillon, Museum Italicum, vol. 2, Paris, 1689—also in Migne, PL 78); Statuta Ecclesie Antiqua (in H. T. Bruns, Canones Apostolorum et Conciliorum, 1839). (B) For English Mediæval Ordinals see:—Maskell, Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesie Anglicanæ (Oxf., 1882), vol. 3; Frere, Use of Sarum (2 vols., Camb., 1898, 1902); a list of English Pontificals is given by Frere in his Pontifical Services (Alcuin Club 3). (C) Lutheran forms of Ordination will be found in Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, vol. 2, pp. 517 ff. (D) The English Reformed Ordinals may be conveniently consulted in two publications of the Parker Society:—Liturgies of King Edward VI. and Liturgical Services under Queen Elizabeth; Bucer's Draft will be found in his Scripta Anglicana, pp. 238-259—the parts which influenced the PB Ordinal are reprinted in CQR, Apr. 1897, pp. 132 ff. (E) On the subject generally see:—Procter and Frere, New History of the BCP (London, 1907); Blunt, Annotated PB.—Ed.

H. LEONARD PASS.

ORDINARY.—Spiritual jurisdiction, that is, the authority to exercise within a definite area or over certain persons the spiritual power conferred by Holy Order, is of two kinds, ordinary and delegated. Ordinary jurisdiction is that which attaches to an office, the tenure of which is permanent, and of which the incumbent cannot be deprived except by process of law, on account of malfeasance, crime or incapacity. Ordinary jurisdiction once bestowed cannot be withdrawn at the mere will and pleasure of the superior who has conferred it. Delegated jurisdiction can be so withdrawn. Ordinary jurisdiction arises out of the office conferred by the superior; delegated depends upon the continued good pleasure of the superior.

An ecclesiastic having ordinary jurisdiction is called an "Ordinary." He may have other Ordinaries subject to him, and again others who exercise their ordinary jurisdiction over him. The superior O. of a diocese is the Bp. An Archdeacon is the O. for certain purposes within the area of his Archdeaconry, but subject to his superior O. the Bp. Every incumbent of a parochial benefice is an O., that is, he is the O. of his ch. and parish, wherein he possesses, by conference by the Bp., ordinary jurisdiction, but subject to his superior Ordinaries, viz., the Bp. in all spiritual matters, the Archdeacon as regards certain matters, the Rural Dean as concerns certain other matters.

The O. referred to in rubrics of the PB means generally the Bp., but also sometimes the Archdeacon, or either the Arch-
3. PB Rubric. deacon or the Bp. in cases where they may have concurrent jurisdiction; as for instance in the rubric as to signifying to the O. the name of a person repelled from Communion, in order that the O. may "proceed against (him) according to the Canon." Such person might be proceeded against either in the Bp.'s Court or in the Court of the Archdeacon, and therefore the signifying might be to either Ordinary (see ARCHDEACON).

Every O. can delegate jurisdiction within the limits of his own jurisdiction to another duly-qualified person, but subject to inhibition by the superior Ordinary. Thus a parochial incumbent can give leave to another priest to administer the Word and Sacraments and to officiate in his parish, but always subject to inhibition by the Bp., or to any regulations which the Bp. may lawfully make. At certain times or occasions the superior Ordinary may suspend the jurisdiction of the inferior. Thus during the period of his diocesan visitation the Bp. usually inhibits the Archdeacon from visiting.—A4. E. G. WOOD.

OREMUS ("Let us pray").—We find occasionally in the PB an Invitation (Bidding) prefacing a pr. and setting forth its special object (e.g., in HC, "Let us pray for the whole state"; in Bpt., "Dearly beloved, forasmuch as"; "Seeing now, dearly beloved . . ."). In early days such Invitations commonly preceded all prs., and "Let us pray" is a relic of them. It is found in the PB in two situations:—(a) at the beginning of the prayer-part of services; (b) to mark the change from Versicles and Responses to prs. of the Collect-type. And in all cases it serves as a call to devout attention.—BI. J. W. TYRER.

ORGAN.—The O. is the instrument most closely connected with Church music, and its origin must be sought in the most remote periods of history. L. Introductory. There can be no doubt that in its earliest forms the O. was recognised as particularly suitable to the needs of worshippers in religious ceremonies, as much for the dignity of its tone as for the support it provided for the voices. The many stages of development through which it has passed to its present size and complexity are interesting in their connection with the history of music. The O. is an instrument playable by a single performer, and is capable of supporting unlimited voices in musical expressions of joy and sorrow alike. It still preserves its nobility of tone, and a dignity, when it is properly used, which gives it a pre-eminent position. From the nature of the case the O. has had a very important influence upon music, and organists have, had, and to some considerable extent still have, upon their shoulders the musical well-being of a large number of people who have to depend upon church-going for their music.

It is not proposed to trace at any length the development of the O. through the many centuries of its existence, but to deal with a few of the difficulties which modern conditions impose both with regard to the organ and the organist. It will, however, be advisable to show in as short a way as possible a few of the phases through which the instrument went, and their connection with Ch. music.

The earliest organs, owing to the great size of the keys which controlled the pipes, were used in single notes to support the PLAINSONG. These 2. Early Instruments. keys required great pressure to put them down, and involved the whole hand in the process, so that, at the best of times, two notes only could be played together. It is obvious that a long process of development was necessary before it was possible to use the keyboard in a manner at all approaching the modern method. But as improvements were made, and it became possible to play notes in more rapid succession and in greater combination, a kind of organ music began to be written on the lines of choral music. The composers of this early kind of instrumental music were all of them organists; and they soon began to experiment in order that they might find a style more suited to the nature of the instrument than to voices. The greater the demands on the technical resources of the performers and the mechanical devices of the instrument, the greater was the stimulus organ builders received to meet them, and invent the means to satisfy them.

From this period (1550) the organ began its career more or less in the form in which we know it. The organs were, of course, very small, and must have been rather exhausting to play on, but it is surprising to find how soon composers began to write passages for the O. which demanded a very considerable amount of dexterity. The compositions of Merulo, Andrea and Giovanni Gabrieli—all of them organists of St. Mark's at Venice—abound in such passages. These organ compositions are the first definite attempt to create a style of composition suited to the instrument.

3 Influence on Music.

It is interesting to find that the men who were, first and foremost, organists were the founders of modern instrumental music. In these days we hear much of the influence (for ill) of the O. loft upon composers. But it was not always so. In the 2nd half of the 16th century the O. was the more advanced and matured among available instruments, and therefore offered the greater inducements to composers. The O. had a good start in the development of instrumental style, and kept its lead until the time of Bach's death in 1750.

It may be well to give some idea of the kind of O. those early composers had to write for.

4. Organ Building.

An O. of 12 stops was considered a large one. It contained, as a rule, no reed stops. Pedals which had been invented in the previous century (1470) were beginning to take their place, but were cumbersome and incapable of rapid performance. Reed stops, although they had been introduced into German organs in the 15th cent., were little used, owing to difficulties of keeping them in tune, and their slowness of speech. This is borne out in Antignati's account of his organ at Brescia (1608). The organ built for York Minster in 1632 by Robert Dallam contained but 14 stops, 2 manuals and no reeds or mixtures.

O. building seems to have developed more rapidly in Germany than elsewhere, judging by the instrument built at Lübeck during the 16th century (1518). This organ, of 2 manuals, contained the earliest 32 ft. pedal stop. A third manual was added in 1561, and by the end of the 17th cent. there were 57 speaking stops. This is the instrument over which Buxtehude presided, and upon which he performed when Bach came to Lübeck to hear him, having tramped all the way from Arnstade. Pedals seem to have become general in England at a much later date than abroad.

It is difficult to say to what extent in those early days the organ was used in this country.

5. Organs in England.

But that it had definite functions is obvious from the fact that as early as 1570 organs were looked upon with disfavour by the Puritans, and in 1586 Parliament was asked to put down cath. chs. in which "the service of God is abused by piping with organs," etc.

However, things did not come to a head until 1644, and, judging by the vehemence of the following clause in the Ordinance passed by Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament on May 9th of that year, that "All organs and the frames and the cases wherein they stand in all chs. and chapels aforesaid shall be taken away and utterly defaced, and none other hereafter set up in their places," it is fairly plain that organ and organ-playing had assumed very definite proportions in the chs. at that time. Many organs were destroyed, but not all. Some found their way into private houses with this important result, that O. playing was cultivated on more secular lines, and instrumental music gained thereby.

During the Interregnum English O. builders had, to a large extent, disappeared; so that, at the

8. The Restoration and After. Restoration when O. building became an urgent necessity, there were too few builders for the work, and it was then that Bernhard Schmidt (Father Smith) and his two nephews came from Germany, and established a great reputation in England. Thomas Harris and his son Renatus returned from Paris. These men brought with them all the newest things in O. construction, and gave to O. building in this country an impetus which has resulted in the pre-eminence of English organs to-day.

With the Restoration of Charles II a great change came over church music. In any case after the silence and restraint of the 16 years previous to the Restoration, a change was bound to come. But a still greater reason for a change was supplied by Charles himself, who expressed a desire for a lighter kind of music, such as he had heard at the French Court under the influence of Lulli. The introduction of a more secular idiom into church music was the result; and the increase in importance of the instrumental accompaniments gave still further stimulus to organists and O. builders.

Among the composers of this period, who were also organists, Humphreys, Blow and Purcell had the greatest influence. During the 18th century O. building developed but slowly. We do not find instruments of any great size. Any considerable increase under the old tracker system was to some extent limited by the weight of the touch which the finger could cope with. Couplers for connecting the manuals were little used for the same reason. An organ of two manuals and pedals, with 20 to 30 stops, was considered a large instrument.

The invention and introduction of the many fancy stops with which modern organs abound are developments of the 19th century. The organs of the 18th and early 19th centuries are chiefly notable for the beauty of the diapason tone, a quality which is rarely produced in modern organs. On the other hand, the superiority of the reed stops in our modern instruments is unquestioned. The most important achievement, however, in the development of organ building was the invention of the pneumatic action. It has resulted in the entire reorganisation of the interior of the organ, and has made it possible to play with the utmost rapidity passages hitherto impracticable. It has made the use of couplers general, and has thereby placed an infinite number of combinations at the disposal of the performer. The adoption of mechanical blowing has made a steady wind supply possible, and has been the means of producing some of the wonderful reed stops of modern organs.

The importance of the O. in churches was never greater than it is to-day. It has to supply music at every turn and of every

9. Functions of the O. kind. Congregational singing is largely dependent on it. Choir accompaniments of every variety are provided by it. It has to fill up many chinks and crevices, and to cover up all sorts of movements of the clergy and the choir. It plays the congregation in and out. It preludes the sermon and ekes out the collection. Its influence for good, if well handled, is immense. It adapts itself most readily to all kinds of experimental effects, and is, therefore, a dangerous instrument in the hands of the unskilful. It is the only instrument, playable by one person, which can provide infinite variety of tone-colour to the many parts of the service it has to perform. And, lastly, it provides the only opportunity many people have of hearing instrumental music of all kinds played either as voluntaries or at recitals.

One question arises which deserves very careful consideration. The position in which organs are placed in unsatisfactory positions, not infrequently in chambers totally inadequate for the purpose. In the Ch. service the congregation is surely the most important consideration, and organs, if they are to stimulate the singing, must be so placed that they can accomplish this. Organs tucked away in chancel niches are wasted, so far as the purpose for which they were built is concerned. The old west gallery, with the organ in it, was a far better arrangement, and gave far more support to the congregation. To have the choir in this gallery would be an additional advantage, and would also make it possible for women to sing in those choirs which find it difficult to secure adequate boys' voices. Many chancels, especially in small churches, have the effect of deadening the voices of the choir and obscuring the tone of the organ. In all concert rooms great care is taken so to place the chorus, orchestra and organ that they may be heard to the greatest advantage. Would that similar thought and care were bestowed upon these very important points in many chs. ! When the value of music in the service is so generally acknowledged, it is surely only reasonable to expect that everything should be done to give the music its greatest effect, by placing the instrument and singers in the position where they can be heard best.

9. Its Position. an organ is placed in a church has the most important bearing upon its utility. In many chs.

With the wonderful developments in modern construction, and the endless contrivances for stop control, the conditions under

10. Organ Playing. which an organist works are very much better than in former years ; but a very much higher standard of attainment is expected of him. O. technique, especially in the direction of registration, has advanced enormously. A new style of O. playing may be said to have arisen ; a style in which the charm of the old solid O. tone has given place to a highly sensitive appreciation for tone-colour. But the organist should not forget that the most modern O. is still capable of playing those most perfect examples of O. music yet available, the works of J. S. Bach. The fascination of orchestral arrangements is reasonable, but the better the organist the wider are his sympathies. —Q3.

H. P. ALLEN.

ORIENTATION OF CHURCHES.—See EAST, TURNING TO.

ORIGINAL SIN.—Certain passages of Holy Scripture, principally from the writings of St.

1. Scriptural Teaching.

Paul, have been generally understood to imply that man is by birth under the "wrath of God," that he is in a state of alienation from God which can be traced back to that beginning of human sin described in Gen. 3, that he brings into the world a nature which is inclined to sin, and that only by regeneration, by a total change or new birth from above granted by God's free grace, can he be delivered. Cp. Ps. 51, and the teaching of Christ in 'John 3, and of St. Paul, especially in Rom. 5-7, 1 Cor. 15, Eph. 2.

The early Church undoubtedly held the same doctrine, though without formal definition and expressed in various ways by the early Fathers. The doctrine was impugned indirectly by the Gnostic sects of the 2nd and 3rd cents., and directly challenged early in the 5th cent. by Pelagius and Coelestius, who appear to have taught that new-born infants are in the same condition as unfallen man. Pelagianism was refuted in Britain, the country which gave it birth, by SS. Germanus, Lupus and David, and elsewhere by St. Augustine and others. It was finally condemned at the Ecumenical Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. The subject continued to be discussed by the Schoolmen, and was one of the burning questions of the Reformation period. It formed one of the subjects of controversy between the rival schools of Calvinism and Arminianism.

2. History of Doctrine.

The teaching of the PB on the subject of OS. is to be gathered chiefly from Art. 9 and the Bapt. Offices. Art. 9 is somewhat reserved in its language; while condemning Pelagianism, it does not, at any rate in its English wording, appear to go as far as Calvin in teaching the total depravity of fallen man. Man is only "very far gone from original righteousness" (the Latin however has quam longissime). Nor does it deal with the "imputation" of Adam's guilt to his posterity. On the other hand, it is more emphatic than the Council of Trent in teaching the sinful nature of "concupiscence." That Council (Sess. v, held in 1546) simply laid down that concupiscence is "of sin and inclines to sin."

3. Article 9.

¹ [It has, however, been argued that John 3, while clearly implying the necessity of passing by a new birth from a lower and earthly state to a higher and heavenly, involves no precise doctrine of original sin, and is satisfied by supposing universal imperfection. It has also been urged that the eccles. doctrine of the Fall has no real support in the OT, and cannot even be securely deduced from St. Paul. See Tennant's Hulsean Lectures, and Sanday-Headlam on Rom. 5. Cp. MAN. G. H.]

The practical exposition of the doctrine in the Bapt. Offices is clearer and more satisfactory than in the Arts. It stands outside controversy and is confined to a simple Scriptural statement which may be analysed under the two following heads. (1) The natural condition of fallen man is that of sin and separation from God; and only by the regeneration of which Bapt. is the outward means can he be delivered from this condition and brought into living union with God in His Kingdom. (2) This natural sinfulness of man is not merely a forensic statement. He is not merely overshadowed by the original guilt of Adam. There is in every man an ingrained tendency to commit actual sin (see opening Exh. of Bapt. ¹). That this tendency to sin remains after Bapt. (as stated in Art. 9) is implied in the fervent prs. for victory over sin and the final perseverance of the newly baptised. They are stated to be regenerate and to have received the remission of sins, and a rubric affirms that baptised children, "dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved." But the gift of the Holy Spirit is prayed for not only before but after the actual Bapt.—a gift which will not only confer the new birth from the state of nature to that of grace, but act as the Divine remedy, by the co-operation of the human will, for all the perils of natural concupiscence. The baptised are delivered from the condition of sin; they are also given a new spiritual endowment which will enable them to avoid actual sin and attain to actual righteousness.

4. The Baptismal Offices.

Much past controversy on OS., as well as much loose language to-day, might have been spared, if the clear principles on which the Bapt. Offices are based had been grasped. The teaching of the Church stands on a different plane from, and is really untouched by, modern theories as to the evolution of man or the transmission of character by heredity. Evolution is clearly going beyond her own sphere in suggesting that the Fall of man was really a rise in his moral development, or that the sense of sin is due only to man's inheritance of tendencies from his brute and savage ancestry, out of which he is endeavouring in the process of evolution to rise. Evolution as a doctrine of natural science is concerned only with processes, and from its own standpoint cannot deal with man's spiritual endowment. Theorising on these subjects without taking account of revealed data is an invasion of the sphere of theology, even as theology would be going out of her province in dogmatising from Bible texts on the origin of species. Those who have received the Christian Faith are justified in meeting such intrusion on the ground of Divine revelation. The doctrine of OS. (as distinguished from original guilt) in the PB formulation of it rests upon the truth, revealed in Scripture and confirmed by experience, that each member of the race is from birth onwards constitutionally liable to sin and exposed to the influences of an evil world. It is revealed also that no self-caused development can set right what has gone astray from the Divine plan. This can only be effected by an inward spiritual renewal from God, by an exercise of that Almighty grace and power which transcends natural processes. [See further, MAN.]

5. Original Sin and Evolution.

Similarly, the theories of heredity connected especially with the name of Weismann do not really touch the teaching of the Church.

8. Original Sin and Heredity.

It is asserted that, while natural characters are transmitted, acquired ones are not; and that, while the tendency to fall below the ideal is heritable, this cannot be due to the effect of any wrong volition on the part of ancestors. Leaving out of question the doubtfulness from a scientific point of view of such conclusions, the Church may not only entrench herself in her consciousness of a Divine revelation, she may point also to the facts of human life, conscience and history. Whether we consider the malignity and the persistence of sin, or the mysterious power of recovery which the Christian Faith and Sacraments have brought into the world, or the indubitable phenomena of conversion and spiritual experience, we can find no explanation so full and satisfactory as that of Holy Scripture and the Church's teaching. Revelation and the facts of life are really at one.¹ (For Literature, see SIN.)—ib. A. R. WHITAM.

ORNAMENTS OF THE CHURCH.—See RITUAL, vii.

ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER.—In this connection the term "Ornaments" signifies what is necessary as well as what is decorative in character, or what is used by the clergy in the way of liturgical vesture in the services of the Church. In the early Church Orders or directories of worship of the 3rd and 4th cents. of the Christian era little is said on the subject of the vestures of the clergy—so little, in fact, as to make it doubtful whether any distinctive liturgical dress was common, or at least universal, up to the close of the 4th cent. In The Testament of our Lord, c. A.D. 350, there is no reference to vestments of the ministers during Service; but the chief deacon in charge of "the guest-house which is in the church" is to be "clothed in white garments, a stole (Gr., Orarion) only on his shoulder" (1 34). This is probably the first mention of a stole; it is named as a badge of office, and it was not worn during Service, at least exclusively, if at all. It is interesting to observe that here the chief deacon wears his stole on one shoulder only, as is usual in our own day (see Maclean, Recent Discoveries illustrating Early Christian Worship, S.P.C.K., 3 § 7). At the Council of Laodicea, held c. A.D. 380, we find the mention of stoles, forbidden indeed to subdeacons, readers and other members of the Minor Orders, but worn as a mark of office in the case of deacons and perhaps also of the higher orders of clergy (ib.). The Canons of Hippolytus (37 201), probably of 4th cent. date, refer to certain Eucharistic vestments. We read that the presbyters and deacons assembled for the Eucharistic Service with the bishop, "robed in white vestures, more beautiful than those of all the people, specially splendid . . . even the readers are to have festal garments." It seems that at this date special vestments were regarded as badges of office.

1. Early Evidence as to Vesture.

¹ [See further MAN.]

Amongst the latest discoveries in the field of ancient Church usages are The Liturgical Homilies of Narsai, recently translated by Dom Connolly (Texts and Studies, viii, Cam. Univ. Press, 1909). In describing the celebration of the Eucharist in the East Syrian Church in the 5th cent., Narsai, apparently a bishop, draws for us a picture of the altar surrounded by a crowd of richly dressed ministers; he says: "The priests now come in procession into the midst of the sanctuary and stand there in great splendour and in beauteous adornment" (Hom. xvii A., p. 4). Lights, incense, waving of fans, genuflections and bowings before the Consecration only, are named. The ceremonial and liturgical development revealed in Narsai is very great, and far in advance of that in the West before the close of the 5th cent. In fact the Homilies of Narsai breathe a markedly different liturgical atmosphere from that of earlier documents.

It seems clear, however, that in the first four centuries the liturgical costume of the clergy was identical with that worn in daily life by the laity or official persons of the State. In the 5th cent. the outdoor costume worn at Rome by State officials consisted essentially of two garments—an under-tunic with or without sleeves, and a paenula or ample cloak, which was sleeveless and without any opening down the front. The head was passed through an aperture made in the centre of this latter garment, and it was lifted in folds over the arms when the wearer wished to use his hands. This is the cloke (phelonion) referred to by St. Paul in 2 Tim. 4 13. From these two vestures the liturgical dress of the clergy in the West has been mainly evolved. When in full-dress the lower officials of State wore the paenula over the tunic, the latter garment being confined at the waist by a girdle; in addition, they wore conspicuously a brightly coloured scarf, the pallium, as a badge of office. With the exception of this latter vesture the dress of the Roman clergy was absolutely identical with that of the Roman civilian of position of the time. (See Duchesne, Christian Worship, S.P.C.K., pp. 379 ff.)

2. Western Use.

That this is the case is conclusively proved from a letter of Pope Celestine I (A.D. 423-432), addressed to the bishops of Provence (Labbe and Cossart and Mansi, Sacr. Concil., 1762, 4 43), in which he condemns the use of any specially or exclusively ecclesiastical costume. In Gaul, however, there was a tendency to distinguish the clerical garb from that of the civilian or lay dress, which Celestine strongly disapproved, as his letter shows. "The documents, liturgical or otherwise, dealing with the Roman use, take for granted that all ecclesiastics, from the Pope down to an acolyte, wore the planeta or paenula with the tunic under it. . . . This costume was still used in the 6th cent. by laymen of distinction" (Duchesne, p. 380). A contemporary picture exists (reproduced in Atchley's Ordo Romanus Primus, Delamore Press, 1905, p. 29), which exhibits Pope Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-604) and his father, Gordianus the senator, dressed similarly, each wearing a planeta or paenula over the tunic or dalmatic; the bishop is only distinguished from the senator by the pallium or scarf thrown round his shoulders and the book of the Gospels in his hand. In the Church of St. Vitalis, Ravenna, is a mosaic of the 6th cent. (the church was consecrated A.D. 547), showing a bishop and two clergymen: all three ecclesiastics wear a long white garment reaching down to the feet, with full and wide sleeves; a narrow band or stole passes over both shoulders, reaching to the bottom edge of the garment, which is a linen tunic or dalmatic, an early form of the alb, surplice or rochet. The bishop also wears a dark olive-green paenula (planeta or chasuble) and over it the pallium, an episcopal scarf, white, fringed at the ends, and marked with a cross (reproduced ib., p. 1). The evidence against the use of any distinctive liturgical habit in the West at this period is conclusive.

From the Roman tunic and paenula the alb and chasuble are derived, the clergy retaining, with modifications, the ancient dress of civilians of position, whilst the latter adopted various changes of attire as time went on. The rochet and surplice are, as said above, modified forms of the ancient tunic. Duchesne traces the stole and similar scarf-like vestures (the oracion, the epitrachelion and the pallium) alike to a common origin, as first introduced into liturgical use during the 4th cent., and he regards them as scarves of office similar to the civil insignia of Roman life (Duchesne, pp. 393-4). We must, therefore, on historical grounds, dismiss from our minds any idea that the liturgical vestures of the Christian Church in the West are derived from those of the Jewish priesthood—the former were undoubtedly, in their earlier forms, merely the ordinary garments of daily use, which by degrees became restricted to the clergy alone, and were as time went on invested with a sacred and symbolic character.¹

The authoritative direction for the liturgical vesture of the clergy of the English Church is found [according to the view here taken] in the Ornaments Rubric, which requires the retention and the use of such ornaments of the ministers at all times of their ministration as were in this Church of England by the authority of Parliament in the Second Year of the reign of King Edward VI. It is now generally admitted that this direction, worded loosely enough, is intended to refer to the legalised usages in regard to the ornaments of church and minister which prevailed under the First PB of Edward VI. There is undisputed evidence that the Ornaments Rubric was revised and deliberately re-enacted at the last revision of the PB in 1662. It takes no account [but see ORNAMENTS RUBRIC for another view] of any intermediate legislation enforcing a minimum of liturgical vesture in the face of prevailing gross neglect, such, e.g., as the Advertisements of A.D. 1566 or the canons of A.D. 1604; it refers back to the legalised usage under the PB of 1549 for guidance in the matter of the ornaments of the minister.

"The Rubric seems to me to imply with some clearness that, in the long interval between Edw. VI and the 14th year of Car. II, there had been many changes; but it does not stay to specify them, or distinguish between what was mere evasion, and what was lawful. It quietly passes them all by, and goes back to the legalised usage of the second year of Edward VI. What had prevailed since, whether by an archbishop's gloss, by commissioners, or even statutes, whether, in short, legal or illegal, it makes quite immaterial."—Letter to Dr. Liddon from the Right Hon. J. T. Coleridge, 1871, quoted in Ritual Conformity, p. 10.

It will suffice here to quote the directions as to liturgical costume given in the First PB of Edward VI, enumerating the various vestures of the minister which were in the Church of England by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI, and which the present PB orders to be retained and to be in use by the ministers of the church at all times of their ministration.

(a) Holy Communion. "Upon the day, and at the time appointed for the ministration of the Holy Communion, the priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope. And where there be many priests or deacons, there so many shall be ready to help the priest in the ministration, as shall be requisite; and shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, albes, with tunicles."

"And whensoever the bishop shall celebrate the Holy Communion in the church, or execute any other public ministration, he shall have upon him, beside his rochette, a surplice or albe, and a cope or vestment,¹ and also his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or holden by his chaplain."

(b) Ante-Communion, or Table Prayers. "Though there be none to communicate with the priest . . . he shall put upon him a plain albe or surplice, with a cope, and say all things at the altar (appointed to be said at the celebration of the Lord's Supper) until after the offertory. . . ."

(c) Choir Offices, etc. "In the saying or singing of Matins and Evensong, baptising and burying, the minister, in parish churches and chapels annexed to the same, shall use a surplice. And in all cathedral churches and colleges, the archdeacons, deans, provosts, masters, prebendaries and fellows, being graduates, may use in the quire, beside their surplices, such hoods as pertaineth to their several degrees, which they have taken in any university within this realm. But in all other places, every minister shall be at liberty to use any surplice or no. It is also seemly that graduates, when they do preach, should use such hoods as pertaineth to their several degrees."

Thus, the legal vestures of the English clergy at the present time, as enjoined by the PB² and specified above, are these: (i) For the Holy Communion: Bishops—ROCHET, SURPLICE or alb, COPE or vestment (with the use of the PASTORAL STAFF); Priests—Alb, vestment or cope; with albs and TUNICLES for assisting priests or deacons. (ii) For Matins, Evensong, and other Offices: Bishops—as above; Priests—surplice, and HOOD in preaching.

The simultaneous use of hood and TIPPET (scarf) in service-time rests on no enactment of any rubric or canon of the English Church, but merely on custom. For a popular yet accurate account of the vestures of the ministers, with illustrations, see Dearmer, The Ornaments of the Ministers (Mowbrays): for a fuller account see Report of Sub-Committee, Upper House of Convocation of Canterbury, No. 416, SPCK, 1908, entitled The Ornaments of the Church and its Ministers.

¹ For the mediæval symbolic meanings attached to the various vestments of the ministers of the Church see the Rationale of Ceremonial, c. 1540-1543, Ed. C. S. Cobb, 1910, pp. 16 ff.; cp. OCM, pp. 33-37, and Staley, Ceremonial of the Eng. Ch., pp. 159-167.

² The term "Vestment" was frequently used to describe a complete set of Eucharistic vestments—CHASUBLE, STOLE, GIRDLE, MANIPUL, ALB, and AMICE (see Scudamore, Notis. Eucharistica, 2nd ed., p. 72).

³ [But see for another view ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.]

For explanations concerning the various vestures named above, see other articles in this work under the respective headings.—R3.

V. STALEY.

ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.—The vexed question of the validity and meaning of the OR.

1. "Prima facie" View.

has become urgent from the "Letters of Business" addressed by the Crown to the Convocations in 1906 to consider whether it was desirable to "prepare a new rubric." It is obvious that the proper construction of the existing rules as to O. must have an important bearing on any discussion of proposed modifications of those rules. What may be called the prima facie view has been stated in the previous art. It assumes that the OR., taken by itself, defines the law of O. in the Ch. of Eng., and that its meaning is that at least the O. lawful under the First PB are still legally required. In 1908 a sub-committee of the Upper House of Cant. Conv.¹ made the same assumption as to the governing force of the OR., and reported, though not very decidedly or explicitly, in favour of the legality of vestments.²

On the other hand, an opposite interpretation has been twice endorsed, after lengthy discussion of the historical and legal points involved, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.³ It has been argued at length under RITUAL LAW, ¹ The members were Bps. J. Wordsworth, G. F. Browne, Robertson, Gibson, and Chase, and their Report is cited as OCM (The Ornaments of the Ch. and its Ministers).

2. Legal and Historical View.

² OCM, p. 90: "We feel bound to state that our own study of the facts leads us to the conclusion that the Ornaments Rubric cannot rightly be interpreted as excluding the use of all vestments for the clergy other than the surplice in Parish Churches and, in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, the surplice, hood, and cope." It will be noted that those who think that scarf, hood, and preacher's gown are lawful in parish churches could subscribe to this conclusion, even if they judged the Euch. vestments illegal. But the construction placed upon it in the text has been explicitly or implicitly sanctioned by the authors elsewhere.

³ See Table II at end of RITUAL LAW, under 1868 M.M. and 1877 R.C., for the names of the great judges concerned. It is proper to add here that the famous Westerton Judgment (1857 L.W. in Table II at end of RITUAL LAW) had created the impression that the "dresses" of the First PB "may still be used." And so secure did those feel who introduced the vestments that this impression was correct, that the opposite decisions were received with consternation and indignation. The terms of the Judgment were these. Speaking of the printed rubrics of 1559, 1604, and 1662, their Lordships said that "they all obviously mean the same thing; that the same dresses, and the same utensils or articles ["Ornaments of the Ch. and of the Ministers thereof"] which were used under the First PB of Ed. 6, may still be used. None of them, therefore, can have any reference to articles not used in the services, but set up in chs. as ornaments in the sense of decorations." But (1) the whole point of this paragraph was to lay stress on the limitation contained in the words "the Min. shall use" (1559 and 1604), and "be in use" (1662), which excluded decorations; (2) this sentence was a mere obiter dictum in regard to "dresses," for, as the Purchas Judgment noted, "this question of the Vestments was not before the Court"; (3) the Judges were right in 1857 in ignoring the proviso, because no one pretends that

§§ 8-29, that in regard to the Elizabethan period later research has greatly strengthened the general position taken by the Court as to vestments,¹ both by showing evidence of an independent legal prohibition of them earlier than the Advts. on which the Judges relied, and by thus interpreting a body of data hard to explain if vestments were first made illegal in 1566. On this view, s. 25 of Eliz.'s Act of Unif.² is the governing rule, and carries with it the orders made, not in abrogation of it (as is suggested, OCM, p. 89, l. 4), but in fulfilment of its provision for retention and use only "until other order." The OR. is on this view a mere note, any doubt as to the construction of which must be settled by reference to the governing rule.³

This interpretation would maintain that the prima facie view requires the OR. to be taken apart from its historical origin and its legal connections, and misinterprets one part of the rubric because it ignores the qualifications contained in the rest; whereas a review of the evidence would show that both the terms of the OR., when properly read, and the law of which it is the subordinate expression, exclude the use of vestments.

The OR. is a patchwork of old phrases, and its meaning cannot be judged without taking into account the purpose of its authors and the situation with which it dealt. Accordingly, we must begin with a survey of the law and practice in regard to ministerial vestures in the past. The crucial dates are 1549, 1552, 1559, 1566, and 1662. As a good deal turns on the sequence of events, the facts will be given in a chronological series.

1547, Jan. 28. Edw. 6 succeeded his father H. 8, the mediæval vestments being still in continuous use.

1548. An English supplement to the Mass provided for the communion of the people in both kinds, but no change of vesture was made.

1549, Jan. 21. Before the end of Edw. 6's 2nd year it was ordered in the First PB by the authority of Parliament that "a white alb plain, with a vestment or cope" should be worn at HC by the principal any "other order" was taken about "Ornaments of the Ch." (which alone were in question in that case), and, as the Ridsdale Judgment pointed out, "Judges weigh their words with reference to the questions which they have to consider, and not with reference to questions which are not before them." (CAT 110 39 f.).

¹ This term will be used summarily for alb and chasuble or tunicle.

² For full text see RITUAL, § 16 (25), and note inclusion of the Act in the PB as No. 1 of the contents (ib., § 15).

³ With the language of the Ridsdale Judgment (CAT 110 24-26) cp. Frere (Lit. Ref., p. 105): "Rubric is in its essence a note, inserted in a Service-Book as a reminder to the user concerning some point of law or custom which is material to the business in hand. It is not in itself, properly speaking, directive, but suggestive. It never is complete, and may be incomplete in very various degrees."

⁴ The suggestion that the cope was only intended for use when the Ante-Communion alone was to be used (Hier. Ang. 1 136 n, 273-5) is negated by the fact that Abp. Cranmer, who presumably knew better than anyone else the meaning of words he with others had drafted, officiated at the HC with other bps., "clothed (say the words of the Register) in linen surplices and copes" (Strype, Cranmer, 1 363 f., q. Hier. Ang. 1 137), the option as to episcopal dress being similarly worded (RITUAL, § 24, d⁴).

minister, as "the vesture appointed for that ministration" (see RITUAL, § 36, H⁴, n. 1); and "Certain Notes" at the end of the book required that for matins, evensong, baptising, and burying, the minister in parish churches, and chapels annexed to the same, should use a surplice. A momentous change was thus made in reducing the chasuble ("vestem sacerdotalem") to the rank of a permissible alternative at HC, and also in dispensing with various accessories previously ordered.

The assumption, so frequently made,¹ that the term "vestment" includes a chasuble with the mediæval appurtenances (amice, stole, and maniple), is not borne out by the evidence. Sometimes, as in Bonner's arts. (see RITUAL, v), it is used so comprehensively as to include at least the alb and girdle, or even the frontal. But more often it clearly denotes the chasuble, as in the inventory of St. Paul's Cath. (Hier. Ang. 149), where "Albis with stoles fannels and parours" are numbered separately. And in the rubric, where "vestment" appears as distinct from the alb and alternative to the cope (cp. the prohibition in the 1552 rubric), the comprehensive sense "cannot be the use" (OCM, p. 109). Sir R. Phillimore in the Purchas case in 1870 condemned the stole and maniple, while allowing alb and chasuble. (Cp. also the quotation from Becon under 1554 below.)

1552. The 2nd Act of Unif. (which only came into force² Nov. 1), by a rubric in the revised PB, ordered that the minister "at the time of the Communion and at all other times of his ministration (shall) use neither alb, vestment, nor cope, but . . . being a priest or deacon, he shall have and wear a surplice only."

1553. Immediately after Mary's accession the Acts of Unif. were repealed, and the religion of the "last year" of her father was restored, including of course the mediæval vestments which Henry had left untouched.

1554. The usage of this time may be illustrated from the contemporary description given by Becon in his Displaying of the Popish Mass (PS 3 599). "As though your own apparel, or else a fair white surplice, were not seemly enough for the due ministration of the sacrament, ye first put on upon your head an head-piece, called an amice. . . . Then put ye on also an alb . . . and that alb ye gird unto you. . . . After this ye cast a stole about your neck. . . . Again upon your left arm ye put on a fannel [p. 361, fannon,³ i.e., maniple]. . . . Last of all come on your . . . coat which is called a vestment. . . ."

1558, Nov. 17. Elizabeth succeeded Mary.

1559, May 8. The 3rd Act of Unif. was passed, which has the distinction that it was formally subscribed by the Convs. on Dec. 28, 1661, as No. 1 in the contents of the PB, and was re-enacted by Parl. in 1662 (see for full text any large Desk PB or other complete ed.,

B. The Act of 1559.

¹ E. Geldart in The Case for Incense, p. 125, who in the text thinks it cannot be reasonably argued that the "vestment" did not include its full suit of stole and maniple, just as the alb would naturally include the amice, and, especially, the girdle, yet in a n. admits that "this is, however, not to be absolutely taken for granted"; and Braun, author of the exhaustive work Die Liturgische Gewandung, 1907, in his review of OCM (in Stimmen aus Maria Laach, 1910) adopts the limited sense, confirming it by parallels from contemporary Lutheran usage.

² Evidence as to ornaments in 1552 has often been cited as if showing usage under the Second PB, when it really referred to the 1549 rule. Cp. RITUAL LAW, § 11 and nn.

³ An humeral or ephod" is the first item (= amice) in this alternative list, from A Comparison between the Popish Mass and the Lord's Supper.

or cp. RITUAL, § 16, for main contents verbatim). By s. 3 the PB of 1552 was re-enacted under severe penalties (see above), but a proviso in s. 25 is usually interpreted as suspending the operation of the OR. of 1552 (which prohibited the ministerial use of alb, vestment or cope), until other order should be taken. As there is no evidence of the ritual use of the vestures disused in 1552 anywhere after the re-establishment of the PB, it is natural to ask whether such use really was sanctioned by the new law. The result of this inquiry has been often prejudged in reliance on the expositio contemporanea contained in the rubric which the editors—whoever they were, and acting under whatever authority—substituted for the statutory rubric (see RITUAL, § 24, D¹ n. 3, D² n. 1). No well-informed writer now maintains that this printed rubric had statutory authority. It is urged, therefore, that its terms should not prejudice the interpretation of the Act; some ground of policy may be found to explain the difference.¹ A somewhat minute analysis will be necessary in order to do justice to the complex ambiguities lurking under the terms of the proviso.²

¹ Provided always and be it enacted] It has not always been recollected that the sole statutory authority that could be claimed for vestments from 1559 to 1662, and (it may be added, if the view described in § 2 be correct) from 1662 to now, is a temporary suspensory proviso, and not an independent enacting clause.

² Analysis of s. 25. From that it would follow that no one could be punished for disregarding it, for no penalties are attached, as is pointed out in the Short Dialogue, 1605 (Tomlinson, CMV, 1908, p. 61 f.).³

² that such Ornaments] According to two concurrent judgments of the Privy Council,⁴ "the term 'ornaments' in the rubric means those articles, the use of which in the services and ministrations of the Ch. is prescribed by that [i.e., the First] PB," and "is confined to these articles," for "though there may be articles not expressly mentioned in the rubric, the use of which would not be restrained, they must be articles which are consistent with, and subsidiary to, the services: as an organ for the singing, a credence table from which to take the sacramental bread and wine, cushions, hassocks, etc."

³ of the Church] It is generally admitted that the reference is to the structure, and not to the society.

⁴ and of the Ministers thereof] In OCM, p. 93, it is held that the term 'Ministers' in the OR. includes bps. and abps., because these are clearly sometimes termed Ministers. On the other hand,

¹ The state policy of the Q. would easily provide a motive (see further below § 8). Cp. Creighton (Q. Eliz., pp. 60 f.; cp. p. 55), "So Eliz. set to work to play a game which bewildered every one"—the apparently serious consideration of Philip's proposal of marriage. The Spanish ambassador wrote, "This woman is possessed with a hundred thousand devils."

² The historical survey is resumed in § 9.

³ Dealing with a similar attempt to overpress a proviso (in the case Rex v. Dibdin, ex parte Thompson), Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton said, "The proposed method of interpretation . . . sins against the fundamental rule of construction that a proviso must be considered with relation to the principal matter to which it stands as a proviso. It treats it as if it were an independent enacting clause instead of being dependent on the main enactment. The courts have frequently pointed out this fallacy, and have refused to be led astray by arguments . . . which depend solely on taking words absolutely in their strict literal sense, disregarding the fundamental consideration that they appear in a proviso" (Times, Dec. 13, 1910). According to this ruling s. 25 of 1 Eliz., c. 2, could not repeal s. 3 (requiring the surplice only) or replace it: it merely qualified its action for a time.

⁴ See Table II at end of RITUAL LAW, 1857 L.W., and 1868 M.M. The quotations in the text are the statements in the latter of points they regarded as established in the former.

the Privy Council ruled on the appeal from the Lincoln Judgment, that the Bp. of Lincoln was not responsible for the use of lights, which were under the control of the incumbent.¹ This view, as taking account of the qualifying "thereof," seems to be the better founded. In that case the OR. only prescribes for incumbents and their deputies; and bps. and abps., unless beneficed or taking temporary charge, are outside its scope.

5° It should be noted, as bearing on the meaning of the proviso, that whereas in the 1552 and 1559 (printed) rubrics the words "at the time of the Communion, and [at] all other times of his ministration" occur, and in 1662 the variant "at all times of their ministration," the Act does not mention ministration, or its times.

6° shall be retained] These words imply that the Ornaments (to be further specified) were at the time lawful possessions of the parish churches under the Marian régime, and at least require that they shall not be parted with contrary to the subsequent terms of the proviso.

7° and be in use] (a) The prima facie interpretation of these words is that they refer to "use" in the sense of ceremonial employment. (b) But it has been urged by Tomlinson (PBAH 102 f., and more fully R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 1 212-214, 222, as well as in his pamphlets) that 'use' has here a meaning practically obsolete now, but then accepted both in ordinary speech and in legal terminology, viz., "trust."² (c) He has also given instances of "use" in connection with Ch. property as meaning employment in a very wide sense, covering any sort of beneficial disposal³ (cp. RITUAL LAW, § 11, n.). Similarly the Judges in the Purchas case (see Table II at end of RITUAL LAW, 1871 H.P.) pointed out that "the Statute of Eliz. did not direct such use [s.e., in ministration], nor refer to any special times of ministration, but it ordered simply the retaining of the ornaments, till further order made by the Queen" (cp. 5° above). All three interpretations, (a) to be used by the minister in the services, (b) to be in trust, or (c) to be in non-ceremonial employment, are thus legitimate according to contemporary usage, and the historical context must settle which is correct.

8° as was in the Ch. of Eng.] Not "as were in use" (the wording of the printed rubric of 1559). The word "was" in the extant MS. original of the Act as signed by the Queen was clearly written over an erasure and is therefore deliberate. It is not, therefore, "such ornaments as were in use then," but "such as was the regulation then."

9° by authority of Parl.] Dibdin (Case against Incense, p. 6) states that this is a phrase which "appears at the beginning of every statute . . .

¹ See Table II at end of RITUAL LAW, 1892 R.L.

² In the Statute of Uses (27 H. 8, c. 10) one clause, s.g., refers to "such like estates as they had or shall have in use, trust, or confidence of or in the same." Cp. Shakespeare in the Merchant of Venice, "I am content, so he will let me have the other half in use—to render it Upon his death, unto the gentleman That lately stole his daughter" (Act iv, sc. 1). (Lewin on Trusts, p. 12, endorsed this view.) This sense is connected with usage and usury, the ordinary sense with useful and usage. Note that, until recently, many PBs erroneously printed "be used" for "be in use" in the Act.

³ The Bodmin inventory of 1566 (Hier. Ang. 1 172-4), often quoted to prove the late ritual use of vestments, includes along with a "censer of latten" and "a sacring bell" (forbidden as early as 1547 by R. Injn., cp. Cardwell, D.A. 1 15), "3 Jesus coats," "3 tormentors' coats," and "2 devils' coats,"—all "to be used and occupied to the honour of God in the same church." On this Dibdin (Case against Incense, p. 72) remarks, "these words 'to be used and occupied' look uncommonly like the formal words of a deed, and I doubt in my mind whether they have any significance at all with reference to actual employment."

'authority' is the technical word for indicating the enacting power of Parl." More than one attempt at legislation had been made earlier in the session, but had failed. And the reference to Parl. may well have been inserted in order to conciliate opponents, who were thus only asked to endorse what an earlier Parl. had approved. Neither Injns. nor Proclamations (the statutory force of which was abolished at the end of the first year of Ed. VI) can be referred to here.

10° in the 2nd year of K. Ed. VI] The passing of the 1st Act of Unif. is mentioned in K. Ed.'s Journal among the entries of the 2nd year, and the 1552 Act refers to it as "made in the 2nd year of Ed. VI." It was long contended that the reference was to the usage of 1548,¹ but it is now generally admitted that the First PB is the standard intended. Sir L. T. Dibdin gave before the R. Comm. on Eccles. Disc. (v. 1, q. 2468) a long list of the Judges who in various cases have "been unanimous as to the meaning being" as just stated. It should be noted also that the wording is "such as was . . . by authority of Parl. in the 2nd year," not "such . . . as was . . . in the 2nd year by authority of Parl.," and the verbal usage of statutes proves that the date refers to the session of Parl., not to the whole year, so that the interpretation under 8° is confirmed.

11° until] This word is not "unless," and, read in its own context,² it creates a presumption that some "order" will be "taken" at an early date (cp. the reference in the R. Injn. of 1547 to "ceremonies . . . not as yet abrogated," the abrogation following in the 1st Act of Unif.). Evidence will be offered to show that this presumption was realised.

12° other order shall be therein taken] The force of these words has been discussed at length under RITUAL LAW, §§ 8-14, where it is argued that, if not the issue of R. Injn. 30, at least its imposition upon the clergy, and its administrative enforcement in the R. Visitation, satisfied all legal requirements involved in the proviso.

13° by the authority of the Q.'s Maj. with the advice of] The very general terms in which the R. authority is required should be noted, cp. RITUAL LAW, § 8 (b).

14° the commissioners appointed and authorised under the great Seal of Eng. for causes eccles.] On June 24, 1559, the day on which the restored PB came into force, and in realisation of the presumption noted under 11° above, a Commission "under the great seal for causes eccles." was issued, the Injns. were "annexed" to the Commission, and were authorised by their "advice" when they made the clergy subscribe them, Injn. 30, as shown under RITUAL LAW, § 9 (1), requiring the surplice, to the exclusion of alb, vestment and cope.

15° or of the metropolitan of this realm] Abp. Parker was not consecrated till Dec. 17, or "confirmed" till Dec. 9. So he could not give the "advice" earlier; but, at the time these words were inserted in the Act, the difficulties and delays over his consecration could not have been foreseen.

In the PB, as printed, the statutory rubric of 1552 has been altered, and differs from the proviso,

7. Rubric as printed in 1662. on which it depended for any validity it might possess, in five points. (a) It followed the 1552 rubric in saying, "The Minister shall use," whereas the proviso might equally well refer to the Churchwardens.

¹ See Micklethwaite, Ornaments of the Rubric, and Maccoll R. Comm. and the OR, 1906.

² The tendency to read "until" as "unless" is no doubt due to the terms of the printed rubric of 1559, where, however, though the "until" sentence is omitted, there is an explicit reference to the Act; and the presence of this may account for the curious fact that the rubric was left in the PB, though the overt prescription in it was universally disregarded.

(b) It specified "ministration," and (c) noted the times ("at the time of the Communion, and at all other times"), and (d) the place ("in the Church") of such ministration. (e) The ornaments were noted as such as "were in use" at the specified date, ct. 8° above.

Its terms, that is to say, require sense (a) under 7° above, and negative both the other alternative meanings of "use." Even if it were correct that "the Rubric, whatever its origin, is the only expositio contemporanea of the proviso" (OCM, p. 66), that would not be decisive. But it does not stand alone, and from its unauthoritative character cannot rightly override all other evidence, of which there is no lack.

1° "On Easter Day (March 26) her Maj. appeared in chapel, where Mass was sung in Eng. according to the use of her brother, K. Edward," and the celebrant according to the rubric of the Second PB did not "wear anything but the mere surplice" (Vendian S.P. 7 57).

2° On April 30, two days after the Act was passed, Sandys (afterwards Abp. of York) wrote to Parker, referring with verbal inexactness to the proviso; but, as he was then in touch with Cecil, and shortly after became a Royal Visitor to enforce the Act, he is not likely to have been wrong about the purport of it. His interpretation—his word "gloss" means no more—"is that we [clergy] shall not be forced to use them, but that others [e.g., churchwardens] in the meantime shall not convey them away, but that they may remain for the Queen" (Parker, Corr., p. 65).

3° On June 13 Cecil wrote (S.P. Eliz., Foreign, p. 313) that the Injns. were "already framed for general Visitation" (see further § 6, 14°). A more authoritative expositio contemporanea can hardly be imagined. (1) The Injns. had to be subscribed by all the clergy along with the PB, and were regularly enforced by the bps. on pain of deprivation right through Eliz.'s reign. They are grouped (OCM, p. 66) with the "Interpretations" of 1561 (p. 68) as being merely "more or less formal documents making a claim to some sort of authority." But the three MS. variants of the latter in the Petyt collection are but unpublished, unauthorised, and anonymous drafts. (2) The reference of Injn. 30 [text in RITUAL LAW, § 9 A n] to ministerial vesture can scarcely be seriously doubted. But a tradition based on incomplete quotations has favoured a "general view" (OCM, p. 67), which is hardly tenable. (a) The words "both in the Ch. and without" are categorical. (b) The definition "such seemly habits, garments, and square caps, as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter year of the reign of K. Ed. VI" is unequivocal. "Orderly" implies conformity to the current regulations. The "latter year" (i.e., 1553) was the one whole year within which a new usage as to ministerial dress ("a surplice only" "at the time of the Communion, etc.") was in force. The mention of this year had no special relevance for outdoor dress. That "there is no mention of the surplice by name" (OCM, p. 67) is true; but the OR. of 1662 names no vestures, and the argument tells both ways. Further, the form of reference was obviously politic, as conciliating the Marian exiles, just as 1 Mary, stat. 2, c. 2, in an equally politic manner, only required "all such divine service and administration of sacr. as were most commonly used in the realm of Eng. in the last year of the reign of our late sovereign lord, K H. 8." (c) The words immediately following, "not thereby meaning to attribute any holiness or special worthiness to the said garments" (OCM "garment"), can only be an apology for the surplice, already under Ed. 6 much protested against. (d) The uniform reliance on the Injns. for enforcing the surplice by Elizabethan bps.¹ seems a complete proof.

4° At the R. Visitation, which got to work in Aug., 1559, the rule of the surplice only was administered everywhere, except that in certain "great churches" the "order taken" permitted the retention and use of the cope.

5° Even in the Q.'s chapel the rule of 1549 was never carried out, though there was adopted, no doubt by her orders, in the autumn of 1559, a novel usage, neither prescribed nor allowed by any rubric, viz., the wearing of three copes at HC (cp. end of first par. of § 5 above, and n. there).

6° The preceding rubric about chancels was also modified without statutory authority (for text and variant see RITUAL, § 24, D³), but the visitation arts. of the Ordinaries, which embody the wording of 1552, prove that this modification also was not regarded as having any force of law.²

In any case there is a contradiction to be explained between the printed rubric and the authoritative action taken by Injn. 30 and the R. Vis., together with the immediate disuse of vestments which is now generally admitted to have taken place. And the only point seriously in doubt, apart from questions of legal validity, is, whether the proviso is, or is not, consentient with the rubric. If it is so, the Act orders what was immediately and unhesitatingly prohibited; if it is not, the anonymous rubric stands as the sole exception in a chain of harmonious data.

Either view can find explanation in considerations of policy. The Q. and the Government had to consider, both the feelings and wishes of the Marian clergy, who had to be conciliated if possible, and the judgment of foreign courts alike on general grounds and with a view to a possible Royal marriage. Some means of masking the suddenness and completeness of the changes made must be found. And it matters little to the argument which of the two alternative solutions be adopted. All that is claimed here is that the conclusion, that the sanction of the ritual use of vestments was not in the proviso but in the printed rubric, fits best the whole of the facts. On this view a period of grace was, by the politic administrative act of modifying the terms of the rubrics in the printed PBs, interposed between enactment and enforcement. The two altered rubrics (1) allowed MEP to be said by the min. facing E. in his "return stall" ("the accustomed place"), and (2) let him at HC go on wearing alb and chasuble, the two principal items in the mediæval Euch. dress.

¹ Bp. Guest of Rochester, quoted OCM, p. 68, as if acting upon the Interpretations (which required the cope alone at HC), asks on the contrary (June 28, 1565) in art. 13, "whether ye know any priest or minister that useth not in the Ch. and abroad the apparel that is appointed him by the Q. Maj.'s Injns.," and in art. 28 about "the ministration of the HC," "whether they use such decent apparel at the same ministration as they are appointed by the Q.'s Maj.'s Injns." (Rochester Register, fol. 98). Nine other vouchers are given in CAT, 395 4-6; cp. also Tomlinson, PBAH, c. 4.

² For refs. see Tomlinson, Hist. Grounds of the Lambeth Judgment (6), pp. 23 f.

But, if this view be rejected, as hitherto it has been generally,¹ then it is claimed that the only satisfactory solution of the problem that has yet been offered is that the policy of temporary postponement was the policy of the Act, and that "other order" was taken as soon as it was possible to do so safely and effectively, i.e., by the imposition and enforcement of the Injns. at the R. Vis. of August, 1559 (see this alternative discussed under RITUAL LAW, §§ 8-14). In either case the rubric of 1552 was fully operative as to its positive requirement ("The Min. at the time of the Communion . . . shall use . . . a surplice") after the Visitation.

(The historical survey, broken off in § 6, can now be resumed.) 1559, June 24. The PB came into force, with the rubric discussed above; and on the same day the Commission was issued with the

8. Survey: Injns. annexed, under which in Aug. 1559-1560. and thereafter vestments were systematically put away (RITUAL LAW, § 12).

1560. "Some ordinary at his visitation" asked "whether any . . . vestments not allowed by law be reserved of any man, or in any place, or no." (Strype, Ann. i. 1 245, 2 497). Also Becon's Catechism claims that "a magistrate (may) command that the min. in the time of his administration wears a surplice." He would certainly not have defended the allowance of the vestments.

1561.² Bp. Parkhurst of Norwich repeated the inquiry noted under 1560, and Abp. Parker (Strype's Parker 1 146) asked if "the sacraments (be) ministered in manner and form prescribed by the Q.'s Maj.'s Injns."

1562, Feb. 7. Jewel writes desiring even to get rid of the surplice (Z.L. 1 100); Bp. Allery of Exeter reports a Puritan as preaching "against surplices, rochets, tippets, and caps." Not a word is said of the more obnoxious vestments.

1563, July. The 2nd bk. of Homilies speaks of "this costly and manifold furniture of vestments of late used in the ch.," whereas "the vestures used in the ch. in old time were very plain and single and nothing costly."

1564, Jan. 2. A min. loses his benefice for "refusing to conform to the order of the Ch. service by wearing a surplice at the administration of the Sacrament," though such use was illegal on the prima facie view (Taylor, Annals of St. Mary Overy, pp. 126 f.). Mar. 24. Earl's Diary (f. 3a) reports an order for "the surplice at all services." Earl also records that before Parker and Grindal at a Court of the Eccles. Commission the ministers of London were thus admonished: "The Council's pleasure is that strictly ye keep the unity of apparel like to this man here, Mr. Robert Cole, as ye see him. A square cap four-cornered, a scholar's gown priestly, a tippet and in the Ch. the linen surplice, and strictly keep the rubric of the book of our common prs. of Eng. and the Q.'s Maj. her Injns." (Note that the 1559 rubric, by its closing words referred to the statute, and so contained the ground for its own modification by the Injns. But it may be the 1552 rubric as re-enacted that is meant.)

¹ The decisive ground of rejection has been that, if no ritual use were intended, there was no reason for limiting the ornaments to those of the First PB. A rebutting argument, that Parl. would not brook even temporary exemption from confiscation for ornaments not sanctioned by a Reformation Parl., has not convinced many.

² The Interpretations, which contain a clause prescribing the cope (apparently by itself) at HC, are not noted above, because there is no real evidence that they were ever published, enforced or obeyed by anyone.

1565-6. The Queen's letter of Jan. 25, 1565, and the Advts. which gave effect to it on their promulgation, April 4, 1566, are fully discussed under RITUAL LAW, §§ 18-20, where the conclusion is reached that the vestitarian clauses of the Advts. in regard to the surplice satisfy all requirements as a taking of other order under s. 25, while the provisions as to three copes in great churches were—if not ultra vires as contravening s. 3—an "ordaining and publishing of further ceremonies" under s. 26. Much fresh evidence, however, confirms the judgment expressed above, that "the surplice" had been legally made the only legitimate ministerial vesture. The abp.'s report to Cecil on "Varieties in the Services" (Feb. 28, 1565) noted no cases of using alb or chasuble at HC, but stated, "some with surplice and *cope*s (i.e., in imitation of the Q.'s chapel and in anticipation of Advts. and Canons), some with surplice alone, some with none" (reprinted in R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 4 40). July 17 Bp. Horn of Durham, a R. Commissioner and Visitor, wrote that "though the rest of the dress [of Popery] had been taken away (sublata reliqua facce), the wearing of square caps and surplices was continued to the clergy, though without any superstitious conceit, which was expressly guarded against by the terms of the Act" (Z.L. 1 142). The reference is to Injn. 30, which the bp. thus identifies with the Act. So Gualter refers to "the Q.'s Maj.'s ordinance for the wearing of the surplice and priest's cap" (Lansd. MSS. 9, art. 1). See CAT. 381 20-22 for 7 other vouchers from this year.

1566, Mar. 26 (a week before promulgation of the Advts.). The London ministers were brought "before the Abp. of Cant. and other of the [Privy] Council, where charge was given them to serve their Churches and wear their apparel according to the Q.'s Injns. or else to do no service" (Gairdner, Three 15th cent. Chronicles, p. 135).

1604. Nearly 40 yrs. can now be passed over, not for lack of evidence, but because it adds nothing fresh to the tale. The PB was reissued by Jas. I, with alterations the validity of which has been usually denied. They did not concern the OR. In the same year the canons endorsed the prescriptions of the Advts. (see RITUAL LAW, § 32), and asserted their harmony with the PB by requiring no variation from the latter.

1627. Bp. Cosin (then only archdeacon) asked, "Doth he [the min.] when any sac. is to be administered . . . wear the surplice?"

1628. Laud in his Vis. arts. asked: "Whether doth your min. wear the surplice, while he is saying the public prs., and administering the Sacrament?" and again "Whether there be in your parish who are known or suspected to keep hid in their homes any Mass books, Breviaries, or other books of Popery or superstition, or any chalices, copes, vestments, albs, or other ornaments of superstition uncanceled or undefaced, which it is to be conjectured they keep for a day, as they call it?" (Rit. Com. 2 575).

1641. Bp. Wren of Ely reported to Parl. that "these Injns. are allowed and confirmed by the Q.'s own Advts., cap. 1, art. 3, and those Advts. are authorised by law, 1 Eliz., c. 2, sect. penult." (Parentalia, p. 75).

1643. Episcopacy was abolished by the Long Parliament.

¹ Cp. the "rusticall" terms reported by the Puritan author of An Answer for the Times from "the talk of the rude people": "Neighbour, played we not a wise part, when we kept our Mass-clothes and books, for by the Mass, neighbour, we shall have all againe one day." Cp. similarly the account in Strype (Parker, 1 399) of the destruction or defacement in 1572 of "vestments, albes, tunicles, stoles, maniples, etc.," kept by Dr. Cairns, and described as "Popish trumpery which he might think would come in play again."

1645. The PB was suppressed and its use in public or in private made a penal offence.

1660. The bps. and clergy were reinstated, and the PB restored as a matter of course, its illegal suppression not having affected the validity of the Act of Uniformity. The prescription by the canon of the surplice at all services was universally obeyed by conformist clergy.

1661. At the Savoy Conference, among a long list of objections, many of them frivolous, there was a complaint that the printed OR. of 1559 "seemeth" to bring back the cope, alb, and other vestments." The bps. in their reply ignore this point as unworthy of notice, declaring that they "think it fit that the rubric continue as it is,"¹ and refer to their full treatment of the main objection that "the surplice" was enforced (pronouncing "no habit more suitable than white linen"), for that had been the main bone of contention in the century-long vestigarian controversy.

1661, Nov. Revision of the PB was formally begun in the Convs., on the basis of a draft prepared by a committee of bps. and divines, whose work is represented by Cosin's Durham Book, a copy of a 1619 book, altered in the handwriting of Cosin and Sancroft, as secretaries.

1662. The PB was passed by Parl. as received from the Convs. with the OR. as we now have it (RITUAL, § 24, D^o).

Our survey may be summed up in the statement that from the time of the R. Vis. in the summer and autumn of 1559 down to 1662, when the present OR. was accepted by Convs. and Parl., no one wore a chasuble, no one ordered vestments to be worn, no bp. or conformist divine, neither Parker, Andrewes, nor Laud, hinted or suggested that they could be legally worn, much less that a white alb plain, with a cope or chasuble, was the only authorised vesture at HC.² The explanation suggested above of this state of things is that an unbroken series of authoritative acts had excluded alb and chasuble from the category of legal vestures, and had left the surplice, with the additions sanctioned by the canons, as the sole legitimate vesture of the clergy "at all times of their ministration."³ The importance of this conclusion lies here. If the 1662 Act and annexed Book unmistakably required the vestments, all previous law and history would become in 1662.

10. The Position

¹ Perhaps they did not wish by alteration to give countenance to the allegations of some Puritans (cp. RITUAL LAW § 28, objection 10) that the current practice was not in accord with the rubric. On similar grounds Pope Leo 13 argued recently that Ang. Orders were invalid because the alterations in the 1662 Ord. were a confession that the Edwardian Ord. was insufficient. But the revisers of 1661 did alter the rubric after all, see § 12, 1^o below.

² Cosin's notes, on which much stress has been laid by many writers, are no exception, for he never published them, and his official action (see above under 1627) is inconsistent with those notes which seem to accept the legality of vestments. Further, (1) the notes are full of inaccuracies, (2) in a later note he acknowledges himself mistaken on this point, "But the Act of Parl., I see, refers to the canon, and until such time as other order shall be taken" (OCM, p. 88). The notes ascribed to Bp. Overall are not his.

³ The alternative explanation, that the action of R. Visitors, Bps., Commissioners, and Council, was an illegal modification of the law, is stated and discussed in regard to the first crucial epoch (1559) under RITUAL LAW, § 13 f., and in regard to the second (1566) in § 23-28 (cp. § 29 f., for the theory of the surplice as a minimum).

practically irrelevant. But if, as will appear, these documents admit, not to say require, a different interpretation, then it may be possible to settle the meaning by noting the intention.

The first fact is the constantly ignored insertion of the Act 1 Eliz., c. 2, as No. 1 of the contents of the PB. The substitution of a new book¹ did not affect the operation of ss. 25 f. This proviso, it was ruled in the Ridsdale Judgment (CAT 110 25), still constituted "the law authoritatively governing the matter," and the new Rubric was, like the old, "a memorandum or note of reference to that law." Apart from the high legal authority of the great judges concerned in this conclusion, the cogency of it is apparent even to non-legal minds, when once the significance is grasped of the re-enactment of Eliz.'s Act, not by mere reference but by incorporating it in extenso in the forefront of the PB, and with ratification by Ch. as well as State. Moreover, this ruling is on a point of law, not of doctrine or ritual, and no "new light" can alter the legal question. In the same way the ruling, that the double proviso carries with it the order or orders to which it had looked forward, and to which it gave operative force and statutory validity, is simply common sense. This interpretation is borne out by Pref.¹ which refers to "the laws of the land, and those laws never yet repealed."

11. The 1559 Act Reaffirmed by
Ch. and State.

Turning next to the rubric, a careful examination will be needed to establish its conformity to previous law and usage. If the 1559 Act settles the matter, it must override the rubric. But if the OR., properly interpreted, agrees with the Act, that will be an additional confirmation of the view taken.

12. The New Rubric.

1^o The Revisers did not adopt the attitude of the Savoy conferrers, but altered the rubric. That any alteration would introduce an "occasion of cavil" is excluded by Pref.¹ (RITUAL, § 17, B¹), and Lord Clarendon tells us that "the bps. spent the vacation [i.e., the summer of 1661] in making such alterations in the BCP as would make it more grateful to the dissenting brethren."²

2^o As if to show that the OR. depended on the 1559 Act, inserted a few pp. earlier, they introduced "the words of the Act itself," as Sancroft noted on the original draft in the Durham Book, but (a) having incorporated the Act already, they naturally dispensed with the reference to it in the rubric they were amending, and (b) they "stopped short of the reference to the taking of other order," not, as suggested (OCM, pp. 88 f.), so as "to exclude any reference to the Advts. as authoritative in the future,"

¹ It is worth noting, as bearing on the question of interpretation, that on June 25, 1661, the House of Commons ordered "to make search whether the original book of the Liturgy annexed to the Act passed in the 5th and 6th yrs. of K. Ed. 6 be yet extant"; i.e., the intention was to disregard the Elizabethan and Jacobean books altogether, and to go back to the 1552 PB.

² There were, of course, changes in an opposite direction (e.g., "sanctify this water"), and it has been claimed (cp. HISTORY OF THE PB, § 20) that the balance of change is on that side; but no change comparable to the legalising of the Euch. vestments can be noted.

but simply because in 1662 the order was regarded as taken and the law settled.¹

3° They replaced the words "at the time of the Communion, and at all other times of his ministration" which might imply a difference of use, by the phrase "at all times of their ministration," the meaning of which is settled by their own (the revisers') Vis. arts., Cosin, e.g., asking in 1662, "Have you a large and decent surplice for the minister to wear at all times of his ministration in the ch.?" This expositio contemporanea seems to rule out the otherwise tenable grammatical construction of the phrase in the rubric ("at all times") as equivalent to "at the several times."

4° Instead of repeating the direction "the Minister shall use" (which might have "seemed to bring back the alb, etc."), they borrowed from the Act the wording "shall be retained and be in use."² In the Act of 1559 these words were qualified by the condition "until other order, etc." By the order or orders thereafter taken the alb and chasuble had been put away, and the cope banished from parish churches, and the resulting law³ was as was most recently expressed in the canons. On the Restoration in 1660 the surplice, the only ornament of the minister prescribed in 1549 and still "retained" by law,⁴ was reintroduced as usage in the churches, and with it the Ornaments of the Ch. which the First PB had prescribed. The OR. does no more than order that these "ornaments of the Ch., and of the Ministers thereof, shall be retained and be in use." What was called the "prima facie" view (in § 1 above) interprets "retained" as if it were "re-introduced."⁵

5° By adopting the words of the Act the Revisers were able to make clear the distinction between "the Ornaments of the Ch." and those of "the Ministers thereof at all times of their ministration." This had been obscured by the 1559 OR. And this combination of the two sets of ornaments supplies the reason for the continued reference, which has misled so many, to the usage of the First PB. That was still one of the criteria for the legality of ornaments of the Church. Moreover, as noted under 4°, the surplice was an ornament of that book, and the OR. was simply a direction to read "Certain Notes" (RITUAL, § 24, D³, n. 3) as controlling the Mins. "at all times of their ministration," instead of for the specified offices only. Thus also the frequent contemporary allusions to the "Certain Notes" (as if no other direction in the 1549 PB mattered) are both accounted for and justified.⁶

¹ Cp. the quotation from Bp. Wren, a leading Reviser and High Churchman, in § 9 under date 1641.

² No one doubts that "use" in 1662 meant "ministerial use." This paragraph, it is proper to note, loses some of its force if the alternative of § 10 (2nd n.) be adopted.

³ To a plea on behalf of "those two things that remain" (i.e., the cope in cath. chs. at HC and the surplice everywhere, according to the then recent Advts.), the early Puritan 'Answer' replied (An. Answer for the Times, p. 103), "It grieveth you to hear the rest of the popish apparel that is abolished rehearsed" [see quotations under RITUAL LAW, § 28 (10) b and n. there] "with that which is retained. But, as God by His magistrates had delivered us from those, so we trust He will deliver His Ch. from these" (i.e., cope and surplice).

⁴ The most natural interpretation of "retained" is "retained in use." But it might mean—if the evidence pointed that way—"retained in law," with the right of re-introduction in use. And the double phrase, "retained and be in use," might have been taken in this sense by the Revisers. The decision will then turn on the question whether, in view of the evidence marshalled above and under RITUAL LAW, the appearance of illegality attaching to the vestments from 1559 onwards can be brought under the proverbial rule that "appearances are deceitful." See § 13 (i).

⁵ That the Revisers did not make their meaning still plainer is easily explained by the historical situation. They never dreamed that the revival of the discarded vestments would ever become a practical question, and they followed a natural

It has now been shown that the OR. admits, if it does not require, a meaning in harmony with the canons. It must now be pointed out (1) that no evidence has been produced to show that any single Reviser desired to change the law, or expressed the belief that it already legalised vestments. On the other hand, Bp. Wren, chairman of the revision committee, wrote in 1660 in relation to the First PB as enacted by the 1549 Act that "there is somewhat in that Act that now may not be used," and declared that "to preserve those that are still in use, it would be set down in express words" (cp. under 1641 above).¹ (2) Our examination has shown that the alterations in wording, to say the least, do not require us to suppose that they were alterations in the law; and (3) there is no evidence that anyone alive at the time hinted or suggested that such a change had taken place. The changes in the rubric are not named in the list of principal alterations, and they passed Conv. at a session which reviewed so many pages that these could not have excited discussion. In Parl., moreover, on a proposal to dispense from the use of the surplice and the Cross in Bapt., the spokesman of the Commons explained their rejection of it by saying "that he thought it better to impose no ceremonies than to dispense with any, and he thought it incongruous, at the same time when you are settling Uniformity, to establish Schism" (J. H. Parker, Introd., pp. 476, 482).

12. Other indications.

It so happens that Vis. arts. dating from 1662 or a year or two later have been preserved from every diocese except Bangor. Not only do all the ordinaries agree in requiring the surplice at all ministrations, but 25 of them expressly refer to the Canons of 1604 as of full obligation, while the rest by their references to hood and tippet or scarf, imply the same.

It was not till nearly fifty years later that the (at that time) novel interpretation of the legality of vestments was set forth by John Johnson in a 3rd and revised ed. of his Clergyman's Vade Mecum (1709), Nicholl at the same time printing Cosin's early Notes, without his correction. A long line of legal and liturgical writers took the same line, and a new tradition gradually established itself.² And in 1858, impulse to make as slight changes as possible under pressure of opposition. Hence, instead of drafting a new rubric, they simply made a mosaic of old phrases, full of latent ambiguities unless resolutely taken together and illuminated by history.³ Frere gives no authority for his statement that "the more learned of the liturgical scholars seem to have become aware that the rubric [of 1559] authorised the alternative use of the vestment" (Lit. Ref., p. 123). Bp. Wren, called by Lord Clarendon "very learned and particularly versed in the old liturgies of the Greek and Latin Chs.," and one who had suffered imprisonment by the Puritans for his ceremonial usages, was under no such illusion, we have seen, and Cosin had found out his early mistake (§ 10 n.).

14. A New Tradition begins in 1709.

¹ Nicholl (Comm. on BCP, 1710), Wheatly (On BCP, 1710), Bp. Gibson (Codez, 1713), and Burn (Eccles. Law, 1809) may be named, and, among writers on the Low Ch. side who took the same view, A. J. Stephens (BCP with Notes, 1849), Dean Goode (Asis, 1851), and Dr. Vogan. On the other hand, what may be called the "Wren" view was maintained by Sharp (On the Rubric, 1753), Bp. Madox in 1733 (quoted by Soames, Eccles. History, 1839), R. P. Blakeney (BCP, 1870), and others, Soames and Wheatly Balme (The Ch. and the OR., 1883) being High Churchmen.

acting on a natural mis-reading of an obiter dictum in the Westerton Judgment,¹ the systematic revival of vestments began. The movement can be followed in the Report of the R. Com. on Eccl. Disc., pp. 54 ff., Hist. Survey.

In view of the long continuance of vestments in many chs., many, especially among the clergy, have favoured the legalising of an alternative use.² And in response to the Letters of Business inviting the Convs. to consider the propriety of forming a new Rubric, tentative proposals have been approved, leaving the OR. unaltered, but sanctioning either interpretation in practice, subject to episcopal control or other safeguards. The York Upper House have suggested as a compromise the permission of a white vestment, one of their number preferring that a licence for the use of vestments should be issued to selected churches. See ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER; RITUAL (VII Ornaments); Reports of Rit. Com. (1867, etc.), and R. Com. on Eccl. Disc. (1906); Report of a Sub-Committee of the Cant. Upper House of Conv., The Orn. of the Ch. and of the Min., 1908 (cited as OCM); Tomlinson, PB, Arts. and Homs., 1897 (cited as PBAH), and various tracts; Frere, Religious Ceremonial; and the reports of cases cited in Table II at end of RITUAL LAW.—R3.

15. Present Proposals.

G. HARFORD.³

[We desire to state that we are unable to follow the writer of the previous art. in his construction of the legal and historical problems involved, and in particular we are not satisfied with the view taken as to the validity of the 30th Injn. of 1559. M. S.; J. W. T.]

ORTHODOX.—This is the title assumed by the Eastern Church, and reflects its somewhat stereotyped adhesion to the dogmatic formulations of the great conciliar age of doctrine. But it is commonly used to describe those who hold the Nicene Creed. It has also a looser sense, which is hardly caricatured by the old epigram: "Orthodoxy is my 'doxy'; heterodoxy is the other man's 'doxy'." Religious circles which keep to themselves are always liable to be afflicted with a nervously narrow conception of orthodoxy.—U.

G. HARFORD.

PAINTING.—Before the era of whitewash, our churches were a blaze of colour. Walls,

¹ See above, § 2 n.

² On the other hand, some who wear vestments, or accept com amore the view of their legality, have argued against the recognition of an alternative use on the ground that this would be a new departure, because, on their view, the Euch. vestments are already ordered exclusively. But the cope is not an Euch. vesture, and yet it was an equally lawful alternative under the 1549 PB, unless we adopt the scarcely tenable theory mentioned above in § 3 under 1549, n.

³ Canon Grensted who, with a wide and accurate knowledge of the literature takes the same general view of the OR. as is argued in this art., has read both this art. and RITUAL LAW in proof, and both are indebted to his suggestions for substantial and verbal improvements. In view, moreover, of the difficulty of avoiding prejudice in this connection, it may be added that the present writer from 1889 to 1899 believed in the legality of vestments, and upon occasion wore them. The discovery and observation of data, unknown or unnoticed by him before, seemed to make it a duty to present these with some fulness to others.

G. H.

tombs, stonework, were all painted. There is not a single Pre-Reformation church in England which was not adorned with painted decorations, and it is a melancholy fact that so much of this art has perished, or been wantonly destroyed. In the whole of the country there are few of the old edifices which contain any traces of the numerous quaint designs and figures painted on the inner surfaces of their walls during the mediæval period. Several means were employed. Sometimes Fresco was used, by means of which pictures were produced upon walls covered with plaster, while the plaster was wet. Wall P. was employed when the plaster was dry. The distinction between Fresco and Wall P. is frequently forgotten. Most of the early specimens of this art are monochromes, but subsequently the painters used polychrome, introducing various hues. The vaulted ceilings, timber roof, screens and canopies, monuments with their effigies, as well as the surface of the walls, were often coloured with diaper-work. Colour and gilding were marked features in all mediæval buildings, and even richly carved fonts and sculptured monuments were embellished by this method of decoration. Beneath coats of white-wash many still remain to be uncovered. Some of the Ps. fade rapidly when exposed to the air, but means have been devised for their preservation.¹

1. The Art in Early and Medieval Times.

The practice of P. churches is very ancient. St. Wilfrid used it. Figures of saints at St. Mary's,

2. Brief Historical Sketch.

Guildford, are probably Saxon work, and traces of early colouring can be found at St. Nicholas', Ipswich, at Britford, and at St. Martin's, Canterbury. There are numerous examples of Norman painting, and sometimes early specimens of the art have been painted over in later Gothic times. At the Church of St. Lawrence, Reading, no less than five distinct series of Ps. were discovered, executed one over another. The cathedral of St. Albans contains some of the best Norman Ps. The favourite subjects were the Agnus Dei, scenes from the life of our Lord, the Apostles, the Last Judgment, St. George, St. Nicholas, St. John writing the Apocalypse, St. Michael weighing souls, and the torments of the lost. Great progress was made in the art in the 13th cent. Travelling monks roamed the country and left behind them in many a village church traces of their skill in P. The murder of St. Thomas of Canterbury became a favourite subject, and also the lives of St. Catharine, St. Nicholas, St. Margaret, St. Edmund, the Seven Acts of Mercy, and the Wheel of Fortune. The early English artists carefully prepared the surface of the walls for their work, a practice neglected by their successors; hence their Ps. have lasted well, whereas those of the 14th cent. have often crumbled away. It would require too long a space to trace the development and decline of the art. We may notice the gradual increase in the number of the Ps. of the Coronation of the Virgin, and of the increased veneration for St. Christopher and St. George. The former is depicted almost life-size, and usually appears opposite the principal entrance, the sight of the saint being deemed a preservative against violent death and against drowsiness during the service. Moralities, too, became fashionable with the 15th and 16th cent. artists.

¹ Cp. List of Buildings having Mural Decorations, by C. F. Keyser, Science and Art Dept., South Kensington Museum, p. xcii.

Wall Ps. have suffered from various causes. They have been regarded as relics of superstition, and during the Commonwealth were covered with whitewash. Restoration and the ignorance of ancient art have caused many to be destroyed. Some modern work is of the highest merit. St. Paul's Cathedral is adorned with a magnificent series painted by Sir William Richmond, and many a village church has been decorated in this manner. The practice of scraping the interior walls so as to expose the rough and wide-jointed masonry is on every ground a most reprehensible and unreasonable form of treatment. There is no apparent connection between whitewashed walls and reverence, and art and beauty may help devotion in God's sanctuary.—R4.

P. H. DITCHFIELD.

PALL.—(i) = PALLIUM (q.v.). (ii) A cloth, black, white, or coloured, for draping coffins. (iii) (Lat. palla).—The Communion office prescribes that the remains of the consecrated elements be covered with a FAIR LINEN CLOTH. Originally the CORPORAS was long enough to fold back for this purpose. Then a second corporas—the P.—was used, folded, to cover the elements until consecration, and afterwards, opened out, over the consecrated elements. Of late days a square of linen stiffened with cardboard has been introduced, contrary to all old canons which prescribe only pure linen about this Sacrament (see Luke 23 53). (iv) An altar-cloth, such as that offered by the sovereign at CORONATION. (v) Close P.—the supertunica assumed by the sovereign at coronation. (vi) Open P., pallium regale, assumed by the sovereign at coronation. (vii) A canopy held at coronation over the sovereign during the anointing.—R3.

S. REDMAN.

PALLIUM.—The P. (= ιουδριον) was originally an outer article of dress akin to, but not identical with, the toga. In shape it was that of a square or oblong blanket, which, in process of time, became a richly bedizened cloak worn by the Emperor, and conferred by him upon high officials of Ch. and State as a mark of dignity or honour. By degrees it waxed less, until it became merely a narrow band (or kind of scarf) which loosely encircles the neck and hangs down behind and before; thus it would resemble, in shape, the letter Y, as it now appears on the arms of the primatial see of Canterbury. In the East, the P. has (under the name of Omophorion) been worn by bps. since the 5th cent. The material of the Western P. was white wool, shorn from the lambs reared in the convent of St. Agnes, outside the walls of Rome, and it was ornamented with dark crosses (now four in number, but originally more numerous, although an instance has been found on an archiepiscopal sarcophagus having but a single cross). In the first instance the emperor gave it to patriarchs, and later popes began to send pallia (at first with the emperor's consent, but afterwards independently) to certain bps., and specially to metropolitans, as an honorific gift, and subsequently as a token of their vicarial authority being derived from the see of Peter. It was only to be worn on certain occasions; in the case of St. Augustine of Canterbury, to whom Pope Gregory the Great sent it, only at mass.

In Gregory's time the P. was bestowed for at least four purposes: (1) as a personal mark of honour, but not of jurisdiction (e.g., to Bp. Syagrius of Autun, to whom Gregory gave precedence among his suffragans, and to Bp. Leander, who had been for more than 20 years metropolitan of Seville); (2) as a regular honour to the suburbicarian bps. of Syracuse, Messina and Ostia; (3) as a mark of vicarial (not archiepiscopal) jurisdiction to certain metropolitan sees (e.g., Arles); (4) as an honour to all Western metropolitans more intimately associated with Rome. In none of these instances is there any hint of archiepiscopal jurisdiction being conveyed from Rome (cp. the fact that all bps. in Gaul, Spain and Africa wore the P., probably by imperial, not papal, favour). Gradually, the right of granting this vestment became reserved to the popes, and, by the 8th cent. at least, the doctrine was held by the English Ch. that it was necessary not only for the discharge of metropolitan functions, but as the very means by which an abp. became possessed of his provincial powers (e.g., consecrating his suffragan bps.)—cp. Stigand's action in 1052, when, not being able to obtain a P. from Rome, he made his schismatical position clear by wearing the P. which Abp. Robert (ejected by Earl Godwine) had left behind him in his hasty flight to France. The next step in thus increasing the papal power was the imposed duty of the abp. to visit Rome to obtain his P., and it is recorded of King Cnut that one benefit arising from his pilgrimage to Rome in 1027 was to obtain a promise from John XIX that for the future the English abps. should not be required to pay exorbitant sums for their pallia. Since the Reformation English metropolitans have not assumed the use of the P. except in armorial bearings. (See Duchesne, Christian Worship, Eng. trans., pp. 384–394; DCA, arts. Omophorion, Pallium.)—R3. H. E. SCOTT.

PALM SUNDAY.—See HOLY WEEK, § 1.

PALMS.—The Palm was always the emblem of victory, because it bears its abundant fruit as high as it can; it does not drop its leaves, and, though depressed by weight on its branches or the violence of the wind, always resumes its original attitude. The Hebrews call it tamar, or "the rising tree." Hence from very early times it was the custom to carry branches of P. in procession. The eccles. use of P. is connected with the sixth Sunday in Lent, called Palm Sunday. In commemoration of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem it became the custom in the Roman Church for branches of P. and olives to be solemnly blessed and distributed among the congregation. Some of the branches were also burnt to ashes and kept by the priests for use on the following Ash-Wednesday, the symbolism of victory being retained even in the ashes. In Judea Palm trees were very abundant, and constant reference is made to them in Holy Scripture, while the name "Tamar" (Gen. 38 6) means "palm"—"a victorious maiden." In countries where the Palm tree does not flourish other trees are substituted for it, and used in the procession on Palm Sunday. Thus, in Rome the box-tree or the olive, in England the willow or the vew, takes the place of the Palm. The custom of Palm Sunday processions was abolished in the second year of Ed. VI. The Sarum Missal contains a service for the blessing of P., which took place before the Celebration of HC (see Evan Daniel on the PB, p. 223). The custom still prevails in some places, and seems to be reviving, of decorating the altars in church with branches of flowering willow, and it is a common thing for boys and girls to go out into the country lanes to gather willow buds.

No reference to the events of Palm Sunday and the symbolic use of P. is now to be found in the PB, with the solitary exception of the second evening lesson which contains the story of the triumphal entry.—R2.

F. L. H. MILLARD.

PAPISTS.—The name began to be used after 1534, and was given to those who held to the Pope's supremacy, at least in things spiritual, against that of the King. Henry made little change in the doctrine or constitution of the Church save on this single point, which he enforced under pain of high treason. Radical reforms were effected under Edward VI, but at least three-fourths of the English people welcomed Mary's restoration of the mediæval system and were not averse to a moderate exercise of Papal authority. The nation, however, was shocked by that Marian persecution which it has never forgotten since, and the gulf between Anglican and Papist was widened by Elizabeth on the one hand and by the Popes on the other. In 1563 the Council of Trent ended its laborious task of formulating mediæval doctrine, and in the same year the 39 Articles furnished in much briefer space a statement of evangelical truth. A year earlier Pius IV had forbidden all participation in Anglican worship. Many attended it in good conscience and many, "Church-Papists" as they were called, continued to do so in bad conscience. In 1570 Pius V excommunicated Elizabeth and declared all allegiance to her unlawful. Colleges were founded at Douai, Rome, Valladolid, etc., for the training of "seminary priests," who were to labour in the "English Mission." The Northern Rebellion, the Babington plot, the Armada, exasperated the Queen and her subjects. It was made high treason to bring bulls or other Papal documents into England, or to reconcile an English subject with Rome. Under the same penalty Jesuits and seminary priests were to quit the country within forty days. It is true that seminary priests and many Jesuits had no taste for political intrigue and sincerely devoted themselves to work for souls according to such light as they had. But they would not, though they acknowledged Elizabeth as their lawful Queen, renounce and condemn the Pope's claim to the deposing power, and Elizabeth, mistaken though she was, had some excuse for believing that they could not be trusted in time of rebellion or invasion.

Matters did not mend after the accession of James I and the Powder Plot. James made an honest attempt to relieve Papists by proposing to them an "oath of allegiance." It acknowledged the King's supremacy in the civil sphere, while it condemned as "impious and heretical" the doctrine that princes excommunicated by the Pope might be lawfully deposed and murdered by their subjects. This declaration was approved by Blackwell, the Superior of the English Papists, but was rejected by Paul V in 1606. Nor did Papists gain in popularity, as they might have fairly expected to do, under the succeeding Stuarts. They were accused of setting London on fire; in 1678 the nation was driven to fury by the fabrications of Titus Oates, and a little earlier the Test Act had made Papists ineligible for military or civil service of their country. Long persecution had reduced their numbers, so much so that the Florentine ambassador declared in 1677 that "soon no Catholic would be left in England." William III retained the existing laws against Popery and added to their number. Henceforth no Papist could keep a school or own arms or even a horse worth £5. He could neither inherit or purchase land. The worst of these laws became inoperative and were formally repealed in 1778. In 1829 the Act of Emancipation granted full or nearly full relief. A Roman Catholic cannot ascend the throne or be Lord Chancellor in England, nor can a Sovereign marry a Roman Catholic: otherwise Romanists enjoy the same rights as their Protestant fellow-subjects.—A1. W. E. ADDIS.

PARDONS.—See INDULGENCE.

PARISH.—The PB presupposes the parochial system. Each "curate" is entrusted with the pastoral care of souls within a definite area—the P. In each P. the worship and work of the Church as provided for in the PB must be carried on.

Both on the Continent and in England the Diocese preceded the P. as an administrative unit.¹ From the 2nd cent. to the

1. History. time of Constantine the church in each town had its bishop, who was assisted by presbyters and deacons. When the Anglo-Saxons were evangelised, while the work of preaching was chiefly done by monks, the Church was organised from the first on the principle of territorial episcopacy.

Tradition assigns the foundation of the parochial system to that great organiser, Archbishop Theodore (A.D. 668).

Certainly during the period when the monastery was the centre of evangelistic work the foundation of village churches was going on.² The duties of the localised clergy were laid down by the Council of Clovesho in 747 A.D. By degrees there came to be a church in each township which "represented the original allotment of the smallest subdivision of the free community, or the settlement of the kindred colonising on their own account, or the estate of the great proprietor who had a tribe of dependents"³ (Bp. Stubbs, Constitutional History, i, p. 34). In many cases the oversight of the P. was provided for by a neighbouring monastery. There was much room for the improvement of the parochial system at the time of the Reformation.

From the 12th to 16th cents. various causes tended to destroy the efficiency of Church work in the P. (1) The religious houses tended to interfere with episcopal supervision, especially when they were independent of the bishop's control. (2) Many parochial endowments came into the hands of the Papacy. Several popes bestowed benefices on unworthy and incompetent nominees; the protests of Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln, against these scandals are well known. (3) The work of the preaching orders, excellent as it was, tended to relieve the parochial clergy of their own proper work, and did not conduce to clerical efficiency. (4) The Black Death in the 14th cent. swept away almost half the population: it was impossible to find clergy for all the Ps., and many endowments vanished.¹

¹ "The word parochia seems to be applied by Innocent I (Ep. 25 s) to the smaller area to which it is restricted by modern usage; but the term continued to be used of the unit of episcopal administration in the 12th cent."—Cunningham, Cure of Souls, p. 24.

² Bode, Ecc. Hist. 3 7: 54, 5.

³ Chanc. P. V. Smith (Church Handbook, p. 53) says that the formation of the P. was brought about in two stages. "At first central or baptismal churches were erected in which baptisms were performed and other services conducted for a wide area. Afterwards these areas were subdivided into districts or parishes, coterminous for the most part with the estates of great landowners." The principle of treating the baptismal church as a mother church still survives in some towns where the "old parish church" is largely resorted to for baptisms.

As the desire to secure a better care of souls was one of the causes of the Reformation, so undoubtedly that movement ultimately led to a more effective fulfilment of parochial duty.² There is no better evidence of this than the PB itself. Its provision for frequent Communion and for daily worship, its round of services adapted to all the great turning-points in life, its directions for the instruction of young and old—above all, the ideal suggested by the questions and exhortations in the Ordinal—testify to a high standard of pastoral efficiency.

As time went on a different sort of reform was needed in parochial administration. The growth of population in some centres demanded a division of Ps. The industrial revolution of the early 19th cent. called for a complete readjustment. This was to some extent met by the ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION, formed in A.D. 1836, the object of which is "to devise the best mode of providing for the cure of souls, with special reference to the residence of the clergy in their respective benefices." Various Church Building and New Parishes Acts have been passed, enabling new Ps. to be formed under schemes prepared by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and confirmed by Orders in Council.³

What limit should be set to the creation of new Ps. is an important question. There is at least something to be said for the system found, e.g., at Portsea, Great Yarmouth and Helmsley, where a big population on a large area is administered under one head.

One priest has charge, under the bishop, of the souls in each P. He is the Incumbent, or, in PB language, "the CURATE."

²
The Clergy. Where the population is large there may be one or more assistant curates who are under the direction of the incumbent, but are responsible to the bishop whose LICENCE they hold and without whose permission they cannot be dismissed. The incumbent is recognised by the law of the land as responsible within a given area for the cure of souls; "he is also a civil official, charged with the duty of performing and registering some of the most important transactions in the community, especially marriages." He is instituted by the bishop to the spiritual charge of the P.; he is inducted by the archdeacon to the temporalities of his benefice.

When provision was first made for the spiritual care of a township or P., the principal landowner often endowed the benefice, probably by devoting part of the tithes to this purpose. On the strength of this benefaction he frequently became patron of the living. If the P. priest were appointed directly and received the tithes, he was called rector or parson ("persona ecclesiae," "the representative of the Church"). Often, however, the lord of the manor would endow some neighbouring monastery, on the understanding that it should provide for the spiritual needs of the P. The monastery would then be the "rector." In the 13th cent. the monasteries were obliged to appoint a priest to take charge of each P. of which they were rectors. In some cases this priest received a certain portion of the tithes for his maintenance, and became irremovable except by the bishop: he was called a "vicar." In other cases the monastery would appoint a temporary priest or "curate." On the dissolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII the rectorial rights attached to them and the patronage of vicarages of which they were rectors were confiscated to the Crown, and bestowed, some on bishops, some on colleges in the universities, and some on Court favourites. Many of the rectorial tithes and much of the patronage to vicarages thus passed into lay hands. But, where a vicarage had not been created, the curate in charge now ceased to be temporary and was as irremovable as a rector or vicar: he was called a "perpetual curate."

(On duties of parochial clergy, see CURATE.)

(i) Lay Officers. The CHURCHWARDENS are appointed annually at the Easter Vestry; often one is elected by the vestry, the

³
Organisation. other nominated by the incumbent.

Their duties are (1) the care and maintenance of the church, (2) the preservation of order in the church. The sidesmen (synodsmen) are appointed at Easter by the minister and parishioners, to assist the wardens. There are other officers and helpers in most Ps.—such as lay-readers, Church Army captains, organists, choristers, bell-ringers, teachers in day and Sunday schools, district visitors, deaconesses, sisters, Bible women, secretaries of clubs, classes and societies, etc., etc.

(ii) The Common Life of the P. The Vestry is the ancient assembly of the parishioners both for ecclesiastical and civil business. In former times it was entrusted with the levying of the poor rate as well as the Church rate, and often with other civil duties as well. It consists of ratepayers of both sexes. Since the abolition of the CHURCH RATE in 1863 and the transfer of civil duties to other bodies, the business of the vestry is confined to the election of wardens and the approval, or otherwise, of applications for a "faculty" for some alteration in the church or its fittings.

(iii) Parochial Church Council. Now that the vestry is robbed of its civil functions, it seems anomalous that it should consist of all ratepayers, who may include Roman Catholics, Protestant Nonconformists, Jews and Atheists. A partial remedy is to be found in the creation of a representative PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL, consisting of bona fide members of the Church of England, who can voice public opinion, assist the clergy in the promotion of Church work, and manage the P. finances. At present such a council can have no statutory rights.

(iv) Various Organisations. Mention may be made of a few P. organisations. (1) For men and

¹ See Cunningham, Cure of Souls, pp. 56-61.

² The Church of Rome itself made important reforms in its parochial cure of souls (Council of Trent, Sess. vi, cc. 1 and 2; Sess. xxiii, c. 1). On the other hand, those reformed churches on the Continent which broke altogether with Catholic tradition did not maintain the same pastoral ideal (see Cunningham, op. cit., p. 71).

³ For the various kinds of ecclesiastical districts or Ps., see P. V. Smith, op. cit., p. 56.

leads: Church of England Men's Society, Church Lads' Brigade, Bible classes, clubs. (2) For women and girls: Mothers' Union, Girls' Friendly Society, mothers' meetings, Bible classes, clubs. (3) For children: Day School, Sunday School, Catechism, Band of Hope. (4) Missionary Association—perhaps connected with a Missionary Society, perhaps independent: King's Messengers or Sowers' Band for children. (5) Branch of Christian Social Union. (6) Church of England Temperance Society, or White Cross Society. (7) Organisation for Encouragement of Thrift, e.g., Friendly Society Lodge. (8) Committees for organising relief or help in sickness (better if extra-parochial).

The great advantage of the parochial system is that all who will conform to the Church's simple rules may claim the ministrations of their P. clergy. The P. priest is responsible, not for a small coterie who happen to form the "congregation," but for all the souls in his P. No doubt in large centres of population there will be a considerable interchange of parishioners; people cannot be hindered from attending churches which they prefer. But no one is left uncared for, if the parochial system is faithfully worked. Ideally, each P. should be a microcosm of the diocese as the diocese is of the Church.

On the other hand, there is the danger of a somewhat narrow "parochial" outlook, and the P. is apt to lack evangelistic enthusiasm. For Home Mission work it is probable that some supplementary organisation is required.

On the history of the P.: Gneist, History of the British Constitution; Stubbs, Constitutional History; Ayliffe, Parergon; J. Toulmin Smith, & Literature. The Parish. On general questions, patronage, P. officers, etc.: P. V. Smith, Church Handbook; ib., Law of Churchwardens; ib., Legal Position of Clergy; Cutts, Handy-book of the Church of England; Selden, Tithes; Selborne, Some Facts and Fictions, etc. On the whole subject: Cunningham's Cure of Souls is useful.—A7. J. A. KEMPTHORNE.

PARISH, ANCIENT.—The term is ordinarily applied to any P. in existence before the passing of the first of the Ch. Building Acts (58 Geo. III, c. 45) in 1818. There is considerable doubt as to when the parochial division of the country was finally accomplished, but in its main features it appears to have been settled before the Norman Conquest (see PARISH, § 1). The Act 58 Geo. III, c. 45, was thus the first step towards the readjustment of a parochial system which had been in existence for about 800 years.

From Reformation times until the passing of the Ch. Building Acts the division of Ps. or creation of new Ps. was accomplished by means of special Acts of Parliament relating to the particular churches and Ps. affected.—A7. R. W. FOWELL.

PARISH, NEW.—This name is given:—(1) to an eccles. P. constituted under the New Parishes Acts, 1843 and 1856 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 37, and 19 & 20 Vict., c. 104), and having a P. ch. approved by the Eccles. Commissioners under the provisions of those Acts; and (2) to an eccles. District constituted under other statutes, but becoming a District and separate P. under the Act 19 & 20 Vict., c. 104, s. 14.

A "new parish" is wholly independent ecclesiastically of the P. or Ps. out of which it has been formed: the incumbent is a Perpetual Curate with exclusive cure of souls within its boundaries.—A7. R. W. FOWELL.

PARISHIONER.—(For the purpose of this art. the word parish is taken as = eccles. parish.) The word P.¹ includes the resident inhabitants (being householders rated to the relief of the poor) within the parish and also "persons who are occupiers of land, that pay the several rates and tithes" (3 Atk. 577). By common law the Ps. ought to bear the cost² of repairing the ch. (except the chancel, where that is repairable by the parson), and of providing a communion table and tables of the decalogue (canon 82), bread and wine for the communion (canon 20), also a chalice, bells and a bier, a font (canon 81), a pulpit (canon 83), an almschest (canon 84), a prayer-book, Bible, etc. (canon 80), and a table of prohibited degrees (canon 99). The registers of baptisms should also be provided and preserved at the expense of the parishioners.

Where no statute has intervened, a P. has a right to a seat in ch. without payment, and (1 Edw. VI, c. 1, § 8) to be admitted to HC in the absence of a "lawful cause."³ Ps. are of right entitled to burial in the churchyard of their parish, unless they are within certain eccles. prohibitions (suicides, and the like); but not to burial in any specific part of the churchyard.

By canons 89, 90, Ps. must concur with the minister in the choice of CHURCHWARDENS and SIDESMEN; the usual practice being that the minister at the Easter vestry nominates one warden and the Ps. elect the other. If the minister and Ps. fail to agree in the choice of sidesmen, these must be appointed by the Ordinary of the diocese.

In a few cases advowsons are vested in the Ps., who are each entitled to one vote in the election. It appears that such elections may be by ballot (L.R., 3 Ch. D. 233). Owing to unseemly circumstances attending many such elections, provision was made by Stat. 19-20 Vict., c. 50, for the sale of such advowsons and application of the purchase money to repairs of the churches or augmentation of the livings (where necessary) and the erection, etc., of parsonages, schools or chapels of ease.

Disciplinary procedure under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, may be commenced by (among other means) a statutory declaration that an offence has been committed, made by three parishioners. For the purposes of this Act (§ 6), "P." means:

"a male person of full age who . . . has transmitted to the bishop under his hand the declaration, 'I am a member of the Church of England as by law established,' and . . . for one year next before taking any proceeding . . . has had his usual place of abode in the parish within which the ch. or burial-ground is situated . . . to which the representation relates."—A3.

¹ It is sometimes used in a wider sense as including all residents in a parish of full age:—e.g., "note that every P. shall communicate" (8th Rubr. aft. HC).

² Since the Compulsory Church Rate Abolition Act, 1868, they are legally exempt from pecuniary liability in these respects. The authors of that Act contemplated that parochial vestries would "make, assess and receive" voluntary church rates as there organised: but few instances of that scheme succeeding as a regular source of income are known. In practice, these and other expenses are usually defrayed from the voluntary contributions of members of the congregation.

³ The latter right is one which supports an action on the case at common law (Rex v. Dibdin, L.R., 1910, at p. 107).

R. J. WHITWELL.

PARLIAMENT, AUTHORITY OF.—A Ch. or a State may from motives of high expediency exempt vast areas of human life from the range of its legislation.

1. Interrelation of Ch. and State.

But, inasmuch as every act has both a religious and a secular aspect and affects not only the doer but also his fellow-men, there is no action which is not a possible subject both of eccles. and civil legislation. Life is continuous, and the activities of the Ch., of the State, and of the individuals who compose them, indivisible. The liberty of the Ch. is necessary for the State, because liberty is the opportunity for self-realisation in service. On the other hand, the Ch. works under secular conditions and good order is necessary to her welfare.

It follows from what has been said that, when Ch. and State are at variance, the quarrel can seldom be adjusted by a simple reference to the principle that the one should confine itself to spiritual, the other to secular, activities. The problems of life cannot be solved so simply. Its disorders and disorganisations are at bottom spiritual, and require for their healing penitence, patience and charity rather than the naked assertion of abstract principles.

We will illustrate. It is in our view probable that Parliament might with great advantage distinguish between the religious and secular parts of a child's education, and invite the assistance of religious communities in the one department in schools where it refused it in the other. Such an Act might, we think, prove to be of the highest value. Yet it would certainly not rest on a sound principle nor on one of universal application, for a child's education is a unity. The secular work has a religious bearing and the religious work a secular. The suggestion that "getting on" is the be-all and end-all of education is the inculcation of paganism, and a State organised primarily for military purposes would not permit in the period assigned to the religious bodies instruction in the ethics of the Society of Friends. Again a Ch. might reasonably endeavour to improve the conditions of labour by insisting upon some system of exclusive dealing; but, in doing so, might come into conflict with a most reasonable statute against combination and conspiracy. Caste, even if maintained on secular grounds, is not consistent with the due administration of the Sacraments. The spiritual organisation of the early Ch. was not consistent with the purely secular maxim Divide et impera.

Our problem was discussed with great thoroughness and acuteness during the mediæval periods, but always on the assumption that the Ch. and State were conterminous societies or the same society. That assumption is no longer valid, but it is not more invalid than the conception of the State and a plurality of Churches moving in independent orbits. The strong body of opinion which supports "undenominational" religious teaching (whether accompanied or not by special teaching) witnesses to the permanent attractiveness of the mediæval system, as does the readiness of public opinion to accept the office of the Ch. of Eng., for example at a Coronation, for the expression or consecration of a national emotion. Thought advances in a spiral and circles round to restatements of old positions. The reaction from mediæval political thought is weakening, and this tendency is likely to become more marked. Of the mediæval writers who discussed the relations of Ch. and State, Marsilius of Padua, who wrote his Defensor Pacis in 1325 (cp. Robertson, Regnum Dei), was for our purpose the most important and probably on any view the most prescient. According to him the sovereign people, acting normally through the Prince as their chosen representative, not only may but must take part in General Councils, as "the university and general congregation of faithful believers," and their consent is necessary to excommunications. The characteristic doctrine of the Defensor may be stated in the phrase of Wycliffe, who learnt it from him, stare in laicis ecclesiam. He was not an isolated thinker, and his ideas were influential at the councils of Pisa, Constance and Basle.

Two centuries after they were formulated they fell upon congenial soil and germinated.

2. The Tudor Settlement.

The Defensor was translated at the expense of Thomas Cromwell (Letters For. Dom., Henry VIII, 11 1355, 9 523), and inspired his policy, as also Hooker's defence of the Reformation settlement. "The spiritual power of the Church . . . from Him which is the Head hath descended unto us that are the body invested therewith It were absurd to imagine the Church, the most glorious among (societies), abridged of this liberty" (EP vi. 2 2). Elizabeth and her Parliament, like the Prince of Marsilius, spoke for "the university of the faithful." A Tudor Parliament was the organ of a Church-State summoned in God's name to discuss the things of God and observing the forms which befit a religious assembly. The House of Commons said the Litany, the Speaker leading, before it ratified the 39 Arts. The intervention of Parliament was subject to the condition which justified the Royal Supremacy, which "existed on the understanding that the Church and her law were accepted and their protection was the highest care of the civil government" (Dean Church, Relation of Ch. and State, p. 50; cp. p. 17). It was further laid down by Elizabeth that matters touching religion should be "first liked by the clergy," that is, prepared and approved by Convocations.

Under favourable conditions this settlement might have achieved as permanent a success as is possible in an imperfect world, for it appealed to some sound principles; but it had two grave defects. (1) Its failure to give adequate expression to the principle of lay responsibility was not inherent in it as a system of thought, but arose from the fact that the Reformation was in England an intellectual and political rather than a spiritual movement.

4. Its Defects.

The doctrine of the priesthood of the laity was valued rather as a weapon to be wielded against the papacy than for its own sake. Certainly neither Jewel nor anyone else ever entertained the intention attributed to the bp. by Harding of "inviting tinkers to a general council." The current was in the opposite direction. The parish churches of England ceased to be what they had been in the past, the homes of democratic life, and the guilds and fraternities were ruthlessly broken up. It was to the evangelical revival and the spiritual awakening which accompanied it that we owe the modern movement for the restoration of the primitive status of the laity.

How little the true meaning of the new status of Parliament was understood is shown by a speech of Lord Keeper Smith (A.D. 1675), which is characteristic of the attitude adopted by the Parliaments of his century: "When we consider religion in Parliament we are supposed to consider it as a Parliament should do and as Parliaments in all ages have done, that is, as a part of our laws, a part and a necessary part of our government; for as it works upon the conscience, the State has nothing to do with it; it is a thing belonging to another kind of communion than that by which we sit here" (Parl. and Ch., Burrows, p. 98).

(2) The Marsilian system postulated the religious unity of the State, and this was rendered impossible by the centralising policy of the sixteenth century which largely for reasons of State interpreted unity as uniformity. It is idle to single out Laud for special blame. The world is not governed by philosophers, and the disruption of the religious life of England would only have been avoided if her statesmen had possessed the insight and detachments of Bacon, and her bps. the spirituality and mental breadth of Hooker. The toleration of dissident religious communities became inevitable.

The Parliament which petitioned Charles II against toleration rightly described it as "the establishment of schism." After the Act was passed, Lord Mansfield said, in an important judgment, "By this Act the Dissenters' way of worship was not only rendered innocent and lawful, but was established; it was put under the protection of the law" (Life, p. 255). Moreover, Nonconformists ceased to be members of the Ch. of England (Selborne on Baker v. Lee, Defence, p. 196). Not only was the nation divided; in 1707 the Scotch Presbyterians sat in Parliament. The greatest revolution in the relations of the Ch. with the State since it was first recognised by Constantine had shattered the Reformation settlement.

But the nation did not understand what it had done. One disaster followed another. The Toleration Act in principle secularised Parliament and disfranchised lay churchmen in eccles. matters. Walpole silenced the Convocations of the clergy. The nation wished no evil to the Ch. and mistook the maintenance of the wrongs of Nonconformists for the maintenance of the Ch. rights which it had destroyed. Her golden fetters were mistaken for the insignia of privilege. During the century of stagnation which followed what little legislation was carried through was by statute with the assistance of the bps., who acted in their capacity as Lords of Parliament. Special Acts were required, e.g., for the building of the steeple at Yarmouth and the constitution of the new parish of St. Anne's, Manchester. A new order dawned when by the creation of the Ecclesiastical Commission Parliament in effect gave a grant of limited autonomy to the Church.

In estimating the existing situation we may assume the following positions. (1) There is no constitutional objection to the gradual assimilation of the status of the Ch. to that of the Nonconformist bodies. These are established by law and their members are not members of the Ch. of Eng. The Ch. is only "national" in the sense of Art. 34 or, by a loose use of the word, because in common law she ministers to every parishioner who fulfils the required eccles. conditions and represents the average ways and instincts of Englishmen (cp. the important Cambridge Memorial, Hort's Life 2 263).

(2) Convocations retain all the powers assigned to them by constitutional usage (cp. the implied recognition of Elizabeth's dictum in the allusion to Convocations in the preamble of the Act of Uniform. Amend. Act), and by the custom of this realm. But most of the ground is covered by statute, and while this is the case effective legislation by canon becomes of course impossible (cp. Phillimore in Essays in Aid of Ch. Ref., p. 154).

(3) Convocations are now assisted by Houses of Laymen. An appeal to Parliament is an appeal not to, but from, the lay priesthood.

(4) Under the changed conditions of legislation it is practically impossible to pass an eccles. bill without government support. This was shown by the history of the Benefices Act which was not passed until after twenty-five failures, of the bills to create new dioceses, and the attempt of Mr. Lloyd George with a few Liberationists to wreck the Clergy Discipline Bill of 1892 (cp. Benson's Life, Hansard 4, III, 1601). Parliament has many procedures and could easily secure strictly Ch. legislation against obstruction. Its attempts to deal with Ch. matters apart from the concurrent consent of Convocations have been wholly ineffective for any purpose except the stirring up of strife (evidence of Abp. of Cant., Commission on Eccl. Discipline 23,465 f., 23,500).

(5) The precedents of the Acts by which the Ch. of Scot., the Free Ch. of Scot. and the Free Methodists hold their property show how large is the liberty which the State may safely permit to strong religious communities. Mr. Arthur Elliot, writing from a somewhat Erastian standpoint, admits this in respect to the assemblies and courts of the Ch. and holds that the Royal Supremacy as it exists by statute is unnecessary (The State and the Church 2, pp. xvii, xix).

On the other hand, (1) provided that the will

6. Existing Situation.

5. Establishment of Schism.

of the Ch. actually prevails, an ancient and anomalous system which works well should be modified with care and by degrees. (2) Apart from its general duty of supervision, P. must watch over Ch. property as a fund on trust, the more so as it is a trust for spiritual purposes in behalf of every Englishman who desires to avail himself of it, and observes the requisite eccles. conditions. (3) P. must give reasonable protection to vested interests, e.g., faculty pews, advowsons; and (4) P. must act for the laity of the Ch. until it can resign its ancient function to a body possessing greater competency.

We have endeavoured to place before our readers some of the chief considerations which seem relevant to our subject. We

7. Conclusion. may sum up by saying that short and simple methods of treating the relation of P. to religion may sometimes be necessary, but are never true to the complexity of life.

A sound policy must express the balance and interaction of antithetical truths and opposed principles. The Ch. must not surrender herself to the one-sided enthusiasm of a conspicuous group on this side or on that. The situation will be variously estimated, but its main requirements would seem to be met if P. modified its procedure with respect to bills relating to the Ch. of England which had received the approval of Convocation in such a way as to secure for them its decision, and that no Bill touching religion should become law without the consent of the religious body or bodies concerned, except for the gravest and most urgent reasons of State. The need for some such reform of procedure is imperative. Eccles. legislation is gravely in arrears, and there are no more fruitful sources of disorganisation, of contention and of scandal in any society, than obsolete or obsolescent laws, weak government, and the habit of postponing difficulties. It may be added that the powers of the Eccles. Commissioners might in several directions be increased with much advantage.

In addition to the works referred to above we may mention Makower's Constitutional Hist. of Ch. of Eng.; the lives of Tait and Benson; Abbey and

8. Literature. Overton, vol. 2, c. 1; Frere, The Relation of Church and Parliament; Frere's Proctor; Dunning, Political Theories; Poole, Wycliffe and Movements for Reform; Gierke, Medieval Ideals, translated by Maitland; Galton's Church and State in France; Brewer's The Church of England, Church and Faith; R. Commission on Eccles. Disc., Evidence 23,465 f., 22,794 f.; Report of Bp. of Salisbury's committee on The Position of the Laity (S.P.C.K.); the writer's pamphlet, Church and Parliament (Longmans), and his article on Marsilius in G., March 8, 1905.—A2. H. J. BARDSLEY.

PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCILS may be either voluntary or legal. Most of the sister Chs. have a compulsory provision in their constitution for the establishment of a local body of lay persons, to be associated for financial, administrative, and general purposes with the incumbent in any district recognised as a parish. In England such PCCs. are common on a voluntary basis, the clergy, wardens and sidesmen being usually ex-officio members, others being annually appointed or admitted as delegates of Ch. associations in the parish. The advantage of such an advisory body has been proved by long and wide experience, and has been endorsed by Conv.; but the risks of ignorant meddling, unspirituality, party spirit, and oppression of minorities are held by some to outweigh the gains. The question is, whether things will on the whole be worse without a Council as a safety-valve and medium of inter-communication. There is less agreement as to the proposal for establishing such Councils by law, and it has been pointed out that in any case their functions should be restricted to local details, leaving wider and more fundamental discussions to Diocesan and central bodies. At the same time their indirect value in eliciting and developing the interest and sense of responsibility of the laity must not be forgotten.—A2. G. HARFORD.

PARSON. (O. Fr. persona, Lat. persona.)—"The most legal, most beneficial, most honourable title . . . a parish priest can enjoy," "One that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church," Persona ecclesiæ, "so named because by his person the Church, which is an invisible body, is represented."—Blackstone. He is the priest of a parish, having the cure of souls, and must have been ordained and also presented, instituted, and inducted into the benefice. (In mediæval times the term was used of beneficiaries who paid only a fraction of their incomes to priests who performed their duties.) It was unknown in England before the Conquest. Chaucer uses it in its technical sense. In later times, e.g., in Fielding's novels and since, it has been applied to any clergyman, sometimes in a tone of contempt.—A2. J. E. SWALLOW.

PARSONAGE was originally the Benefice of a PARSON, comprising "the Parish Church with all its rights, glebes, tithes and other profits whatsoever." So Wyclif spoke of "the housis of the personage." In this sense the word is now obsolete except in legal documents, as, e.g., in a Wigan Terrier of 1814, which speaks of "the parsonage of Wigan," and "the Incumbent Rector of the said parsonage," i.e., Benefice.

P. was also used of the house in which the parson lived. It is occasionally so used now, but has in recent years more generally signified the house of a perpetual, or even of a stipendiary, curate. If a house is neither a rectory nor a vicarage, it is now termed a P. It is a pity that this fine old word should have so fallen from its high estate. Its degenerate use, like that of Parson, should be avoided so far as possible.

The earliest English name for the houses of the clergy is "Manse" (before A.D. 740), place of abode. In 1654 a "Mansion-house" (from the same root, manere) was built for the minister of Hindley Chapel. It must have been small, for the site measured only 16 yds. by 12 yds.

Pre-Reformation Ps., resembling small manor houses of the same date, remain at West Dean, Alfriston, Great Snoring and elsewhere. The plan included Hall with Parlour at one end (Chamber over), and Kitchen and Offices at the other. Outbuildings and other rooms were added. Ps. would differ in size in different parishes. Thus Leland (A.D. 1533) found that the "Winwike personage hath a parke," in which in 1548 there were deer. On the other hand, Herrick, in his charming Thanksgiving (before 1647), describes his "little house" (probably an old one) at Dean Prior, with its Chamber, Porch, Parlour, Hall, Kitchen (all small), and "little buttery." The size of Ps. tended to increase after the Reformation. Thus in 1618 Rector Bridgeman added "the parlour and garden chambers, gallery, stairs and private chapel" to his P. at Wigan. In 1711, "the old parsonage being extremely ruinous" (in 1666 there were six hearths in it, as against eight each at the houses of two principal laymen), Rector Hindley of Aughton replaced it with a new one, containing "17 usefull Rooms for Reception, Lodging offices, and Garrets with one good stair case," etc. These are but examples of what was going on all over England.

Many benefices with reduced incomes are now burdened with over-large houses. In building new houses it is wiser to err on the small side. Indeed, where the Eccles. Commissioners have any control, they limit the expenditure. If space be left for the purpose on the site, a temporary annexe can be cheaply erected by an incumbent who has a large household and adequate means. But, before doing this, advice should be had from someone well acquainted with the law of DILAPIDATIONS. In parishes where plenty of suitable houses exist it may be even better to assign an annual sum to cover the rent of a suitable house. It is most desirable that the house should be within the parish, and near to the ch. But to make this an absolute sine qua non narrows the range of choice in the case of some parishes, where a man could hardly bring up a family. All clerical houses have to be kept in repair by the Incumbents, as was the case even in the 14th cent., and the Law is to be found in "The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act" of 1871. There is a good chapter on ancient Ps. in Cutts, Parish Priests (S.P.C.K.)—A6.

W. A. WICKHAM.

PASSING BELL.—See BURIAL SERVICE, § 3.

PASSION SUNDAY.—See LENT, § 4.

PASSIONTIDE.—See LENT, § 4; HOLY WEEK.

PASTOR.—Our Lord proclaims Himself, John 10 11, the Good Shepherd (Bonus Pastor). To Him the term is applied, 1 Pet. 2 25, 5 4, Heb. 13 20, Rev. 12 5. He uses the verb (= "be a shepherd") in the second commission to St. Peter, John 21 16; as do St. Paul, Acts 20 28, and St. Peter, 1 Pet. 5 2. "Pastors" are Ch. officers, Eph. 4 11. The P. (i.e., bishop or priest) with his flock is an image used by St. Greg. Naz., Or. 1; by St. Greg. Magn., De Cura Pastoralis; and in the English Ord. (charge to Priests). "Pastors" occurred in the Litany, 1552 (altered to "Priests," 1662); and now in the Cat., Ember Prs., and Colls. for St. Matthias and St. Peter.—A3, 12.

J. E. SWALLOW.

PASTORAL STAFF.—A very ancient episcopal ornament, perhaps originally the bishop's walking stick (cp. St. Fillan's Staff at Edinburgh), and short. Greek bishops use a staff of the Tau shape. English PSs. became beautiful and costly, though that on the tomb of Bishop Stapeldon (Exeter, 1326) is a simple Crook, such as shepherds use now. Fine specimens are: one at Wells (12th cent.), Bp. Wykeham's (1370) at New Coll., and Bp.

Foxe's at C.C.C., Oxford. The PB of 1549 ordered its use, and no contrary order has since been made. Hence it is still a lawful episcopal ornament. In 1549 it was to be used by the Bp. at HC ("his pastorall staffe in his hande, or elles borne or holden by his chapeleyne"); also by the presenting Bps. at Consecrations; and was delivered to the newly-consecrated Bp. with the words, "Be to the flock of Christ a shepherd." The delivery was omitted in 1552, and the PS. went out of general use, though Bishop Wren's (1631-1638) is shown at Pembroke College, Cambridge. It was still used as an undertaker's ornament at funerals, and also on effigies. Bp. Hamilton of Salisbury revived the ceremonial use (1863), Bp. Wilberforce about the same time, and Bp. Harold Browne before 1870. Most bishops now use it, striking the west door with it at their ENTHRONEMENT and at CONSECRATIONS OF CHURCHES, holding it (in the left hand) at Benedictions, and sometimes carrying it in Processions, though it is more often borne by the chaplain. It is difficult to understand why this beautiful emblem was ever objected to. It has three parts, crook, rod, and point—"Curva trahit, quos virga regit, pars ultima pungit."—R3. W. A. WICKHAM.

PATEN. (Latin patena).—A metal plate on which, in the Anglican rites, the bread is consecrated in the HC service. The word occurs in the first rubric inset in the Pr. of Consecration. Anciently, and in the Latin rite still, the consecration was made upon the CORPORAS, and the host transferred subsequently to the P. This custom was allowed by the First PB, but the present rubric clearly directs consecration upon the Paten.

The material of the P. followed that of the chalice, and has been since the early Middle Ages restricted to the precious metals. One of the oldest Ps. remaining in a parish church in England (Bredhurst, c. 1260) is of copper gilt.

Pre-Reformation Ps. are circular, having within a moulded rim a circular depression, and within this again a multifoil depression. In the centre is a device, as the Agnus Dei; the Manus Dei, or the Hand of God in the act of blessing; the Vernicle, or Face of Christ; or the Sacred Monogram. The P. was made to fit the bowl of the chalice.

The Post-Reformation (Elizabethan) P. was made to fit the bowl of the chalice as a cover when the P. was inverted, and it had a small foot, which served also as a handle. These Ps. had usually a small turned-up rim, and no depression. Ps. of the later 17th and 18th cents. are flat, with a turned-up rim, and are often engraved with the donor's name or arms. There is no English precedent for the plain, almost flat, disc used to-day in the Roman Catholic rite. (See also PLATE.)—R3. E. HERMITAGE DAY.

PATRIARCH.—I. The title given in 4 Macc. and NT to the progenitors of the Jewish nation. II. A title of precedence conferred from the 5th cent. on the bishops of the greater sees. In the 4th cent. it had been used loosely by Greg. Nyssen and other orators of all bishops.

The 6th canon of Nicaea recognised superior rights in the Churches of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, and more obscurely in certain other Churches. It is plain that the bishops of these Churches were not ordinary metropolitans (ARCHBISHOP), but exercised rights over several metropolitans. The 2nd canon of Constantinople (381) defined this further by ruling that each "diocese," or larger division of the Empire, should be distinct. Sixty years later, the historian Socrates (58) wrote of this as the creation of patriarchates.

In the Council of Chalcedon the title was frequently conceded to Leo of Rome. The testimony of Socrates makes it clear that it was at the same date commonly given to the chief metropolitan of each imperial diocese, as Ephesus and Cæsarea. Later usage confined it to the five sees of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Jerusalem; elsewhere the title EXARCH was used. The privileges of a patriarch, as generally recognised, are mentioned in a letter of Innocent I (402-17) to Alexander of Antioch: he ordained metropolitans within his district, and his consent was required for the consecration of other bishops. In 1587 a patriarchate was established at Moscow, but in the time of Peter the Great the title was dropped, and the patriarchal functions were transferred to the Holy Governing Synod. The title has been conferred, without any added authority, on the Archbishops of Lisbon and Venice.

(Suicer, Thes., s.v.; Bingham, Antiquities; E. Hatch in DCA.)—73. T. A. LACEY.

PATRON.—The title of P. has arisen from some unexplained confusion respecting the old Roman law terms patronus and advocatus; and thus, although the person appointing is called a P., the right of appointment is called the right of advowson, jus advocacionis (Burns, Eccles. Law). The erection of oratories and chs. gave a primary title to the patronage of laymen. Patronage in Eng. is now largely in lay hands. At the present time, under the Ch. Building Acts and the New Parishes Acts, patronage may be assigned to, or vested in, the contributors to the building and endowment of a ch. or their nominees, through the agency of the Eccles. Commissioners, without, it may be, either the consent or concurrence of the incumbent and P. of the mother parish. The usual method of settling the patronage of a new ch. is by agreement under the Ch. Building Acts, 1845 (s. 23) and 1848 (s. 4), entered into by the Bp., P., and incumbent of the parish prior to the consecration of the intended ch. Such agreements are very numerous, and almost invariably provide that the right of patronage shall not (except when by the instrument vested in an eccles. corporation and, therefore, inalienable) be sold or transferred for money. This is done to render the new benefice eligible for augmentation by the Eccles. Commissioners under their rules and regulations. The right created by such an agreement is not to be regarded as an advowson in the historical meaning of that term, but rather as a new kind of trust-property or office created by statute and not clothed with any legal estate.

The patron must bef. presentation satisfy the Bp.'s officers that he has a primâ facie title to present. After presentation the Bp. has (canon 95) 28 days within which to intimate his intention to admit, though he may prosecute his inquiries beyond this time. (See further, NOMINATION, INSTITUTION, COLLATION.) Formerly an eccles. P. could not, after a refusal, present a second clerk, but this is altered by the Benefices Act, 1898, which also contains provisions for calculating the period of LAPSE. The same Act abolished DONATIVES with cure of souls, and rendered it illegal for a P. to sell the next presentation; he can now transfer on sale only his whole interest in the patronage. Eccles. patrons (unless owners individually and not ex officio) can only alienate their rights through the agency of the Eccles. Commissioners. The right of patronage passes from the P. to the Crown, when a benefice has been vacated by the promotion of its incumbent to a bishopric.—74. T. H. ARDEN.

PATRON SAINT.—The saint under whose name a church is dedicated to the service of God. The prefix "patron" refers to the mediæval custom of placing churches under the patronage or protection of saints. The origin of this custom is closely connected with the observance of certain dates as Saints' days. It is certain that not a few of the commemorations of the Calendar are due to the widely spread practice of translating or solemnly removing the remains or relics of saints from their first place of burial to churches built, in their memory, to receive and preserve them. The translation of relics was connected with the dedication of churches in which the relics were deposited—usually under the altar, or in a cavity in the mensa of the altar; and the anniversary was observed afterwards, year by year, in commemoration of the saint in whose name the church was thus dedicated, and whose relics it enshrined. (See DEDICATION FESTIVAL.)—C.

V. STALEY.

PAUL, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 28, 34; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 6.

PAX.—See KISS OF PEACE.

PEACE AND CONCORD.—The reduplication of thought in this phrase, as e.g., in Coll. for P. at MP, is probably due to a fondness for such phrases characteristic of the PB. The Gen. Coll. ran "author and lover of peace." The phrase with "unity" added occurs in the Lit. also where the words, together with the mention of "all nations," emphasise the comprehensiveness of the intercession. This had special significance in 1544. The Sar. Lit. has "vouchsafe to give peace and true concord to all Kings and Princes." Possibly C. may be regarded as a stronger and more personal word than P., this latter meaning absence of hostility, C. implying absence of hatred. This is perhaps borne out by two PB phrases: (i) "the preservation of peace and unity in the Church" (Pref.); (ii) "godly union and concord" (Pr. for Unity in Accession Service). From these phrases we may gather that C. implies a more fundamental brotherliness than Peace. On the other hand, the words in the last-named Pr.—"One holy bond of truth and Peace, of Faith and Charity"—regard P. from the spiritual standpoint of its use in the NT; so also the 2nd Coll. at EP. See Procter and Frere, New Hist. of PB, p. 404.—K3. J. R. DARBYSHIRE.

PECTORAL CROSS.—A small cross of precious metal, in ancient times generally containing a relic, hanging from a chain round the neck, and worn upon the breast by bishops and abbots as a mark of office. The legality of English bishops wearing this ornament in church has been disputed, on the ground that the PC. was not an ornament of the minister in the second year of Edward VI. No trace of the PC. can be found in England at the time referred to by the Ornaments Rubric.—A7.

V. STALEY.

PECULIARS.—A peculiar is a place exempt from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary to which from its geographical situation it would normally be subject. P. are of several sorts, e.g., (a) the peculiar of an abp., bp., dean or other spiritual person, which is exempt from the jurisdiction of the diocese to which it would naturally belong; (b) the royal peculiar, exempt from any jurisdiction other than that of the Sovereign. The independence of P. has been largely abolished by statute during the last century.—A7.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

PEEL ACTS.—(6 and 7 Vict., cap. 37, and 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 94.)

These Acts "to afford increased facilities for the subdivision of populous districts and for the formation thereof of separate and distinct parishes for all eccles. purposes" mark the second stage in the advance towards the great object of putting the Ch. into a state of full efficiency. Though operating concurrently with the Ch. Building Acts, the same object is sought to be obtained upon totally different principles. The principle of the Ch. Building Acts appears to have been that of providing first of all a place of worship for that portion of the inhabitants of the Parish for whose spiritual wants provision was about to be made. Until the Ch. was built the Minister had no status, and the semi-parochial character of the district when assigned and the subordinate position in which the Incumbents were placed with respect to the Incumbent of the original parish seriously affected their ministrations. When an Incumbent was precluded from discharging some duties which form a most important part of his clerical functions (or if permitted to discharge them had no right to the fees due for such performance), those under his spiritual charge could not but regard him as occupying a subordinate position and look with less respect upon his ministry, and his spiritual usefulness and moral influence would become proportionately impaired. If subdivision of a parish be desirable, it would appear that the subdivision should be complete in its effects and consequences. Under the Peel Acts the first step is the constitution of a new (populous) district greatly needing pastoral care and superintendence, the assigning to the Minister at the outset the charge of the district, and bidding him forthwith commence his ministrations, performing divine service in a schoolroom or any other convenient building. The people are thus made to feel at once the value and importance of religion, and the ch. grows out of this state of things as the result of his Ministry. When a ch. has been provided and consecrated, the district becomes a new Parish, and the Minister is entrusted with the complete cure of souls. He is authorised to perform all the offices of the ch., and his influence is thus brought to bear upon the great mass of his parishioners in every relation of life. He receives the fees for the performance of these offices and is entirely independent of all eccles. interference or control save that only of the Bp. and Archdeacon. Each of the Parishes thus formed has at once a complete parochial status. Experience has proved that those churches have filled best and have been most successful which have been built where there has been ready to turn into them a congregation already formed and accustomed to the services of the Ch. of England.—A7.

T. H. ARDEN.

PENALTIES.—Certain money P. or forfeitures are incurred under the Pluralities Act, 1838. Other P. are dealt with elsewhere.—A5.

PENANCE.—In the primitive Ch. those who were guilty of heinous offences, such as idolatry, murder, or adultery, were excommunicated until they felt moved to do P. by making a public confession of their sins bef. the congregation as evidence of their genuine repentance and desire for forgiveness and for the prs. of the Church. By the 4th cent. a regular disciplinary system had been organised, and special classes of sins deserving exclusion from Communion were enumerated. The penitents were also divided into four distinct classes:—mourners, hearers, kneelers, and non-communicating worshippers. Special officers (or penitentiaries) were also appointed by the bp. to hear confessions privately, and to judge of the advisability of their rehearsal before the congregation. These also prescribed the definite acts of humiliation to be performed, and the precise length of time the excommunication of the offender should last, in order that his true penitence might be evidenced and the congregation assured of its reality.

Gradually the public Conf. before the congregation was dispensed with altogether, the prs. of the clergy who heard the private confessions being considered sufficient as representing the congregation, and Abp. Theodore of Canterbury is supposed to have originated the custom of allowing the Ps. imposed to be redeemed by the payment of pecuniary fines.

In 1215, secret auricular Conf. of sins, once a year, to a priest was made obligatory on all, and Absol. was changed from a precatory into an indicative or declaratory form; while P. was exalted to the level of a necessary Sac., consisting of the three parts of contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Absol. was at first only given after satisfaction, but later on it was bestowed during Conf. and after contrition, as it was regarded as delivering the penitent from the eternal guilt of sin and pains of hell, while satisfaction was still required to release him from the temporal penalties due to his sin on earth and in PURGATORY. Very soon attrition, mere sorrow arising from the fear of the punishment consequent upon sin, was substituted for genuine contrition, and the P. imposed as satisfaction was frequently commuted by the purchase of an INDULGENCE bestowed out of the Treasury of Merits.

The Council of Trent anathematizes "all who deny P. to be truly and properly a Sacrament ordained by Christ Himself and necessary to salvation." The Ch. of England, on the other hand, denies that P. is "a Sacrament of the Gospel ordained of Christ," as having no "visible sign or ceremony ordained of God" (Art. 25). It states, however, that excommunicated persons are to be openly reconciled by P. (Art. 33), and laments that the "godly discipline in the Primitive Church" whereby notorious sinners "were put to open penance" is in abeyance (Commination Service). [For further information about Confession and Absolution, see REPENTANCE.]—PE. C. SYDNEY CARTER.

PENITENTIAL PSALMS.—The seven Penitential Psalms (Pss. 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143) are the Pss. which in ancient and mediæval times were used in seasons of penitence and trouble; and in the Ch. of Eng. they are appointed to be read on Ash-W., Ps. 51 in the Communion service, and the others as PROPER PSALMS for MEP. The contents and aims of these Pss. may be thus briefly summarised: each, it will be seen, has a distinctive character of its own.

In Ps. 6 the Psalmist has been brought, by long and severe sickness, to the verge of the grave; and he prays God earnestly to heal him. His enemies, interpreting his sufferings (cp. the Book of Job) as a punishment for his sins, taunt him with being abandoned by his God, and declare that his prayers are useless. But (v. 8) with a sudden inspiration of faith he realises that his petitions have been heard, and asserts his conviction that his foes will soon (by his recovery) be put to confusion. There is in this Ps. no confession of sin.

Ps. 32 describes the blessedness of forgiveness and the conditions for receiving it. The Psalmist had sinned grievously, and as long as he refused to acknowledge his sin his mental suffering was intolerable (v. 4: read was for PB is). But confession at once brought pardon (v. 5: read acknowledged, and did I not hide). Thereupon he proceeds to exhort other godly men, circumstanced as he had been, to do likewise (v. 7, AV 6: for shall read let).

Ps. 38 opens with almost the same words as Ps. 6; but the sequel is very different. First the Psalmist describes at length (vv. 2-10) his mental and bodily sufferings, which he attributes expressly (vv. 3, 4) to his sin; then (vv. 11-14) his desertion by his friends, and the malice of his foes; he ends (vv. 15-22) by expressing his trust in God, and praying earnestly for deliverance.

Ps. 51 hardly needs to be characterised. It is the profoundest expression of contrition and longing for forgiveness to be found in the OT. The Psalmist prays first for pardon and cleansing, confessing the greatness of his transgressions (vv. 1-9), and then for renewal and sanctification (vv. 10-12); finally, in the joyous sense of God's favour restored, he promises to express his thankfulness in grateful service, and in that submission of the heart which is more acceptable to God than any material sacrifice. The Ps. is attributed by its title to David, after Nathan had rebuked him for his great sin. But, though it expresses thoughts and feelings of a kind which might well have been in David's mind at the time, yet the form in which they are cast indicates a much later age. The Ps. breathes the spiritual atmosphere of Is. 40-66 (cp. Is. 43 25, 57 15, 59 12, 63 7; and note that the expression "thy—or "his"—"holy spirit" occurs elsewhere in the OT only in Is. 63 10, 11); in its attitude towards sacrifice it presupposes the teaching of the great prophets; and generally the ideas expressed in it imply a longer and more mature spiritual experience than was attained in David's time. It may be assigned with great probability to the early years after the return from Babylon.

Ps. 102 is a national Ps. It must have been written, as vv. 14, 16 show, shortly before Jerusalem was rebuilt after the exile. The poet has himself felt deeply the sorrows of his nation; and he speaks on its behalf (cp. Lam. 3, where the nation, figured as an individual, is similarly the speaker). He describes the suffering, the destitution, and taunts of foes, which, in consequence of God's anger for its sin (v. 10: cp. Is. 42 25, 57 17), had been its lot (vv. 1-11); but finds consolation in the thought that Jehovah's eternal sovereignty is the sure pledge of the rebuilding of Jerusalem and restoration of His people, which will be the prelude to the conversion of the world (vv. 12-22): the national strength is, indeed, far gone, but the mercy of the Unchanging One (Mal. 3 6) will renew it (vv. 23-28). This Ps. contains many reminiscences of earlier Pss. and of Is. 40-66.

Ps. 130 (De profundis) is a cry for help and forgiveness out of deepest trouble. Jehovah, the Psalmist knows, is a God of forgiveness; hence he can hope confidently, and he bids Israel hope, that the pardon and deliverance asked for will be granted. The Ps. has affinities with the book of Nehemiah, and belongs probably to Nehemiah's age. Vv. 7, 8 suggest rather strongly that the troubles and iniquities of vv. 1, 3 are national rather than personal, and that the Psalmist speaks as representing the nation: both national misfortune and national guilt were deeply felt by godly Israelites in Nehemiah's age (cp. Neh. 1 3-17).

In Ps. 143 the Psalmist, who has been bitterly persecuted, appeals to God for help, entreating Him not to deal with him strictly as he deserves (vv. 1-4): the recollection of His great doings in the past encourages him to look to Him now (vv. 5, 6); and he prays further for a speedy hearing, for deliverance and guidance, and for the destruction of his enemies (vv. 7-12). This last pr. strikes a discordant note in a Ps. which is otherwise full of humility, patience, and faith. The Ps. abounds in reminiscences of earlier Pss.—PB, 620. S. R. DRIVER.

PENSION.—Until comparatively recent years nothing was attempted in the way of providing Ps. for aged and infirm

1. Statutory Provision. The Bishops' Resignation Act was passed in 1869, and provided that the retiring abp. or bp. should receive annually the greater of the two sums, either £2,000 or one-third part of the episcopal income. On special grounds, an Order in Council might assign to him for life his episcopal residence. It provided also, in cases of mental incapacity and where no resignation took place, for the appointment of a bishop coadjutor with right of succession. Two years later (1871) followed the Incumbents' Resignation Act. Under it, all necessary consents to the resignation having been obtained, careful inquiry is made by commissioners appointed by the bp., who specify the amount of the P. which in their opinion ought to be allowed, but in no case is it to exceed one-third of the net annual value of the living. The parsonage house goes to the new incumbent. The pensioned clerk remains amenable to eccles. discipline, and his P. may be suspended or forfeited under the same circumstances as would have similarly affected his original income. The Act was amended in 1887 for the purpose of making Ps. vary with tithe averages; and further to enable the new incumbent to recover dilapidations from the P., provided that not more than half of the P. was withheld in any one year. The whole scheme was completed in 1872 by The Deans' and Canons' Resignation Act, of which it may suffice to say that the P. is limited to one-third of the income calculated on an average of the three preceding years.

The value of this legislation was grievously impaired by the fact that the P. was deducted from the income of the benefice.

2. Voluntary Effect.

Confining attention to the Act of 1871, it is plain that the incomes of the clergy are, as a rule, so small that they cannot bear to be reduced by one-third, and, on the other hand, the third taken away does not constitute a P. on which a man can live. But the difficulty or impossibility of working the Act had the good effect of calling attention to the necessity of raising voluntary funds; and about the time of Queen Victoria's first Jubilee (1887) a signally successful effort was made in this direction, largely through the personal exertions of a retired Liverpool merchant, Christopher Bushell, and the munificence of the widow of a Liverpool shipowner, Mrs. Charles Turner, which issued in the formation of Diocesan Funds, some of them of considerable amount, especially in the Northern Province.

But far the most important result of this voluntary action was the founding of the Clergy Pensions Institution in 1886. The Report enshrines the names of fifteen founders, at the head of whom stands Mrs. Turner with £10,000. The institution has also been, and continues to be, splendidly endowed by the Eccles. Insurance Office. Full particulars of its operations can be obtained from the Secretary, Mr. Robert Love, at 11 Norfolk Street, Strand, W.C. The principle of the work is to induce the clergy to secure Ps. for themselves at the age of sixty-five, by a small annual subscription, only £2 2s. od. if it begin at ordination. The P. secured on strict actuarial calculation is not large, only £15 15s. od. a year. But the voluntary subscriptions enable the C.P.I., in conjunction with Diocesan Funds, to raise the P. to (at present) £52. There are between 5,000 and 6,000 beneficiaries, and these increase by 400 a year. The number of Ps. being paid is now 170. The aggregate capital probably exceeds £500,000. It should be added that, if a beneficiary dies before the age of sixty-five, the total of his contributions, with compound interest at 2½ per cent., is returned to his representatives. And he can at any time reclaim his contributions with like interest, but forfeiting the P. It is easy to recognise the importance and value of the C.P.I., but it has the hampering—no doubt necessary, perhaps wholesome—limitation that its benefits are confined to its own members, who do not as yet greatly exceed one quarter of the clergy; and even for them a P. of £50 is by no means an adequate provision.

In many directions, therefore, supplementary schemes were being suggested, when, in 1906, the Eccles. Commissioners, moved by the Abp. of Canterbury, determined to set apart £250,000 to be forthcoming in the next three years for the purposes of a clergy P. fund and appointed a committee to report upon regulations for its administration. The committee were to keep in view two objects: the provision of Ps. for retiring clergy, and the lightening of the burdens imposed by Ps. on the benefices vacated by them. Their Report is dated 24th April, 1907, and it was adopted by the Board on the 30th May ensuing.

3. New Scheme.

The Regulations, summarised, are to the following effect. The Commissioners reserve the right to make or to refuse a grant or to vary its conditions under exceptional circumstances.—Applications may be made either by the retiring incumbent, or by the clergyman to whom the benefice has been offered, but no grant will be made after the institution of the new incumbent.—Grants are for life, but are liable to modification or forfeiture under the same circumstances as Ps. under the Resignation Acts. They do not vary with the corn averages.—The maximum grant is (with exceptions) £50.—The age of retirement must be not less than sixty-five.—Grants are not made where the annual value of the Benefice, after deduction of P. under the Acts, exceeds £300.—If the deduction of the P. has reduced the annual value to below £250, the grant is divided between the retiring priest and his successor. The latter receives 2-5ths, or such less sum as will restore the Benefice to £250, or to its original value, if less than £250.—If the annual value is reduced below £150 by the deduction of the P., the Commissioners may grant a further annuity sufficient to restore it to £150, or to its original value if less than £150.—No grant will be made unless it be met by a provision (other than the Acts P.) for the retired incumbent of at least an equivalent amount, and the source and security of which are satisfactory to the Commissioners. Grants from the C.P.I. or from diocesan or other like funds, or, in certain cases, private income properly secured, would be recognised.

The Regulations have been operative for just three years (Nov. 1907–1910), during which time 321 grants have been voted by the Commissioners.

There is much reason to be gratified with the progress made so far, but as yet Ps. are not of sufficient value to enable and to

4. Conclusions. induce resignation in anything like the number of cases where it would be an advantage both to the retiring incumbent and to the Ch. It is a question whether the problem will be completely solved, until the Ch. is provided with a central system of finance which, instead of relying on capital, shall provide an annual income to meet this and kindred objects. The Abp.'s Ch. Finance Committee, now sitting, may be able to devise what is required.

It is gratifying to notice that in Scotland, Ireland, America, and the colonies, the sister and daughter Churches, and indeed other Christian bodies, invariably recognise Ps. as a primary and essential element of finance. It would not be possible here to give any outline of their schemes, which are usually devised with much care and wisdom. The Statute of the Ch. of Ireland, making provision for the superannuation of clergymen (Ponsonby and Gibbs, University Press, Dublin, 1905), will repay study from its suggestiveness.—A6.

ARTHUR GORE.

PENTECOST.—See FESTIVAL, § 22, 23, 24.

PERPETUAL CURATE.—In the case of an inappropriate rectory where no provision is made for a vicar, the priest appointed to serve the parish and to have the cure of Souls is licensed by the bishop to discharge these functions permanently. He is therefore called PC., as having the cure of Souls permanently, but yet not being either rector or vicar. The Statute has provided that such Curates may be called vicars. That does not, however, give them the status of vicar, they are therefore only titular vicars. It would seem to be better to employ the old designation, PC., as marking distinctly what the status is. (See INCUMBENT).—TA. E. G. WOOD.

PETER, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 8, 34; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 14.

PEW.—When first (Piers Ploughman, c. 1360) used of a Church seat, "pew" generally signified a low bench. Later, it meant a high enclosure. The word came into the PB in 1662—"the Reading Pew" (Commination), i.e., "the Reading Desk or Pew" (Bishop Sanderson, 1652), the "convenient seat" of canon 82 (1604). In 1549 "Mattyns" was to be begun, "the Priest beeyng in the quier"; but in 1552, "in suche place of the Churche, Chapell, or Chauncel, and the minister shal so turne him, as ye people maye best heare." Apparently some priests had reading-desks as early as 1564. There was "a pewe where Mr. Parson saithe the service," for which "ii Matts" were provided at St. Peter Chepe (1568). Bp. Parkhurst (Norwich, 1569, Genevan School) ordered a minister's seat to be provided, in large churches "in the body of the Church," and in smaller churches "outside the chancel door." Sometimes Reading Pews had two desks, one facing east for Prayers, the other facing the congregation for Lessons. In 1623 "a pue or quere" was built in the middle of St. Nicholas', Liverpool, to hold "the minister" and "clarke... in the same queare," "in full audience and viewe of the whole congregacōn." George Herbert (1626) made his Reading-desk as high as his Pulpit, "that Prayer and Preaching... might... have an equal honour." Bp. Wren (Norwich, 1636) ordered that the "Reading Desk" should not stand with its back to the chancel, nor be too remote from it. The Reading Desk became general, but it has now to a great extent disappeared, the chancel stalls being used by clergy of all schools of thought.

1. The Reading Pew or Desk.

Excepting the Bishop's Chair (Ordinal), the PB does not mention seats. In early Christian times we find the worst features of the "Pew system" (Jas. 2 1-3).

2. Pews for Worshippers.

Later, men stood in church. Then crutches were allowed as supports. Then came movable seats, and stone benches round the walls and pillars. Finally, from the 14th cent., fixed wooden seats became general, hundreds still remaining. The nave was frequently almost covered with seats, which were sometimes put also into roodlofts and western galleries. There was appropriation to the use of individuals and classes, rents were paid, and we read of "pewe dore," "lok," "cosshyn, carpet, and curteyn," "borde, elmyrn, to knyel on in the pews." Appropriation early led to trouble. Hence Bp. Quivil (Exeter, 1284) forbade it, except for patrons. Bp. Sanderson (Visitation, 1662) asked "Is there any strife or contention among any of your Parish for their Pews?" Archdn. Hare (c. 1840) spoke of Ps. as "eyesores and heartsore." Appropriation and payment were well known before the Reformation. At St. Lawrence, Reading, seats were appropriated and paid for certainly as early as 1441 (1520, "Itm. of my lord," the Abbot, "for his moder sete iiijd"). So also in 1554 and 1607. Pre-Reformation Ps. were generally low, rarely over 3 ft. high, often not much over 2 ft., of thick oak, with ample kneeling space, facing eastward. Some Post-Reformation seats were like them. At Wigan (1662) Bp. Bridgeman found there had been few or no seats in the nave until Fleetwood (Elizabethan rector) caused forms, "uneasy, having no backs," to be made of the old Roodloft and other wood. Gradually townsmen had built "other-fashioned seats over their pretended burial places." The parishioners were ordered to seat the church uniformly after the bishop's pattern, which they agreed to do; but, as they delayed, the bishop had the seats made, and connived at appropriation. "He advised them to rank the best in the highest seats, and so place on the one side only men, and on the other side their wives in order, and to seclude children and servants from sitting with their masters and mistresses." These Wigan seats were probably low, as were others still remaining. But, generally, the height and size of Post-Reformation Ps. were much increased. They were fitted with doors, sometimes with locks, and lined with baize, which harboured fleas, dust, and plague germs. A tester occasionally covered them. Weever (Fun. Mon., 1631) speaks of these "pews made high and easie for the Parishioners to sit and sleepe in, a fashion of no long continuance and worthy of reformation." Bishops, e.g., Laud, Williams, set their faces against them.

Sir Christopher Wren objected to them. But alike in Stuart, Puritan, Restoration, Revolution and Georgian times, Ps. held their own. They were of all sizes and shapes, facing all ways. Some were like parlours, carpeted and curtained, with chairs, tables, fireplaces, and even "light literature." The Cambridge Camden Society (1840) fought hard against "Pews." Dr. Neale's History of Pews, Mr. Paget's Milford Malvoisin, and Archdn. Hare's first Charge were powerful onslaughts. The Free and Open Church Society was founded in 1865. Thousands of Ps. have disappeared, and pew-rents are becoming unpopular. In many cases CHAIRS are used instead, which, however, are often too crowded, making kneeling as difficult as in the old square Pews.

For the legal side, see Phillimore, Ecclesiastical Law, vol. 2 (2nd ed.). Under the Church Building Acts the law rests upon enactments.

3. Legal Aspects of Pews. Earlier, it appears to rest rather upon legal decisions. In old parish churches every parishioner has a right to a seat, but the right to allot seats is the Bishop's, usually exercised through the churchwardens; the parson cannot interfere. Appropriation must be by Faculty (now rarely granted), or uninterrupted Prescription. The Church Building Acts regulate pew-rents in churches built under them. Where there are no rents, the law is the same as in old parish churches.—R5.

W. A. WICKHAM.

PHILIP, ST.—See FESTIVAL, § 31; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 11.

PICTURES.—The scope of this article is limited to P. in the ordinary acceptance of the term, i.e., P. hanging or otherwise set up and framed. Wall-paintings, frescoes, mosaics, and painted windows are separately treated.

It is difficult in these days to understand the feeling against P., or the distinction which is sometimes drawn between wall-paintings, frescoes, painted windows, etc., on the one hand, and a picture painted in oils on canvas or wood, or an engraving, framed and hanging or otherwise fixed to the wall, on the other. To the Puritans of the 16th and 17th cents. all P. were abhorrent, and were regarded as relics of Popery, worthy only to be swept away and destroyed. Nevertheless it is remarkable that notwithstanding these widespread Puritan prejudices not yet altogether obsolete, which cannot see a picture in a church without suspecting that some one may want to worship it, the use of P. in churches in England has never altogether been given up.

In the 14th and 15th cents. there arose in Europe a great school of artists, whose work was encouraged and used by the Church, and an immense debt of gratitude is due to them. The magnificent works of Fra Angelico, Fra Bartolomeo, Leonardo da Vinci, Michael Angelo, Raphael, Correggio and a host of others, were mainly inspired by religion and executed for the adornment of churches. Many of these in later times found their way out of the churches into picture galleries and private houses in England and elsewhere, but an enormous number of beautiful P. is still to be seen in the cathedrals and churches of Europe, especially in Italy and Spain.

Mediæval England produced no painter of note, but, as far as ability and opportunity would allow, she possessed herself of works of art for the decoration of her churches. Very few old P. remain, chiefly owing to the inrush of the Genevan influence, which played sad havoc with all church adornments.

There can be no doubt that P. among other things had been superstitiously regarded and used, and so we find them dealt

3. Destruction of Pictures. with in the Injunctions of Edw. VI (1547), which ordered that all P. which recorded "feigned miracles," or were put to any superstitious use, should be taken away, and that if any remained they should be "for a memorial only."

Thus began the great clearance of so much that was beautiful from our churches, and for a cent. and a half they remained more or less cold, dreary and bare.

It was in the 18th cent. that P. were again brought in, generally as altar-pieces. The restorer has swept many of these

4. Pictures in the 18th Cent. away, but they are preserved and put up in some other part of the church and sometimes in the vestry. Examples where they remain over the altar are to be seen at Magdalen College, Oxford; Chinnor, Oxon; Bledlow, Bucks; Esher (old church), Surrey; St. John's, Wakefield; Thornes, Yorks; St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, etc.

Great care should be taken in the selection of P. Coloured ones should be chosen, and these if possible

5. The Selection of Pictures. should be originals, not copies. But this for obvious reasons can seldom be the case now.

It is well to remember that P. leave in the minds of many who see them impressions of what they represent. It is therefore most important that those impressions and ideas should be healthy and strong, and such as conduce to a proper realisation of the truths and lessons of the Christian Religion.¹

—R4. H. D. MACNAMARA.

PIE.—(Pica Sarum—Ebor., etc.—"Directorium Sacerdotum," "Ordinale.") Until the art of printing advanced, and a church almanac could be issued for each year as it came, a collected book or "Calendrier perpétuel" of 35 (or 36) almanacs was needful to guide the clergy in adjusting the observance of the "movable" and the "immovable" feasts and to regulate the weekly commemorations according to the requirements of each week of every year which could conceivably occur. Meanwhile the Ordinale proper which had hitherto applied the general rules of the still earlier Custom-book to the course of a single year, had been improved about 1270, when Salisbury Cathedral was finished, and it went through further revisions in the 14th century.

¹ P. are among the less important ornaments which are frequently placed in churches without a faculty, though strictly a faculty should be obtained. And it is a distinct protection against the introduction of P. which are in any way objectionable.

"The new Ordinal of Sarum use," of which Wyclif fell foul because he looked upon it as the embodiment of a form of worship which he deemed unscriptural, never required to be printed as a substantive work, for a large portion of it had been imported piecemeal into other service books in the form of rubrics. But a much more convenient and particular application of the rules was printed by Caxton in 1477 under the title of the former (and little used book) Ordinale. He advertised the copies, however, by a more familiar and distinctive name, as "pyes of two and three commemorations of Salisbury use." In them he provided not only for churches which (like Salisbury itself) were dedicated in honour of the B. Virgin and had only one other Commemoration (of Thomas M.), but for those also which had a third weekly commemoration, that of the patronal saint. In 1487 Caxton printed a fuller Ordinale known as the Directorium Sacerdotum of Clement Maydeston (fl. 1430-56). In 1497 a further revision by W. Clerke, precentor of King's Coll., Camb., took its place.

A short P. was attached to or incorporated in some MS. Brevs. from the 14th cent. and in those printed 1501-57. In days when service-books were largely rubricated, the priest's directory which had very little or no colour to diversify it was noticeable for its simple black and white appearance, and thus acquired the name of pica, or (mag)pie. Hence also the printer's founts of type, "small pica" and "large pica," derived their names. The jocular name for a confused jumble of type—"printer's pie"—was also partly suggested by the strange appearance of the much-abbreviated rules.

Cranmer's criticism of "the number and hardness" of these rules—a phrase translated from Cardinal Quignon's strictures on the "ordo breviarii"—was not strictly applicable to the directions which are brief and simple, but to the system of variable Antiphons, etc., which he was bent on abolishing.

The York Pica, or Directorium Ebor., compiled by Rob. Avisaede in 1495, was revised by T. Hothysall, vicar choral, and printed in 1510 by Dr. T. Hannibal, canon and diplomatist. (The Directorium Sacerdotum has been reprinted by the HBS in vols. 20 and 22 of its series. The short Pie is contained in fasc. i. of the Camb. reprint of the Sar. Breviary.)—BI.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

PISCINA.—A stone basin in the south wall of the Sacramentum, used for the purpose of receiving the water with which the vessels have been cleansed after the Celebration of HC. The word itself means "fish pond," and is the equivalent of "κοιμηθῆρα" in the early Latin Church for baptismal font. Later, the P. niche was used by the priest for washing his hands after celebrating.

The first rubric in the PB provides the authority for the retention of the P.: "And the chancels shall remain as they have done in times past." There were Ps. in all the churches in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI, and there is no authority for their disuse.

The niche in which the P. is built is canopied, and often richly decorated with foliage and emblematic carving.—R6.

F. L. H. MILLARD.

PLAINSONG.

Plainsong is a term now used to denote that great mass of worship-music which came into being during the cents. immediately succeeding the liberation of the Ch. under Constantine. Until the 12th cent. P. needed no specific name, such general designations as Musica, Cantilena or

^{1.}
Its Name. Cantus being adequate, either with or without qualifications such as ecclesiasticus. The invention of harmony, however, rendered some distinguishing term necessary to describe the older one-dimensional, or unisonous, music; and (probably because of its freedom from fixed time-values) the phrase Cantus planus (smooth, even, level song) was adopted for the purpose. Another term used somewhat loosely to describe the same type of melody is Gregorian music. This is the result of a tradition (now fairly established in spite of modern criticism) which ascribes to Gregory the Great the compilation and final arrangement of the liturgical chant, which already was mainly traditional in his time. Strictly, the expression Gregorian music should be reserved for those melodies which came either from St. Gregory's own pen or from the Roman Schola cantorum of his time. The wider term P., on the other hand, covers the whole field of primitive Christian worship-music, whether of the Mozarabic, Ambrosian or Gregorian families. From the point of view of the musical theorist the same phrase might even be stretched to include the music which probably was in use in the Synagogue worship of the Pre-Christian era, the early melodies of the Eastern Ch., or even the inflexions to which a Hindu chants his sacred books and a Mahometan the Koran, but the limits of this art. preclude the discussion of any matter beyond the actual history of the liturgical chant in the West.

There is no direct evidence extant as to the actual origin of the earliest Plain-chant melodies.

^{2.}
Its Origin. The laborious attempts which have been made to establish some kind of musical continuity between the inspired songs of the Temple and the early psalmody of the Christian Ch. fall to the ground in view of the fact that, during the very period when Christian worship-music was developing its own definite characteristics, the use of instrumental accompaniment, which had been so prominent a feature in the Temple scheme, was deliberately disallowed. The evidence on this point is overwhelming and conclusive. Nor can we formulate any definite theory as to the systematic importation of Jewish Synagogue melodies into the Christian assemblies. All that can be regarded as certain is that P. was not so much an original creation of the West as an art-form whose roots lay in the East, and that its evolution in Western Christendom runs parallel with the development of liturgical forms. In order to make clear the structural characteristics of the music, therefore, it will be necessary to allude to the texts which the melodies had to embellish and with which they were so intimately associated. Important as it undoubtedly had been in the age of persecution for the Christian assemblies to conduct their worship in as simple and inconspicuous a manner as possible—with neither music nor ceremonial, as the 9th cent. writer, Amalarius, reminds us—the ingrained Jewish habit of psalmodic expression had been preserved and even developed. The Songs of the Blessed Virgin, of Zacharias and of Simeon, had come into use along with a number of other distinctively Christian compositions in psalmodic form, of which there are many traces in various parts of the NT. In addition, the prose hymns of Judaism, the Pss., remained with the rising Christian community, a bequest, as it were, from the people of the old Dispensation to those of the new, so that by the beginning of the 4th cent. the psalmody of Israel had, indeed, attained a position of importance among Christians far surpassing that which it had had among the Jews. Thus, the Edict of Milan, which liberated the Church and left her free to employ the resources of art for the embellishment of her services, found her ready prepared with the Psalter, and other compositions psalm-like in structure, for use as the basis of that portion of her worship which lay outside the prayers and readings.

The earliest known method of reciting a Ps. musically was that called Cantus responsorius, by means of which the precentor sang the Ps. as a solo, the congregation interpolating a fixed refrain at the close of each verse. Probably this method was a continuation of the practice which had long been current in the Synagogue. In the earlier Christian times the precentor's solo passages were little more than inflected monotone (see MUSC. LITURGICAL), but the natural predilection of a skilled artist for vocalisation seems to have asserted itself, especially at punctuation points, and by the time of St. Augustine the music of the Ps. verses had become ornate, the older simplicity being regarded as an archaism. The congregational refrains or interjections originally were very brief, such phrases as Amen or Alleluia, a short text as "For his mercy endureth for ever," or the first verse of the Gloria Patri, being used in this manner. Among the Greeks such a response was known as an Acrostic (ἀκροστιχίον or ἀκροελεῖδιον), the Latin term to denote the same thing being Respondere; hence the use of the term Responsorial Psalmody to describe this type of recitation. A further point of development was reached when the refrain itself was appropriated by the trained liturgical singers. This involved the musical elaboration of the chorus parts which hitherto had necessarily remained simple, so that the whole system of Responsorial Psalmody became extremely ornate throughout, with the result that the Ps. so treated was eventually narrowed down to the limits of a choral melody (called the Respond proper) with only one or two Ps.-verses sung by the soloist. In this musically elaborated, though textually abbreviated, form, Responsorial Psalmody survived in the GRADUAL at the Euch. and in the RESPOND of the Divine Office.

The next method of psalmody to be considered in the order of its introduction was that called Cantus tractus, a sustained, uninterrupted chant sung by a single voice throughout. Obviously, this method possessed great possibilities for musical ornamentation of which the early musicians were not slow to avail themselves. Its sole survival in the later liturgical books is to be found in the TRACT which, on certain penitential occasions, was substituted for the Alleluia after the Euch. Gradual.

Another method of psalmody was that known as Cantus in directum, whereby a Ps. was sung straight through by a body of voices without repetition, response or antiphon. This seems to have been the latest method of all, for it is first mentioned in the Rule of St. Benedict, where it is prescribed only for certain Psalms. It is dealt with at this point because it never had the same vogue as the method to be described below, nor did it influence the later liturgical forms to any degree. Many liturgists have thought that this Direct Psalmody was merely ordinary recitation without musical embellishment; that it never developed beyond the simplest inflected monotone may be seen from the following example, which shows its actual survival in the Benedictine books:

The Lord help - eth them that are fall - en :

the Lord car - eth for the right - teous.

The fourth method of reciting the Psalter was that known as Cantus antiphonus, in which the singing was done by two alternating choirs. Its origin has been ascribed to St. Ignatius of Antioch, but probably it began in the East about the middle of the 4th cent., and speedily rivalled the competing Judaistic method of Responsorial Psalmody already described. Its chief point of divergence from the Responsorial method lay in the singing of the Ps.-verses by a whole choir instead of by a single voice, and in the extension of the refrain (which had been but a congregational "tag" in the Responsorial system) into a definite melodic formula sung by an answering body of voices. This Antiphonal Psalmody was introduced into the West by St. Ambrose. Already in his time the word Antiphon had come to mean a refrain in psalmody, and Antiphonal Psalmody signified the singing of Pss. by two choirs alternately in such a manner that an antiphon melody introduced the Ps. and was also repeated after each verse.

In a very short time Antiphonal Psalmody became extremely popular, and many interesting allusions to it are made by St. Augustine. It was this method of using the Psalter with refrains, or antiphons, which formed the groundwork of all the choral parts of the later liturgical books except the Graduals, Responso and Tracts, which have already been accounted for. From this point onwards the history of the chant and of the text that went with it is one of textual abbreviation and, perhaps, of melodic simplification, culminating in the authoritative work of revision and classification undertaken by Gregory I. Such additions to the musico-liturgical scheme as came in after his time are easily distinguishable by reason of the restricted and local authority which they possessed. In fact, the Gregorian revision, which marks an important stage in the complete Latinisation of a type of melody originally Oriental in character, seems to have been regarded as so authoritative and final

4. Development of the Plainsong System.

St. Augustine. It was this method of using the Psalter with refrains, or antiphons, which formed the groundwork of all the choral parts of the later liturgical books except the Graduals, Responso and Tracts, which have already been accounted for. From this point onwards the history of the chant and of the text that went with it is one of textual abbreviation and, perhaps, of melodic simplification, culminating in the authoritative work of revision and classification undertaken by Gregory I. Such additions to the musico-liturgical scheme as came in after his time are easily distinguishable by reason of the restricted and local authority which they possessed. In fact, the Gregorian revision, which marks an important stage in the complete Latinisation of a type of melody originally Oriental in character, seems to have been regarded as so authoritative and final that the later stream of constructive musicianship had, for the most part, to find its outlet in other and less permanent directions (see TROPE).

At this point it may be well to notice how the inevitable textual abbreviations already referred to were carried out in the musical psalmody which accompanied Christian worship, as a good deal of light will thus be thrown upon the actual contents of the Sarum Gradual and Antiphoner, with which the compilers of the BCP were so well acquainted. The variable parts of the music of the Euch. (other than those between the Ep. and Gospel) may be taken first. These consisted of an Office, or Introit, sung during the entry of the celebrant, an Offertory sung during the preparation of the oblations, and a Communion sung during the partaking of the Sacrament. They were all of the nature of incidental accompaniments to the actions of the minister, and their duration depended upon his convenience. The abbreviation of the Introit left it eventually with its antiphon and only one Ps.-verse, with Gloria Patri, while the Offertory and the Communion lost their Ps.-verses altogether and retained only the antiphon or refrain.¹ Such non-variable and quasi-Biblical parts of the Euch. office as were inserted gradually (Gloria in excelsis, Sanctus, Agnus Dei and Credo) were set to simple inflexions which lay somewhere between inflected monotone and the simple Ps.-tone. The elaboration of the "Ordinary" as distinguished from the "Proper" is a later growth.

In the Divine Office the abbreviations did not affect the Psalter as in the Euch., but were felt rather in the antiphonal refrains. This may easily be explained, for, instead of being incidental accompaniments, the Pss. were of the essence of the Divine Office. The Ps.-antiphons, however, disappeared from use except at the beginning and end of the Ps., and, beyond this, the antiphon which preceded the first verse was restricted to the first two or three words, leaving just so much of the melody as was necessary to indicate the particular Tone to be used for the Ps.-verses.

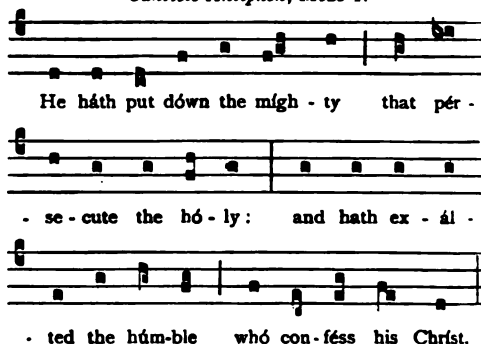

Space will not permit of any detailed discussion of the theoretical structure of the P. melodies. It will suffice to say that, far from being a crude and imperfect form of composition, they represent a highly developed and extremely scientific musical system, which reached its climax at a remarkably early period. Simple inflected melodies for the people, developed pieces for the trained choir, and highly ornate numbers for the skilled soloist, are all to be found within the Plain-chant scheme, which, to the musician, must remain for all time as the accomplished realisation of all that was possible within the limitations of the monophonic, or unisonous, style. The eight families, or Modes, into which the antiphons and other melodic compositions were divided had their counterparts in the eight Tones, or recitative passages, by means of which the Ps.-verses were rendered both at the Euch. and in the choir offices. It will only be possible now to give some brief musical examples to illustrate the first Mode and its accompanying first Tone.¹

5. Structure of Plainsong Music.

¹ As an exception to the general rule that the Euch. Pss. were accompanimental interludes which might not of themselves delay the celebrant, it should be noted that the Gradual, although abbreviated for practical musical reasons, was actually listened to in silence by all present, including the celebrant. It was, in fact, the musical feature of the service, where the singer momentarily became the principal figure.

Canticle Antiphon, Mode 1.

He háth put dówn the migh - ty that pér - se - cute the hó - ly : and hath ex - ál - ted the húm - ble whó con - fess his Chríst.

Tone 1 simple psalm form.

(Intonation) (Mediation)
Thóu art my pórtion, O Lórd : I have prómi - (Ending)
sed to kéept thy láu.

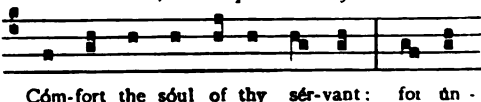

(together with eight other Endings, the use of which depended upon the Antiphon melody).

Tone 1, Gospel-canticle form.

My sóul doth mág - ni - fy the Lórd : and my spí - rit hath re - jóic - ed in Gód my Sá - viour.

Tone 1, Introit psalm-verse form.

Cóm - fort the sóul of thy sér - vant : for ún -

¹ The whole of the Tones in their varying forms will be found set out at length in the Primer of Plainsong (Novello).

- to thee, O Lórd, do I lift up my soul.
(together with three other Endings, the use of which depended upon the melody of Introit Antiphon).

The intention of the English reformers in the 16th cent. was undoubtedly to retain the ancient Plainsong since the Reformation. Plain-chant for the revised service-books, but in a simplified and congregational form. The most complete and authoritative vindication of their ideal of musical simplicity is to be found in the Booke of Common Praier noted of John Merbecke, issued in 1550. Cranmer's desire for a purely syllabic chant was doubtless the result, partly of the corrupt rendering of the ornate P. melodies which had prevailed in his time, and partly of the scandalous practice which had grown up of setting liturgical texts to polyphonic compositions founded upon secular themes often profane in their associations. Nothing but a yearning for musical directness, such as would enforce rather than obscure the sense of the text, could have justified Merbecke's drastic revision of the traditional melodies, which were undertaken so as to secure only one note to each syllable. But the important point is that the prevailing sense of antiquity prevailed in music as in much else, and the immemorial strains of over a thousand years were adapted to new conditions and were not abolished. The settings of the Pss. and Cants. in Merbecke's book follow the simple Gregorian tone forms, while, in the Communion Service, his settings of the Kyrie eleison and of the other shorter numbers are all transcriptions of the simpler melodies in the Sarum Gradual. Even in the longer numbers, which seemed for the time to defy adaptation and were consequently provided with new melodies, the settings were not written in the idiom of the time, but were very ingeniously kept within the limits of the Plain-chant style. Amid all the changes and experiments of a cent. the recitation of the PB Psalter preserved a very substantial musical identity with the Plain-chant of antiquity, and the Gregorian Tones only ceased in England when the recital of the Psalter itself ceased in the penal days which followed the overthrow of King Charles' throne. At the Restoration, although the ancient melodies were revived in many places as a matter of course, a new spirit came over eccles. music, and lighter methods, curiously out of keeping with the solemn grandeur of the words, came into vogue in those circles which were nearest the influences of the Court. But there is fairly conclusive evidence that Gregorian psalmody in England went on until 1740, so that its revival in the 19th cent. leaves only a deliberate break of a hundred years in its continuity from the coming of St. Augustine to these shores; a break which was not too happily filled in by the "fine and modish" inspirations of Nicholas Brady and Nahum Tate.

Beyond the overwhelming claim to recognition which P. may have from the purely historic point of view, there is a further reason for its retention. It is an artistic creation designed to fit the rhythmical prose of the liturgical texts, and, as such, is an unrivalled medium for their musical embellishment. The combination of metrical chant-forms with rhythmical prose words involves the introduction of two incompatible factors, each of which is for ever striving for the mastery. All the reforms which have been undertaken during the last decade in regard to the recitation of the Psalter have been necessitated by this attempted combination of irreconcilable forces, and in every instance the complete mastery of the words has only been secured by the elimination of those characteristics which alone make modern settings justifiable and tolerable. In spite of the enormous havoc which has been done by the faulty rendering of P. melodies, due to an inadequate knowledge of the principles underlying them, it may assuredly be said that the value of Plain-chant as a means for the devotional expression of those inspired forms which have come down to us from the heroic ages of the Saints and Martyrs is becoming more fully recognised every year.—
q2. F BURGESS.

PLATE.—The rubric in the PB specifies four vessels to be used in the celebration of the HC :
flagons, cups or chalices, patens,
1. Cups. and basons for alms. FLAGONS are described in an article by themselves.

For convenience antiquaries designate the Pre-Reformation vessels as chalices, and the Post-Reformation vessels as Communion cups. The practice of administering the Blessed Sacrament to the laity in both kinds, a practice of the early Church reverted to at the Reformation and not the least important change effected at that time, made it necessary for the parishes to provide a cup suitable for the use of the whole congregation. Commissioners were appointed in every county by King Edward VI and by Queen Elizabeth to seize all plate which was no longer particularly required or had served for "Popish purposes." Many parishes in the City anticipated what was coming by selling their plate. The Commissioners were directed to leave sufficient plate to fulfil the needs of each parish, that is to say, a decent cup and paten. The clearance of old plate made, partly by these Commissioners but also by the waste of time and the proceedings at the Great Rebellion, was so complete that only thirty-three chalices have been discovered still in use in England. The great similarity in shape and ornament first of the Edwardian cups, and later on of the Elizabethan cups, makes it probable that some general patterns were issued by the authorities. Only fifteen cups of King Edward's short reign are known to exist in England (seven are in the City of London; the oldest, 1548, is at St. Lawrence Jewry). There is practically no Marian church plate, though the City parish books show that much was done to restore furniture required by the unreformed service. Elizabethan cups exist (by the score) all over England. There are no less than thirty-six in use in the diocese of London. The cups of these two reigns are frequently made of silver gilt. The Edwardian cups are very plain; they have U-shaped bowls slightly narrower at the base than at the lip, and a plain tubular stem with a round foot. The Elizabethan cups are usually more conical and the stem is divided by a knop, like the stem of a Pre-Reformation chalice. The bowls, too, are usually engraved with a conventional scroll design called the strap pattern. The Elizabethan shape continued till the Commonwealth, the strap pattern disappearing after 1600. A large number of very handsome imitations of the Pre-Reformation chalice were made during Archbishop Laud's time. Example: P. given to Acton parish by Duchess Dudley and consecrated by Bishop Juxon at Fulham (the Order of Consecration Service is unfortunately not recorded). The typical cups of the Commonwealth were either a plain vessel with a straight-sided bowl and flat base and a plain trumpet stem, or a small cup with a U-shaped bowl and baluster stem. This variety developed more generally into the ugly Georgian cups of the 18th cent. A fine example of late 17th cent. P. attributed to Sir Christopher Wren, made in 1683, is at St. James Piccadilly. The classical revival at the end of the 18th and the commencement of the 19th cent. produced little P. Example: a fine collection at St. Pancras, London, given by the Duke of York in 1822.

The mediæval revival of the Early Victorian period introduced the Pre-Reformation models now usually copied.

Patens are of several kinds: combined paten and cover for the cup, small hand paten, large credence paten, and still larger

2. Patena. covered paten sometimes called ciborium. The Pre-Reformation and Edwardian patens were small plates. The former generally had a lobed depression and were engraved with some sacred emblem. The latter were flat plates. The paten covers, an invariable adjunct to the Elizabethan cups, are not frequently found after 1600. In Jacobean times the hand paten was enlarged and raised on a short stem.

The tazza-patens so called (examples: Egham, Surrey; St. Giles Cripplegate), were, I believe, really made for chalices (examples: Lausanne; a Scottish example in the collection of the Earl of Rosebery).

The best example of an English ciborium is at Acton in the set of P. presented by Duchess Dudley to the parish. The paten is raised on a baluster stem and fitted with a dome-shaped cover or lid. This cover is provided with a little flat foot like a paten cover, so that when the lid is reversed it can be used as a separate vessel.

At St. Bride, Fleet Street, the ciborium cover was used as an alms bason.

Alms dishes first appear about the Reformation. (Examples: Pre-Reformation, St. Magnus; 17th cent., St. Michael Royal; 18th cent., St. James Piccadilly, and St. Margaret Westminster, with representations of the Lord's Supper.)

Spoons first appear in the time of Archbishop Laud; they usually had circular bowls with a square or hexagonal stem and a seal or figure

4. Spoons. The bowls of later spoons were frequently perforated with either plain circular holes or a pretty pattern intended to strain the wine or remove impurities from it. It is not improbable that they may have been originally introduced for use as in the Eastern Church and afterwards retained for convenience.

Among miscellaneous objects may be included small sets of P. for the communion 5. Miscellaneous. of the sick, funnel wine strainers, knives, and cruets for water and wine.

Church P. as a rule is made of silver and frequently of silver gilt. Among the few pieces of gold church P. in England are two chalices at Cambridge, one at Oxford, and sets of P. at the Chapels Royal and St. Paul's Cathedral. Base metal, glass and pewter, were and are used occasionally.

Probably the earliest communion cups in existence are those exhibited in the treasury of St. Mark's Church at Venice. According to tradition these were taken from St. Sofia at Constantinople at the establishment of the Latin Empire. But the cathedral treasuries at Valencia in Spain and Genoa claim respectively to possess the cup and paten used by our Saviour. The latter, a large green crystal bowl called the Sacro Caleno, was brought to Genoa in 1501 from Syria, where it was taken at the battle of Casarea near Mt. Carmel. It has no Christian emblem on it. The Valencia cup is a much more interesting object. It consists of two onyx cups or bowls about 5 inches in diameter joined by a gold stem. The lower bowl being inverted forms the base or foot and the upper bowl the cup. The latter is engraved with an inscription in Syriac characters. The stem has S-shaped handles, and the base is decorated with gold bands studded with uncut jewels. According to the official account, it was given to the cathedral by King Alfonso V.

The best books to consult about P. are La Messe, by De Fleury, 8 vols., Paris (V. A. Morel), 1883-9; Mediæval Chalices and Patens by 6. Bibliography. S. John Hope and Fallow; and the published inventories of church P. in many dioceses. Old Plate, by J. H. Buck, published in New York by the Gorham Manufacturing Company, contains inventories of old P. still in use in the United States of America.—R3.

E. H. FRESHFIELD.

PLURALITY.—See BENEFICE.

POLL.—The decision of a vestry meeting on any matter may be ascertained by a P. as well as by a show of hands. The chairman of the meeting, who is ordinarily the incumbent of the parish, may direct a P. to be taken without first taking a show of hands. And, if the votes of the meeting be given by show of hands in the first instance, a P. may be demanded as of right by any member of the vestry present who is dissatisfied with the result; but such demand should be made at once, before the meeting has proceeded to other business. Where a P. is to be taken, it is ordinarily the duty of the chairman of the meeting to fix the time for the P. and make the arrangements necessary for its proper conduct.

Every member of the vestry is entitled to vote at the P., whether he was present at the meeting in question or not. As on a show of hands, each member has from one to six votes according to the rateable value of his holding in the parish as entered in the rate book; and the votes at the P. must be given openly and in person, not by ballot or by proxy.

[A P. may also be demanded in the case of a Proctorship election. Those present can record their votes. Absentees will be notified of the days of polling. The expenses are shared by the candidates.]

—A4.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

PONTIFICAL.—The P. or Liber Pontificalis (called liber ministralis in cents. 9–10) contained rites and ceremonial of such sacramental and occasional services as were either peculiar to the office of a Bp. (or, possibly, of an abbot), or to occasions when a prelate exercised some sacerdotal function personally. The PB of Sarapion (c. 350) and such documents as the Peregrinatio, commonly styled Sylvia's or Etheria's, the Apostolic Constitutions, etc., may serve to give some idea of what Bps.' books in early times in the East contained. In the West, we find the Sacramentaries along with Ordines Romani containing the germs of the mediæval Pontifical. The P. of Egbert (Surtees Soc. 27), now known to us from its 10th cent. copy, represents, as its name implies, a book used at York (c. 735–66). It is the earliest known book of its class—a Western book, distinct from a mass-book, and serving for the Bp. a purpose similar to that which the MANUAL would do for a parish priest. Egbert's P. bears some traces of its Roman origin. Similarly, such Norman prelates as Leofric of Crediton just bef. the Conquest, and St. Osmund of Sarum just aft. it, had P. offices combined with Ordines Romani prescribing ceremonial for certain occasions when they celebrated. The Bp.'s book was occasionally known as his Ordinarium.

The principal duties usually reserved for the Bp. as superior were the following: Confirm.,

2. Contents of the Pontifical.

Conferring of Orders, Benediction of Monks and Virgins, Coronation of Kings, Consecration of Churches, with their contents, and of Churchyards, Reconciliation of Penitents, etc. Of these it was found convenient to include one at least in the ordinary Manual with which parish priests were furnished, viz., the Order of Confirm., not so much probably on the ground that, theoretically at least, a presbyter might confirm in emergency, but so as to have the form accessible when the Bp. came. Certain benedictory formula, which a priest might be deputed and licensed to use under his Bp.'s commission, were, moreover, usually put in the Manual; and per contra some Ps. are supplied with a large number of forms which are not exclusively reserved to Bishops.

The demand for the P. was naturally small, and, even down to the final abolition of Lat. services in the Ch. of Eng. in the reign of Q. Eliz., 3. Later Pontificals.

no printed copy was produced for use in this country, though the rubrics of the printed Sar. Processional and one among its woodcuts (expulsion of penitents on Ash-W.) provide for the case of the Bp. officiating. Each Bp. would take his own book with him in his journeys round his diocese, having had, on his consecration, a P. compiled by himself and illuminated under his own direction, or else having acquired one by gift or purchase, a vol. possibly endeared by reminiscences of a previous owner, his predecessor in the see, or, not unfrequently, the old Bp. of some distant diocese. Sooner or later he might supplement the vol. with one or more additional items which he needed, and which an episcopal brother, e.g., Grandisson of Exeter, or Abp. Peckham, had composed. J. de Grandisson himself compiled two libros episcopales, one large, one small, and left both of them to his successors. Wykeham likewise bequeathed to the see of Winton, with his best Missal, librum meum de officio pontificali, which we gather opened, like that of Edm. Lacy of Exeter, with directions for vesting the Bp. for his solemn service. But the order in which the various offices are arranged is by no means uniform in the different MSS., some 40 in number, vols., rolls, or fragments, apparently used by English Bps., as described by W. G. Henderson (Surtees Soc. 61), W. H. Frere (Alcuin Club 3, and Biblioth. Musico-Liturg.), H. A. Wilson (Pont. Magd. Coll. Oxon., etc.—HBS 39), and others. The Liber Pont. of Edm. Lacy 1417–55, edited by R. Barnes, Exeter, 1847, is fairly comprehensive. The Roman P., compiled by Aug. Patrizi Piccolomini, Bp. of Pienza, and edited by Jac. de Lutiis and J. Burckhard, was printed in folio by Stephen Planck in the pontificate of Innocent VIII in 1485; again in 1497; also in Val Trompia, 1503; and in Venice by Giunta, 1510, 1520, and 1572. It was revised in 1596, 1644, 1752, 1818, and more recently.

We find distinction drawn in some cases in English Ps. between the usages of the Romans (Gregorian) or the Roman curia, the French (Gelasian), and the Church of Eng., in certain rites and ceremonies, and here and there reference is made to the use of some local church, such as Exeter or Salisbury. Thus the blessing of a portable superaltar slab more Gallicorum vel Romanorum is referred to in Abp. Bainbridge's 13th cent. P., and the two forms themselves both occur as late as Bp. Clifford's (c. 1397–1421). Frere suggests that this collocation was the work of Grandisson of Exeter, who in 1328 asked for books de usu Anglicano from his uncle Otho's chapel and, in his own P., deliberately put Roman, Gallican, and Anglican forms for consecration of a Bp. side by side, "so that the consecrator might take his choice." Frere (Alcuin Club 3) has analysed English P. forms (a) for conferring holy orders and (b) for veiling nuns, and has traced Roman and Gelasian elements. Roger de Mortival's P. (c. 1315) gives the consecration of a queen secundum ordinem Romanum.

Until the time of Cranmer the idea of one liturgical Use for the Church and realm of

4. Post-Reformation Pontificals.

England had, it seems, made little way. When at length the PB came out in 1548–9, it contained Confirm., as Lat. Manuals had done, but did not provide any substitute for the MS. Lat. P. with which each Bp. had provided himself. In 1549–50 "the form and manner of making and consecrating of Archbishops, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons" was brought out, and in 1552 provision was made for the Bp. when present to pronounce the Absol. and concluding Blessing in the Euch., his vesture and staff having been specified already in 1548–9. Destruction of abbeyes and spoliation of chs.

must have checked ch. building after 1536; but, when chapels and chs. were once more built or restored, in Jacobean and possibly in Elizabethan times, Bps. such as W. Barlow and L. Andrewes compiled forms for consecrating chs., chapels, and burial grounds; also for their reconciliation aft. desecration or pollution, and, occasionally, forms for dedicating vessels for service. Laud, Cosin, and others continued the tradition. Dr. Legg has edited for HBS (41) a collection of such 17th cent. forms. In the Upper House of Convocation, 13th May, 1640, Laud proposed that a form should be provided for general use, but the preparation of a uniform set of Visitation Arts. occupied the time instead. Aft. the Restoration, however, Cosin, who presented such Arts. to the president, March 8, 1662, was a fortnight later charged with the business of preparing a form for consecrating chs. and chapels throughout the realm. He appears to have been unable to get it ready and approved in time for its inclusion in the Sealed Book which was his special care, but the matter came up in Convocation again on May 2, 1663. Such a form appears among his papers (Surtees Soc.), but nothing was settled; and the project rested until Q. Anne in 1711-12 and Geo. I in 1715 gave letters of business to Convocation, when forms (since edited by E. C. Harington, 1844) were framed; but the silencing of the Synod of Cant. and the death of Abp. Tenison precluded them from gaining an absolute authority; and thus each English Bp. has been left hitherto to his own discretion.

In Ireland a form of consecrating chs. has been traced in 1666 (and, in a version for French refugees, in 1702), and the Convocation of the then established Ch. of Ireland was occupied on the matter in 1709-19. Printed copies have been appended to some Dublin editions of the PB since 1716 (B. Mus. 3407, f. 11, e. 18, 1—see W. Reeves, Irish Form, S.P.C.K., 1893; and cp., on the general subject, J. Wordsworth, Bp. of Sarum, Rite of Consecration, Ch. Hist. Soc., tr. 52, 1899).

The PB of the Protest. Episc. Ch., U.S.A., has had a form for consecration of a ch. or chapel since 1799, and one for Institution and Induction of Ministers since 1804. A Brief Pontifical was issued as a private venture, c. 1865-70 and subsequently, as a supplement to R. F. Littledale and J. E. Vaux's Priest's Prayer Book, partly with a view to Dr. H. L. Jenner's episcopate in Dunedin. With more authority, A Manual of Offices for Several Occasions was printed at St. Cyprian's Coll., Bloemfontein, 1880, for Dr. A. B. Webb and his Synod. A form for dedication of bells was issued for the dio. of Winton, 1871; St. Paul's, London, 1878; St. Mary's, Edinburgh, 1879; for Admission of Readers, Oxford, 1868.—B2.

CHR. WORDSWORTH.

POOR, CARE OF.—The PB of 1549 ordered that during the singing of the OFFERTORY "so many as are disposed shall offer unto the poor men's box every one according to his ability and charitable mind." In 1552 "the churchwardens, or some other by them appointed," were directed to "gather the devotion of the people, and put the same into the poor men's box." In 1662 the alms were to be collected, "presented and placed upon the Holy Table"; and a final rubric directed that "after the Divine Service ended the money given at the Offertory shall be disposed of to such pious and charitable uses as the Minister and Churchwardens shall think fit." No. 84 of the canons of 1604 ordered the provision of a "chest for alms in every church," of which there were to be three keys, one to be in the custody of the parson and the others to be kept by the churchwardens. The alms collected in it were "yearly, quarterly, or oftener (as need requireth)," to be distributed by them "in the presence of most of the parish, or six of the chief of them, to be truly and faithfully delivered to their most poor and needy neighbours."

Two Principles are here involved. The change in the social and economic conditions of England, the development of the Poor Law, and the increase and organisation of charity, have rendered obsolete the particular methods enjoined; but the duty to give to the poor as part of Christian life and worship, and the obligation so to give that most good can be done, remain unchanged. The former is insisted on by the weekly collection, the latter is involved in the suggestions for its distribution.

There are two possible methods of securing the maintenance of these principles.

(A) In many places Parochial Relief Committees have been established. Their aim is: (1) to ensure thoroughness and carefulness in giving relief; (2) to form a centre of consultation so that each worker may profit by the experience of the others; (3) to enable all to work together instead of overlapping or frustrating one another's efforts; (4) to strengthen by these means the religious and moral life of the Church.

(B) Others believe that even with the best administration such Committees will only encourage among the masses the idea that the Church is primarily a relief agency; that, without an elaborate and cumbersome system of cross references and visits, overlapping with other agencies will continue; and that by them the clergy will inevitably be compelled to serve tables to the harm of their spiritual work. They therefore advocate the formation of Committees over larger areas including several parishes, on which should also sit representatives of Non-conformist bodies, of Friendly Societies, of the Guardians, of School Care Committees, etc. Representatives from each parish would sit on such Committees and accept responsibility, as far as funds allow, for their own people, who however would not know where the help, administered by the Committee, came from. By these means the Church would fulfil her duty to her poorer members, while all suspicion of

2. Two Principles of Almsgiving.

2. The Two Methods of carrying them out.

1. The Church and the Poor.

religious bribery would be avoided. Often the former plan is the only one practicable, but it should aim at ultimately leading on to the second.

In either case an experienced and trained Secretary is needed, and definite, full and continuous records should be kept of all that is done, with separate papers for each family, numbered and indexed for future reference. The meetings of the Committee must be held at least once a fortnight, the Secretary being given authority to act in cases of emergency. There should be proper representation on it of the various works in the parish or district. It should be composed of both men and women. By it the entire alms of the parish should be administered, and the members should feel themselves bound loyally to abide by the decisions of the whole body.

There must be full and careful inquiry in each case. Both the extent and the causes of the trouble (sickness, size of family, bad character, misfortune) must be known, as well as the sources from which it can be met (income, relations, charity, etc.). This is necessary if the real evil is to be dealt with, and if a fair decision is to be made between several applicants (e.g., for a pension or gift). All statements must be verified (addresses, wages earned, etc.); this is imperative in the interest of truth.

6. Inquiry into Cases. Cure, not merely Relief, should be aimed at. When the circumstances are known, the cases should be considered by the Committee, and each member should consider the best way of doing permanent good. People of bad character cannot be helped by mere almsgiving, as they will not try to help themselves. Nor should money be given merely because people are "deserving," but when they need it, and when it is likely to benefit them. A plan should always be made, and held to till it has clearly failed or succeeded. Relief should be adequate, in cash given at the home, and not by ticket. It is better to help thoroughly a few who are in need than to give a number of small doles to people who can really do without them.

There must be Co-operation with other Agencies. This may be often effected by combining with them in some such plan of help to be carried out either by them or the Committee. 7. Co-operation with other Agencies. Where there is a Charity Organisation Society, it will often be able to undertake this work, if the agencies will provide for the cost. In other circumstances it is better for each agency to undertake the whole of a certain number of cases. Where possible, recourse to the Poor Law should be prevented, but when the Guardians have accepted the responsibility for a family they should do all that is necessary. Out-relief should never be supplemented by charity, and it is a very serious matter to thwart the plans of others, even if they seem to be mistaken, by interfering.

The Work of Charity is not confined to Relief. The Committee is justified in spending alms on preventive work. Less experienced workers can often undertake this, and so train themselves for the more difficult work of relief. There are immense openings in connection with School Care Committees, Thrift Work, Apprenticeship, Health Work, Friendly Visiting for After-Care Committees, Clubs, and Societies for Girls. Visiting in connection with these will often be found more satisfactory than house-to-house or district visiting.

8. Preventive Work. themselves for the more difficult work of relief. There are immense openings in connection with School Care Committees, Thrift Work, Apprenticeship, Health Work, Friendly Visiting for After-Care Committees, Clubs, and Societies for Girls. Visiting in connection with these will often be found more satisfactory than house-to-house or district visiting.

The effect on character is the chief consideration. In all relief given the moral results to the individual must be thought out—

2. Effect on Character. whether it is likely to make him more or less strong and independent in the future. Still more must the effect on the neighbourhood be considered before giving to people who are immoral, drunken, lazy, untruthful, or neglectful of their children. Often it is far more personal interest and encouragement than money that is needed to help people through their difficulties.

Literature. The Charities' Register and Digest with an Introduction on How to Help Cases of Distress, and other publications of the London

10. Literature. Charity Organisation Society (Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge Rd., S.W.), especially the Occasional Papers dealing with the Church and Charity; Charitable Relief, Handbooks for the Clergy Series (Longmans, 2s. 6d. net), with a short list of books; Royal Poor Law Commission Report, Pt. VII, and Appendix XIII, Diocesan Reports (Wyman, 109 Fetter Lane, E.C.); Publications of the Christian Social Union, Association of Parochial Relief Committees, National Health Society, National Union of Women Workers, Industrial Law Committee, and other Societies details and addresses in the Charities' Register.—K3⁴.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

"POPULOUS PARISHES."—Prior to the passing of the first of the Ch. Building Acts in 1818, Parishes remained for the most part the same in superficial extent as when founded upwards of 800 years ago. Very inadequate attempts were from time to time made to supply the deficiencies in accommodation by the foundation of chapels within the bounds of parishes themselves, but no attempt was made to invest these churches with independent parochial rights. The Ch. Building Acts—upwards of twenty-one in number—mark the first stage in the subdivision of Parishes. These Acts are so complex and conflicting in their nature as to have defied all endeavours to classify them or render them at all intelligible to the general reader. They were followed by the PEEL ACTS which proceed towards the attainment of the same object upon totally different principles and have been practically superseded by Lord Blandford's Act, 1856, by the agency of which parochial subdivision is now quite easily and efficiently accomplished by the Eccles. Commissioners for England to whom the entire conduct of all proceedings relating to subdivision is entrusted.—A7.

T. H. ARDEN.

PORCH.—Our church Ps. served a ceremonial as well as a practical purpose. The Marriage Service, for instance, began in the P.: here, too, was the holy water stoup. Except in a few instances, the principal entrance to an English church was by a side P. and not by a western doorway. The Saxon church at Bradford-on-Avon has lateral Ps., and there is a large Norman P. at Southwell Minster. The early Gothic north Ps. at Wells and Salisbury, the south transept P. at Lincoln and the west P. at Ely are highly finished and important work of the 12th and 13th cents. The grandest of English Ps. is that at Peterborough with its three great arches and its crown of spires, and of later date there are interesting examples at St. Mary Redcliffe (Bristol), and at Cirencester. Most of our large Ps. are in two stories, the upper one serving as a sexton's lodging, a library, or a vestry; but village churches often have low, simple Ps., though generally these are carefully finished. Timber Ps. are common in some districts, the oldest is perhaps that at South Hayling, which is 13th cent. work. The very fine 15th cent. example at South Benfleet is carved all over with rich tracery ornament. At Leigh (Essex) is a good 16th cent. red brick P. In modern classic churches open porticos were often used instead of sheltered Ps., but these porticos are far from suitable in the English climate.—R6.

CHARLES A. NICHOLSON.

POSITION AND POSTURE OF MINISTER AND PEOPLE.—“Religion, in order to meet the wants of human nature, will

1. Preliminary, take account of each element in man's nature: she will maintain lower relations with the bodies as well as higher relations with the souls of men. As man has, besides his unseen person, an outward and visible shape, so will religion herself provide sensible forms as well as supersensuous realities. She will exact outward as well as inward reverence, because in a being constituted like man, the one is really the condition of the other” (Liddon, Some Elem. of Relig., 3rd ed., 116). In these words we have the rationale of the appointment and adoption of bodily postures in public worship; there is also the need of order and uniformity in united worship. Thus bodily postures are to be regarded as the outward apparel of religion, in which the worship of the Church as a body finds its reverent and appropriate visible expression. “I beseech you,” says St. Paul, “that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (Rom. 12 1). In The Myroure of our Ladye, of 15th cent. date, this is well put thus:

“Take heed that the holy hours be said with meek reverence and devotion, both inward in heart and in all outward observances, as in kneeling, inclining, sitting and standing, and in sad” (serious) “and reverent keeping of all the members of the body, much more than if ye were in the presence of any earthly king or queen, or other earthly creature, as ye that are in the presence of Almighty God to do Him service, both with body and soul, like as He made both to that same end” (E. E. Text Soc. 62).

The only postures named in the directions of the PB are two—standing and kneeling: and this is true both as regards the minister and the people, with considerable difference of occasion: the standing posture of the minister has in certain cases its own special significance. The sitting posture, though customary on the part of the people, is not recognised in the rubrics of the PB. (See art. SITTING.)

In canon 18 of 1604 we find some enlargement and explanation of the rubrical directions of the

PB, such as “all kneeling,” “all kneeling,” “the people kneeling,” “all standing up,” “the people standing.” The 18th canon reads, “all manner of persons present in the time of divine service shall reverently kneel upon their knees when the general confession, litany, and other prayers are read; and shall stand up at the saying of the belief, according to the rules in that behalf prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer.” Strange to say, the practically universal habit of sitting during the Epistle, and the very ancient and widespread custom of standing during the Holy Gospel (ordered in the rubrics), and during the recitation of the Gloria in excelsis in the Communion Service, is not alluded to in canon 18; whilst also no mention is made of any posture of the people during the Psalms and Canticles. The canon goes on to explain that “these outward ceremonies and gestures” (of kneeling and standing) “testify the inward humility and Christian resolution” of the worshippers. The same canon directs that, “when in time of divine service the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all person present, as it hath been accustomed”; whilst canon 7 of 1640 “commends it to all good and well affected people, members of this Church” (of England), “that they be ready to tender unto the Lord the said acknowledgment” (that the church is God's house), “by doing reverence and obeisance, both at their coming in and going out of the said churches, chancels, or chapels, according to the most ancient custom of the primitive Church in the purest times, and of this Church also for many years of the reign of Q. Elizabeth.” (See art. BOWING.)

The very general custom which obtains nearly everywhere in our churches of facing East during the recital of the Creed has no rubrical authority of any kind, nor any Pre-Reformation precedent whatever. “It was begun in Caroline times, partly in imitation of the practice of the Jews, who always turned their faces in the direction of Jerusalem, towards the mercy-seat of the holy temple, when they prayed, and partly in imitation of the early Christian ceremonies of Bapt., in which it was usual for the catechumens to renounce the devil with their faces to the West, and then to turn to the East to make their covenant with Christ: the East, or region of the rising sun, being the source of light. Hence the turning towards the East became associated with Christian worship generally from early times, but not till quite recently in any special sense with the daily recitation of the Creed” (Procter and Frere, New Hist. PB 391). It may be said here that the true survivals are the turning to the East for the Gloria Patri and the Gloria in excelsis. (See art. EAST, TURNING TO.) It is to be observed that turning eastwards at the Gloria Patri has come down to us from the Middle Ages by continuous tradition in England; was enjoined by the Sarum Consuetudinary and other old rules; and was very general in the Western Church, although not practised at Rome. Needless to say there is no direction in the PB or Canons for reciting the Creed facing East. No direction is given in the rubrics as to the posture to be adopted during the Anthem; and this matter is best regulated by the significance attached to the Anthem. If regarded as an act of praise, it is well to stand: if as sung for the edification of the people, it is fitting to sit. For the Post-Reformation evidence for all the positions, postures, and gestures named above, see Hierurgia Anglicana, new ed., Delamore Press, 2, Index generally.

The fact that the clergy in Service act in a twofold capacity—(1) as representing the people before God, and (2) as representing God to the people—is to be borne carefully in mind in considering the positions and postures which they are directed to assume in church. Since the clergy are the empowered and authorised ambassadors of God to the congregation, and the recognised delegates or representatives of the congregation before God, it is both natural and fitting that these two distinct aspects of their duty during Service should be visibly signified. In addressing God as the leaders of the people, and in their name, it is appropriate that they should look in the same direction as those whose worship they are leading. The objection vulgarly made and stated that "the clergy are turning their backs on the people" is as entirely beside the mark as it would be to say that the spokesman of a deputation, in presenting a petition, turns his back upon those in whose name he speaks, or that an officer in leading his soldiers to battle similarly treats them. In 1661, the bishops, in their reply to the objections of the Puritan party, used the following reasonable words: "When the minister speaks to the people, as in lessons, absolution, and benedictions, it is convenient that he turn to them: when he speaks for them to God, it is fit that they should all turn another way, as the ancient Church ever did; the reasons of which you may see Aug. lib 2. de Serm. Dom. in monte" (Cardwell, Hist. of Confer. 320, 353). In accordance with these principles, so admirably stated by the fathers in 1661, the minister will stand and turn towards the people in reading the ex., lessons, commandments, ep. and gospel, absol., comfortable words and the blessing at HC.

3. Position and Posture of the Minister.

The proper posture for the minister in reciting the Collects and the prayers following the

4. Standing and Kneeling.

Anthem at MP and EP is that of standing. (For a full discussion of this matter and the reasons for the opinion given, see Staley, Liturgical Studies 14 205 ff., "Posture of Minister during the reading of the Collects"; also Frere, Relig. Ceremonial 124, 293). It is fairly certain that the addition of the words "all kneeling," in the rubric before the Collects at MP, as also in the Bapt. and Confirm. offices, and the alteration in the rubric before reception in HC—all made in 1662—were alike not intended to include the minister, but to put an end to the unseemly custom introduced by the Puritans of the congregation sitting during prayers and at reception of the Communion. "The words 'all kneeling' were added to the rubric (before the Collects), which here as elsewhere do not apply to the priest" (Procter and Frere, New Hist. PB 583 note).

There is good English precedent for saying the Lit. "in the midst of the church" (Hier.

Anglic. 2 35 ff.), that is, outside the chancel-screen—"between the porch and the altar" (Joel 2 17). This is the place indicated and signified in the rubric of the Communion. The priest should most probably stand for the latter part of the Lit., beginning at the Lord's Prayer: the rubric at this point suggesting some difference of posture.

The normal posture of the minister is that of standing—penitential portions of the Services excepted, for which he kneels; apart from other considerations, the minister is better heard by the people when standing than when kneeling, a matter of moment from a practical point of view.

In emphasising the importance of the minister adopting as a general rule the standing posture in prayer and praise, we are in harmony with the custom of the primitive Church, which forbade both clergy and people to kneel in church during the fifty days from Easter Day to Whitsunday, and on all Sundays, in joyful confession of the Resurrection of Christ. This rule was formally made by the General Council of Nicaea, (325):

"Because there are some who kneel on the Lord's Day, and even in the days of Pentecost; that all things may be uniformly performed in every parish, it seems good to the holy Synod, that prayers be made to God standing."—can. 20.

This canon, however, but enforced a custom very much older than the time when it was enacted, being referred to by Irenæus in a fragment of his work on Easter, preserved in the Questions and Answers to the Orthodox (Quæst. 115), and traced by him to the Apostles. Tertullian also refers to not kneeling on Sundays and during Eastertide (De Cor. Mil. 3; De Orat. 23): in fact few customs are more frequently mentioned by early Christian writers than the practice of praying in the standing posture. (See DCA 1, art. Genuflexion, 723 ff.) In the recently published Liturgical Homilies of Narsai, of the end of the 5th cent. (Text and Studies, Univ. Pr., Cambr., 190), kneeling typifies the silence and deadness of our Lord's Body in the tomb, and the priest does not genuflect after the consecration of the Elements, "because the mystery of the Resurrection has been accomplished." Here we can obviously trace the influence of the Nicene canon 20 quoted above, for Narsai adds "the 318 priests gave command that on all Sundays and festivals there should be no genuflexion" (ib.).

Thus the minister stands throughout the HC—the Conf. and Pr. of Humble Access alone excepted, for which two prayers he is directed by the rubrics to kneel. His standing is named in the rubrics of the HC five times. There is no authority for his kneeling to receive the Sacred Elements; the posture of kneeling at such a time is both inconvenient, and even dangerous in handling the paten and the chalice. Bp. Cosin's suggestion that the priest should receive the Communion "upon his knees," was not adopted at the last revision (Parker, Introd. to Revisions of PB 217).

The celebrant is directed to commence the Communion Service standing at "the North side of the Table." This direction cannot, as our altars are now placed, be complied with; for it relates to a time when the holy Table stood lengthwise in the nave or chancel, with the broad sides North and South. Archbp. Benson, in the Lincoln Case, ruled that "the change" in the position of the holy Table "made the North side direction impossible of fulfilment in the sense originally intended" (Bp. of Lincoln's Case, ed. Roscoe, 138). When the altar was restored to its ancient position, under the East wall or window of the churches, the direction for the priest to stand before the Table remained unchanged. But it seems reasonable that the position of the celebrant should be regulated by the changed position of the holy Table; that is, that he should occupy the same relative position to the altar in its present position as he occupied formerly. This is clear if we take an illustration from the case of the performer on a pianoforte, who takes the same position in relation to the keyboard, howsoever the instrument may be placed. The celebrant is directed to consecrate¹ the elements "standing before the Table," that is, as the altar is now placed, facing East. The phrase is historical, and occurs frequently in the old English service-books, where it invariably means in front of the altar. For fuller information concerning the postures and positions of the minister see Hier. Anglic., new ed., 2 25-47. (See also arts. POSTURE OF REVERENCE, EASTWARD POSITION, NORTH SIDE.)—R2. V. STALEY.

5. At Holy Table.

POST-COMMUNION PRAYERS.—The LORD'S PRAYER in the early Liturgies, except in that of the Apost. Const. in which it does not occur at all, and in the Ethiopic Liturgy where it follows the Communion (Hammond, Liturgies, p. 262), came immediately after the Consecration and not after the Communion.² It was placed here in 1552 (though not printed in full till 1662) on the same principle on which it follows the most important part of each service (cp. the Bapt. Office, the Order of Confirm., the Burial of the Dead, etc.; see also Scudamore, NE, p. 768). It is fitly used here when we are moved to thankfulness to our heavenly Father after having been strengthened and refreshed by the Body and Blood of Christ, though we cannot help feeling that the position it occupied in 1549 was a more suitable one.

The Doxology does not occur in the PB of 1549, where the Lord's Pr. comes immediately after the Consecration. It was first placed here in 1662, the Revisers apparently following the Scottish rite of 1637 (cp. the opening of Mattins and Evensong and the Churching of Women, for the variety of use).

"O Lord, and Heavenly Father," etc. This Pr. is sometimes called "the Prayer of Oblation." But that title would more properly belong to it, ¹ [He is directed to "order" them in this position, but the Rubric (as correctly punctuated in EASTWARD POSITION, § 7 and nn.) is ambiguous as to the position of the Min. at the Consecration, as Abp. Benson explicitly affirmed.]—G.H.

² There is, however, reason to believe that it was absent from the primitive offices of HC, though it was introduced at a very early date.

if it had been placed after the Pr. of Consecration, as in 1549, or in the Scottish Rite of 1637. (In the Amer. PB it follows the Invocation.) "It is more true

2. The Prayer of Oblation. to say that in this Pr. the Ch. rather recognises an oblation in the Euch. than makes it. . . . It does not, like the best models of that Pr., express the relation of the Sacrament to the one proper Sacrifice of the Cross" (Scudamore, NE, p. 770). The rejection of Cosin's proposal in 1662 to prefix to this Pr. a Memorial of the Passion, and place the two after the Pr. of Consecration with a prefatory rubric, "immediately after shall follow the Memorial or Prayer of Oblation," further tells against this title for the Pr. as it stands.

"Sacrifice of Praise and Thanksgiving." The introduction of this expression appears to be due to Ridley (Works, p. 322). "The Sacrifice of Praise" appears in the Liturgy of St. James (Hammond, Liturgies, p. 39; see further in Scudamore, NE, p. 773; Burbridge, Liturgies and Offices, p. 244). "The sacrifice which we offer is that which the Early Church delighted to offer, a sacrifice of many kinds. It is first and chiefly our Eucharist: our thanksgiving for the Redemption of mankind through the sacrifice and death of Christ. It is also . . . the pleading of the merits of His Death . . . and with these sacrifices of Thanksgiving and Pleading we offer ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a lively sacrifice unto God" (Burbridge, ib.; cp. Dowden, Further Studies, p. 238 ff.).

"All Thy whole Church." The chief bond of union which makes all the members of Christ's Church one, whether they are members of the Church Militant or the Church Triumphant, is the Euch. (cp. SPCK Commentary 117; Cosin's Notes on BCP, 1st Series, p. 351, on the possible application of this Pr. to the departed).

"Reasonable, holy and lively (i.e., living) sacrifice." St. Paul (Rom. 12:1) exhorts his converts to present their bodies a living and holy sacrifice (Vulg. hostiam), which is their "reasonable service" (Vulg. rationabile obsequium).

For the expression "ourselves, our souls and bodies," which comes apparently from an old English Lay Folks' Mass Book, cp. Dowden, Further Studies, p. 240.

"Almighty and everlasting God." etc. The rubric gives this Pr. of Thanksgiving as an alternative to the former, which appears to be more suitable for ordinary use, as it pleads the merits of Christ, and these are applied in the Sacrament. This, on the other hand, is more suitable for Saints' Days, as it brings out the holy fellowship of all the faithful. It was composed for the PB of 1549 and was the only Post-Communion Coll. provided in that book, the "Prayer of Oblation" being then included in the Consecration. A pr. of thanksgiving had formed a conspicuous feature in the primitive Liturgies, but had dropped out of the mediæval Service, except in the form of a private pr. of the Celebrant.

This Pr. is based on HERMANN'S CONSULTATION (1543), which has "Almighty and Everlasting God, we give thanks to thy exceeding goodness because Thou hast fed us with the Body of Thy only begotten Son and given to us His Blood to drink. We humbly beseech Thee work in us with Thy Spirit," etc. (Day's translation of Hermann's Consultation, ed. 1847; Blunt's Annotated BCP, p. 193).

"Very members incorporate in the mystical Body of Thy Son. . . ." The corporate aspect of the HC, which had been overshadowed by the mediæval emphasis on its sacrificial side, was re-emphasised at the Reformation (cp. 1 Cor. 10 17; and Scudamore, NE, p. 781).

The direction of 1552 "or this," which makes this beautiful Pr. a mere alternative, is perhaps to be explained by the fact that at the same time the expression of thanksgiving in this part of the Service was increased by the addition of the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.—H3. J. F. KEATING.

POSTURE OF REVERENCE.—(The present art. only deals with the antiquarian side of the subject; for discussion of PB directions, see POSITION AND POSTURE OF MINISTER AND PEOPLE; for BOWING, see separate art.)

From very early times two Ps. of reverence have been recognised: (a) standing (as a servant bef. his master); (b) kneeling (as a subject bef. his king). We find mention of them in both OT and NT, and their use has continued in the Christian Ch. down to the present day.

1. The Two Postures of Reverence.

(a) Standing has always been looked on as the proper P. for the Praise of God. Among the Jews it was so in the temple services (1 Chron. 23 30) and on other occasions (Neh. 9 5); and it has been almost universally adopted by Christians (though partial exceptions, such as SITTING during the Pss., have sometimes been connived at). A striking example is to be found in the Liturgy of St. Mark in which, shortly bef. the SANCTUS, the deacon proclaims: "Ye who are sitting, stand up."

But standing was also used as a P. of Prayer (so in the OT, Gen. 24 13, II Chron. 20 9, etc.). Nor is this confined to the OT: the Publican in the parable, as well as the Pharisee, stood (Luke 18 11, 13); our Lord assumes his disciples will pray standing (Mark 11 25). Hence standing became the normal P. of pr. in the early Christian Ch.; Justin Martyr, in his description of the Sunday Service, says that aft. the Sermon "we all stand up together and offer prayers" (I Apol. 67); Origen, in his work On Prayer (c. 31), discusses standing bef. kneeling; and many other references might be given. With standing were often combined two minor ceremonies: (α) lifting up, or spreading out, the hands (see HANDS, § 2); (β) raising the eyes (Ps. 123 1, Luke 18 13; Christians were instructed to do this modestly—cp. Tertullian, De Orat. 17; Cyprian, De Domin. Orat. 6).

Standing was likewise the primitive P. for receiving HC (Tertullian, De Orat. 19; Dionysius Alex., apud Eusebius, HE vii. 94), a custom which has lasted in the East to the present day; in the West kneeling was introduced at a later period, probably early in the Middle Ages (see further, COMMUNION, MANNER OF, § 2; DCA 1 416; Neale, Introd. to Hist. of East. Ch., p. 524).

(b) Kneeling in Prayer is frequently mentioned in the Bible; we find it adopted by Solomon (1 Kings 8 54), Ezra (9 5), Daniel (6 10), our

2. Kneeling.

Lord (Luke 22 41), St. Peter (Acts 9 40), St. Paul (Acts 21 5, Eph. 3 14). In the early Ch. it was reserved for penitential occasions e.g., confession of sin (Hermas, Vis. i. 13; Origen, On Prayer 31 3), or special supplication on account of some calamity (Tertullian, Ad Scapulam 4; Eusebius, HE v. 51). For this reason kneeling was altogether forbidden during the joyful seasons set apart in honour of Christ's resurrection (Sundays, and the 50 days of Eastertide)—a prohibition stated by Tertullian (De Coron. Milit. 3) to rest on immemorial tradition, and asserted in a fragment ascribed to Irenæus (1 828-9, ed. Stieren) to have come down from apostolic times. This prohibition was confirmed by canon 20 of the First Council of Nice, and, though disregarded in the West, it is still the rule in the East, where, indeed, standing is the regular P. for pr., and kneeling is used only once a year—at the Service of Kneeling on the evening of Whitsunday. (For kneeling at HC, see § 2 supra.)

(For further information, in addition to arts. mentioned in § 1, see Hastings' DB, arts. Knee, Prayer; DCA, arts. Genuflexion, Oranti, Prayer.) —R2. J. W. TYRER.

POVERTY, VOW OF.—One of the three "Evangelical Counsels," or vows of the monastic orders (see Matt. 10 9, etc.). Voluntary P. is not exclusively Christian. In Christian times it was always recognised as a characteristic of the monastic life, but was first insisted upon as a solemn vow by St. Benedict of Nursia († 542). In his rule the vow was made in general terms, "Vultis abrenunciare saeculo huic et pompis eius?" P. was much emphasised by the early friars, particularly in the rule of St. Francis, partly because, though the individual monks professed P. with chastity and obedience, the wealth of monastic bodies was great and caused scandal. By the vow of P. "regulars of either sex cannot in anything, either by licence, or by disposition of their Superior, have any private property, nor is it permitted to professed regulars to modify, by way of declaration, the testament made by them before their profession." The vow may be of one or two kinds, simplex (declaration of P.) or solemn (a solemn profession of P. on admission to an order).—R4. J. R. DARBYSHIRE.

PRÆMUNIRE.—An offence or penalty, so called from the opening words of the writ of summons issued preparatory to the prosecution of the defendant: "præmunire (= præmoneri) facias A.B.," "cause A.B. to be forewarned . . ." etc. It took its origin from the exorbitant power claimed and exercised in England by the Pope, and therefore, though not mentioned in the PB or Articles, calls for consideration in connection with the statement of the 37th Art. that "the Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this Realm of England." Inasmuch as it consisted in introducing a foreign power into the realm it ranked as an offence against the sovereign.

The statute usually regarded as the first Præmunire Act (though the writ præm. fac. is not mentioned by name in it) was passed in 1353 (27 Ed. III. s. 1, c. 1). It sprang out of the Statute of Provisors of 1351 (against papal usurpations in regard to eccles. appointments), and was designed to prevent persons aggrieved by the latter from seeking redress at Rome. It did not, however, name the Pope or Rome, but enacted simply that those who sued in foreign courts in cases cognisable by the King's Court should, in default of appearance, be subject to the penalties of forfeiture and imprisonment. In 1365 the Statute was re-enacted in more stringent form with explicit reference to the papal court.

In 1393 the re-enactment of the Provisors Law was followed by the Statute of P. par excellence (16 Ric. II, c. 5), "one of the strongest defensive measures taken during the Middle Ages against Rome" (Stubbs). It enacted that whoever procured at Rome or elsewhere any translations, processes, excommunications, bulls, instruments, or other things which touch the King, and all persons aiding or assisting them, should be put out of the King's protection, and their lands and goods forfeited to the King's use. The last Pre-Reformation statute concerning this offence was passed in the reign of Henry IV (2 Hen. IV, c. 3). By it the penalties of P. were extended to all persons who accepted any provision from the Pope to be exempt from canonical obedience to their proper Ordinary.

During the Reformation era the scope of the P. Acts was still further enlarged. Thus, by 25 Hen. VIII, c. 21, to sue from Rome any licences or dispensations or to obey any process from thence became subject to the penalties of P.; by 25 Hen. VIII, c. 20, any dean and chapter refusing to elect to a vacant bishopric the person nominated by the Crown, or any abp. or bp. refusing to confirm or consecrate him, fell within the penalties of the P. Acts. This Act was repealed by Mary, but revived by Elizabeth and has since remained in force. By later enactments (e.g., 13 Car. II, c. 1) the penalties of P. were applied to other offences in no way connected with papal aggression but all relating to the King's authority.—A2.

A. ROBERTSON and
R. W. B. LANGHORNE.

PRAISE.

Praise may be defined as the offering of pure adoration to Almighty God for His own eternal excellences (1 Pet. 2 9), His gifts of creation and preservation, His blessings to all men, and His promises to His people. It is thus distinguished from THANKSGIVING, which is the tribute of grateful souls for mercies received. The P. of God is not only the work of angels but also of man (Lk. 19 38-40); and indeed the chief work of those who have received the mercies of God in the religion of Christ is to show forth the Ps. of Him Who has called them into the glorious light of the Catholic Faith.

The P. of God is set forth in the worship of the PB very richly. (1) The daily offices are full of the ancient psalmody of the Church. The Psalter is to be used in regular course, and the PB allows very little variation from that course. Many of the Pss. are psalms of pure P. (as distinguished from thanksgiving), e.g., Ps. 150. (2) The Canticles of MEP immortalise the most beautiful remaining portion of rhythmic Scripture, and praise God for His intrinsic goodness and for His loving-kindness to man in the redemption of the world by His Son. (3) The Gloria in excelsis preserves a very primitive expansion of the angelic song of the Nativity as does the Sanctus of the seraphic worship of Is. 6. The only non-scriptural hymns are the Te Deum, and the Veni Creator Spiritus in the Ordinal—a hymn which has taken deeper hold of the Western Ch. than any other, Te Deum alone excepted. The two versions of Veni Creator (Bp. Cosin's, inserted in 1662, and the common metre version) are the only metrical hymns which have been legally sanctioned in the Ch. of England. Thus, in one sense, the supremacy of scriptural hymnody is clearly emphasised. But only a very literal adherence to scripture would exclude other acts of praise. This is seen in the deliberate ordering of the ANTHEM in the daily offices, instead of which (in the latter part of the 17th cent. and the beginning of the 18th) the practice arose of singing a metrical psalm or HYMN. The modern hymn is now substituted, and it is also intercalated at several places in both the daily offices and HC. Whether the present-day tendency to multiply hymns in the course of divine service does not overstep the bounds of PB sobriety is indeed a moot point; and their extraordinary frequency at almost every possible place interferes not a little with the liturgical balance of the services. Nevertheless, when hymns are carefully selected so as to be in didactic sympathy with the Scriptures and Coll. proper to the day, they serve an illustrative and emphasising purpose which is very helpful.

Of musical notation there is none in the PB as it now stands; but shortly after the issue of the 1549 book that great Ch.

2. Music in Church.

musician, Merbecke, put forth the PB with "plain tune" thereto (see BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE PB, § 5), which has formed the basis of the traditional Anglican use in Ch. music. This work was on the model of the ancient PLAINSONG of Pre-Reformation times; but some of the modern, very commonplace, and often meretricious, "harmonisings" of these ancient melodies have only served to hopelessly obscure their intrinsic (if severe) beauty. When it is remembered that these old melodies were, for the most part, sung without any instrumental accompaniment, it is not surprising that there is no mention whatever in the PB of any musical instrument to be used in divine worship. But, as organs flourished before the Reformation, there can be no doubt that their use (and that of other instruments) is at least allowed, if not implied. The present custom, however, of building organs, as a rule of much more power than is necessary for the ch. in which they are placed, has had the inevitable twofold effect of covering up the deficiencies of the choir and practically silencing the congregation. To further congregational participation in public worship has been, during the past decade, a most laudable effort, but the extravagances of "choral" Services of the past half cent. will need ruthless uprooting. Of "choirs" in the modern sense, i.e., bodies of men and boys whose special duty is it to perform the services to music, there is no mention in the PB. The persons who assist the priest are uniformly alluded to as "clerks." These persons were originally in Minor Orders, but their duties (since the lapse of Minor Orders) have devolved upon laymen, and (in cathedrals at least) long custom has familiarised church-folk with the existence and duties of lay-clerks. It is, however, to lose sight of all personal obligation in public worship to allow lay-clerks to do more than lead in responses and singing. It would be well pertinently to recall the direction of the 18th canon, that all worshippers shall say "in their due places audibly with the Minister, the Confession, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed; and (make) such other answers to the public prayers, as are appointed in the BCP." Moreover it is worthy of note that, where singing is ordered, there is always allowed the alternative of "saying" or "reading," which seems to point to the insistence of our PB compilers upon the duty of public (and not merely substitutional) worship. That is to say, the modern professional choir of the fashionable ch. is something not even contemplated by our PB. The cathedral choirs stand upon a different footing. They are parts of definitely religious foundations whose primary function is the most reverent (liturgically) and most cultured (musically) rendering of the Divine Liturgy and of the Divine Office to the praise of Almighty God. For the due accomplishment of this the proportion of the PB affords full and dignified scope.—K3².

H. E. SCOTT.

PRAYER.—"How should any kind of service we do or can do find greater acceptance than pr., which sheweth our concurrence with Him in desiring that wherewith His very nature doth most delight?" Thus, proceeding from the abstract to the concrete, does Hooker (EP v. 23) begin his discussion of the BCP by pointing out the nature and aim of all pr. in bringing men into communion with God. For to pray is, in effect, to approach God in an act of homage to His majesty. In this age there is much one-sided insistence upon what is colloquially called the practical side of life; but the PB has no knowledge of any substitute for pr.—not even the highest and most self-denying form of labour. Its very existence is to provide, inter alia, that a continuous stream of pr. shall never cease to be offered to God. The regular round of MEP, the offering of the great intercessory Lit. thrice weekly, the celebration of HC on Sundays and Holy-Days (with at least the possibility, if not implied probability, of its daily offering—cp. rubrics aft. the Gospel for the Circumcision and bef. the Proper Prefaces), the Ash-W. service of Communion—all indicate that the Ch.'s ideal is one of constant prayer. Bef. the Reformation this ideal was even more exalted, and pr. went on (theoretically at any rate) continuously throughout the day (in the Hour Offices); but this was an undue strain upon human nature, and, outside conventual life, pr. was in danger of total collapse. The obligation of daily pr. has, however, been conserved in every revision of the PB, which thus assumes its necessity among the regenerate sons of God. Thus, to provide public pr. is (with the exception of the VS) the primary aim of the PB; and this is seen not only in the recovery of the mother tongue as the vehicle of public devotion, but also in the services provided, in which are so clearly reflected what may be styled the Aspects or Divisions of prayer.

The ideal of the PB is always a lofty one, as it constantly impresses upon the worshipper the majesty and glory of God; and

2. Confession. thus the Confession of sin is of necessity a preliminary in the approach of the soul to Him. Hence every public office of pr. (HC, MEP, Lit.) has its definite admission of guilt and its accompanying supplication for forgiveness (according to the model of the Lord's Pr.), implying thereby the perfection, the absolute holiness, and the unchanging love of God, "Who desireth not the death of a sinner but rather that he may live" the life most fitted to reflect His own glory and goodness. Accordingly, in all public worship we confess our sins, thereby parting with self-satisfaction, and owning that we are not worthy to stand in God's Presence, admitting our faults of omission and commission, our failures and neglects, and casting ourselves wholly upon the Divine mercy which never fails the penitent and contrite heart. In this connection it is important to notice that (quite apart from private confession of individual faults) the Ch. has always insisted upon corporate confession of sin and corporate pr. for forgiveness which (in the spirit of apostolic Christianity) is a public devotion. If this were fully recognised (Ps. 40 13: "I have not kept back Thy loving mercy and truth from the great congregation"), can there be reasonable doubt that more earnest corporate confession of sin would be made, and that pr. for its forgiveness would be more abundantly answered?

Intercession is at once a blessing to him who offers it as well as to those for whom it is offered.

It may be defined as pr. for others

3. Intercession. (cp. Tertullian, Apol. 39: "Corpus sumus de conscientia religionis et disciplinae unitate et spei foedere. Coimus in coetum et congregationem, ut ad Deum, quasi manu facta, precationibus ambiamus. Haec vis Deo grata est. Oramus etiam pro imperatoribus, pro ministeriis eorum ac potestatibus, pro statu saeculi, pro rerum quiete, pro mora finis"). Consequently (as in every age of religious life Intercession has been deeply valued not only as a duty but as a privilege) the Ch. makes abundant provision for placing every need of man before the good God. So Hooker (EP, v. 49 3): "To pray for all men living is but to show the same affection which towards every of them our Lord Jesus Christ hath borne, Who knowing only as God who are His did as Man taste death for the good of all men." And, when the royal priesthood given to every Christian at his Bapt. and Confirm. is remembered, the duty of Intercession is emphasised. Hence it is that the Lit. (or, according to its sub-title, the "General Supplication") gathers up all the needs of mankind in language at once tender and compelling, and (mingled with constant supplication) presents them, through the merits of Christ, to the Eternal Father.

Petition, though, like Intercession, a part of pr., is distinguished from the latter in that it mainly regards, or at least includes,

4. Petition. the petitioner's own needs. Popular theology has nearly narrowed down the conception of pr. to the restricted scope of including scarcely anything else than this; such a theology is astoundingly selfish. But, if we live to the greater glory of God, our own needs fall into their proper place in the perspective of our lives; and coupled with each petition is the saving clause, "God willing." Yet, because we are weak, we need petition for ourselves, as every day brings its own peculiar perils both of happiness and trial, which can only be overcome by the goodness of God and our confidence in that goodness. Thus we pray for the special graces which we need, not only for victory over temptation (which is a kind of negative help), but also for the development, growth and edification of all our faculties and capacities to God's glory (which is positive help). And the greatest blessing which flows from Petition in pr. is the gradual formation in the individual character of its most precious virtue—a personal confidence in, and dependence upon, God. There always will arise the question how far direct personal petition in pr. will be answered. To this one clear reply can be given. If what we ask is to the honour and glory of the Giver it will be granted; if, as so often happens, we need the salutary correction of divine discipline, the answer may be delayed and (in all probability) ultimately come in a way which we do not either "desire or deserve."

Adoration may be easily distinguished in theory from Thanksgiving; but in actual practice they insensibly blend as, avoids the semblance of mere lip-worship by the formal offering of "ourselves, our souls and bodies," at that most solemn moment of Christian worship which follows immediately after the consecr. and reception of the Eucharist.

5. Adoration. even in the use of an act of Adoration like Ps. 150, the soul, proprio motu, reverts to God's past mercies. Perhaps Adoration as an element of pr. is best seen in the worship offered to God by the 24 elders who "fall down before Him that sitteth upon the throne" (Rev. 4:10, 5:14). This aspect of pr. is very plainly seen in the services provided in the PB for the Great Festivals of the Ch. when we praise God for the various revelations vouchsafed to man from time to time, but chiefly through the Incarnation of His dear Son. In constant use are the Cants. of MEP and the Sanctus and Gloria in excelsis in HC; and it is to be noted that every Ps. and Cant. (save Te Deum) closes with an act of pure adoration in the Gloria Patri. At the same time the Ch.

Akin to Adoration is that element of pr. which (in one sense) lends completeness to it, viz.,

6. Thanksgiving. In the soul's approach to God Confession is the necessary preliminary, which passes into Intercession and Petition, followed by Adoration, contemplation of God as He is. But the offering of Thanksgiving is most grateful and delightful to the nature of man as being a just and humble recognition of all God's benefits to us in time past (Ps. 103:1). In MEP there is but one formal precatory act of Thanksgiving, the General Thanksgiving; but there are others to be found in HC (Pr. of Oblation) and in the Occasional Offices. In this connection we may quote the striking words of William Law (Serious Call, c. 15): "If any one would tell you the shortest, surest way to all happiness and all perfection, he must tell you to make it a rule to yourself to thank and praise God for everything that happens to you. For it is certain that whatever seeming calamity happens to you, if you thank and praise God for it, you turn it into a blessing." There is no rubric as to the frequency of the use of the General Thanksgiving, but the temptation to neglect Thanksgiving is so common that it would seem well to say it at least once daily. Church-people should be definitely instructed to make use of the special clause in this Pr. in returning thanks to God publicly for special personal mercies (e.g., recovery from sickness, deliverance from calamity, etc.).

Lastly, while the prs. of the Ch. are intended primarily for public use, most of them are also fitted for private devotion, and this is by no means the least benefit flowing to English churchmen from their possession of a Liturgy in the mother tongue.—K4. H. E. SCOTT.

7. The PB in Private Prayer.

PRAYER BOOKS (VARIOUS).

The various sections of this art. display the various reasons for producing the various altered forms of the PB. The

1. Introductory. Calvinistic books (§ 2) were produced at the time when Calvin's teaching had a powerful hold on the minds of men, and great efforts were being made to assimilate the PB to the Puritan standards. The books mentioned in § 3, 4, are later in date and reflect the reaction; the object of their compilers was liturgical improvement and fuller expression of Catholic doctrine. The Arian and Rationalistic movements of the 18th cent. are represented in § 5. The remaining sections contain books marked by a desire to avoid strong sacramental expressions and, in general, to maintain the forms of the English Ch. without using anything which might not be agreeable to the feelings of more extreme Protestants.

On the death of Edward VI the extreme Reformers fled to Frankfurt, Emden, Strassburg, Zurich and Geneva. At the first-mentioned town a large number assembled, and a controversy soon arose as to whether the English PB should be used, or the services should be brought into complete conformity with the Calvinistic model. Knox and his party composed a liturgy for use in the English congregation, which was based on the Second PB of Edward VI. It is not a full service-book but an outline to show the order in which the parts of the PB were to be used and what were to be omitted. Though composed in 1555, it remained in MS. till it was printed by Wooterspoon & Spratt in 1905 (Blackwood). This book, the "Liturgy of Compromise" as it is termed, is of importance, as it shows the direction in which the Reformers were moving and the objections which they had to the PB. Only one lesson is read at MEP. The Lit., however, is allowed by way of compromise. HC is to be celebrated on the first Sunday in every month. The service is extensively mutilated. The Coll., Ep., Gospel, Sursum Corda, Pref. and Sandus are omitted; the Sursum Corda was objectionable from its responsory character; the rest was rejected either on account of its resemblance to the mediæval books, or because it belonged to the variable parts of the service for holy-days and seasons, to which a strong objection was felt. The remaining parts have the following order:—Coll. for Purity, Commandments, a General Pr., Pr. for the whole state of Christ's Ch., Creed, Offertory, Sents., Exh., Conf., Pr. of Consecr., Comfortable Words, Pr. of Humble Access, Communion, and the rest as in the PB. It is clear that the liturgical element was thus ruthlessly excised, and the service was reduced to the extremity of baldness. Private Bapt. was suppressed, and in public Bapt. the sign of the cross vanished and the Sponsors answered for themselves, not for the child. At Marriage the giving of the ring disappears, also the provision for HC. The Churching of Women is removed, and the Cat. is rewritten in a Calvinistic sense. The book ends with a Pr. of a fierce character for the English sovereigns (Philip and Mary).

2. Calvinistic PBs.

In Scotland in 1619 a book was prepared which was a cross between the English PB and Knox's Book. It was never published, and was superseded by the full Scottish PB of 1637. In 1620 an Ordinal was adopted in Scotland based on the English Ordinal, but recognising only two orders, Bishops and Ministers (Procter and Frere, p. 145). (The Puritans published many Service-books for their own use, e.g., the DIRECTORY FOR PUBLIC WORSHIP, but these are outside our subject, as they are entirely based on the Genevan model, and avoidance of PB forms is their main object.)

The preceding books have had for their object to continue the work of Edward VI's reign in the direction of Calvinism. We now come to a number of books of which the design is to start from the liturgical work of Edward VI's reign and proceed to a greater conformity with Catholic usage. In this movement the First PB of Edward VI played an important part. The first step in this direction was the Scottish PB of 1637. For this, its offshoot (the Scottish Communion Office), and its influence in America, we must refer our readers to arts. SCOTLAND (PB HISTORY IN), SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE, and AMERICAN PB.¹ We will confine our attention to more private efforts in the same direction. In 1696 was published The Liturgy of the Ancients represented, As near as well may be in English Forms. The author of this work was a certain Edward Stephens, "sometime Barrister-at-law of the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple." He was much shocked at the prevalent infrequency of Communion, and conceived a desire to restore the practice of daily Celebrations and frequent participation in the holy Mysteries. To this end, after many unsuccessful efforts prolonged for not less than thirty years, he succeeded in gathering a small congregation of weekly communicants, who met first in a private room, and afterwards, by permission of the Bp. of Gloucester, in his Church of St. Giles, Cripplegate. But his efforts were directed not only to the revival of frequent Communion, but also to the restoration of the Liturgy to its primitive form. In a letter to the Abp. of Canterbury (written in 1694-5) he says, "When we had it in private, we used such enlargements of the Church Service as I thought most agreeable to the ancient Form; but when we came into the Church, we forbore most of that, and confined ourselves to the Church Forms, only supplying what I thought defective therein, as well I could, out of other parts of our Liturgy." I conceive that the second of the liturgies contained in the above-mentioned work is the form which he used in private; it has hardly any point of contact with the PB. The first liturgy it contains is the Church Form, that being supplied which he "thought defective therein, out of other parts of our Liturgy." The resultant book is an eclectic mixture of the various English and Scottish PBs, with details culled from various older liturgies and arranged according to Stephens' fancy. He was conscious, as many have been, of the deficiencies of the PB, but quite unconscious of the difficulty of liturgical reconstruction; his work is a patchwork, not an organic development.

3. Stephens' Liturgies.

After the deposition of James II, Abp. Sancroft, with eight other Bps. and 400 priests, felt unable to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary and were ejected from their benefices. At first they used the BCP, but some of them soon began to employ the First PB of Edward VI. In 1718, however, the Non-jurors published a book of their own, which was based mainly on the First PB, with some details from the Second PB and also certain improvements from older liturgies. The Non-jurors' PB is marked by the revival of many older usages, such as the mixing of wine and water and the employment of an Invocation of the Holy Spirit at HC, threefold immersion in Bapt., Unction in Confirm. and VS, and Reservation of the Sacrament.

4. Non-jurors' PBs.

In 1734 the Non-juring Bp. Deacon published A Compleat Collection of Devotions, of which Part I contains The Publick Offices of the Church. This eccentric work is a blend of the BCP, the Apostolic Constitutions, and various primitive usages. The guiding principle was a return to the practices of antiquity; unfortunately, they were composed under the impression that the Apostolic Constitutions were a record of early Catholic custom and not, as is really the case, the product of private enterprise, based on current custom, much in the same way that Deacon's book was based on the BCP.

The Non-jurors were not the only people during the 18th cent. who were active in producing PBs based on the authorised form. Perhaps the most remarkable of these is that brought out in 1713 by William Whiston. This man was an Anglican priest, and at one time he held high office in the University of Cambridge as Lucasian Professor of Mathematics in succession to Sir Isaac Newton. Unfortunately, he fell into Arianism, and was not only deprived of his Professorship and position in the University, but was also suspended from communion with the Ch. by an Act of Convocation. With these opinions he combined an extravagant devotion to primitive antiquity, and in particular to the Apostolic Constitutions, which he considered to contain the substance of Our Lord's revelation during the forty days which intervened between His resurrection and ascension, and consequently to be rather more important than the NT. The latter tendency he carried out with great thoroughness, so that, as his book appeared in 1713, five years before the Non-jurors', he anticipated them in the revival of many ancient usages. He says in the Introduction to his liturgy that, "In compliance with the first of King Edward VI," he had omitted "the Ten Commandments" and restored "the anointing with Oil, the trine Immersion, the sealing with Ointment, and the White Garment, all in Baptism; the Manner and Form of the Oblation, Consecration, Participation, Commemoration of, and Prayers for, the Saints departed, with the mixture of Wine and Water, all in the Eucharist; the Anointing with Oil in Visitation of the Sick; the Prayers for the Saints Departed in the Burial-Office, and the like." He was able to make his love of antiquity subserve his Arianism, for all Trinitarian expressions designed to combat Arianism could be rejected as not primitive; and the Apostolic Constitutions were not likely to embarrass him, since their author held subordinationist views. He warmly approves of the liturgy of Stephens. The liturgy of Whiston is not widely different from the PB, varying partly in Arian alterations and omissions, partly in re-arrangements, and also in alterations designed to find room for the revised uses. It must be observed that Whiston agreed with the Non-jurors, not only in uses, but also in strong assertion of sacramental grace. Yet, with Deacon, he omits the Absol. in VS, an omission probably due in both cases to the lateness of the form rather than disbelief in the doctrine. The rites of Initiation suffered some change. The Cat. was replaced by a new one, consisting of the Ten Commandments and other passages from Scripture, and an instruction from the Apostolic Constitutions. Infant Bapt. is abolished, and the offices of Bapt. and Confirm. are both to be performed at the same time by a Bp. or Presbyter. The office of Bapt. is that in the PB for "such as are of riper years," and the various usages mentioned above are inserted. Whiston's Liturgy was reprinted, with his Memoirs, in 1750.

5. Arian and Rationalistic PBs.

The Arianism of the 18th cent. found further expression in a series of books which trace back to Dr. Samuel Clarke, Rector of St. James', Westminster, and at one time chaplain to Queen Anne. His book on the Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, the third part of which contained his proposals for a reform of the PB, was condemned by Convocation in 1714. A PB on these lines appeared in 1774, entitled The BCP Reformed according to the Plan of the late Dr. Samuel Clarke. In 1785 came out a Liturgy, collected principally from the BCP, for the use of the first Episcopal Church in Boston; together with the Psalter or Psalms of David (Boston, 1785, 8vo). This book is both Arian and Socinian, and the first Episcopal Church in Boston afterwards became the first Unitarian Church in America. In the Psalter many passages are printed in italics, to be omitted in public service.

The English residents at Dunkirk published a book in 1791 called The BCP compiled for the use of the English Church at Dunkirk together with a collection of Psalms. Prevented by a decree of the National Assembly of July 12th, 1790, which forbade recognition of foreign prelates, from placing themselves under an English Bp., they were left to their own resources. Nor was it possible among the many sects into which the residents of Dunkirk were divided to conform entirely to the English Ch. They, therefore, sought to find the "highest common factor" of the religious beliefs of the residents, and it is significant of the tendency of undenominational enterprises that they promptly turned to the design of "the excellent and learned Dr. Samuel Clarke, Rector of St. James', Westminster." His PB is the basis of the Dunkirk book, but so carefully and thoroughly eviscerated is the latter that the result is entirely uncatholic, and blatantly Unitarian. The complete abandonment of every shred of Catholicism and every pretence to orthodoxy is excellently exemplified by the address in "The Ministration of Baptism to such as are of riper years":—"By being baptised, you do not declare yourself of any religious sect or party; but a Christian: For you are baptised into the name of Jesus only: not of Paul, or of Peter, for the Apostles themselves were not lords of our faith; not of Luther, Calvin, or Socinus, in later times: all of whom, though faithful servants of God, and eminent reformers and teachers in the Christian Church, were fallible mortals, and mistaken in many things." In this book the Communion Service begins at the Exh., "Ye that do truly"; presumably the form for MP was to serve as a Mass of the Catechumens in respect of lessons from Scripture and intercession, and the Nicene Creed is thus omitted. The Words of Administration are:—"Take and eat ("drink," in the case of the cup) this in remembrance of Christ."

PBs on this plan continued to be printed, e.g., A Common PB according to the plan of the Liturgy of the Ch. of Eng. with suitable services (Exeter, T. Brice, 1791), The BCP reformed (London, J. Johnson, 1802), The BCP reformed, according to the plan of Dr. Samuel Clarke (Bristol, 1830).

The PBs in use among Protestant sects may be taken in three divisions:—(a) those used by sects who dissent from the teaching of the Church; (b) those used by the sects, of recent origin, who profess complete agreement with the Ch. of England, but assert that its teaching and practice are being corrupted by those who are disloyal to Reformation principles; (c) those used by the "Episcopal Protestant" sects, recently formed in certain RC. countries.

(a) Many of the sects use the PB at the discretion of the minister and with modifications, but do not bind themselves to any liturgical form. The Wesleyan Methodists have produced an edition of the PB for their own use. They originally worshipped and communicated in the parish chs., and their own meetings were an additional and private form of devotional service. When, in course of time, they came to organise themselves into a separate religious body, independent of the Church, they began to use a modified PB. Many alterations and omissions are made in the Wesleyan PB, objectionable both in form and tendency. The Absol. and Lord's Pr. and Ath. Creed are omitted in MP. No days beyond Sundays and the feasts that fall on Sunday are appointed for liturgical observance, except Christmas Day, Good Friday and Ascension Day. In some editions the Ante-Communion vanishes entirely; in others it exists and alternates with MP; the rest of the HC service follows the PB. In Bapt. all mention of regeneration is omitted. In Ordination the candidates are required, after asserting their belief in Scripture in the words of the PB, to assent to the doctrine of "the first four volumes of Mr. Wesley's Sermons and his notes on the NT," and the form of Ordination is, "Mayest thou receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Christian Minister and Pastor, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God, etc." (cp. the PB of the American "Methodist Episcopal Church").

6. Modern Protestant PBs.

7. Wesleyan PB, etc.

Other Dissenting bodies use the PB not so much as a liturgical book, but as a source from which to quarry at discretion. Accordingly they do not produce new PBs, but employ such portions of the PB as they choose.

(b) The religious bodies calling themselves the Free Church of England, the Protestant Reformed Evangelical Church of England, etc., generally keep closely to the PB, as their professed intention is to maintain the doctrine and discipline of that book. To this division belongs The BCP Revised according to the use of the Free Church of England, which generally follows the PB, but has some significant omissions, e.g., the Quicumque Vult and the mention of regeneration in Bapt.; the form in Ordination is, "Mayest thou receive the Holy Ghost for the Office and Work of a Minister in the Church of God, etc. . . ."; the VS is omitted (cp. the PB of the "Reformed Episcopal Church" of Great Britain and Ireland).

In Canada the "Reformed Episcopal Church" in 1873 reprinted the Proposed Book of 1785 of the American Church. In August, 1874, the Committee on Doctrine and Worship put forth a reprint with some alterations of the Standard Book, adopted by the General Council of the "Reformed Episcopal Church," held in New York in May, 1874. The changes made in these books are all in one direction—the sacramental language is Zwinglian. In accordance with this, the basis of Ch. membership is changed, and assumes the form of interdenominationalism (see rubrics after Nicene Cr., at the Offertory, and after Confirm.—Procter, History of the BCP, 1889, p. 183, n.3).

(c) During the last cent. Protestant congregations have been formed in RC. countries in connection with certain parts of the Anglican Ch., and service-books in the vernacular have been prepared for their use.

For the Spanish Protestants we have the Oficios Divinos y Administracion de los Sacramentos y otras Ordenanzas en la Iglesia Española (Madrid, 1881), Oficios Divinos y Administracion de los Sacramentos y otros Ritos en la Iglesia Española Reformada (Madrid, 1889), and, in English, The Revised PB of the Reformed Spanish Church (Dublin, 1889). These books profess to be Mozarabic, but they are as unlike the Mozarabic rite as is possible. They are really the BCP with an unskilful veneer of Mozarabic details. In doctrine they are in the highest degree opposed to sacramental teaching (see CQR, vol. 40, p. 169).¹

Of similar character are the books of the Mexican Episcopal Church; also The Divine Offices and other formularies of the Reformed Episcopal Churches of Spain and Portugal (1882), and The BCP, Administration of the Sacraments and other Divine offices for the use of the Lusitanian Church (1882).

In 1903 appeared at Milan the Liturgia of the

¹ [On the other hand, Abp. Plunket, in his preface, claims that in this PB "no question has been closed which, by reasonable men in the Ang. Communion, is regarded as fairly an open one." The Order for HC is throughout structurally distinct from the BCP, is derived in its main bulk from Mozarabic sources directly or indirectly, and includes such features as the responsive Absol. of the Presbyter by the people, and, in the Consecration Pr., the solemn Commemoration and the Epiclesis.—G. H.]

"Chiesa Cattolica Riformata d'Italia." This work is much better in doctrine than those mentioned above. Liturgically, it is a combination of the BCP and the Roman books; though the Calendar is entirely Anglican, a good deal of Roman matter remains in the framework of the offices.

A collection of various PBs is given by Peter Hall in Fragmenta Liturgica, 1848. The following portions of the contents are pertinent to this article:—vol. 2—Stephens' Liturgy

Bibliography. of the Ancients, 1696; Liturgy of Ancient Christians; Deacon's Litany and Prayers, 1797; vol. 3—Whiston's Primitive Liturgy, 1713; vol. 5—The Non-jurors' Offices, 1718; vol. 6—Deacon's Devotions, 1734; vol. 7—The Dunkirk PB, 1791; the Introduction in vol. 1 is exceedingly valuable. For the Non-jurors' services see Procter and Frere, History of BCP, pt. 1, c. 8, App. 1, and the older editions of this work by Procter alone, pt. 1, c. 5, App. secs. 1, 2, 3. The Second PB of K. Edward the Sixth and the Liturgy of Compromise is published by H. J. Wotherspoon and G. W. Sprott, Blackwood, Edinburgh and London, 1905. The various service-books of the Protestant Chs. are given in the art. as they occur.—B1. T. THOMPSON.

PRAYERS AND THANKSGIVINGS UPON SEVERAL OCCASIONS.—Under this heading in the PB are grouped 11 prayers and 8 thanksgivings, "to be used before the two final prayers of the Litany, or of Morning and Evening Prayer." These forms are, with one exception, modern compositions; they are no part of the unvarying order of daily Service, but are intended for occasional use only; hence they are commonly described as The Occasional Prayers. This group of prayers and thanksgivings was appended to MP and EP and Lit. at the last revision in 1662, but some of them had been in use previously in the PB. They are as follows.

(1) For Rain—(2) For fair Weather: both of which were printed at the end of the Communion Service in the PB of 1549—(3 and 4)

2. Prayer. In the time of Dearth and Famine (two forms): (5) In the time of War and Tumults: (6) In the time of any common Plague or Sickness: these four prayers were added and placed at the end of the Lit. in the PB of 1552—(7 and 8) In the Ember Weeks: first printed in the PB of 1662, the former taken from Bp. Cosin's Collection of Private Devotions, 1627, the latter from the Scottish PB of 1637, and there found at the end of the Lit.—(9) A Prayer that may be said after any of the former: from the Sacramentary of St. Gregory, it came into the PB of 1559 through the Sarum Lit.¹ and is found in all Primers of the English Church as far back as the Primer can be traced; in the Amer. PB it is printed at the end of "A Penitential Office for Ash-Wed., which may be used at other times"—(10) A Prayer for Parliament: most probably composed by Laud, when Bp. of St. David's; it is found in Laud's Summary of Devotions (280, ed. 1667) amongst "Prayers upon

¹ The original Latin is as follows: "Deus, cui proprium est misereri semper et parcere, suscipe deprecationem nostram: et quos delictorum catena constringit, miseratio tue pietatis absolvat: per Dominum."

Sundry Public Occasions," with marginal note referring an Order of Fasting, ob Pestem gravissimam, A.D. 1625, the beginning and the ending being verbally identical with the form in the PB of 1662: in 1628 it occurs in a form of pr. in time of war. The expression, "our most religious and gracious king," was probably held in 1662 to be a compliment to K. Charles II, but whilst most appropriate to his father, K. Charles the Martyr (in the occasional forms of 1625 and 1628), the phrase was singularly out of place as applied to the profligate Charles II (see Dowden, Workmanship of PB, 2nd ed., 222). With true wisdom the Irish Church has reduced the words to "our Sovereign Lord the King." In this pr., the word "Dominions" was substituted for "Kingdoms" by an Order of Council, Jan. 1st, 1801—(11) A Collect or Prayer for all Conditions of Men was in all probability composed by Dr. Peter Gunning, when Master of St. John's Coll., Cambridge, and appears first in the PB of 1662: it is directed "to be used at such times when the Lit. is not appointed to be said": accordingly, we find that Gunning did not permit its use in the afternoon or evening at his college services, "because the Lit. was never read then, the place of which it was supposed to supply" (Bisse, The Beauty of Holiness, ed. 1720, serm. 3 97). The Lit. being, according to the directions of the PB, a morning devotion, the Pr. for all conditions of men, its substitute, should likewise be restricted in use to the morning only; i.e., it is for use on the mornings of the non-Lit-days—Mon., Tues., Thurs. and Sat. (Upon this point see Staley, Liturgical Studies 11 162 ff.)¹ Originally, this pr. appears to have been much longer, in order to meet the objections of the Puritans at the Savoy Confer. in 1661 to the short petitions of the Lit., in regard to which they desired that "the particulars thereof may be composed into one solemn prayer" (Cardwell, Hist. of Confer. 306). Evidence of the shortening of this pr. appears in the use of the word "Finally," which is somewhat unnecessary in so brief a prayer. It would be very interesting if the original and longer form could be discovered.

THE IRISH PB has additional prayers as follows: A Pr. for Unity (from Acces. Serv.): For a Sick Person (combination of two forms in Visit. of Sick, drawn from Cosin's Devotions): On Rogation Days (adapted from Cosin, For Fruits of Earth): On New Year's Day: For Christian Missions: A Pr. for the General Synod of Ch. of Ireland: To be used in Colleges and Schools.

THE AMER. PB has additional prayers as follows: A Pr. for Congress (adapted from Pr. for Parliament): A Pr. to be used at the Meetings of Convention: For the Unity of God's People (from Acces. Serv.): For Missions: For Fruitful Seasons (two forms): For a Sick Person: For a Sick Child (adapted from VS): For a Person, or Persons, going to Sea: For a Person under Affliction: For Malefactors, after Condemnation—all dating from 1789. Also before the Psalter are inserted, A Form of Pr. for the Visitation of Prisoners: A Form of Pr. and Thanksgiving for the Fruits of the Earth: and Forms of Pr. to be used in Families.

¹ [The common usage rests on: (a) the general heading which specifies EP; (b) a possible alternative sense of the special heading, the Lit. not being appointed for use at EP, in which, as the service most largely attended in most parishes, it would seem desirable to leave room for the optional use of an Intercessory prayer wider and fuller in scope than the rest.]

The eight Thanksgivings are the following:

- (1) A General Thanksgiving, composed by Bp. Reynolds for the revised PB of 1662 (Cardwell, Synodalia 2 658):
- (2) For Rain: (3) For Fair Weather: (4) For Plenty: (5) For Peace and Victory: (7) For Deliverance from the Plague (two forms):—all, with the exception of one, added to the PB as a result of the Hampton Ct. Confer. in 1604 (Cardwell, Hist. of Confer. 222, 223):
- (6) For restoring Peace at Home was added at the last revision, in thanksgiving for the restoration of the Monarchy, adapted from Bp. Wren (Jacobson, Fragmentary Illustra. 64).

THE IRISH PB has, in addition to the foregoing, a thanksgiving For Recovery from Sickness.

THE AMER. PB places the General Irish and American PBs. Conditions of Men, contrary to original intention) in MP and EP, and the former also at the end of the Lit.; thereby differing from the English PB, which directs their occasional use only. Additional forms of thanksgiving are provided—After Childbirth (from the Churching of Women): For a Recovery from Sickness: For a Child's Recovery from Sickness: and For a Safe Return from Sea.—FIO. V. STALEY.

PREACHER.—In the early Ch. preaching was considered the special, though not the exclusive, function of the Bp. The decrees of the Councils of Laodicea (c. 365 A.D.) and Valentinia (524 A.D.) seem to imply this. In the Apost. Const., however, we read: "Let the Presbyters, but not all, exhort the people: and last of all the Bishop, who is like unto the governor of the ship" (2 57). Some homilies of St. Chrysostom preached at Antioch conclude with words implying that the discourse of the Bp. was to follow. In Africa Presbyters were not allowed to preach in the presence of the Bp. before St. Augustine; he had special permission given to him to preach by Bp. Valerius, and afterwards the custom of Presbyters preaching, even in the presence of their Bps., became common. Deacons as a rule did not preach, though special permission to do so was sometimes given by the Bp. St. Vincent of Saragossa (304 A.D.) preached as his Bp's deputy, the Bp. having an impediment in his speech. Gregory the Great also preached when a Deacon. Laymen as a rule were not allowed to preach, but Origen, when a layman, was requested by Alexander, Bp. of Jerusalem, to preach before him (Euseb., HE vi. 19 16). There are also other instances.

The mediæval rule in the Ch. of Eng. was that Bps. might preach anywhere without a licence. All clergy might preach in their own cures. Deacons and other clergy without preferment might only preach by special licence from the Bp. During the period of the Reformation many varying rules and regulations about preaching were made. The legal qualifications of a preacher in the Church of England at the present day are laid down in canon 36:—"No person shall be received into the ministry nor admitted to any ecclesiastical living, nor suffered to preach, to catechise, or to be a lecturer or reader in divinity in either university, or in any cathedral or collegiate church, chapel or any other place within this realm, except he be licensed either by the Archbishop or by the Bishop of the diocese where he is to be placed, under their hands and seals, or by one of the two universities under their seal likewise; and except he shall first subscribe to the three articles" concerning the King's supremacy, the Book of Common Prayer, and the Thirty-Nine Articles: and if any bishop shall license any person without such subscription, "he shall be suspended from giving licenses to preach for the space of twelve months." (See further, LECTURER.)—TA.

LUCIUS SMITH.

PREACHING.—The office of the preacher is to extend to all the world and to every age the ministry of the Incarnate Word of

1. The Aim of the Preacher.

God, that is to say, the preacher must give to men the truth which was brought to man in and through the Word who was made Flesh. The first Christian preachers, as we learn from the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, gave to their hearers narrative statements about the Person and Life of Christ, concluding simply with brief exhortations to decision and action. The Epistles of the same preachers may be regarded as written sermons to be read in the assemblies of the faithful: these contain a greater proportion of exhortation, occupying the same relative position, at the end of the discourse. The great patristic preachers for the most part addressed their hearers in sermons which are commentaries on Holy Scripture, and these sermons have but slight structure or proportion. Later preachers developed methods variously suitable to different classes of persons and different capacities of learning; and in the changes which time has brought the sermon has come to have a place of prime importance amongst us. The preacher must be equipped for his work with a knowledge not only of the truth which he has to preach but of the people to whom he has to proclaim that truth. He must inform himself sympathetically of their habits of mind and common temptations: he must know how to use the tide of their affections and how to meet the current of their prejudices. He must interweave human interest and Divine truth so that the incidents of daily life may recall to mind the sermon that has been heard and invite its application.

The preacher should have always the purpose of informing the minds and hearts of his hearers and of moving the will. He should therefore prepare himself for his ministry by reading everything that may help him to bring the Scriptures into focus: all works of art or literature which enable one to realise the Life and Ministry of our Lord in Palestine and the whole preparatory dispensation of law and sacrifice will contribute to this preparation. Behind the immediate composition of a sermon lies this preparation of the preacher. And, further, the preacher must have by constant meditation a devotional and spiritual knowledge of the Word. Every sermon should contain definite teaching in some part of the Christian revelation; and this should be commended acceptably to the minds of the hearers. Sometimes the text may be chosen to suit the subject of the sermon rather than the sermon derived from the text. But most often the sermon should be an exposition of a short passage in Holy Scripture to which the text should be as "the nail fastened in the sure place." Whether the sermon is upon a subject or from a text the preacher must claim the attention of his hearers at the very outset. His first words should open the ears of all present; and then he must be careful that he does not squander his opportunity. The meaning of his subject must be displayed in simple and lucid language without rhetorical or conventional expressions. Every sentence should add completeness to the subject in hand, and every word give more light and definite form. Illustrations should be used very sparingly in the earlier part of the sermon: and metaphors and figures as seldom as possible. The immense privileges of the pulpit should be maintained on its evident merits: the importance and nobility of theme, purity and dignity of language, and deference and earnestness of manner. As the sermon proceeds, it is permissible to use an increasing earnestness and intimacy and pathos: the appeal being carried through the mind to the heart. And then, when the interest and sympathy are at their best, the preacher must bring the people to conviction and decision. He must resolve for them beforehand that they shall go away with new hopes and higher purpose, confident of God's goodness and reliant upon His grace.

2. Preparation for Preaching.

In its structure a sermon ought to be so simple and definite as to be easily remembered by the hearers. And the form which it should take in the minds of the hearers must first exist in the mind of the preacher. It is not necessary to use always the familiar terms of section and division; but it is necessary that the sermon be vertebrate. And the divisions may well be marked by a change in the manner and tone or gesture of the preacher. There must be in every case the exposition of the text and its application, the first lucid and the second practical. But generally there are many more divisions than these: and the form of the sermon may include the prologue, the considerations, and the epilogue. The prologue must vividly set out the conditions of time and place and circumstance which give colour and significance to the text, with some particular emphasis predisposing the attention of the hearers to the lesson which the sermon will enforce. The considerations which follow the prologue may form a catena in regular development from the prologue, reaching a climax in a final application; or they may be severally short reflections of moral and spiritual character issuing in a general conclusion. The opening of the sermon is of great importance, but the close must always be a matter of more concern to the preacher. And, whether a sermon is to be given without the aid of a manuscript or to be read deliberately line by line from the pulpit, the actual framework may well be set down in ten or twelve short lines as the first great step in the composition. This will enable the preacher to follow the counsel of St. Paul, to teach proportionately.

3. Structure of a Sermon.

Happily the order of the Christian year helps by suggestion in the choice of texts and subjects:

4. Topics and Treatment. and the earliest sermons commonly preached in the English Church were short expositions of the Holy Gospel, delivered from the altar step as soon as the Gospel was read, and called postils, from the words post illa verba. The regular sequence of the Christian year keeps the balance of incident and doctrine: it sets out the life of Christ in its true order, and upon that foundation it enunciates the teaching mission of the Holy Ghost. Formerly every parish priest was bidden to hear his people, one by one, repeat the Creed and the Lord's Pr. in the season of Lent, that so he might be assured that every parishioner knew the standard of the Christian faith and the norm of Christian worship. The same principle may be observed to-day, if due attention is given by the preacher to dogmatic and devotional theology. Every sermon should contribute something to the hearers' understanding of the Christian faith; and the preacher ought within himself to know what article of the Creed he is amplifying and illuminating. In the same way a balance must be kept between the objective and the subjective. Objective sermons are ordinarily the more necessary and subjective the more popular; it is the duty of the preacher to set out the objects of the faith, and it is the pleasure of the people to listen to pathetic and moving portrayals of human affection and emotional experience. The preacher must be very cautious and restrained on all the subjective aspects of religion, and careful to insist always upon the revealed truths which constitute the Faith. It must be remembered also that appeals to emotion soon lose their force and become worthless by repetition, whilst the power of doctrinal teaching is cumulative: a strict economy in the use of terms of personal intimacy or affection is a part of the preacher's prudence, if he would not exhaust the value of his influence and ministry.

The proper length of the sermon and the proper pace of utterance must befit the audience; the dangers are on the side of too great

5. Length and Delivery. length and too great rapidity. Often too much is attempted in one sermon, and digressions are made from the main theme without sufficient reason. The principal advantage of preaching without a manuscript is the opportunity which the preacher has of judging the attention of his hearers: when once that flag he should end his sermon as soon as he can, consistently with decent order. And, in the matter of pace, he should aim at keeping such a moderate and average speed as will enable him to vary at will to greater or less rapidity; from the easy rhythmic movement of the sentences of narration or description he should be ready to move into attack with rising voice and short periods, or to make his profound impression in the slow and measured terms of an utterance which must be remembered. But no occasion requires or can justify the sharp strident tone: earnestness must be evident, but anger must never be allowed, and the spirit of the prophet must always be subject to the prophet. The preacher should use the simplest of sentences possible; in this St. John's Gospel is an excellent model, and personal intercourse with little children is a great education to this end. At the same time, he needs the widest range of language attainable, and ought to be able to express his doctrines in terms familiar to the several classes of men. The language of the Holy Bible and of Spenser is the best equipment for one who would reach the common people; affectation and pedantry are as much to be dreaded and avoided as conventionalism and rhetorical expressions. The preacher in full possession of the truth which he has to convey, in full control of himself, his voice and his feelings, in full sympathy with the people to whom he addresses himself, will preach courageously, sincerely and effectively; and the word will not return void but it shall accomplish that for which it has been sent forth.—Te.

JOHN WAKEFORD.

PREBEND: PREBENDARY.—A prebend is an endowment in land or a pension in money given to a cath. ch. for the maintenance of a priest, being one of the chapter, hence called a Prebendary. By Act 3 and 4 Vict., c. 113 (1840), the members of the chapter (except the Dean) are now called Canons. In some chapters of the Old Foundation the name Prebendary is retained for the titular holder of a disendowed prebend, whose status is in most respects similar to that of honorary Canons.—A3.

R. J. WHITWELL.

PRECENTOR.—The office of P. became one of necessity as soon as the Church was in a position to carry out her worship adequately, and required bodies of persons to assist in so doing.¹ Hook (Ch. Dict.) says that the first mention of such an office is to be found in the 4th cent.; just about the time when, persecution being past, the Church had leisure to adjust her worship in a more dignified way. The primary duty of a P. was to regulate the music of the service, and Ven. Bede records the work for the improvement of Psalmody done in England by John, the P. of St. Peter's at Rome, sent for the purpose by the Pope of the time (Agatho), the result of whose instruction had an influence on the Council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (Polity Christian Ch., Pelliccia). But other duties came to be added, and Dr. Rock (Ch. of our Fathers, vol. iv, 135) summarised the duties of the Mediaeval P. thus:

"To the P. belonged the duty of regulating all those things which concerned the singing of the divine service. He it was who wrote down on the board . . . the names of such as should undertake the different choir-offices, or serve at the Altar, for the next week."

In the old cathedral foundations, both in England and France, the P. was always a dignitary; in the newer foundations, a minor canon was appointed (see Dict. of Musicians). Jebb (Choral Service) states that in some capitular bodies the P. ranked next to the dean. He adds: "To the P. the superintendence of the principal part of the Church service belonged. He examined and superintended the chanters, appointed the Musical Services, and was responsible for the appointment of the choir boys" (p. 39). He thus indicates the duties which were gradually vested in this office.

Such an office was at first only needed in cathedral or collegiate churches. But when, in the last century, central parochial churches began to gather together bodies of persons, whether as choir or otherwise, to carry out a more complete and orderly form both of choral and ceremonial worship, some sort of office such as that of P. became desirable, to undertake the oversight of the various church assistants. Accordingly, in a large staff of clergy, the Incumbent usually appoints one, qualified for the duty, to act as "choir chaplain" or "P.," and thus the old office is finding its way, usefully, into the machinery of a large parish.

1 "Pronunciator" and "Archicantor" were alternative titles.

His work, (i) so far as the musical part is concerned, would be done in conjunction with the choirmaster and organist (always supposing those two duties to be centred in one person, as is most usually the case nowadays). They would consult over the choir lists, the choirmaster knowing best what his choir could undertake; and would naturally work together in the choice of fresh voices: and (ii) in training servers, etc., he would work with his sacristan, or whoever might be entrusted with this duty. Such an office is of real value, if only the two precepts of St. Paul be kept in view: "τῇ φιλαδελφίᾳ εἰς ἀλλήλους φιλόστοργοι" (Rom. 12 10), and "πάντα εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τὸ ξύνη γινώσκου" (1 Cor. 14 40).—Q1.

JAMES BADEN POWELL.

PREFACE (IN COMMUNION SERVICE).—

The P. is so called, because it is an introduction to the Canon, or most solemn part

1. The Name. of the Service. Its title varies. In the Roman (also the Sarum) it is Praefatio, in the Mozarabic Illatio (= offering), in the Gallican Contestatio (= witness), in the Gothic Immolatio. (See further, DCA, art. Preface.)

In the Eastern Churches only one P. is found in each Liturgy. In the West the idea that special seasons and festivals naturally called for suitable memorials of the blessings associated with them soon led to the introduction of a great variety of forms of thanksgiving, e.g., in the Gallican and Mozarabic rites there was a P. for every Sunday and Festival; in the Ambrosian for week days as well (Hammond, Liturgies, pp. 322-3). Gregory the Great reduced them to eight in the Roman Church. In the Leofric Missal (11th cent.) nine are enumerated as enjoined by Pope Pelagius (Maskell, Ancient Liturgy, p. 113). To these a tenth was added, to be used in the English Church in honour of the Blessed Virgin, by the 14th canon of the Synod of Westminster in 1175 (Wilkins' Concilia, i, p. 478). The Ps. in the Celtic Church varied only in the naming of the Seasons (see Warren, Celtic Church, p. 99 ff.; Scudamore, NE, p. 238).

The mediæval English uses had Ps. for Christmas, Epiphany, Lent, Passiontide, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, Trinity, Festivals of the Virgin, and Festivals of the Apostles. The absence of a P. for Good Friday is noticeable (cp. Warren, l.c.) as bearing on the question of Good Friday Celebrations of HC (SPCK Prayer Book, p. 107).

In 1549 the Ps. were reduced to five, which were restricted to the festival itself; but in 1552 three of these were directed to be said on seven days and one on six days afterwards, the whole forming the OCTAVE, a Western arrangement possibly borrowed from the Jewish custom of extending a festival over seven or eight days (Lev. 23 36, 1 Macc. 4 56; cp. DCA, s.v.).

The Christmas Day P. is based on the Coll. for Christmas Eve in the Gel. Sacramentary, and it

4. For Christmas Day. was new in 1549. The only change it has undergone since is "as at this time," substituted in 1662 for "at this day."

The Sarum P. was: "because through the mystery of the Incarnate Word the new light of Thy Brightness shone on the eyes of our mind, that while we know God visibly we may through Him be rapt into the love of things invisible." This is from the Greg. Sacramentary (Scudamore, NE, p. 540).

The Easter P. is from the Gel. Sacramentary: "Te quidem omni tempore, sed in hac potissimum nocte gloriosius praedicare, quum

5. For Easter Day. Pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus. Ipse enim verus est Agnus qui abstulit peccata mundi; qui mortem nostram moriendo destruxit, et vitam resurgendo reparavit."

The Ascension Day P. is from the Greg. Sacramentary, and varies slightly from the Latin: "Per Christum Dominum nostrum; qui post resurrectionem suam omnibus discipulis suis manifestus apparuit, et ipsis cementibus est elevatus in coelum, ut nos divinitatis suae tribueret esse participes."

The source of the Whitsuntide P. is unknown, though it has been compared to a P. for Pentecost in the Gallican Liturgy (Palmer, 7. For Whit-Sunday. Orig. Lit. 2 124). It was composed in 1549, taking the place of the Sarum form, "through Christ our Lord, Who, ascending above all heavens and sitting at Thy right Hand, did this day pour the promised Holy Ghost on the sons of adoption." Exception has been taken to the phrase, "giving them the gift of divers languages." But it is the natural interpretation of the statements in Acts 2 4-11.

Trinity Sunday occupies the last day of the Octave of Whit-Sunday, and this festival has therefore no

8. For Trinity Sunday. Octave, but it is distinguished by the fact that the following Sundays are named and numbered after it, instead of after Pentecost as in the Greek and Roman Churches. This is in accordance with the ancient usage of the Church of England (Luckock, Divine Lit., p. 262). The Trinity P. is directed to be used on the "Feast of Trinity only," "only" being added in 1552. (Before the Reformation the same P. was used on every Sunday until Advent.) It is a free translation of the Pre-Reformation P.,¹ which is found in the Gel., Sarum and Roman, but not in the Greg. rite (Maskell, Anc. Lit., p. 105; Scudamore NE, p. 542), omitting the last portion, probably on account of the difficulty of translating it. The Amer. PB has an alternative P. for Trinity Sunday.

¹ "Qui cum unigenito Filio tuo et Spiritu Sancto unus es Deus, unus es Dominus, non in unius singularitate Personae, sed in unius Trinitate substantiae; quod enim de tua gloria revelante te credimus, hoc de Filio tuo, hoc de Spiritu Sancto, sine differentia discretionis sentimus. Ut in confessione verae sempiternaeque Deitatis, et in personis proprietates, et in essentia unitas, et in maiestate adoretur aequalitas." We may note that the Latin is addressed to God the Father, the English to the whole Trinity, this necessitating the omission of the words "Holy Father" in the earlier part of the Preface.

On days when there is no Proper P., the Common P. is used, composed simply of two paragraphs which precede and follow the Proper Ps. when they are said. A custom formerly prevailed for the people to say the latter of these two paragraphs, "Therefore with angels," etc., with the priest. But this custom has to a great extent been given up, and is forbidden by the Rubric of the present Amer. PB. The two paragraphs are free translations of forms occurring in the Gel., Sar., etc. We give the original Latin. "Vere dignum et justum est, aequum et salutare, nos tibi semper et ubique gratias agere, Domine sancte, Pater omnipotens, aeternae Deus." (It will be noted that the opening words of this take up the people's Response, "Dignum et justum est," which has just been said.) "Et ideo cum angelis et archangelis, cum thronis et dominationibus, cumque omni militia coelestis exercitus, hymnum gloriae tuae canimus, sine fine dicentes." (This, of course, as in the English, is immediately followed by the SANCTUS.) [A welcome "enrichment" of the PB would be the provision of proper Ps. for Epiphany, All Saints' and other Festivals.]
—H2. J. F. KEATING.

PREFACES TO THE PB.—There are two Pref. to the PB. The second, now entitled "Concerning the Service of the Church," was the original Pref. composed by Cranmer and placed bef. the book of 1549. It received a brief addition in 1552, viz., the sentence "And if the Bishop . . . to the Archbishop." The document is one of the passages which have been influenced by QUIGNON'S BREVIARY. An original draft in Lat. is found in the scheme of Cranmer referred to under HISTORY OF PB, § 1. This Lat. draft was remodelled by him for the book of 1549. It begins by describing the scriptural character of the primitive order. Next, it refers to mediæval corruption by additions, omissions, neglect. Then the characteristics of the present order are set forth, viz., a calendar for continuous Scripture reading, an order more profitable, pure, intelligible and commodious, which is besides a uniform national use. After this, directions are given for the decision of disputes. Lastly, an appendix is added as to the private use of foreign devotions, with directions for the daily use of the PB by the clergy.

The present first Pref. was contributed by Sanderson, Bp. of Lincoln, in 1662. It begins by reviewing the principle, form and authority of some previous revisions. It then describes the origin of the recent revision, viz., the King's condescension to Puritan importunity for alteration and addition. Next comes the treatment of their demands, viz., rejection of the dangerous and frivolous, concession of what was reasonable or expedient, yet with no acknowledgment of previous unscripturalness, uncatholicity, or unreasonableness. Finally, there is a summary of the alterations made by the revisers of 1662, viz., Calendar and Rubric change, removal of obsolete and ambiguous words, substitution of AV for earlier versions, addition of occasional ps. and thanksgivings. And at the end a hope of acceptance is expressed.

—B.

H. GEE.

PRELATE.—A term of the HIERARCHY of Jurisdiction, meaning properly anyone who is prælatus or preferred to others in the Church, but restricted in practice to those who are set above a simple parish priest. In modern English usage it is applied only to bishops.—TA. T. A. LACEY.

PREPARATION FOR BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION AND HOLY COMMUNION.

Our Blessed Lord gave instructions 1. Preparation in the NT. to His Apostles that they should "make disciples of all nations" by "baptising them into the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." The use of this formula would imply a certain knowledge on the part of those to be baptised of the truths which the formula involved, and so would postulate previous instruction and a Conf. of faith. This is exemplified in the record of the Bapt. of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8): he first received instruction in the rudiments of the Christian Faith ("Philip preached unto him Jesus"), and then made a profession of his personal faith in that which was declared to him ("I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God," Acts 8:37).¹

The admission into the Christian community by Holy Bapt. was followed by the Apostolic rite of "LAYING ON OF HANDS" referred to in Heb. 6:2, and exemplified in the case of the Samaritan converts who, having received instruction from Philip the Deacon and having been baptised by him, afterwards received the "Laying on of Hands" (preceded by pr.) from the Apostles Peter and John (Acts 8:5, 12, 14-17). A like ceremonial act was performed by St. Paul in the case of a body of Ephesians who had received "John's Baptism" (Acts 19:1-7). In both these cases the "Laying on of Hands" was accompanied by a special Gift of the Holy Ghost.

We have no further details as to the P. of candidates for these sacred rites in apostolic times. Jewish converts to the Christian Faith had already received instruction in the truths common to Judaism and Christianity, and would only need to be instructed in the doctrines specifically Christian; while the Gentiles would need such rudimentary teaching as St. Paul gave, e.g., at Lystra and at Athens.

The writers of the 2nd cent. furnish us with little evidence as to the P. required for the initial rites of the Christian Church.

2. Preparation in 2nd and 3rd Centuries. Justin Martyr speaks of a profession of faith in the doctrines in which the candidates had been instructed, and a promise to live conformably to that faith, as well as a Conf. of past sins. From his Apology and from the Didache we gather that fasting (as preparatory to the ceremony) was enjoined on the candidate, on the administrant, and on other members of the Church.

In the 3rd cent. the writings of Tertullian supply considerable details of the P. for, and administration of, Bapt. The candidate had to prepare himself for it by pr., fastings and vigils. It was usually administered at Easter or during the fifty days following. Before entering the font, which had been previously blessed, the neophyte solemnly renounced the devil, his pomp, and his angels. After the sacred washing conferred in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, he received an unction of consecrated oil and the imposition of hands, during which the Bp. prayed that the Holy Spirit might be given to him. He then made his first Communion (see Duchesne's Christian Worship, translated by M. L. McClure, pp. 334 and 335). Thus on the same day the candidate was admitted into the Church by Holy Bapt., received the Sacramental Laying on of Hands, and partook of the HC—one P. serving for the whole series.

¹ The verse is omitted in RV, but it has considerable MS. authority, and is quoted as early as Irenæus: "It may well have expressed what actually happened" (Expositor's Gr. Test.).

Later, the P. was made more definite and the ceremonies attending it were greatly elaborated.

These included: (i) The formal admission to the Catechuminate (with the Insufflatio, or Breathing on, in imitation of our Lord's act, John 20 22), those thus admitted being reckoned as Christians, and those who desired it (known as competentes) being put under further special P. for Holy Bapt. Infants were reckoned as Catechumens, received Bapt. and the Imposition of hands, and were admitted to HC. (ii) The Scrutinies or Testings, to which the competentes were subjected during the period of P., usually the 40 days before Easter—these including instruction in the Christian formularies and belief. (iii) The Exorcisms—the banning of the evil spirits which were supposed to have their abode in the unbaptised. (iv) The Effeta—corresponding with the Ephphatha (i.e., be opened) pronounced by our Lord at the healing of the deaf-mute (Mark 7 34), and accompanied by a similar ceremonial act.

This ceremonial was further modified as time went on. Originally the Bp. alone baptised and confirmed and gave the First Communion. But the difficulty of securing the presence of a Bp., except at rare intervals, led to the separation of Bapt., which was administered in infancy by the priest, from Confirm., the administration of which was restricted in the Western Church to the Bishop. Confirm. was then administered when the child came to "years of discretion" (though earlier than is now customary), and was followed by First Communion.

At the Reformation the three Services were made distinct, and a separate preparation enjoined in each case.

(i) In the case of infants, a personal P. for Bapt. could not be secured. But it is required that the child should be represented by GODPARENTS who, in accordance with canon 29, should be communicant members of the Church, and thus well instructed in the Christian Faith. They are charged with the duty of seeing that the child is "virtuously brought up to lead a Godly and a Christian life," and instructed in the formularies of the Christian religion; and in the meantime their faith is accepted on behalf of the child they represent at the Font (Mark 2 5).

When in 1662 a Form was provided for the Bapt. of those of Riper Years, specific directions are given as to their P.—"Timely notice shall be given to the Bishop" . . . "that so due care may be taken for their examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the Principles of the Christian Religion; and that they may be exhorted to prepare themselves with Prayers and Fastings for the receiving of this holy Sacrament."

(ii) The P. of intellect as preparatory to Confirm. is implied in the concluding Address to the sponsors in the Bapt. Service.

Children are to be "brought to the Bishop to be confirmed by him, so soon as they can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, and be further instructed in the Church Cat. set forth for that purpose."¹ The injunction (in the last rubric of the Cat.) that "the Curate of every Parish shall either bring, or send in writing . . . the names of all such persons within his Parish as he shall think fit to be presented to the Bishop to be confirmed," implies a spiritual preparation of the candidates by the Parish Priest, and such examination as will satisfy him that they come with right dispositions of soul and spirit; as well as with clear understanding of the relation in which they stand to Almighty God by virtue of their Bapt., and with faithful anticipation of the Grace to be received through the Laying on of Hands.

(iii) The P. for HC is primarily by way of self-examination, in accordance with St. Paul's teaching (1 Cor. 11 28). This examination is to be "by the rule of God's commandments" (Exhortation in HC), and is to extend to three departments: (a) Repentance with purpose of amendment, (b) Faith, (c) Charity or Love (Cat.). The outcome of this examination would be: (a) Conf. to Almighty God, (b) Reconciliation with our neighbours, (c) Restitution and Satisfaction to those we have wronged, where this is possible. The PB further enjoins resort to God's Ministers for the man who cannot by the means aforesaid "quiet his own conscience"; such recourse would be made for the Conf. of sins by which the conscience was burdened ("open his grief"), "that by the ministry of God's holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice."²

While the Church leaves a very large liberty to the individual conscience, it at the same time gives very solemn warning, in the Exhortations of the Communion Service, of the great danger of an unworthy receiving of the Holy Sacrament. It also provides in the rubrics for the repelling from the Lord's

¹ Till the final revision in 1662, the Cat. was printed as a part of the Confirm. Service.

² It will be observed that the rule of the Church of England in this respect differs from that of the Mediaeval Church, which (by a decree of the Lateran Council, 1215) made Conf. to the Priest a necessary preliminary to the reception of HC. The wise words of the First PB of Edward VI may be well quoted here: "requiring such as shall be satisfied with a General Confession not to be offended with them that do use, to their further satisfying, the Auricular and secret Confession to the Priest; nor those also which think needful or convenient, for the quietness of their own consciences, particularly to open their sins to the Priest, to be offended with them that are satisfied with their humble confession to God . . . but in all things to follow and keep the rule of charity."

8. Disciplinary Table, under proper authority, and other safeguards. (a) "notorious evil livers," (b)

"those betwixt whom" the Curate "perceiveth malice and hatred to reign."

It is a disciplinary rule of our Branch of the Church that "none shall be admitted to the Holy Communion until such time as he be confirmed, or be ready and desirous to be confirmed."—K6.

E. HOBSON.

PRESANCTIFIED, MASS OF THE.—From very early times the celebration of the Euch. was forbidden on certain fast-days. This was the case everywhere on Good Fr.; at Rome also on Easter Even; at Milan on all Fridays in Lent; in the East on all week-days in Lent, except Saturdays, the Annunciation and Maundy Th. By the 7th cent., both in East and West (see canon 52 of Council in Trullo, and Gelasian Sacramentary 141), a custom had arisen of reserving some of the elements consecrated at the last Euch. for the Communion of priest (and people) on prohibited days. The resultant Service of Communion without fresh Consecration was called the Mass of the P., and was used at Rome and in Mediæval Eng. on Good Fr. only. It was very short and simple. The consecrated host was brought in, the Lord's Pr. said with its Preface and Embolismus (see LORD'S PRAYER, § 7, 8), and the Communion then took place. The Mass of the P. was abrogated in Eng. in 1549.

J. W. TYRER.

PRESBYTERIAN.—See DIRECTORY; EPISCOPACY, § 4; FORMS OF PRAYER; PURITANS. In these arts. the influence of Calvin in favour of the P. system in England is sufficiently illustrated. Most of the 17th cent. P. congregations in England came under Socinian influences in the 18th cent., and are now undistinguishable from Unitarian bodies. There are similar old endowed chapels in N. Ireland. The "Presbyterian Ch. of Eng." is a recent formation, largely due to Scottish, and esp. Free Ch., auspices. But it now includes many English people. It is well organised, broad-minded in tone, charitable in its activities, and as a rule friendly towards the Ch. of England. Perhaps the most promising overtures towards REUNION on a satisfactory basis are those which have been exchanged in Australia between the Ang. Ch. there and the Presbyterians.—A1.

G. HARFORD.

PRESENTATION.—See NOMINATION, INSTITUTION, PATRON, LAPSE.

PRIEST.—Ordination to the sacred office of the priesthood is a necessary qualification in the Ch. for the fulfilment of various functions. In the first place only a P. can celebrate the Euch. He alone can absolve. The Absolutions in the public services can only be read by a P. With regard to Baptism he is the ordinary minister; a deacon is only to baptise in the absence of the P. (see the Ordinal); so that it would be irregular for a deacon to administer Baptism in the presence of a P. A P. has an "habitual" right to preach the Word of God, though only

"actually" so in a place to which the Bp. licenses him; whereas a deacon has no right to preach unless he has the special permission and licence of the Bp. to do so. The right of preaching, that is to say, is inherent in his status as a P., though he cannot exercise that or any of his functions without jurisdiction. A P., therefore, can lawfully and canonically preach if invited to do so by a parish P. (see ORDINARY). But a parish P. could not invite a deacon to preach unless, besides his status as a deacon, he had licence from "the Bp. himself" to do so; the right is not inherent in his status as deacon. To a P. belongs the power of benediction; a deacon cannot bless. Thus it is said in the Apostolical Constitutions (828): "A presbyter blesses but does not receive the blessing; yet does he receive it from the Bp. or a fellow-presbyter. In like manner does he give it to a fellow-presbyter. He lays on hands but does not ordain; he does not deprive, yet does he separate those who are under him if they be liable to such a punishment. A deacon does not bless, does not give the blessing, but receives it from the Bp. and presbyter; he does not baptise, he does not offer; but when a Bp. or presbyter has offered, he distributes to the people, not as a P., but as one that ministers to the priests." Marriage cannot be canonically solemnised except by a P. From the enactment of the 13th of the Statuta Antiqua (5th cent.) onward, the Church has provided that the marriages of the faithful shall be blessed by a P., though such benediction is in no way necessary for the validity of the marriage. The duty of the minister of the Church in respect to marriage is to bless the parties who have contracted. Hence it is necessary that the minister should be a P. The present marriage service of the Ch. of Eng. clearly requires this. Three terms are used, P., curate, minister. It can scarcely be contended, however, that these three terms apply to any but one and the same person. Moreover the first benediction is to be given by "the minister," but, as a benediction can only be given by a P., it is clear that the person spoken of as the minister must be a P. It is quite certain that the Pre-Reformation law was that none but a P. should solemnise marriage, and no authority, either civil or ecclesiastical, can be adduced in support of the proposition that a deacon can canonically solemnise. Indeed, Lord Campbell, in the case of The Queen v. Millis in the House of Lords in 1843, seemed to doubt whether a marriage solemnised by a deacon would be a legal marriage; he said: "The Judges seemed to intimate that a marriage by a deacon before the Reformation would have been bad, but that since the Reformation it is valid. I should like to know by what authority the change has been brought about. Lord Hardwicke's Act is silent upon the subject, and Parliament has in no shape interfered. No canon has been passed by Convocation. The Book of Common Prayer says a deacon may baptise in the absence of the P., it is silent as to his authority to marry."¹ Those parts of the public services where the rubrics intimate that the P. should officiate should not be said by a deacon. In fact, strictly speaking, a deacon should not take a service by himself, he is assistant to the P., who should be present. It is necessary that a presentee should be a P. before he can be instituted to a benefice, or be admitted to any dignity. Thus, the Caroline Act of Uniformity enacts, § 14, "that no person whatsoever shall thenceforth be capable to be admitted to any parsonage, vicarage, benefice, or other eccles. promotion, or dignity whatsoever, nor shall presume to consecrate or administer the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, before such time as he shall be ordained P., according to the form and manner in and by the said book prescribed, unless he have formerly been made P. by Episcopal ordination."—ra.

E. G. WOOD.

PRIESTHOOD.—A priest may be defined as "one whose office is to perform religious functions; an official minister of

1. Introduction. religious worship" (NED). The meaning of the word in English is often ambiguous, owing to the fact that it may be used in different senses, as the equivalent of presbyter, from which it is etymologically derived, or as the English rendering of the Latin sacerdos. It has often been asserted that the former is the only meaning that the word can bear in Christian usage, and that in Christianity there is neither P. nor sacrifice. The great feature which distinguishes Christianity from other and lower religions is thus said to consist in the fact that it possesses no priesthood. But, if there is a real sense in which we can speak of a Christian SACRIFICE, so too we may allow that P. has a place in Christianity, remembering also that the offering of sacrifice is not by any means the sole function of the priest.

A study of comparative religion shows us that ministerial priestly acts,—viz., acts of worship performed by one on behalf of the many—are common to all ancient religions. This is due to the fact that early religion and worship is social rather than individual, and is primarily concerned with the family or community. But the existence of a separate priestly class, distinct from the natural heads of the community, is not so easily explained. Many considerations enter into account for the rise of such a class. Ritual requirements, the demands of asceticism or special sanctity, mere convenience, may all be held conjointly responsible. The differentiation may be a slow process; the priest and the king, or the priest and the sorcerer, may never be entirely separated. All alike are held to be acting on behalf of the community, whether their functions be secular or religious.

¹ [In Halsbury, Laws of Eng., 1910, 11 376 n., it is stated that "it is apprehended that it is in accordance with this principle" (i.e., the abolition of the common law of the realm, including all valid canon law, by "general and long-continued non-user and custom to the contrary") "that the power of a deacon to solemnise matrimony (now undoubtedly legal) exists. The old rule of the canon law dropped, or rather was 'utterly abolished' and 'became frustrate and of none effect'; a new one took its place at the Reformation and has been acted on ever since." It seems clear that the courts will uphold the validity of a marriage solemnised by a deacon; but the practice is, as shown in the text, irregular and incongruous with other PB provisions, and would seem to be one requiring fresh canonical regulation. G. H.]

There is much mention of priesthood, and there is a very large "priestly element," in the history and literature of Israel. But a development is to be observed.

8. In the Old Testament. The position of the priesthood in the early days of nomadic life is very different from that of the post-exilic hierarchy. The religion of the desert was simple in character and expression, and its occasional sacrifices did not require expert priestly assistance for their performance. It was the offerer himself who slew the victim and divided the sacrifice among his family or friends. The only priests were the keepers of the local shrines or sanctuaries, and their functions were oracular and judicial. It was not until the Israelites encountered the settled agricultural civilisation of Canaan that a separate priestly class came into prominence, as the worship at the sanctuaries became more sumptuous and more elaborate. We see the process at work in the period of the Judges and in the first days of the Monarchy.

But a recollection of the earlier liberty with regard to the exercise of priestly functions always remained. Thus, in Ex. 19 6, we have the statement, "And ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation." There was an idealisation of the past, no doubt under prophetic influence. In the writings of the prophets we find very stern denunciations of the priests of the day. But it is not P. in itself that is attacked. The prophets complain of the moral delinquencies of the priests and the fact that they have neglected their teaching functions. The priest is blamed for encouraging, rather than repressing, the popular materialistic view of religion. The prophetic ideals found their embodiment in the legislation of Deuteronomy, which aimed at a reformation of the P. The abolition of the high-places and the centralisation of worship at Jerusalem suppressed the country priests, but enormously increased the power of the Temple priesthood. In the Book of Ezekiel, and in the Priestly Code, we see a further "sacerdotalising" of the Jewish religion, which finds expression in the idea of a theocracy administered by a hierarchy. The secret of the priests' power lay in their special privilege of access to the altar, and in the atoning merit of priestly sacrifices. In the sacrificial feasts the offerer still played an important part, but in the other more strictly expiatory sacrifices the priest was the chief agent.

(a) Our Lord's Teaching. By the time of our Lord another type of religion had sprung up alongside of the more formalistic worship. The religion of the 8. NT: Christ's Teaching and Office. Psalmists and Pharisaic pietists did not lay such great stress on priestly sacrifices. Our Lord Himself, while

He observed the Festivals of His countrymen, has in His recorded utterances very little concern with the P. of the day. He opposes Himself to the worldly Sadducean party, which was largely composed of priests, and He quotes the saying of the prophet, "I desire mercy and not sacrifice" (Hos. 6 6).

He seems to accept the P. as the official authority in cases of leprosy, but he gives an unfavourable picture of the Priest and Levite in the Parable of the Good Samaritan. We may infer, however, from the account given us of Zacharias in St. Luke, that good and devout men were to be found amongst the priests of the day. In Acts also we read that priests were attracted to the Christian faith (Acts 6 7).

(b) The Priesthood of Christ. The starting-point for the Christian P. is the P. of Christ. Our Lord spoke of His death in sacrificial terms, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews we have the full significance of that Sacrifice brought out.

Christ has shown in Himself the eternal value of P., "having become a high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb. 6 20), and the Sacrifice which He offers is Himself. He has been "appointed for men in things pertaining to God" (Heb. 5 1). The P. of Christ has fulfilled and completed all others. There is no longer any use for the many priests of the OT with their multitude of sacrifices, because the one great High Priest has offered the one Sacrifice.

(c) Of the Church. But this does not mean that man can henceforth dispense with all earthly Priesthood. It is most

4. Universal P. necessary to remember that the P. of the OT was not the best possible. It was abolished because of its defects, and because it had belied the true nature of P. We need not be surprised that there is no mention of any special priestly class in the NT. There was naturally a very strong revolt against the old Jewish idea, and the danger of its recrudescence would be keenly felt. Service and self-sacrifice, rather than the offering of sacrifices, were to be the most prominent attributes of the Christian ministry.

But, on the other hand, there is very distinct mention of the universal P. The old thought of Ex. 19 6 is revived: Christians in their capacity as the true "people of God" are to be "a holy P., to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 2 5). "Ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession" (v. 9). The community of the Church of Christ is thus a priestly body, and is called upon to exercise its priestly functions. The priestliness is that of the Church in its corporate capacity. We are "priests unto God" as members of the "kingdom," and as belonging to the "royal race" (Rev. 1 6).

(d) Of the Ministry. The question then remains, How is the Church of Christ to exercise her priestly duties? In the Epistles of St. Paul we are shown how the Ch., as the Body of Christ, acts through its members who are endowed with different capacities.

5. Ministerial P. There is no dead level of function, but rather the most varied expressions of activity. Yet all is to be done for "edification," i.e., for the building up of the Body of Christ. It is in this way that the Ch. can express her priestliness. Certain members of the body are to be, on behalf of the rest, the ministerial organs of the Church's priesthood. Certain individuals are to be enabled to develop more than others the faculties of priesthood which they possess as members of the priestly community. They are to be definitely chosen, in the interests of edification and order, to perform priestly action on behalf of the community. Christ's Apostolic ministers are to be the normal organs for exercising the priestly functions which belong to the body.¹

What, then, are the priestly functions of the Ch.? The P. of the Ch. depends, as we have seen, upon the P. of Christ. And

6. Priestly Functions. Christ is a Priest, inasmuch as He has "somewhat also to offer"

(Heb. 8 3), namely, Himself. The P. of the Ch. must be brought into relationship with the eternal Sacrifice of Christ. It is the duty of the Ch. to "show forth [RV "proclaim"] the Lord's death till He come" (1 Cor. 11 26). The offering of the Eucharist is corporate, but the corporate offering must be expressed in unified action by the official minister of the Church, whose duty it is to be "a faithful Dispenser of the holy Sacraments." Further, Christ as our Priest "ever liveth to make intercession for" us (Heb. 7 25). It follows then that the P. of the Ch. must be intercessory, and that her ministry should be a ministry of intercession. Again, Christ is the Good Shepherd, and the ministry of the Ch. must be "pastoral," but pastoral and priestly are not contradictory terms, for the Good Shepherd "layeth down His life for the sheep" (John 10 11) as a sacrifice for them. So, too, the priests of the Church must manifest in themselves that spirit of self-sacrifice which actuated their Master, Who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many" (Mk. 10 45). But the P. is the vehicle of expression not only for the Church's sacrificial functions but also for her teaching and ruling functions. The exercise of discipline, the power of "binding and loosing," is committed to certain individuals as representing the Ch. Again, the Ch. is to be taught by those whom she has definitely appointed for the purpose, to be "faithful Dispensers of the Word of God." And she prays for her priests, "That they may both by their life and doctrine set forth thy true and lively Word, and rightly and duly administer thy holy Sacraments."

¹ (Cp. Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 268: "The minister's function is representative without being vicarial. He is a priest, as the mouthpiece, the delegate, of a priestly race.")

² ["As often as ye eat this bread and drink the cup, ye proclaim (καταγγέλλετε, not ἀναγγέλλετε, as Ps. 38 18) the Lord's death till He come." The proclamation seems primarily to have a manward reference, and to be effected by the congregation in the act of communion.—G. H.]

To sum up, then, we may say that "the special P. of any class within the body is derivative from the P. of the body itself, and that is derivative from the P. of its Head. It is more or less a matter of history as to how that P. has been exercised" (Abp. Lang, in Priesthood and Sacrifice, p. 160).

And as a fact we find that in the history of the Ch. the best corrective for "sacerdotalism" has been the re-assertion of the priestly character of the Ch. It was only natural that OT and pagan ideas should influence the thought and practice of the Ch., and that what was only in the first instance a useful analogy (cp. Clement, Ad. Cor. 40, and his mention of priest, Levite, and layman) should become a source of great evil when too literally applied. In the Middle Ages, while there is occasional reference to the universal P. of the Ch.,¹ the priestly order is spoken of in the most extravagant language.² The priest stands between God and His worshipper; the sacrificial functions of the P. and the power of Absolution are insisted upon to the exclusion of all else; in a word, the priesthood has once more become Judaic. The Reformation was essentially a revolt against this sacerdotal view of Christianity. The priest had assumed a despotic position, and his tyranny extended over both this life and the next. Hence it was only to be expected that some of the extreme reformers³ should wish to abolish all idea of a Christian P. by maintaining that every man is his own priest, in reality a contradiction in terms. But in the writings of Luther we find an emphatic statement of the priestliness of the Church. He maintains that Bapt. makes a man a priest,⁴ while he also asserts, "For though it is true that we are all equally priests, yet we cannot, nor ought we if we could, all to minister and teach publicly." Further, at the Eucharist, "We are there in our priestly dignity. We do not let the priest proclaim for himself the ordinance of Christ; but he is the mouth-piece of us all, and we all say it with him in our hearts with true faith in the Lamb of God Who feeds us with His Body and Blood." In Calvin there is scant room for individualism in religion. The Church is the "mother of all the godly" (Inst. 4 1), and has her definitely appointed ministry. Though the name of priest is denied to the Christian minister, yet the history of Calvinism shows that there is even a tendency to a despotism of the pastorate which is not far removed from "sacerdotalism."

¹ Cp. Thomas Aq., S. Th., q. 82, art. 1: "Laicus iustus. . . habet spirituale sacerdotium ad offerendum spirituales hostias."

² Even in the Catechism of Trent 2, q. 2, "Quare merito non solum angelis sed dii etiam, quod Dei immortalis viri, et numen apud nos teneant, appellantur."

³ Luther attacks them in his Treatise in 1532 "Against the Socoaks and Hedge Preachers."

⁴ "Sacerdos. . . non fit sed nascitur. . . ex aqua et Spiritu in lavacro regenerationis" (De Inst. Ministris, § 3).

Calvin's Church is no democracy of believers, but a divine organisation for the purpose of ruling men's thought and conduct, in which the minister tends to assume a position of undue importance. Luther's re-assertion of the universal P. of the Church has often been forgotten in the history of Protestantism.

The Eng. Ch. has deliberately retained the words Priest and P. in her PB and ORDINAL.¹

There must have been many inducements to a contrary course.

Hooker shows how abhorrent the words had become in many quarters when he says, "I rather term the one sort Presbyters than Priests, because, in a matter of so small moment, I would not willingly offend their ears to whom the name of P. is odious, though without cause" (EP v. 78 2). The word Altar was removed from the Second PB, yet no change of doctrine is thereby involved, for where there is a priest there is also an altar (cp. the use of "table" and "priest" in the Eastern Church).

After the Reformation it was necessary to assert the validity of English ordinations against the attacks of Roman controversialists, and the language of the Ordinal was brought forward as evidence. Thus, Abp. Bramhall says, "In our very essential form of priestly ordination, priestly power and authority is sufficiently expressed. We need not seek for a needle in a bottle of hay. The words of our Ordinal are clear enough" (Discourse 5 486). The insertion of the words "for the office and work of a priest" into the Ordering of Priests in 1662 left no doubt on the matter, while the rulings of the Savoy Conference were no less decisive.

The language of the PB and Ordinal also shows that the authority of the ministry is not merely "from below," or purely functional.² Ordination is not simply a matter of convenience. The "choice of fit persons" is divinely inspired, and the candidates are "inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost," as well as "truly called." Though there must necessarily be a congregational element (cp. Art. 23), the gift received in Holy Orders is not mere human permission and authority, but the Holy Ghost Himself, "the heavenly wellspring of that power which eccles. ordinations do bestow" (Hooker, EP v. 77 5). Christ's ministers are "sent" by Him, as He was "sent" by the Father (John 17 18). The first requisite for a valid ministry is adequacy of commission.

We may sum up our treatment of P. with the words of Dr. Moberly: "It would be a superficial following of Scripture which would lead men to strike out such words as priest, P., and sacrifice from the familiar vocabulary of the Christian Ch. It would not only be superficial; it would be profoundly and fatally wrong. The Ch. of Christ, as exhibited in the NT, is priestly and sacrificial in substance, as the Ch. of the OT was only in figure. Mosaic P., with its sacrifices, was no more, on the one hand, a non-significant, than it was, on the other, a complete or substantial thing. It sketched out, it led up to, it enacted parabolically, that which transcended itself, that in which alone its detached, external, and symbolic suggestions found their unity and fulness. All P., all sacrifice, is summed up in the Person of Christ" (Ministerial Priesthood, p. 243).

¹ Cp. title of Art. 32, "Of the Marriage of Priests De Coniugio Sacerdotum."

² Contrast Luther, "Therefore a priest should be nothing in Christendom but a functionary."

We may also compare the lines of Dr. Bright:

"When the Church marks out her chosen Stewards of Thy gifts to be,
Thou dost set them o'er the household;
All their priesthood flows from Thee."

See also:—arts. on ORDERS, ORDINAL, SACRIFICE, APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION; Encycl. Brit., 1910-1911, art. Priest; Schaff-Herzog, Encycl., 1905, art. Priesthood in the Christian Ch.; R. C. Moberly, Ministerial P., 1897; W. Sanday (ed.), P. and Sacrifice, 1900; W. Sanday, The Conception of P., 1898; T. T. Carter, Doctrine of the P. in the Ch. of England (2), 1863; A. R. Ryder, The P. of the Laity, 1910.—id.
E. F. MORISON.

PRIMATE.—A term applied in England to the Archbishops of Canterbury (Primate of all England) and York (Primate of England); in Ireland, similarly, to the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin; also to the chief Metropolitans of Canada and Australia. The word Primas is found in some of the African canons as the title of the episcopus primae sedis (ARCHBISHOP), but it has been used elsewhere merely as a mark of dignity without implying any jurisdiction, except that the Archbishop of Lyon formerly received as primate appeals from the Archbishops of Tours, Sens, and Paris (Fleury, Inst. Droit Can. i. 14 6).—13.

T. A. LACEY.

PRIME.—The office to be recited at the first hour, i.e., 6 a.m. Originally said in the dormitory on rising from bed, but afterwards transferred to the choir, and followed in monastic and collegiate churches by the daily office in the chapter-house at which all the business of the day was arranged. (See HOURS OF PRAYER.)—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

PRIMITIVE CHURCH.—The relation of the Reformed Ch. of Eng. to the PC. is perhaps its most characteristic feature, as it constitutes its peculiar distinction from other Reformed Chs. Like all of them, it recognises Holy Scripture as the sole ultimate authority; but subject to this supremacy it recognises the obligation of deference to the PC., alike in belief and in practice.

In the canons of 1571 it is provided respecting preachers that "chiefly they shall take heed that they teach nothing in their preaching, which they would have the people religiously to observe and believe, but that which is agreeable to the doctrine of the OT and the New, and that which the Catholic Fathers and ancient Bishops have gathered out of that doctrine." The late Bp. Collins, from whose edition of these canons (published by the SPCK, 1899) this is quoted, observes that "this canon has always been regarded of the highest importance. It is quoted by Abp. Bancroft in the preface to the edition of Jewel's works which he put forth in 1609 to be placed in Churches, to show 'that it is and hath been the open profession of the Ch. of Eng. to defend and maintain no other Ch., Faith and Religion, than that which is truly Catholic and Apostolic, and for such warranted, not only by the written word of God, but also by the testimony and consent of the ancient and godly Fathers.'"

In this spirit Jewel proclaimed his famous challenge at Paul's Cross in which, as Dr. Jelf states its purport, "he defied his opponent to produce a particle of valid evidence from Scripture, or from any authority within the first six centuries, in support of any one of the propositions which he impugned."

This principle, and similar historic limits, were reasserted in the most deliberate manner by Bp. Cosin in an important treatise published in 1652, entitled The Catholic Religion of England, Primitive, Pure, Purged, explained to all Christian Monarchs, Princes and estates. He commences by stating as "The Perpetual Standard of Religion, first of all the Canon of Scripture," and proceeds:

"After them our authentic instruments are these: the Three Creeds, the First Four Councils, the first five centuries, and throughout them the succession and consent of the Catholic Fathers. For in them is discovered and set forth that early Faith once for all delivered to the Saints—primitive, pure and purged from defilement, apart from human corruptions and later accretions. Further, such Theology in succeeding centuries as is not at variance with this earliest Theology."

One other witness to the same effect a little later will complete this chain of testimony. Bp. Beveridge, dedicating in 1678 to Abp. Sancroft his Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Catholicae, wrote as follows:

"How great is the harmony between the Primitive Ch. and that over which you preside is patent to any one who is but moderately versed in the decrees and rites of both. It is in fact so great that the two can scarcely be distinguished from one another by anything but time. In both there is the same government, the same faith, the same number of Sacraments, the same form of administering them; they have the same rites, the same laws, the same feasts and fasts. In short, in both all things are so held, constituted and declared that the Anglican is justly and deservedly called the Primitive Ch., revived in these last times."

That was the ideal of the leaders of the English Ch. for a century after the Reformation. No authoritative utterance of the Ch. has since abandoned that standard.—A1. H. WACE.

PRIMUS.—See ARCHBISHOP, § 8.

PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY.—See CLERGY, DISABILITIES, etc.

PROCESSION.—In 1547, the first year of the reign of Edw. VI, certain Injunctions were issued by the Council, in which it
1. Edwardian Legislation. was directed that "they shall not from henceforth, in any parish church at any time, use any procession about the church or churchyard, or other place, but immediately before high mass, the priests with other of the quire shall kneel in the midst of the church, and sing or say plainly and distinctly the litany . . . and none other procession or litany to be had or used" (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1 14, 15). This order was in force in the following year, the second year of the reign of Edw. VI. As evidence of its effect, we are told that, in 1548, "was put downe alle goyng abrode of processyons . . . and the Skynners' processyon on Corpus Christi day, with alle others, and (they) had none other but the Ynglyche processyon in their churches" (Gray Friars' Chronicle, Camden Soc., 56). This prohibition of 1547 affected the mediæval Ps. "about the church or churchyard," which had become scenes of much disorder (see Taverner's Postils, c. 1540, Oxford, 1841, p. 279—"I wyl not speake of the rage and furour of these uplandyshe processions and gangynges about"); but it did not interfere with the P. of the ministers before the high mass, at the carrying in of the sacred vessels, or at the Holy Gospel during that service, under the Latin rite then in use; for The Order of the Communion of 1548 expressly enjoined that, beyond the communion of the people in both kinds, "no rite or ceremony of the mass was to be varied." Thus, whilst the longer and more circumstantial procession proper round the church before high mass was forbidden by the King's Injunctions, the other Ps. of the Service were continued throughout the second year of his reign, and with them the use of the processional cross. The Edwardian legislation affecting Ps. in church, possessing no ecclesiastical authority whatever, cannot be pleaded in prohibition of religious Ps.; and it has, in fact, been generally disregarded.

In our own day Ps. "about the church or churchyard," unconstitutionally put down by the Crown at the beginning of the English Reformation, have been widely revived, and sanctioned by the Episcopate; as, for example, at the consecration of churches and of burial grounds, before the Holy Eucharist and after Evensong on festivals in church, at Church Congresses and on other public occasions. The P. of the preacher to the pulpit preceded by verger with mace is common in cathedrals. Neither must Coronation P. be forgotten. The Lit. has been frequently sung in P. in recent years at St. Paul's Cathedral; in fact this was done through three reigns—the Sovereign generally taking part in it—from the reign of Q. Eliz. onwards; and this processional use of the Lit. was continued until the overthrow of Church and Crown at the end of the reign of Charles I. Thus, the Edwardian Injunction to sing or say the Lit. kneeling was not considered to be of permanent or universal obligation (see Procter and Frere, N. Hist. B.C.P. 423).

In the PB of 1662 the following directions sanction Ps. with singing in two cases, during service time. (a) Holy Baptism:

2. Directions of Ps. of 1662. "The priest coming to the font," i.e., from the lectern, and presumably accompanied by the clerk at least. (b) Holy Matrimony: "Then the minister or clerks going" (from the body of the church) "to the Lord's Table, shall say or sing this psalm following." (c) Burial of the Dead: "The priest and clerks meeting the corpse at the entrance of the churchyard, and going before it either into the church, or towards the grave, shall say, or sing . . ."

Q. Elizabeth's Injunctions of 1559, whilst repeating, almost word for word, the prohibition of 1547, add:

4. Rogation Processions. "But yet for the retaining of the perambulation of the circuits of parishes, they shall once in the year at the time accustomed, with the Curate and substantial men of the parish, walk about their parishes, as they were accustomed, and at their return to the church, make their common prayers" (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1 219, 220). This applies to the Rogation days, when, in the course of the P. round the parish boundaries, halts were made for the recitation of Psalms 103, 104 (see Sparrow, Rationale, ed. 1843, 148).

In parish churches the P., headed according to old English use by cross-bearer and clergy, and followed by choir, should start from the chancel, passing down the south aisle, round the font, up the central passage of the nave, and concluding in the chancel. The old P. was regarded as a distinct act of worship, differing considerably from the "choral march" between vestry and chancel, for which neither authority nor precedent exists. For further information, see Chambers, Divine Worship in England, pt. 1. 5 8; pt. iii; Rock, Church of our Fathers, old ed., 4 18-19. For evidence as to use of Ps. in the Eng. Church since the Reformation, see Hierurgia Anglicana, ed. Staley, 2 3-22, 3, Index. —22.

V. STALEY.

PROCTOR.—A shortened form of Procurator—the designation of certain persons empowered by election or otherwise to represent others in certain affairs. In English literature, once the record of English institutions, the name is found attached to men who acted in very various capacities, and who were held either in great honour or in real contempt. Richard Watts founded at Rochester in 1579 a House for six poor travellers "not being rogues nor proctors"; and canon 133 warns Proctors "not to be clamorous in court," to "refrain lewd speech and babbling, and behave themselves . . . modestly." On the other hand, there are many still living who can remember the dignified and scholarly Proctors of the courts administering canon and civil law, as well as the Proctors duly elected by the colleges of the Universities, or those practising in University courts of first instance. At the present time the name is more commonly used in the Universities than elsewhere, but it also denotes those clergymen who are elected to represent in the two Convs. either (1) the chapters of cathedrals and of the collegiate chs. of Westminster and Windsor or (2) the beneficed clergy of the several dioceses or archdeaconries. (For their number, etc., see CONVOCATION.)—A3.

J. E. STOCKS.

1 [It must, however, be pointed out that processions in parish chs., other than those directed in the PB or properly subsidiary to its rites, have been, in the three cases which have involved their use, uniformly condemned, not by the Privy Council, but by the Court of Arches (twice by Sir R. Phillimore), and not as prohibited by the R. Injns., but as additional ceremonies. G. H.

PROCURATIONS are sums payable by the parochial clergy at the Visitation of their chs. by a bp. or an archdeacon.—A6. J. W. TYRER.

PROHIBITED DEGREES.—In the OT, while divorce and polygamy were, under the Mosaic law, for the time admitted, there is no tone of concession to human weakness in the matter of the marriage of near kin. It is assumed that there is a pudor naturalis binding upon all men. It was binding upon the Canaanites, and for their disregard of it they were "vomited out" from their land.

Of the individual Israelites who should be similarly guilty, it was said "the souls that do them shall be cut off from among their people" (Lev. 18 25, 29). The existence of this pudor naturalis is testified by the laws of most human communities; though these differ to some extent in detailed application. There is general agreement as regards the prohibition of marriages of ascendant and descendant, and of brother and sister: less agreement as regards other relationships. The Code of Lev. 18 has the following list of marriages forbidden to the man, relationships of affinity being marked by italic type.

- | | |
|-----------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| 1. Mother. | 10. Brother's wife. |
| 2. Father's wife. | 11. Wife's daughter and her mother. |
| 3. Sister, including half-sister. | 12. Wife's daughter. |
| 4. Son's daughter. | 13. Wife's son's daughter. |
| 5. Daughter's daughter. | 14. Wife's daughter's daughter. |
| 6. Father's sister. | 15. (Wife's daughter.) |
| 7. Mother's sister. | |
| 8. Father's brother's wife. | |
| 9. Son's wife. | |

In such an enumeration as that of Leviticus it would be unreasonable to expect exhaustive completeness, or analytical arrangement. There is (a) a preamble; (b) a general enactment, "None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him to uncover their nakedness: I am the Lord" (Lev. 18 6); (c) a number of representative cases. The cases thus enumerated are defective on any possible principle if regarded as an exhaustive statement; while there is some redundancy (18 11).

But the prohibitions appear to involve certain great principles: (a) that near relationship of blood is a bar, involving all ascendants and descendants, but only the nearer cases of collaterals; (b) that near relationship of affinity, or connection by marriage, is a bar, because a man and his wife are one basar, flesh or kin (of the fourteen relationships certainly barred, six are relationships of consanguinity and eight of affinity); (c) that relationship through the woman is precisely analogous to relationship through the man.

The application of these principles will be found to result in the expanded table which is printed in the PB, and which is evidently intended to be the logical and complete statement of the Levitical obligations. That table was first put forth by Archbishop Parker in 1563. It was adopted by the 99th canon of 1604 in the following terms: "No person shall marry within the degrees prohibited by the laws of God, and expressed in a Table set forth by authority in the year of our Lord 1563. And all marriages so made shall be adjudged incestuous and unlawful, and consequently shall be dissolved as void from the beginning; and the parties so married shall by course of law be separated. And the aforesaid Table shall be in every church publicly set up and fixed at the charge of the Parish." The table of PD. thus authorised continues to be the authoritative table of the Church of England. The marriages forbidden by it are also forbidden by the law of England, except in the case of the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister, which since 1907 that law recognises (AFFINITY).

In explaining the varying force of the natural prohibition in the case of this or that particular relationship, the theologians of the Eastern Churches have been wont to adduce the analogy of the magnet. Just as the magnet exercises its attraction with greater power on objects which are near, and with less power on objects which are farther off, while at length the attraction, though to a certain extent it still exists, is yet so weak as to be practically inoperative; similarly in the matter of kinship the force of near relationship is great, and of more distant relationship less, while at length, though a certain influence may still be perceived, it is not strong enough to effect actual prohibition of marriage. Where the natural sense of a bar is adequate to prohibit, the Christian will understand it to form part of the law Divine which man is not competent to revise or alter.¹ Many relationships with regard to which no one would claim that they bar marriage by the law Divine have at various times been forbidden by human law, both ecclesiastical and civil. Thus in the West in the Middle Ages the marriage of cousins was barred to the seventh generation (COUSINS' MARRIAGE). But this was by the law ecclesiastical, and it was admittedly open to dispensation. In the English Church no relationships are barred except those enumerated in the PB table. But all these are apparently held by the canon of 1604 to be barred "by the laws of God." This is, however, matter of controversy among Christians. In the Roman Catholic Church at the present day it is the common teaching that only the marriages of ascendants and descendants and of brother and sister are barred by the law Divine, and that all other unions may become the subject of ecclesiastical dispensation.—MA. O. D. WATKINS.

PROPER.—A name given to those parts of a service which vary with the day, season, or occasion, to distinguish them from those which are invariable.—B2. J. W. TYRER.

PROPER LESSONS.—In the old monastic (and cathedral) services (see LECTONARY) the regular reading of Scripture was interrupted and special L. were appointed for Saints' days.

¹ It may be of interest to note by way of parallel that Westermarck, the historian of marriage, in his latest work, The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas, finds the root motive of prohibited degrees in a natural mutual aversion found in those living together from childhood, and extended to others with whom later associations are set up.

1. In Earlier Services and First PB.

The Scripture L. for Sundays and the other movable holy-days did not interrupt the course of L., but were part of it, as the course itself was arranged according to the ecclesiastical year. In Quignon's Brev., with rare exceptions, the third L. only were proper to the festival, and so did not interfere with the regular course of Scripture, which was completed in the first two L.; although extra L. from the Epistles were provided for the third L. of those days, which had not festival third L. In both PBs of Edward VI, Proper L. were appointed only for the most important holy-days: there were no proper L. for Ash-Wednesday, nor for thirteen of the Saints' days: the Nat. of St. John Baptist and All Saints were the only Saints' days which had both L. proper at both MP and EP: even Good Friday had no proper second L., and Easter Day had no proper first Lesson at EP!

In Elizabeth's PB a partial return to the ancient principle of arrangement according to the ecclesiastical year was made by the appointment of the most important chapters of the various books of the OT as Proper first L. for all Sundays, and for these L. the old selection of the books according to the seasons was followed as closely as was possible. The L. were taken from Isaiah, from Adv. to Septuagesima; from Gen. and Exod., from Septuagesima to Easter, so as to bring the institution of the Passover to Easter Day; from Num. and Deut., from Easter to Whit-Sunday. L. from Josh., Judg., 1 and 2 Sam., 1 and 2 Kgs., Jerem., Ezek., Dan., and the Minor Prophets followed till the 21st Sunday after Trin.—after which L. from Prov. were read till Adv.

2. In PB of 1559.

This series of proper L. continued (with a few trifling amendments) till 1871, but in the "New Lectionary" of that year the whole scheme was revised; L.

3. In Lectionary of 1871.

from Job and Prov. were assigned to the 4th, 5th and 6th Sundays after Epiph.; L. from 1 and 2 Chron. and Nehem. were introduced, and the L. from the Prophets extended to the last Sunday after Trin. Several alterations were made in the particular chapters chosen, and alternative first L. were provided for all Sunday evenings.

In the proposed Lectionary of 1878-9 the Sunday L. from the Sapiential books were re-transferred to the end of the series of Sundays after Trin., but the provision of alternative Evening L. was retained.

In the Irish Lectionary of 1877, the Proper L. for Sundays and holy-days were identical with those in the English Lectionary of 1871, except that L. from the Canonical books were substituted for the (four) Proper L. from the Apocryphal books in that Lectionary.

The Amer. Lectionary of 1790 had two important differences from the English Lectionary of that period. (a) The series of L. from Isaiah (which ended with the Sundays after Epiph.) was followed (from Septuagesima to Whit-Sunday) by L. from the other prophets in order—the series being broken by special L. for Easter Day and Whit-Sunday. Genesis was begun on Trin. Sunday, and the principal chapters from the historical books were read until the 22nd Sunday after Trin.; after which L. from Proverbs were read until the last Sunday after Trin. (b) Proper second L. were appointed for all the Sundays of the year, so that the Sunday-lesson system was entirely independent of the Calendar Table. Proper L. have since been appointed for the Ember days and Rogation days, and an alternative series of L. provided for all the days in Lent: all these being further steps in the return to a lesson system arranged according to the ecclesiastical year, and good in principle, although the particular passages selected have been adversely criticised.

In both PBs of Edward VI it was thought sufficient for Saints' days to appoint a proper Coll., Epistle and Gospel; and proper L.

4. For Saints' Days.

were appointed for MP and EP only in cases where L. evidently appropriate were available. In Elizabeth's PB the course of week-day first L. was interrupted for Saints' days, and it was probably intended to furnish each one with L. appropriate to the day; in the end, however, the idea was abandoned, and the reading of the principal chapters of the books of the OT from the point which had been reached on the last Sunday after Trin. was extended through the series of Saints' days, excepting a few for which appropriate first L. were chosen: a "paper" system, for of course the series of holy-days did not follow the series of Sundays of the year, but were interspersed among them.

In 1871 an attempt was made to provide appropriate proper L. for the Saints' days—first L. in all cases, and second L. when appropriate ones could be found. The selected L. were in some cases open to criticism, but the result marked a great advance, the chief blot being the absence of proper L. for the "first Evensongs" of Saints' days.

In the proposed Lectionary of 1878-9 this gap was filled, but all the Saints' days were supplied with proper second L. at all services, a course which in several cases necessitated the use of L. whose suitability for the purpose was but slight. Neither the Irish Table of 1877, nor the Amer. Table of 1892, made any attempt at providing proper L. for the "first Evensong" of Saints' days.—CR.

W. C. BISHOP.

PROPER PSALMS.—In the Ambrosian rite, the "course" of the Pss. (see PSALTER, LITURGICAL USE OF) was interrupted only for festivals of the highest rank; but in the English Church before the Reformation (as on the Continent in general) the course was interrupted, and the regular Pss. superseded by P. Pss., on a large number of Saints' days. As with the lessons, so with the Pss., the first object of the Reformers was to restore the regularity of the course, so that the entire Psalter should be gone through without interruption. Consequently in the First

1. History.

PB it was only for the most important holy-days that the course was superseded by P. Pss.; and although the continuous course of the Scripture-lessons was broken up in 1559, the continuous course of the Psalter was not seriously interfered with till in the American PB of 1892 P. Pss. were appointed for a large and very unnecessary number of holy-days. This novel arrangement interfered with the course the more because most of the days so provided were isolated holy-days such as Adv. Sunday and the Annunciation: when the course is once interrupted—as, e.g., for Good Friday—it is quite unobjectionable to appoint P. Pss. for a number of following days, or to do the same for preceding days also, when all the days so provided succeed one another without break. In the First PB of Edward VI, P. Pss. were appointed only for Christmas, Easter, Ascension and Whit-Sunday (the same Pss. as in the present English PB, except that Pss. 48, 67 and 145 were appointed for the morning of Whit-Sunday); and these selections continued unaltered, except that for the morning of Whit-Sunday in 1552 Pss. 48 and 47 were appointed; in 1559 Pss. 48 and 67; in the Calendar of 1561 Pss. 45 and 67; and the present selection in 1662. In 1662, also, our present Pss. for Ash-Wednesday and Good Friday were added.

In the Amer. PB of 1790 the only change was the substitution of Ps. 64 for 69 on Good Friday evening. The Irish PB of 1877 made no alteration on the English; but in the Amer. PB of 1892, as we have seen, P. Pss. were appointed for a considerable number of days.

The most striking blot in the tables of P. Pss. is the fact that the "first Evensong" of Festivals (i.e., the Evensong "on the day before") is entirely neglected, no P. Pss. being appointed for these services. This is a blot which we have inherited from the old Roman monastic services; in all ancient rites "the evening and the morning" were the day, and Evensong, Mattins and Mass the services for it. Second Evensongs, i.e., Evensong "on the day itself" (as we call it), were unknown and are still unknown in the Eastern rites, and in the Western secular rites by the end of the 7th cent. they had apparently been appointed only for the very greatest festivals. It would probably not be easy to abandon "second Evensongs" now, but the importance of "first Evensongs" on festivals ought to be restored by the appointment of P. Pss. and Lessons for the first Evensong of all festivals which have P. Pss. or Lessons at other services.—cr. W. C. BISHOP.

PROPERTY, CHURCH.—The phrase "Church Property" conveniently embraces all the various kinds of P. held by various persons and bodies for eccles. purposes. The Ch. as such cannot hold P. at all, and the great bulk of the P. of the Ch. is not applicable for the general purposes of the Ch. It would seem indeed that tithes, or the tenth part of the produce of the earth which was dedicated to God, were originally, at least in theory, available for the maintenance of God's ministers in general; but in the course of time the tithes of particular localities became a recognised part of the emoluments of particular benefices. No doubt much P. was devoted to eccles. purposes before the lawyers had learnt to define clearly in what manner it was held. Nowhere, perhaps, is the effort of the lawyer to adjust his science to suit the actual facts so conspicuous as in the domain of eccles. law.

Though the law will not admit that the Ch. itself is capable of holding P., it does recognise that those in whom P. devoted to eccles. purposes is vested hold it not in an individual but in a representative capacity. Accordingly, it does not permit one who holds Ch. P. in virtue of an eccles. office to exercise over such P. the full rights of disposition that it accords to an ordinary owner. It maintains that technically such P. is to be regarded as vested in a CORPORATION constituted by the occupant of the office for the time being, so that it remains vested in the occupant only during his occupancy; and on the termination of his occupancy passes directly to his successor. Such a corporation, when it is constituted by a single person, e.g., a bp., rector, or vicar, is termed a corporation sole: when it is constituted by several persons, e.g., a dean and chapter, a corporation aggregate.

2. Vesting.

The law of Ch. P. is so intricate and casual that it is difficult to give at the same time a concise and comprehensive account of it. It is the purpose of this article to give merely a short summary of it, which may serve to indicate its more important features; and for that purpose Ch. P. may be classified under three heads, viz.:—(1) Parochial P., (2) Centralised P., (3) Miscellaneous Property.

Under the first head it is proposed to give a short account of the different kinds of eccles.

3. Parochial Property.

P. to be found attached to the typical parish. In the typical parish the incumbent is a rector, i.e., a parson in the full sense of the word, and the eccles. property attached to it comprises: (a) a ch. and manse, including, besides the ch., churchyard and parsonage, glebe or land belonging to the parsonage and the goods and ornaments of the ch.; (b) TITHES (see separate art.); (c) Casual Profits, viz., fees, Easter offerings, and special endowments.

(a) A churchyard is not an essential accessory of the ch., and, unlike a ch., is not necessarily consecrated. A ch. and churchyard, however, are usually consecrated together, and when they have been so consecrated they can only be used for secular purposes under the authority of an Act of Parliament. It is a rule of the Ch. that no ch. shall be consecrated till a proper endowment, including a parsonage and glebe, has been provided for the parson.

4. Church and Manse.

The freehold of the ch., churchyard, parsonage and glebe vests in the parson upon his induction, but he is in the position rather of a tenant for life than of an ordinary fee simple owner. A parson may take the feed of the churchyard, and may cultivate the glebe, and on his own account work mines in it if they are already opened, but not otherwise. He may not cut down trees either in the churchyard or the glebe, except for the purpose of repairing property attached to his benefice.

A parson is liable to keep in repair the parsonage and the buildings and fences of the glebe, and often also the chancel of the ch. He is answerable, too, for committing waste on the P. of the ch. in his charge, e.g., by improperly opening mines or cutting trees. In each diocese a SURVEYOR is appointed, whose duty it is to assess the liability of the parson for DILAPIDATIONS to his benefice caused by waste or lack of repairs, subject to a right of appeal to the bp., and the parson is bound to make the dilapidations good under pain of having the profits of his benefice sequestered. When the repairs have been executed to the satisfaction of the surveyor, the surveyor gives a certificate which protects the parson from any claim by his successor in the benefice in respect of repairs in the event of the benefice becoming vacant within the next five years. The parson must also keep all the buildings in connection with his benefice, for the repair of which he is liable, insured to three-fifths of their value.

Since the days of Elizabeth the parson has been able to let the parsonage and glebe, with the consent of his bp. and patron, for the term of 21 years or 3 lives, subject to certain conditions and restrictions. During the last cent. his powers of alienation have been increased, and now, subject to certain conditions and restrictions, the parson is permitted to let the glebe on a 14 years' farming lease or 20 years' improving lease, with the consent of his bp. and patron, and on a 60 years' mining lease or 99 years' building lease, with the consent of his patron and the Eccles. Commissioners. He may also, subject to certain conditions and restrictions, with the approval of the Board of Agriculture, sell the glebe, and with the consent of his patron and the Eccles. Commissioners lease for any term, sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, the glebe or parsonage, provided that it can be shown that such alienation is for the permanent advantage of the benefice; and he may, with the consent of his bp., patron, and abp., sell the parsonage, if that be desirable, provided that the proceeds of sale be devoted to the provision of a new parsonage. For raising money for certain specified purposes, e.g., building or repairing a parsonage or purchasing glebe, the parson may, with the consent of his bp. and patron, mortgage or charge the profits of his benefice.

The CHURCHWARDENS, though they have no estate in either the church or churchyard, are entitled to exercise certain administrative powers in respect of both. It is their duty to see that the ch. and churchyard are kept in a good state of repair, and to provide for the expenses of the necessary repairs, so far as the parson is not liable for them. It is their duty also to provide the requisites for divine service; and the books, ornaments and goods belonging to a ch. are, it seems, in their legal ownership: but they must allow them to be used for divine service under the direction of the parson. It is their duty also to maintain order in the ch. and churchyard and, subject to special rights, to arrange where persons are to be seated for divine service.

6. Wardens and Parishioners.

Formerly they were entitled to levy and enforce the payment by the parishioners of a church rate, to defray the necessary expenses of their office. Such a rate is still not infrequently levied, but the payment of it cannot now ordinarily be legally enforced.

The parishioners have the right to attend divine service in the ch. and to be buried in the churchyard. An individual may be entitled to use a particular pew for divine service. Such a right may be acquired by faculty or by prescription as appurtenant to a particular house, or, where pew rents are authorised, by the payment of a pew rent. Such pew rents then commonly form part of the emoluments of the benefice to which the ch. belongs.

(b) TITHES originally were the tenth part of the produce of the land, and were universally collected in kind. As the inconvenience of this arrangement

7. Tithes. became felt, tithes in kind were largely commuted for fixed money payments. Finally, in 1836, it was enacted that tithes should be generally superseded by a tithe-rent-charge, or a half-yearly money payment charged on the particular land concerned, and varying with the price of corn: certain minor tithes, however, were exempted from such commutation. Land may be redeemed from the burden of a tithe-rent-charge by the payment of a lump sum.

In earlier days a rectory was often annexed to a spiritual corporation, e.g., a religious house, or became "appropriated," and in Henry VIII's reign many rectories fell into lay hands or became "impropriated." In either case it was necessary that some provision should be made by the rector, whether spiritual or lay, for the cure of souls in the parish, and commonly a vicar was appointed for that purpose, and was endowed with part of the emoluments of the benefice. In such a case the tithes were frequently divided between the rector and the vicar, the vicar taking the small tithes and the rector keeping the great tithes. So it has happened that tithes, or their equivalent, may be found in lay hands at the present day, though originally they were always part of the property of the Church.

(c) FEES, commonly known as surplice fees, are due to the parson for his services in connection with marriages, churchings and burials. Fees are also payable to him for making searches in or extracts from the parochial registers of baptisms, marriages and burials. A fee may be demanded by the parson for permitting the erection of a monument or the burial of one who is not entitled as a parishioner or otherwise in the churchyard. Other fees may be due by custom, e.g., a fee for permitting the erection of a monument in the church.

8. Casual Profits.

EASTER OFFERINGS are properly due to the parson from every householder in the parish at the rate of twopence for every member of his family of the age of sixteen years and upwards. Though they take the form nowadays of voluntary payments to the parson by members of his congregation, they are regarded as so far part of the emoluments of his office as to be assessable to income tax.

Special endowments are not infrequently to be found vested in trustees, to be administered by them for eccles. purposes in connection with particular parishes, e.g., for the benefit of the parson or the sustentation of a curate: in each case the destination of the income depends upon the terms of the trust.

During the last two centuries there has been a growing feeling in favour of central authorities, by which church funds may

9. Centralised P. be more effectually secured and more advantageously administered for the benefit of the Church as a whole.

There are at the present time two great central funds respectively vested in and administered by: (a) The Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; and (b) The Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

(a) The funds of the Governors of QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY are chiefly derived from the FIRST FRUITS and TENTHS of benefices (i.e., the whole of the first year's profits of the occupants of benefices and the tenth part of their annual profits, reckoned on the basis of a valuation made in 1292), to which in early days the Popes claimed to be entitled.

The revenue derived from this source was in Henry VIII's day engrossed by the Crown, and eventually it was (with certain equitable exemptions) regranted by Q. Anne, to be applied for the benefit of the Ch. under the name of Q. Anne's Bounty: and by an Order in Council of 1852 the first fruits and tenths were respectively commuted for annual payments of £1 per £100 of the annual value, and 17s. 6d. per £100 of the annual income, of the benefice concerned.

In addition to the commuted first fruits and tenths, the Governors of Q. A. B. have under their control certain funds which have been placed in their hands on the account of particular benefices.

The general funds of the Bounty are primarily employed in the augmentation of the incomes of the poorer benefices. Grants are made by allocating to a particular benefice a part of the funds for the time being available for distribution; and it is a fixed rule of the Governors to make no such grant to a benefice unless a benefaction of at least an equal amount is obtained for the same benefice from other sources, and placed in the hands of the Governors for the purpose of administration. The general funds of the Bounty may also be employed for certain subsidiary purposes, e.g., making loans to parsons for the purpose of repairing property belonging to their benefice, or of making improvements to their residences.

(b) The funds of the ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION are chiefly derived from old eccles.

11. Eccles. Commissioners. revenues, which were formerly dispersed among a large number of benefices.

Towards the middle of the last cent. the unequal distribution of eccles. revenues, especially in the case of the higher offices of the Ch., provoked the zeal of the reformer, and it was thought that it would redound greatly to the advantage of the Ch. if the revenues of certain benefices were pooled, and if some of the benefices in question were suppressed or suspended, and a more equal provision made for the maintenance of those that were retained. Accordingly (with certain exceptions) the lands and emoluments of all sees, deaneries, canonries and sinecure rectories were, by Act of Parliament, transferred to and consolidated in the hands of the Eccles. Commissioners: and the Commissioners were empowered to manage such P. and, after making sufficient provision thereout for the maintenance and endowment of the higher offices of the Ch. by reassignment or otherwise, to carry over the balance to a common fund to be applied in making additional provision for the cure of souls. This fund is expended in accordance with schemes prepared by the Commissioners.

Not all the P. attached to the higher offices of the Ch. passed into the hands of the Eccles. Commissioners.

Bps. are permitted still to retain in their own hands their residences and the land belonging thereto, and Deans and Chapters their capitular estates. Their powers of disposition, however, are limited, like the powers of disposition of the parson.

Besides the buildings definitely attached to the various parishes, there are other buildings, e.g., chapels and mission rooms, which are not so attached. As P. may be vested in trustees for parochial purposes, it may be held similarly by trustees for other Ch. purposes: and not infrequently associations are to be found incorporated under the Companies Acts to hold and administer P. for the benefit of a diocese. In such cases the precise terms upon which P. devoted to eccles. purposes is to be held may, within broad limits, be varied indefinitely. [It is sometimes found convenient to vest P. in the name of some trust association, while retaining, by arrangement carefully expressed in the deed of assignment, all rights of administration or disposal in the hands of some body of persons in whom the P. could not legally be vested.]—A4. HUGH R. P. GAMON.

PROPHESYINGS.—The "Prophesyings" or "Exercises," which occupy an important place in the history of religious controversy in the early years of Elizabeth, are first met with in 1571, and owe their origin to the lamentably low state of learning and of preaching power in the ministers by whom in the various parishes the Elizabethan religious settlement was represented. Not more than a fifth of the clergy, as late as 1586, were licensed to preach; and the hurried ordinations of Elizabeth's early years, the practical extinction of the diaconate for the time, the abortive attempt at a new order of "readers" and the system of examinations in the Bible and text-books like Bullinger's Decades are sufficient evidence of an ignorant ministry. To remedy this defect, there grew up "in divers places of the nation and particularly in Northamptonshire" a practice of the clergy in a certain district foregoing for the discussion, each in turn, of a Scripture passage previously allotted to them, the "exercise" culminating in a summing-up by "a moderator," one of the gravest and most learned of them.¹ The gatherings were held in a church, were used as means of instruction, and were largely attended by the public.

¹ Strype's Life of Grindal, p. 326 ff.

In 1574 Archbishop Parker wrote to Bishop Parkhurst of Norwich, who favoured them, ordering their suppression in his diocese.¹ This does not seem, however, to have been followed by a general prohibition in the province of Canterbury, for at least in the dioceses of London and Rochester they existed under the avowed sanction of the bishops. This may have been due to the fact that the Privy Council, in 1574, had written to Bishop Parkhurst distinctly in their favour. Elizabeth, however, conceived a dislike to them from the first. Parker had assured her in 1574 that they were "seminaries of Puritanism."² And when Grindal, who upheld them, succeeded Parker in the Primacy in 1575, she ordered the episcopate to procure their entire suppression on the grounds that they encouraged religious controversy and tended to the disturbance of peaceable government.³ The freedom of the pulpit had been so productive of unrest and controversy that the Queen, not unnaturally, looked to the suppression rather than to the encouragement of "a preaching ministry," and considered that three or four preachers were sufficient for any county.⁴

To the Archbishop, concerned with raising the intellectual and spiritual level of his clergy, the matter presented itself in an entirely different light. He was not blind to the need of reform in the P., but was unwilling to dispense with them altogether. He had, in fact, drawn out an "Order for Reformation of Abuses"⁵ in them. This would have brought them under episcopal control, would have excluded the laity and any deprived ministers, and silenced any personal "glances" or "invections" against authority. He, therefore, in answer to the Queen, wrote in 1577 a courageous, though hardly tactful, defence of the P., the conclusion of which was that he could not with safe conscience, and without the offence of Almighty God, consent to their "suppression."⁶ The Queen thereupon sequestered him from his ecclesiastical functions, and officially, through the bishops, in his despite, ordered the P. to cease. This did not take place all at once. In some dioceses, notably that of York under Archbishop Sandys, "exercises" of a similar character for the clergy were long carried on, unchallenged by the Queen, and as late as 1585 regulations for the conduct of "exercises" in the diocese of Chester are extant.⁷ But P. are not important after 1577.

It is difficult to see how, within the limits prescribed by Grindal's Orders, they are contrary to the spirit of the Church of England.⁸ The work at which they aimed is to-day being almost universally done by means of clerical meetings for study and prayer in rural deanery or district; and "the quiet day for the clergy" is not out of harmony with their spirit.—TE.

G. FOSTER CARTER.

PROSE.—See SEQUENCE.

PROTESTANT.—A word derived from the protest on behalf of religious liberty made at the Diet of Spire, in 1529, by a large body of German Princes and Imperial cities. It then became associated in common use with Lutheranism in Germany and Anglicanism in England, so that a familiar division of parties reckoned people as Protestant, Papist, or Puritan. It is in this sense that the word was adopted into the CORONATION Oath and the title of the Anglican Ch. in the United States. So Laud disclaimed "any alteration to Popery, or any way blemishing the true P. Religion established in the Ch. of Eng.," meaning the body of positive conviction summed up in the 39 Arts. Later, however, with the multiplication of sects, the word tended to acquire a merely negative connotation, as non-Roman Catholic, and even anti-Catholic. It needs, therefore, careful explanation, when used by members of the Ch. of England.—AI.

G. HARFORD.

PROTESTANT DISSENTERS.—This phrase has in certain legal instruments of the 18th cent. a technical meaning which confines its reference to the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists, known as "The Three Denominations."—AI.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

PSALTER.—The PB Version of the Pss. is, in all essentials, the version contained in the so-called Great Bible of 1539—
 1. Sources of PB Version of Psalter. 41. Tindale (c. 1485–1536) had produced in 1530 the first English version of the Pentateuch translated from the original Heb.; Miles Coverdale (1488–1569) had published in 1535 his English version of the entire Bible; and a composite version, by Thomas Matthew, a combination of Tindale's and Coverdale's, had appeared in 1537. Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, at that time chief minister of Henry VIII, had set his heart on the production of an amended Version of the Bible in English; he accordingly invited Coverdale to prepare a revised translation, based on a more accurate collation of the Heb. and Greek originals. Coverdale was assisted in his task by "dyverse excellent learned men"; and the result of their joint labours appeared in April, 1539. An Injunction, published by Cromwell with the King's authority, required a copy to be set up in some convenient place in every ch. in the kingdom bef. a specified day. The interest taken in the new Bible was remarkable: crowds flocked to every ch. to read, or hear read, the hitherto unknown book. The Great Bible, as it was already called, in view of its "greater volume," by its publisher, Grafton, well deserved the name; it is a magnificent black-letter folio, of some 1,050 pages. A second edition, revised especially in the prophetic and poetical books, followed in April, 1540, and five others in July and Nov., 1540, and May, Nov., and Dec., 1541.

¹ Parker's Correspondence, p. 456.

² Neal, History of the Puritans I 214.

³ Grindal's Remains, p. 467.

⁴ Ib., p. 375.

⁵ Ib., p. 373.

⁶ Grindal's Remains, p. 386.

⁷ Prothero's Select Statutes, p. 206.

⁸ Cp. Lord Bacon's estimate of them, quoted in Prothero, p. 207.

The text which was taken as the basis of the Great Bible was that of Matthew's Bible (1537); and this was revised by Coverdale with the help of Seb. Münster's Lat. version of the OT (Heidelberg, 1534-5)—an important version, in which much use was made of the mediæval Jewish commentators, and which exerted considerable influence upon subsequent English translators. Coverdale also naturally introduced improvements of his own. In the case of the Ps. the text of Matthew's composite Bible thus revised was Coverdale's own former translation of 1535.

2. The Great Bible.

A single example (Ps. 197) must suffice to illustrate the nature of Coverdale's revision; the influence of Seb. Münster, it will be seen, is very marked. Coverdale, 1535, and Matthew, 1537: "The law of the Lord is a perfect law: it quickeneth the soul: the testimony of the Lord is true, and giveth wisdom even unto babes." Seb. Münster, 1534-5: "Lex domini immaculata, convertens animam: testimonium domini firmum, sapienter erudiens simplicem." Great Bible, 1539-41: "The law of the Lord is an undefiled law, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, and giveth wisdom unto the simple." (For another good example, see Kirkpatrick's note on Ps. 105 18.)

The seven eda. of the Great Bible, while exhibiting substantially the same text, differ frequently in details, as alterations, based largely upon Münster, were from time to time introduced, especially in Apr., 1540. Thus in Ps. 32 7, where the ed. of 1539 had "in due season," that of Apr., 1540, had "in a time when thou mayest be found," based upon Münster's "in tempore quo invenire (te licet)." Ps. 143 3, "as the men that have been long dead" (first in 1540)—comes from the same source.

At the time when both the First (1549) and Second (1552) PBs of Edward VI were set forth, the Great Bible was still the authorised English translation of the Scriptures: it was but natural therefore that the version of the Ps. contained in it should be expressly appointed as the one to be used in the daily services of the Church. And when, at the last revision of the PB in 1662, it was directed that the other lessons from Scripture should be taken from the AV of 1611, an exception was made in the case of the P.: choirs and congregations were alike familiar with it, and it was felt to be "smoother and more easy to sing."

The P. however, as printed in modern PBs, is not an exact reprint of the P. of any of the seven editions of the Great Bible.

3. Relation of PB Version to Great Bible Psalter.

Substantially it agrees with the later editions; but small variations have been from time to time introduced into editions of the PB Psalter, mostly by the early printers, apparently without any authority, but often, it seems, suggested by a comparison with some other version (such as the text of the Great Bible P. incorporated in the Bishops' Bible of 1568, and the AV of 1611). Modern Ps., it has been shown, follow very closely texts contained in a Great Bible (4to) of 1569, a Bishops' Bible of 1591, and a PB Psalter of 1583: see especially the Appendix to McGarvey's Liturgia Americana, Philadelphia, 1895, pp. 1*-51*, by the Rev. F. Gibson, D.D., containing a detailed tabulated synopsis of various readings in more than 500 passages, collected from some 60 editions of the Great Bible and PB dating from 1539 to 1892. At the present time (1911), the authorised text of the PB Psalter is that which was adopted in the revised PB accepted by Convocation in 1661, and, from its having been annexed in MS. to the Act of Uniformity in 1662, known as the Annexed PB. A facsimile of the Annexed Book was published by Eyre & Spottiswoode in 1891. Certain printed copies of this Annexed PB, certified as correct (though, as a matter of fact, they do not always agree with the Annexed PB: see below; and cp. the writer's Parallel Psalter, ed. 2, 1904, p. xliiv, n.) under the Great Seal in 1662, are called, in consequence, the Sealed Books (see, for these, Stephens' elaborate annotated ed. of 1854). Many of the changes spoken of above as gradually introduced into the PB Psalter were adopted in the Annexed PB, and thus implicitly sanctioned; there are some also which were made in the Annexed Book for the first time. A few examples may be cited (GB. 1-2, etc. = first, second, etc., edition of the Great Bible; AB. = the Annexed Book). The statements following are made on the authority of Dr. Gibson's synopsis.

Ps. 13 2: "Mine enemy," GB. 1-7 (so Heb.): "mine enemies," first in a P. of 1548. Ps. 38 10: "The light of mine eyes," GB. 1-7 (so Heb.): "the sight of mine eyes," first in a P. of 1574 (a mere misprint, due to the resemblance of the black letter s to l, but continued to the present day). Ps. 40 6: "Thy wondrous works," GB. 1-7 (so Heb.): "the wondrous works," first in AB. Ps. 48 10: "Daughters of Judah," GB. 1-7 (so Heb.): "daughter of Judah," first in AB. Ps. 87 4: "Behold¹, yee (i.e., yea) the Philistines also," GB. 1, 2, 3; "behold yee the Philistines also," first in GB. 4, and generally in subsequent editions. Ps. 95 7: "Sheep of his hands," GB. 1-7, and subsequently, including AB.; "sheep of his hand," first in the Sealed Books. Ps. 145 3: "Marvellous worthy" ("marvellous" being an adverb, as in Ps. 31 23), GB. 1-7, etc., and AB.; "marvellous, worthy," an error first in the Sealed Books, and found still in most modern PBs. One misprint, yea for jah, in Ps. 68 4, already found in GB. 2, remained in editions and PBs (including the Annexed Book and Sealed Books) till it was corrected in 1701. Some of the changes consisted in the removal of archaisms: thus Ps. 32 3, "I will knowledge my sin unto thee," and Ps. 104 21, "To seek their meat at God," were both first altered in the Annexed Book. "Mowes," an old word meaning grimaces in Ps. 35 15, was also first changed into "mouths" in the Annexed Book.

In the Great Bible certain words and passages not in the Heb. (e.g., Ps. 13 6; "bring young rams unto the Lord" in 29 1; and "God" in 45 12), but additions or glosses derived often from the Vulg., are printed in smaller type; and in the Annexed Book these passages, and also some others not in the Heb., are all enclosed within square brackets. These distinguishing marks have, however, been gradually dropped in modern PBs; and they have now, unfortunately, entirely disappeared.¹

¹ Here an interjection, as in the Heb., not a verb.

Coverdale must have been a natural master of English style. His version of the Pss., in the form in which it appears in the

4. Style and Character of PB Version.

Great Bible, is wonderfully attractive: its style is bold and vigorous, and at the same time flowing and melodious; and its diction, while thoroughly idiomatic and of genuinely native growth, is dignified and chaste. It is not surprising that it has endeared itself to many generations of Churchmen. But it is unfortunately disfigured by serious inaccuracies: it also contains renderings which blunt and obscure the meaning of a Ps. or passage; and there are many words in it (e.g., "grudge," "froward," "conversation," "health," "worship") which are now either obsolete, or have changed their meaning, and are thus not understood. Those who love, and habitually use, the PB Psalter have a claim to be able to learn from it the sense of the original more exactly than they can at present do; and a gentle and conservative revision, which, while jealously guarding its unrivalled beauties of rhythm and diction, would enable them to do this, is a much needed desideratum.²

In so far as the P. forms a part of the PB, its use is devotional; and the question of the dates and authors of individual

5. Dates and Authors of Psalms.

Pss. becomes a matter of secondary importance. Still, it deserves a few words here. The Pss. are seldom as impersonal as a modern hymn. They often describe the writer's experience; they allude to, or even celebrate, historical events. They thus invite us, if we can, to realise the situation out of which they sprang. Moreover, as the religion of the OT developed historically, the intelligent worshipper should have some idea of the period of history to which the several Pss. belong. Their actual dates we can, indeed, only determine broadly; of their authors, beyond the fact that a small nucleus is probably Davidic, we know nothing. The P., it is evident, assumed its present form gradually. In the Heb. text (as in RV) it is divided into five Books (viz., Pss. 1-41, 42-72, 73-89, 90-106, 107-150), which in their turn include smaller collections, as the 73 "Davidic" Pss. (not all grouped together), the 12 Pss. of Asaph, etc. Very few Pss. are earlier than the 7th cent. B.C.; and the great majority are exilic or post-exilic. Of the 73 Pss. ascribed to David, internal evidence—the situation presupposed, or the ideas, or sometimes the lateness of the Heb.—shows that certainly the greater number are of much later date.¹ The P. reflects the religious feelings and experiences of a long succession of pious men of Israel; and it is no doubt to this diversity of origin that it owes its extraordinary variety of mood, and style, and theme.

But, though we can seldom or never fix the actual author or occasion of a Ps., we can often reconstruct—at least in Pss. of a personal character—from the allusions and terms used, the kind of situation in which the author was, and out of which the Ps. sprang. It is essential to make an effort to do this, if we wish to understand the aim and object of the Ps. in question. There is great variety in the situations presupposed by the Pss. In Ps. 3 the Psalmist is surrounded by foes, who unite in declaring that there is no help for him in his God; but he appeals with confidence to Jehovah, who has defended him hitherto, and foretells the discomfiture of his assailants. In Ps. 4 the author is surrounded by impatient and distrustful companions, who blame him for some misfortune which has befallen them: he bids them regain a right frame of mind, and trust: in the joy of faith he himself can lie down and rest securely. In Ps. 11 society is in disorder: in the confusion the lives of the righteous are imperilled: the poet's despondent friends urge him to seek safety in flight: it is hopeless to attempt to stem the tide of anarchy. The Psalmist replies in tones of calm and unabated confidence in Jehovah. In Ps. 42-3, the author is somewhere in the Hermon region ("concerning" in PB Version of v. 8 is a misrendering of Seb. Münster's de, "from"), and debarred from worshipping in the Temple; he is taunted by heathen foes with being deserted by his God. With great pathos, he utters his yearnings for God, recalls the happiness of the past, and prays earnestly for restoration to the privileges of the sanctuary. And similarly in many other cases. The situation thus reconstructed often throws much light on the gist and meaning of a Psalm.

6. Personal Situation implied in many Psalms.

In the P. the ripest fruits of Israel's spiritual experience are gathered together, and the religious affections find their richest and fullest expression. The Pss. are pre-eminently devotional in character: and the soul is displayed in them in converse with God, disclosing to Him its manifold emotions, its hopes and fears, its desires and aspirations; we hear in it, for instance, the voices of distress and despair, of confession and supplication, of confidence and faith, of yearning for the sanctuary (Pss. 42-3, 63, 84), of love and devotion, of thanksgiving, triumph, and adoration; we hear in it meditations on the Divine attributes—as shown in nature or history, in the problems of human life (Pss. 37, 49, 73), in the pathos of human existence (Pss. 39, 90); and we hear all these notes uttered with a depth and intensity and a beauty of diction and rhythm, which secure for the P. a unique place in religious literature. In the Pss., moreover, it is to be noted that love, and reverence, and trust, and other sacred affections are not, as in most other parts of the OT, enjoined as a duty from without, but are set before us as the spontaneous outcome of a heart filled with the Spirit of God and stirred by devout emotions. It is the surprising variety of mood and subject and occasion in the Pss., combined with their deep spirituality, their fulness of human feeling, their ready applicability (though see § 13) to the needs and situations of practically all men in all ages, and a literary form such as all can appreciate, which gives them their catholicity, and adapts them to form the hymn book, not only of the second Temple but of the Christian Church.

7. Religious Value of Psalter.

¹ They have been restored in the writer's Parallel Psalter.

² See further, on the sources of PB Version, Driver, Parallel Psalter, Introd.; Westcott, Hist. of the Engl. Bible (ed. 2, 1872; ed. 3, 1905), c. ii, §§ 2-4, and c. iii, §§ 2-4; Lupton in Hastings' DB 5 244-8. Cp. W. A. Wright, The Hexaplar Psalter (1911), containing the versions of Coverdale (1535), the Great Bible (1539), the Geneva Bible (1560), the Bishops' Bible (1568), AV, and RV, printed in parallel columns.

¹ See, for the grounds of these statements, the writer's Introduction to the OT, pp. 373-387.

In interpreting a Ps., there are two or three important considerations which must be borne in mind. In the first place, we have sometimes to ask ourselves who the speaker is: is it an individual, or the nation? Secondly, it must be remembered that every Ps. springs out of the Psalmist's own time, and bears, more or less distinctly, the marks of that time; and many Pss., as we have already partly seen, allude distinctly to the circumstances of the author, or of the persons addressed, or spoken of, in them. As will appear in §§ 10-12, these personal references in a Ps. have often an important bearing on its interpretation. Thirdly, in interpreting the Pss., if we are to keep on sure ground, a distinction must be clearly drawn between the original sense of a passage and an application which may be made of it: a Ps. or part of a Ps. may be applied to many persons and many situations, which were entirely out of the mind of its author; and we must be careful not to apply a Ps. in such a way as to confuse the application with the interpretation. Moreover, a Ps. is a unity; and though it may, in parts, be applied to many different persons, it must, as a whole, have been referred by its author to the same person (or persons).

8. Canons of Interpretation.

The speaker in the Pss. is mostly, no doubt, the individual Psalmist, but sometimes it is the nation, in whose name the Psalmist speaks. This is the case not only where the pronouns are in the 1st pers. plural, but also sometimes where they are in the 1st pers. singular: for Heb. idiom often uses a singular verb or pron. of a people: see e.g., Ex. 14 25 (in the Heb., "And Egypt said, Let me flee"), Numb. 20 18, 19, Is. 12 1, 2, 25 1, Ps. 129 1-3, Lam. 3. The nation is thus the speaker in Pss. 44 5, 7, 16, 60 9, 66 12-18 (cp. us, our, vv. 8-11), 74 13, 89 49, 94 16-19, 22, 102, 118; and perhaps in some other Pss., as Pss. 9-10, 56 (notice how the speaker's foes here are not individuals, but nations, v. 7 RV), 57. There are also probably many cases in which a Ps. has a representative character, and in which the Psalmist speaks not only in his own name, but also in that of his godly, and often persecuted, co-religionists, whose experiences and emotions he feels as his own. And in Ps. 22 it is probable that the speaker, from whose deliverance such far-reaching consequences for the world are deduced (v. 27 ff.), is faithful or "ideal" Israel, the ideal "servant of Jehvohah" of Is. 42 1-4, 49 1-9, 50 4-9, 52 13-53 12 (cp. esp. Is. 49 6, 7).

9. The Speaker in the Psalms.

The Messianic Pss., in the proper sense of the expression (for the term Messiah means specifically the "anointed" king), are those which depict an Israelite king under a more or less ideal character; and it is in virtue of this ideal character which they attribute to him that they are Messianic. The Pss. in which this ideal element is most prominent are Ps. 2, 45, 72, 110; other Pss. in which it is slighter are Ps. 18 (see vv. 43-5), 21 (v. 4), 61 (vv. 6, 7); and cp. also 89 20-36 and 132 11-19. These Pss., though they refer primarily to the circumstances of the time, and speak throughout of the actual king,¹ represent him as invested with various ideal attributes and powers—e.g., victorious over distant foes, ruling to the ends of the earth, securing for his subjects justice and peace—such as were never possessed by any actual Israelite king, and which thus point onward to a future ideal king. In what sense, however, are these Pss. fulfilled by Christ? A careful study of prophecy shows that Christ "does not so much fulfil predictions as realise ideals" (cp. Edghill, Evidential Value of Prophecy, 1906, pp. 435 f., 483 f.); and the Messianic Pss. contain, not predictions, but ideals. They are not predictions of a future Christ, partly because they refer evidently (with the possible exceptions mentioned in note¹) to one or other contemporary king, and partly because they all (without exception) describe an earthly rule, and so contain many features which Christ did not fulfil. The hero of the Pss., for instance, fights against earthly armies, his slain cover the plain (Ps. 110 6), his rule is one of iron (Ps. 2 9), he marries and has children, who represent him in different parts of his dominion (Ps. 45 17). Christ "fulfils" these ideals not in a literal, but in a spiritual, sense. He discards the temporary, "dispensational" elements—i.e., the elements belonging to the Jewish dispensation—and realises the essential idea of kingly character, of which the ideal is the expression. (See further, on the whole question of the manner in which our Lord "fulfils" prophecy, with especial reference to quotations in the NT, Edghill, op. cit., pp. 399-573; and, on the idea of the term "fulfil," pp. 435 f., 483 f.)

10. Messianic Psalms.

¹ Pss. 2, 72, 110, may, however, be entirely pictures of the future ideal king, constructed on the basis of earlier prophetic delineations; but even these are strongly coloured by contemporary references; and the pictures drawn in them, however idealised, are only the rule or conquests of an earthly Israelite king.

There are other Pss. also which express ideals realised by Christ; but, as they do not depict an ideal king, they can be termed Messianic only in a broader and less exact sense. Thus Ps. 8 represents man as holding an ideal dominion over the world; Pss. 15 and 24 1-6 delineate (in outline) an ideal godly character; Ps. 16 expresses an ideal, both of fellowship with God, and of superiority to death; in Ps. 22 the speaker, probably (see § 9) faithful Israel, while plainly in vv. 1-21 describing his own personal sufferings, attributes to his deliverance a world-wide significance (v. 27 ff.). Of these Pss., though none in their original import relate to Christ, Ps. 22 is Messianic (in the sense just explained) in being "fulfilled" by Him, as the genuine impersonation of ideal Israel; the others are so, only in the sense that they describe ideals which He realises more completely than ordinary men. The godly Israelite, and the representative men of Israel—especially, in the Pss., the king, and, though less conspicuously, the prophet—were, under different aspects, types of Christ—of course, partial and imperfect types, but still types; and the Pss. in which their experiences, their aspirations and their ideals are expressed are thus (to speak technically) "typically" Messianic (see esp. Perowne, The Psalms, Introd., chap. III, ed. 1886, pp. 49-55). Naturally, we must recognise a Divine control, determining the line of the Psalmists' thoughts, and enabling them thus in all such Psalms to foreshadow the future Christ.

Other Pss. give expression to the great prophetic ideal (Is. 2 2-4, etc.) of a future conversion of the Gentiles to the true God (22 27, 28, 47 9, 65 2, 66 3, 67, 68 29, 31, 86 9, 87, 102 13, 21 f.: cp. the invitations to the nations to praise God, 47 1, 6-8, 66 1, 7-10, 100, etc.); and they thus foreshadow the intended results of the diffusion of the Gospel in the world.

The primary import of the Pss. is often misunderstood through the use made of them in the NT. But it is necessary to bear in mind the principles on which the OT is often quoted in the NT. Passages are often applied to Christ, though they do not primarily refer either to Him, or even to the Jewish Messiah, because they describe a situation similar to one in which He was placed, or because they are true of Him in a fuller and more comprehensive sense than they are of those of whom they were originally spoken. Thus Ps. 41 9 is said in John 13 18 to be "fulfilled" by Christ. The verse, where it stands, in Ps. 41, refers actually to the false friend of the author of the Ps., and to no one else. Christ cannot, as is sometimes strangely supposed, be the speaker in the Ps.,¹ because of the confession of sin in v. 4, and because of the unchristian prayer in v. 10: "Raise me up (from my bed of sickness), that I may requite them." All that is meant in the quotation is that the experience of the godly sufferer of old is repeated, in the case of Christ, in a keener form. Ps. 35 19 is quoted similarly in John 15 25; but the Ps. cannot as a whole be referred to Christ, because it contains much (including imprecations, vv. 8, 26) which would be quite unsuitable in His mouth. Ps. 40 8-10, again, is in Heb. 10 5-7 quoted as referring to Christ. But it must be obvious that the Ps., in its original intention, has no reference to Christ: it is some OT saint, not Christ, who declares that it is his delight to do God's will; and in v. 15 the Psalmist speaks of his "sins," which, except by most strained and unnatural exegesis, can be understood only as the iniquities which he has himself committed. But the ideal of obedience, expressed in vv. 8-10, is applied to Christ, as a fitting expression of His perfect conformity to His Father's will. The same may be said of Pss. 54 and 69. These Pss., though they may in parts be applied to Christ, and are thus suitably read on Good Fr., cannot, as wholes, be referred to Him: notice 54 5, the prayer for the destruction of the Psalmist's enemies; 54 7, the thought of gratified vengeance; 69 5, the confession of sin; 69 23-29, the imprecations. Pss. 8, 15, 16, 24 1-6, have been sufficiently considered above.¹

Only the so-called Imprecatory Psalms seem to form an exception to what has been said above on the high spiritual value of the P., and its ready adaptability to give direction and expression to the devotional feelings of Christian men. The imprecations in the Pss. (principally 35 4-8, 59 11-13, 69 23-29, 109 5-19—cp. also 58 9, 137 9) strike a discordant note in a book which breathes in general a spirit of saintly resignation. In the case of Ps. 109, it has been supposed that vv. 5-19 are not the curses of the Psalmist himself, but those of his enemies, which he quotes (so that "saying" should be understood at the end of v. 4). It is doubtful if this view is correct (notice v. 19); but, even if it were, the principle would not account for the other imprecations in the Pss., or for the hardly less strong ones expressed by Jeremiah (11 20, 17 18, 18 21-23; cp. also the glow of national vengeance which animates Is. 34, Jer. 50 2-51 58). Such utterances may be palliated; but it is idle to pretend that they breathe the spirit of Christ, or that they can be appropriated consistently by His followers. They may be palliated in part by the consideration that the Psalmists, like the prophets, were keenly sensible of the great conflict going on between good and evil, between God and His enemies, both as between Israel and heathen nations, and as between the godly and the ungodly in Israel itself; they felt that the cause really at stake was the very existence of all divine truth and righteousness upon earth: in desiring, therefore, the downfall of their ungodly enemies, they were but desiring the overthrow of evil in the world, and the triumph of righteousness and the cause of truth. Even, however, when full allowance has been made for such considerations, there remains a personal element, an element of personal feeling and vindictiveness, which cannot be eliminated. The foes of the Psalmist or of Jeremiah may have been hostile to a cause; but they also attacked and persecuted a person; and it is the personal feeling thus aroused which finds expression in these imprecations, and which also, judged by the standard of Christian ethics, stands condemned. We must admit it; and can only see in it the voice of persecuted righteousness, not yet freed from discordant notes by the precept and example of Christ. The OT contains the record of a progressive revelation: the education of the chosen nation was gradual: there is a human element in the Biblical writers, which inspiration elevates and illumines, but does not suppress; it ought not therefore to surprise us if human feeling, which is so prominent in OT writers, and as a rule is so singularly pure and noble, should occasionally betray its earthly origin. (See further, Perowne on the Pss. quoted; Kirkpatrick, p. lxxxviii ff.; Bruce, Apologetics, p. 329 f.)

¹ See further, on §§ 10-12, Perowne and Kirkpatrick on the Pss. quoted; W. T. Davison, The Praises of Israel (an Introduction to the Study of the Pss.), pp. 201-254; Perowne, Introd., l.c., pp. 62-5; Kirkpatrick, Introd., p. lviii ff.; Driver, Studies in the Psalms, in the Expositor, Jan., Feb., March, Apr., June, July, 1910 (also forthcoming separately).

¹ Cp., on this subject, Perowne, l.c., pp. 41-50.

Literature (selected).—Perowne, The Psalms, ed. 6, 1886; Kirkpatrick, in the Cambridge Bible (1892);

Baethgen (the best recent German commentary), ed. 2, 1904; W. T. Davison, The Praises of Israel, 1893, and art. Psalms in Hastings' DB; Sanday, Bampton Lectures on Inspiration, 1893, Lect. IV; Westcott, The Paragraph Psalter, 1881; Driver, The Parallel Psalter, ed. 2, 1904 (PB Version and a new version, arranged on opposite pages, with Intro. and Glossaries explaining words and phrases occurring frequently in the Pss. and archaisms in PB Version); Carleton, The Psalter of the Church, 1909 (PB Version with Intro. and notes explaining or correcting PB Version where necessary); Oesterley, The Psalms in the Jewish Church, 1910 (including use in the Temple and Synagogue); Cheyne, The Devout Study of Criticism, 1892, p. 129 ff. (sermon-studies on selected Pss.); R. W. Church, in the Gifts of Civilisation, 1880, p. 391 ff.; Ottley, Bampton Lectures on Aspects of the OT, 1897, p. 350 ff.; W. E. Barnes, Lex in Corde (Studies in the Psalter), 1910; R. E. Prothero, The Psalms in Human Life, 1904 (also in Nelson's shilling library).—24. S. R. DRIVER.

PSALTER, LITURGICAL USE OF.—

The P. has been described as the Service-book of the Second Temple, but it is not very probable that all the Pss. were used in connection with the Temple worship, though many of them were almost certainly so used; and it is by no means apparent for what purpose the collection as a whole was made. In the services of the Synagogue (at least at the time of our Lord) the P. had only a subordinate place. It is probable that selected Pss. were sung at the various services, as in the present Jewish Services (see Authorized Daily Prayer-book), but there was nothing at this time like a systematic course by which the whole contents of the P. were sung through in rotation, and the later Jewish arrangements for reciting the P. in a definite course are more probably imitations of Christian practice than vice-versa.

The early Christian Church took over the services of the Synagogue (see ANTE-COMMUNION, § 2), expanding the Synagogue series of lessons to suit her own needs for different occasions. In what was apparently the normal type of Ante-Communion Service (whether followed by the actual celebration of the Euch. or not) there was but one Ps. which was sung in the midst of the series of lessons. This Ps. was the original of the later Gradual or Tract, and there was nothing corresponding to the Introit, Offertory-anthem, or Communion-anthem, until the latter part of the 4th century.

There was another simple service of a different character from this, which was in use by the time of Tertullian. He tells us (Apol. 39) that at the Agape, when supper was ended, lights were brought in, and water for the hands, and then each of those present sang in turn something either out of the Scriptures or of his own composition, and the bishop concluded the whole with pr. We take this to be the origin of the Western secular Vespers—not the Roman mediæval Vespers, which are really monastic and of an entirely different character, but the primitive secular Vespers which were almost everywhere superseded by the services of the Roman monks, though preserved in the Ambrosian and Mozarabic rites. This was a service without lessons, which consisted of a series of selected Pss. and a final pr. These primitive Vespers were used originally only on Sundays and holy-days (at what was called in later times "first Vespers," i.e., on the evening before the mass of a feast), but became a daily service after the rise of monasticism. A parallel service for mornings was instituted in imitation of it, the foundation of which was originally Pss. 148-150, and afterwards Cantemus (Ex. 15), Benedicite, and Pss. 148-150; but no services besides these two were considered to be the daily duty of the ordinary clergy and laity until the flood of monastic innovations swept over the Church (see canons of Gallican and Spanish Councils).

With the advent of monasticism an altogether new type of service very naturally arose, the special character of which consisted in the recitation of the P. in course, i.e., in a regular rotation from beginning to end. Cassian (Institutes, bk. 3) describes the services of the Egyptian monks, which consisted of two night services, one ad initium noctis, the other ad medium noctis. Twelve Pss. were said at each service and two lessons followed; on Sundays both from NT; on week days from OT and NT respectively. At the third, sixth and ninth hours the monks prayed privately each in his cell. The services of the monks of Syria were similar in character, except that they assembled for common worship also at the third, sixth and ninth hours, using three Pss. at each hour. A course of early character was the original Ambrosian course (introduced by St. Ambrose for secular use, but in imitation of monastic customs). The original plan of this course seems to have been as follows. Ten Pss. were said each night (at one service before dawn), omitting Saturdays and Sundays; thus fifty Pss. were said "in course" each week. The whole P. was completed in three weeks—the earlier Vespers (and Lauds?) remaining unaltered.

The Course of the monks of Rome is enshrined in the Roman secular Brev. (so called); though in its earlier form it is probable that Nocturns and Vespers alone contributed to the course, whereas now certain Pss. are omitted at Nocturns and Vespers because they are said at the lesser hours. St. Benedict appointed for his monks a course of psalmody resembling the Roman course in its general character, but by no means identical with it.

THE OLD ROMAN (AND SARUM) ARRANGEMENT OF THE PSALTER.

	Sunday.	Monday.	Tuesday.	Wednesday.	Thursday.	Friday.	Saturday.
1st Nocturn { 1st Antiphon and " " 3rd " "	94 1+2+3+6 7+8+9+10 11+12+13+14 15, 16, 17 18, 19, 20	94 26+27+28+29 30+31+32+33 34+35+36+37	94 38+39+40+41 42+43+44+45 46+47+48+49+51	94 52+53+54+55+56 57+58+59+60 61+62+63+65+67	94 68+69+70+71 72+73+74+75 76+77+78+79	94 80+81+82+83 84+85+86+87 88+89+90+91+96	94 97+98+99+100 101+102+103+104 105+106+107+108
2nd Nocturn
3rd "
Lauds	94, 5, 62+66 1s. 12 Benedicite 148+149+150	50, 42, 62+66 1s. 38 148+149+150	50, 64, 62+66 1s. 2 148+149+150	50, 89, 62+66 Exod. 15 148+149+150	50, 142, 62+66 Hab. 3 148+149+150	50, 91, 62+66 Deut. 32 148+149+150
Prime	53 21-25	53	53	53	53	53
Terce	118 a+b, 118 c+d	118 a+b, 118 c+d	118 a+b, 118 c+d	118 a+b, 118 c+d	118 a+b, 118 c+d	118 a+b, 118 c+d
Sext	118 e+f, 118 g+h, 118 i+h, daily	118 e+f, 118 g+h, 118 i+h, daily	118 e+f, 118 g+h, 118 i+h, daily	118 e+f, 118 g+h, 118 i+h, daily	118 e+f, 118 g+h, 118 i+h, daily	118 e+f, 118 g+h, 118 i+h, daily
None	118 i+m, 118 n+o, 118 p+q, daily	118 i+m, 118 n+o, 118 p+q, daily	118 i+m, 118 n+o, 118 p+q, daily	118 i+m, 118 n+o, 118 p+q, daily	118 i+m, 118 n+o, 118 p+q, daily	118 i+m, 118 n+o, 118 p+q, daily
Vespers	118 r+s, 118 t+u, 118 v+x, daily	118 r+s, 118 t+u, 118 v+x, daily	118 r+s, 118 t+u, 118 v+x, daily	118 r+s, 118 t+u, 118 v+x, daily	118 r+s, 118 t+u, 118 v+x, daily	118 r+s, 118 t+u, 118 v+x, daily
Compline	109, 110, 111 112, 113 4, 30 vv. 1-6, 90, 133, daily	114, 115, 116 119, 120	121, 122, 123 124, 125	131, 132, 134 135, 136	137, 138, 139 140, 141	143, 144, 145 146, 147

In the Western courses a certain number of Pss. was appointed for each service, so that the same number of Pss. was said whether they were short or long.¹ In the East the P. was divided into sections with different numbers of Pss. in the different sections, so that the length of the sections might be more nearly alike. The Byzantine monks divided the P. into twenty Kathismata, each of which was divided into three staseis. The Nestorians divided their P. into twenty hulali, each of which is divided into three Marmethe: these divisions are not the same as those of the Byzantine arrangement, though it seems possible that the two systems had a common origin. In this point it is practically certain that the Easterns have altered the original plan.

In the foregoing table the Pss. are numbered as in the LXX and Vulg. In these Versions the number of a Ps. is always one less than in the original Hebrew and the English Versions, with the following exceptions:

Pss. 1-8 and 148-150 are the same in all.

Ps. 9 in the LXX and Vulgate = Pss. 9 and 10 in the Hebrew and English Versions.

Ps. 113 in the LXX and Vulgate = Pss. 114 and 115 in the Hebrew and English Versions.

Pss. 114 and 115 in the LXX and Vulgate = Ps. 116 in the Hebrew and English Versions.

Pss. 146 and 147 in the LXX and Vulgate = Ps. 147 in the Hebrew and English Versions.

a, b, c, etc., denote divisions of Ps. 118 (119) of eight vv. each—f, v, w and x being omitted.

The round of services for the various hours of day and night which were included in the Brev.

4. Reformed community, or at least a college of clergy who had few other duties to perform; and long before the Reformation the system had broken down in practice even in the monasteries, several of the services being lumped together instead of being said at their proper hours. Consequently the need was felt of reformed services which should fit more closely the actual needs and possibilities of both clergy and people. In QUIGNON'S BREVIARY an attempt was made to preserve the ancient Canonical hours of pr. for the private use of the clergy, by rearranging the Pss. so that the P. should be repeated every week, but that there should be only three Pss. at each service. In the English PB a return was made to the primitive secular tradition of only two services daily, and, in order to retain a course of psalmody the P. was arranged in sections of as nearly equal length as possible, so that it should be recited once a month. (A reform that may have had some connection with the Anglican arrangement may be seen in the Brev. of the Humilitati of Milan, where the twelve Pss. of the Roman Nocturns for each day are divided into four sets of three Pss., the first set being appointed for the first week in the month, the second set for the second week, and so on.)

¹ St. Benedict divided some of the longer Pss. into two.

There are four methods of singing the Ps., which were used in the ancient Church. (a) The most ancient form seems to have been the

1. Methods of Tractus, by which method the Ps. was sung straight through by one singer without any refrain or responding by the choir or people. (b) The

Psalmus directus or directaneus resembles this, in that the Ps. is sung through without any refrain, but in this case it was sung by the whole choir or people. (c) The Respond. In this case the Ps. was sung by a single chanter, and the choir and people interposed a constant refrain after each v., much as the refrain comes in in Ps. 136 (135). (d) The Antiphon. In this case the singers were divided into two choirs, one of which sung the vv. of the Ps. and the other sang a constant refrain before the beginning of the Ps. and after each v. or (later) after each group of vv. The Antiphon is apparently an invention of the 4th cent. In later times the continual refrains were found burdensome and dropped, even at the beginning before the Ps. (or group of Ps.) with which they were appointed to be sung: the opening words were retained (though without any meaning) just to show the singers the psalm-tone and ending which were to be used (as these were determined by the opening notes of the melody of the refrain); but the refrain was retained at the end of the Ps. (or group of Ps.) to which it belonged, in order to complete the musical phrase. It became then customary for the alternate vv. of the Ps. to be sung in secular churches by the chanters and choir, and in monastic churches by the two sides of the choir.

In the mass it was customary in the earliest ages to sing a Ps. amongst the lessons (see ANTR-COMMUNION, § 3)—a custom which may have come down from the synagogue; and this Ps. was treated as a Respond (Gradual) or Tract. In the 4th cent. other Ps. were added at the Offertory, the Introit and the Communion, and these were sung as Antiphons. In many cases only part of the Ps. was used for the Introit, and the same Ps. was continued for the Communion-anthem.

Baümer, Histoire du Bréviaire, tr. Biron; DCA, art. Psalmody; CQR, Oct., 1886, art. Ambrosian Breviary; Bute's Coptic Morning Service of the Lord's Day; Maclean's Bibliography. East Syrian Daily Offices; and the various Breviaries mentioned.—24.

W. C. BISHOP.

PULPIT.—The central part of the stage of a Greek or Latin theatre was called Pulpitum, as also the Early Christian Ambo,

1. History. used for the reading of Lections, and (sometimes) for preaching.

The name P. descended to the two successors of the ambo, the choir screen and the preaching-place, but is now commonly used only of the latter. The earliest Italian Ps. (e.g., S. Ambrogio, Milan, 6th cent.) were rectangular, and supported by pillars resting on lions. Niccola Pisano made the beautiful Ps. at Pisa (1260) and Sienna (1266) hexagonal, and covered them with sculpture. The earliest known English P. is said to date from the 14th cent. There are many Perpendicular Ps., e.g., Wolverhampton and Coventry, both of stone, as were many others. Wooden Ps. were also common; iron was occasionally used. Movable Ps. (cp. Exposition de la Messe, Alcuin Club) were of simple construction, with a large hanging attached. There were outside Ps., e.g., Magdalen College, Oxford, and Paul's Cross. In the Royal Injunctions of 1547 and 1559 the churchwardens were ordered to provide "a comeley and honest P., to be set in a convenient place . . . and to be there seemly kept for the preaching of God's Word." Many Ps. were made in Stuart times. Later came the "three-decker." The word occurs once in the Bible (Neh. 8 4), and once in the PB (Commination, 1549—"Reading Pew" added 1662).

"On the Gospel side hung the P." at S. Ambrogio, Torcello, Strasburg, Nantwich, etc. But at Pisa, Fiesole, Wolverhampton,

2. Position. Coventry, etc., the P. was on the south side, and from Ps. similarly placed Liddon and Lacordaire delivered their great Sermons at St. Paul's and Notre-Dame. Chrysostom and Augustine preached from the Ambo, which stood, like a "three-decker," in the centre of the nave. Thus there is no "proper" position for the P., except the one, either N. or S., where the preacher may best be seen and heard.

Both Ruskin and Pugin agree that the P. ought not to be too elaborate. But, since it represents the great Ministry of Preaching, it

3. Construction. should be dignified and beautiful, and large enough to contain a tall seat for an invalid preacher. Its sides should not be too high. In the silver Ambo of Sta. Sophia they were of the "height of a man's girdle." If the preacher is "boxed up," a natural manner of speech becomes difficult. A good rule is that the sides of the P. shall be high enough to allow the preacher's hands to rest comfortably upon them as he stands upright. A movable desk should be provided, and a place for a watch and glass of water. The preacher and desk should be well lighted, if possible by a high, shaded light. A movable floor is necessary for short preachers. The sounding-board, properly constructed, is both useful and ornamental. It was always found over Jacobean Ps., and occasionally earlier, e.g., Strasburg (Dom), St. Stephen's, Vienna, etc. (Gothic); also the great Ps. of the Netherlands (Renaissance).—23. W. A. WICKHAM.

PUNCTUATION OF THE PB.—In the year 1868 a committee appointed by the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury to "examine the variations from the Sealed Books which have been introduced by the privileged printers into the Book of Common Prayer" presented its report. In 1877 and again in 1878 another committee reported "upon the Punctuation of the Book of Common Prayer." A committee was appointed by the Lower House of Convocation of York in 1888 to consider "what deviations are found in the text and punctuation of the present Book of Common Prayer from the Authorised Sealed Books, with a view to their correction," and presented its report in 1892. In 1894 a conference was held of representatives of the Queen's Printers and the Oxford and Cambridge Presses to consider alterations in the Prayer Book, and to secure harmony of action. This conference had no authority beyond making recommendations, but the suggestions were adopted by the Presses. In 1903 the information as to the composition and action of that conference was issued in the form of a Parliamentary Paper as ordered by Parliament in 1902.

In the years 1849-1854 an Edition of the Sealed Books was issued by the Ecclesiastical History Society. The Editor, A. J. Stephens, Q.C., collated eight copies and compared them with existing editions of the Prayer Book. He drew attention in his introduction to the exceedingly incorrect condition in which the various editions of the Prayer Book were then printed. In vol. i, pp. ccvii, ccviii, he made the charge:

"That the Book of Common Prayer should be presented to the Members of the United Church of England and Ireland without the slightest omission or interpolation, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the Queen's Printers, have had, for the avoiding of all disputes in time to come, peculiar privileges granted to them for the printing of that Book; but they have violated the sacred trust that was reposed in them, and those bodies and printers cannot at the present moment produce a single edition which is in accordance with the Sealed Books. And in vol. ii, p. vii, he estimates that the Oxford Quarto edition of 1848 contains above 12,500 deviations from the real matter it affects to reprint." For these assertions A. J. Stephens gave in his foot-notes and introduction ample and detailed proof.

In 1868 the Committee of the Canterbury Convocation reported that "the faults of the later editions are in most respects due to the laudable ambition of providing an amended text, unchecked by any consciousness of obligation to adhere to a prescribed standard. It was forgotten that the duty of correcting the press really consisted in making every edition a facsimile of what was sanctioned by Church and State at the last review, and not an exhibition of its meaning with the latest typographical or grammatical amendments. The very punctuation of the book, with all its faults, is said to be part of the Statute, and not to be disturbed." On the other hand, the Committee of 1877 reported in 1878 that they had examined throughout the punctuation of some modern Prayer Books, and found it on the whole "either agreeing with the Sealed Books collated by Dr. Stephens, or differing in matters of no importance, or altered for the better." And the York Committee of 1888 reported in 1902 that "they have no doubt that the responsible Authorities of 1661 and 1662 would have considered the present editions issued by the privileged printers to be 'true printed copies' of the revised PB within the meaning of the Act of Uniformity." The real explanation of this confusion will appear when the facts of the case are stated.

We possess all the recensions of the PB text referred to by the Act of Uniformity of 1662. They are four in number. (1) The Convocation Copy—a corrected copy of a folio edition of the 1604 PB, dated 1636, with a Psalter and Ordinal of 1639. The corrections and alterations are chiefly in Sancroft's handwriting. A photo-zincograph facsimile edition of this was published in 1871 by order of the Treasury, at the instance of the Ritual Commission, the original being in the Library of the House of Lords.

(2) The Annexed Book—the "fair copy" which was made of the Revised Book, then signed by the members of Convocation and sent by them to the King and the Houses of Parliament. It was attached by strings to the Act of Uniformity and thereby incorporated with it and made Statute Law. It became detached and lost soon after 1819, was rediscovered in 1867, and was published in photo-facsimile in 1891.

(3) The Printed editions of the PB issued in 1662 under the supervision of Sancroft. At least five editions were issued by the King's Printers and one by the University of Cambridge, but no Oxford Edition was apparently issued until 1675.

(4) The Sealed Books—copies which had been examined by Commissioners and corrected and amended in writing and then, certified under the Great Seal of England, were ordered to be kept by all Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, by the Courts of Westminster and the Tower of London, "to be produced and shewed forth in any Court of Record as often as they shall be thereto lawfully required." These books are some 30 in number.

Now, in what condition do we find these Authorities?

Two extracts from the Report of the York Committee of 1892 will show:

(1) . . . "as to deviations of minor importance in matters of orthography or of punctuation and typographical expedients generally—as to all such matters the different texts of 1661, 1662, offer no one standard at all; there is no identity, or attempt at identity, between any two of them; nor is any one consistent with itself; for example, where the same prayers occur twice in the early part of the Morning and Evening Service, and in the Litany as repeated after Morning Prayer and in the Ordination Service, there is no identity of stops, capital letters, or spelling. Each editor and transcriber was left to use his own judgment, and it seems plain that neither those who framed the statutes which speak of a 'true printed copy' and of a 'true and perfect copy' nor those who superintended the writing or printing of such copies understood the words to imply a transcript so literally exact as to preserve unerringly the orthography and punctuation of the original document."

"The modern editions differ indeed in these respects very considerably from the Annexed Book and from all the 1662 texts; but these again differ almost as much from each other, and much more considerably from the original document of the Convocation Copy."

(2) "As to orthography, it is well known how utterly regardless of consistency early writers and printers were, and certainly there is no standard of spelling established by any of the authorities for the text of the PB."

In truth modern accuracy was in 1662 an anachronism, and the state of things of which A. J. Stephens complained in 1849 was simply the result of initial inaccuracy which from the very first had rapidly increased and in the course of two centuries had become divergent. Nevertheless the true position is that affirmed by the motion of Bishop Westcott and unanimously voted by the Upper House of Convocation of York in 1892:

"That it is desirable that the text of the Annexed Book (without regard to orthography) be taken as the Standard of the text of the PB: and that a table of corrections and errata and of changes required by later legislation should be drawn up with a view to their incorporation into future editions"

—with this proviso, as the Guardian wrote in 1891, "where the Annexed Book has made what if it had not been in Manuscript would have been called a misprint, the error should be corrected, though in all other points we think the reading of this book should be implicitly adopted in our present Prayer-books."

We now come to the conference of the representatives of the three privileged presses held on Feb. 28th, 1894, and referred to by Archbishop Benson in a speech made in Convocation, July 3rd, 1894, when he said that they "had agreed to adopt certain alterations and to issue an order that they should be observed in all future prints of the PB." In November, 1902, a return was ordered by Parliament with regard to this meeting and was issued from the Home Office as a Parliamentary Paper in March, 1903. This paper includes the 34 recommendations which deal with orthography, punctuation and the like, and are here reprinted with a few comments:

(1) That in reference to the two Acts of Uniformity, viz., 1 Elizabethæ and 14 Caroli II, the existing practice be retained, viz., of inserting them in the larger editions of the PB and of omitting them in the smaller editions.

(2) That the text of these Acts be verified, and, if necessary, corrected according to the official standard in charge of the Clerk of the Parliaments, the spelling, use of capital letters, and punctuation being conformed to modern usage.

The importance of this second recommendation may be estimated when it is remembered that the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC is based on a clause of the Act "Primo Elisabethæ" and in the opinion of the judges in the Ridsdale case May 12th, 1877, "cannot . . . be looked at otherwise than in connection with" it. Now in the Annexed Book this clause reads, "Such ornaments of the Ch . . . shall be retained, and be in use, as was . . ." The Printed editions of 1662 were ". . . and be in use, as were . . ." but in the Sealed Books "were" was carefully corrected to "was" with a pen. Nevertheless the printers before the year 1700 circulated their editions with ". . . be in use, as were . . ." and in recent years the Act has commonly been printed ". . . be retained, and be used, as was . . ."

(3) In the Preface, second paragraph, in the sentence "the use of the Liturgy would also return" read "also would" instead of "would also."

(4) In the Preface, Of Ceremonies, etc., last paragraph, in the sentence ("as much as may be with true setting forth of Christ's Religion") insert "the" before "true."

(5) In the Calendar, under date September 7th, strike out "Enurchus," and substitute "Evurtius." Also, under date March 7th, strike out "Maurit."

(6) That in the Lord's Prayer, wherever it occurs in the PB, the third petition be punctuated and printed thus—"Thy will be done, in earth as it is in heaven."

This is a remarkable change. In the Annexed Book we find two forms, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," with no stop at all; and "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." The Sealed Books have "Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven." Amidst this confusion a change was adopted in order to bring the meaning more nearly in accordance with the Greek text of Matt. 6 10, but it is a change resting on no authority in Ch. or State.

(7) In Morning Prayer, Rubric after "Venite, &c.," strike out "as they are appointed" and substitute "as they be appointed," the same change to be made in Evening Prayer, Rubric before Magnificat.

(8) In the Benedictus, verse 7, substitute "hands" for "hand."

(9) In the Benedictus, verse 9, substitute "child" for "Child."

(10) In the Litany, wherever it occurs in the PB, print the first suffrage "O God the Father of Heaven" without any comma after the word "God."

(11) Also in the Litany, wherever it occurs in the PB, leave an interval of a line or two after the Lord's Prayer, and also after "Graciously hear us, O Lord Christ."

(12) In the Collect for the First Sunday in Advent strike out "the quick and dead" and substitute "the quick and the dead."

(13) In the Gospel for Septuagesima Sunday substitute (passim) "penny" for "peny."

(14) In the Holy Communion, Prefatory Rubric, second paragraph, substitute "have" for "hath" in the sentence "until he hath openly" and also in the sentence "he hath recompensed."

(15) In the Holy Communion, Prefatory Rubric, fourth paragraph, strike out "the North-side" and substitute "the north side" without the capital letter or hyphen.

(16) In the second Commandment, wherever it occurs in the PB, strike out the comma after "children."

(17) Also in the fifth Commandment strike out the comma after "land."

(18) In the Nicene Creed punctuate and print thus: "of one substance with the Father, By whom all things were made: Who for us men."

(19) Also in the Nicene Creed strike out "Giver of life" and substitute "giver of life."

(20) Also in the Nicene Creed put full stop after "remission of sins."

(21) In the Offertory, in the Sentence, 2 Cor. ix, substitute "grudging" for "grudgingly."

(22) And in the Sentence Heb. xiii strike out the word "well."

(23) In the Prayer for the Ch. Militant, in the sentence "especially to this Congregation here present," strike out "especially" and substitute "specially."

(24) In the Holy Communion, at the end of the Ter Sanctus twice, and at the end of the Gloria in excelsis, print "Amen" in Roman and not Italic type.

(25) Let the Rubric at the end of the Communion Service "Whereas it is ordained" be printed uniformly with the preceding Rubrics, the quotation marks (inverted commas) and the black rule above being struck out, and a Paragraph mark (§) being inserted at the beginning of the Rubric.

(26) In the Service for the Public Baptism of Infants, the Rubrics at the end to be printed uniformly with other Rubrics, and a Paragraph mark to be put on at the beginning of each paragraph.

(27) In the Catechism, last part, second answer to be printed thus; "I mean an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us," without a comma after the word "grace."

This recommendation needs detailed examination, for the "comma" is found in every single one of our Authorities—the Convocation Copy, the Annexed Book, the printed editions of 1662, the Sealed Books. Why then should it be omitted? The facts are peculiar. In 1903 there were discovered in the Record Office the letters patent of King James directed to Archbishop Whitgift, Feb. 9th, 1603 (O.S.), by which this part of the Catechism was first authorised, and there is no stop in the whole sentence. Of even date with this there is the Royal Warrant or Privy Seal, directing the Lord Chancellor to annex the Great Seal of England. In this Warrant the answer is punctuated, "I mean an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ himself, as a means, &c. . . ." This punctuation is retained in some of the PBs between 1604 and 1662—others punctuate ". . . grace, given . . ." Also the Greek Versions of the Catechism both before and after 1662 render the phrase "χαριτος ημιν δοθεισης." On the other hand, the Latin Version of Dean Durel printed in 1670 renders the phrase "signum . . . quod nobis datur"; his earlier French version (1662) had "grace qui nous est donnée." And the insertion of the "comma" from 1662 to about 1800 was almost universal. Since that date it has been usual to omit the "comma." A question was asked in Parliament on this very point in October, 1902, and the Home Secretary stated in reply:

"As a matter of fact, the punctuation of different editions of printed PBs has varied considerably, and in this particular case the printers at their consultation found that the practice was by no means uniform. In many editions, going back to the early dates, the comma is omitted; in others it was printed. Having in view the great importance of uniformity in such a matter, the printers agreed that the comma should be omitted, so that the interpretation of the sentence should not be prejudiced in any direction, it being clear that the system of punctuating in the Annexed Book is not such as to justify the basing of an argument on the presence or absence of this comma."

(28) In the second Rubric after the Catechism strike out "Apprentices" and substitute "Prentices."
(29) In the Marriage Service substitute "N" for "M" (passim).

(30) In the Communion, second paragraph of opening Address, print thus: "Instead whereof until the said discipline may be restored again (which is much to be wished)."

(31) The Psalms. At the heading of Psalm CIX let Deus laudem be substituted for Deus laudum.

(32) In Psalm CXLV, verse 3, omit the comma after "marvellous," so that the verse will read "marvellous worthy to be praised."

(33) In the Ordinal, the Preface and opening sentence, omit "the" before "Holy Scripture."

(34) The Articles. Introduce a distinct title page, as they are no part of the Prayer Book.

These are not the only instances in which necessary correction has been made; two others may be mentioned. In the Gospel for the Thursday before Easter both the Annexed and the Sealed Books read "two other malefactors," most rightly corrected in recent editions to "two other, malefactors." In the Epistle for Good Friday the Annexed Book reads, "When he had offered one sacrifice for sin for ever, sat down, &c.," but the Sealed Books read, "when he had offered one sacrifice for sin for ever sat down." These two passages, with others, were noted in the York Committee's report of 1892.

This report also notes other points which have not been attended to, of a far more serious character than some of the trivial changes included in the above 34 "recommendations." Of these, three should be mentioned. The report reads as follows:

(1) In the Tables of Contents.

No. 19 "The Catechism with the Order for the Confirmation of Children" has been subdivided in modern editions into—

1. The Catechism.

2. The Order of Confirmation.

(2) In all the authorities a strong line of demarcation is set after the Absolution in Morning and Evening Prayer: this should be restored.

(3) But the most important variation of the modern text of the Psalter from that of the Great Bible is in the entire disregard of the brackets and small black letter type, which are preserved in the Annexed Book, but not in the printed Editions. A large percentage of these are represented by modern commas on either side of a vocative case; about 70 mark the additions made in the Vulgate, as taken from the LXX, to the Hebrew text.

In all these cases there is a change of type both in the original Great Bible and in the Annexed Book; so that it would certainly seem, as Bishop Westcott has said, to be "in accordance with the purpose of those who first printed it on this form (i.e., with the notation of the Great Bible though imperfectly given) to distinguish all additions to the Hebrew text noticed in the Great Bible."

The final conclusion is inevitable. The punctuation, orthography and minor variations of the PB are not of sufficient authority to enable them to be used in support of any special views with any weight whatever. On the other hand, it would be perfectly possible for Prayer Books to be printed so as to adhere more closely than is yet the case to the legal authoritative standard copies, even though the Prayer Book of to-day is more accurately printed than it has ever been since the revision of 1662. Indeed, paradox though it be to say so, it is in many respects a more accurate copy of the original than the original standards themselves were from which it was taken.—B1. FREDC. F. GRENSTED.

PURGATORY.—The word P. occurs in the PB only in Art. 22. There it forms the title of the Art., although there is no clear reason why it should do so, except that in the body of the Art.

it is mentioned first in a group, the "Romish" doctrine concerning which is repudiated. Of the other members of the group, one (Pardons) is closely connected with the belief in P.: the rest ("Worshipping and Adoration as well of Images as of Reliques, Invocation of Saints") have no direct connection with it. The same grouping was observed by the Council of Trent, which dealt with the same subjects together in one session in 1563, about ten months after the framing of our Arts. In both cases these beliefs and practices were classed together, because they are all concerned with the mutual relations between the living and the departed members of the Church. Art. 22 condemns as a whole the "Romish doctrine" concerning these relations (on the meaning of the word "Romish," see ROMISH DOCTRINE and INVOCATION OF SAINTS).

It is to be noted with regard to the doctrine of P. that, although the Council of Trent had not yet formulated the Roman position, yet the framers of our Arts. had before them some authoritative definitions of it from the Roman side. The Council of Florence (1439) had already defined it at its minimum with a view to securing agreement with the Greek Church (see below). And, further, the Council of Trent had already (in Sept., 1562), in its decree "On the Sacrifice of the Mass," alluded to it incidentally in the words "defunctis in Christo nondum ad plenum purgatis." In Dec., 1563, the Council agreed as to its decree concerning Purgatory. The doctrine is stated in its barest possible form: that there is a P., and that the souls detained in it are benefited by the prayers of the faithful and especially by the sacrifice of the altar. For the rest, the bps. are enjoined to impress upon their flocks the "sound doctrine" of P. handed down by the Fathers and the Councils of the Church, but at the same time to suppress public preaching on the "more difficult and subtle questions which do not minister to edification," and to forbid abuses and superstitions. The decree of the Council is really the reply of the Counter-Reformation within the Roman Communion to the outcry raised against previous scandals. It acknowledges abuses without specifying what they are and orders their removal. But it sanctions the doctrine of P. as defined by the Council of Florence, to which reference is here made. By this Council the theory of P., which the Tridentine Fathers now confirmed, is thus expressed: "If any have departed this life in penitence and love of God, before they have made satisfaction for their sins of omission and commission by fruits worthy of repentance, their souls are purified after death by purgatorial punishments."

This position is explained by Roman theologians as follows. Satisfaction for sin is of two kinds: (1) that made by Christ on the Cross; (2) Explanations and (2) that which has to be made by Given of it. us ourselves, although its sole virtue and value come from the merits of Christ. This latter kind of satisfaction is the acceptance and voluntary endurance of temporal punishment for the sin. The guilt and the eternal punishment are remitted in the forgiveness granted through the Atonement. But there remains the temporal punishment which still has to be borne, although the sinner is forgiven and restored to the favour of God. The temporal punishment is again of two kinds: (1) that which cannot be avoided, e.g., injury to health or reputation consequent upon sin; (2) that which is voluntarily undertaken as a penance. If this temporal punishment has not been accomplished during the earthly life, it must be continued after death (Schoupe, Elementa, Tract. XIV de Poenitentia, and XIX de Novissimis). A more refined explanation of P. is sometimes found, e.g., in Möhler, Symbolism (§ 23), which centres around the idea of purification rather than those of satisfaction and punishments. The man who dies forgiven is not by the physical fact of dying made in a moment wholly pure in heart. Purification can be no "sudden magical change" effected from without the man: it must come from within him and by his own free choice and action. P. (as the word implies) is the place where the forgiven soul by Divine grace completes this work of purification. When the work is done, the "pure in heart" are admitted into Heaven and see God.

We may call the above the doctrine of P. with its explanations and justifications, as it has been officially defined by the Roman Church under the pressure of the Reformation spirit both within and outside the Roman Communion. The idea of a place and a process of purifying for the soul after death has been accepted by many leading Lutherans (e.g., Dr. Dörner and Bishop Martensen) on the Continent and members of the English Church (e.g., Bishop Andrewes and Dr. Hort). The scandals which Art. 22 had in view, such as the sale of INDULGENCES by which souls were bought out of P. and the traffic in Masses for the departed, are of course indefensible. Putting these aside, we may sum up as follows the authority for the doctrine. (1) It has no real scriptural warrant. Modern Roman writers (e.g., Addis and Arnold, Catholic Dictionary, last ed. revised by Scannell) allow that the only direct Biblical evidence is 2 Macc. 12 48 ff., which of course (quite apart from the probability that the belief and the practice there referred to were exceptional amongst the Jews of that time) cannot be regarded as a sufficient foundation for an article of faith. On the other hand, the "rest" and "peace," which the NT so constantly promises to the dead in Christ (our Lord promises Paradise "to-day" to the thief on the cross), make it difficult for us to accept the teaching of purgatorial pains, and impossible to believe in a torture by material fire, as the Catechismus Romanus (drawn up by Pope Pius IV and a committee of Cardinals in 1566) implies. (2) There is practically no Patristic authority for the doctrine during the first six centuries. Apart from doubtful references in Tertullian, the Passio Perpetuas, and St. Cyprian, the first Western Father who alludes to the doctrine is St. Augustine, and he speaks of it in a hesitating and tentative way. It was Pope Gregory the Great (590-604), who first laid it down as a doctrine to be believed. In the Eastern Church there are doubtful allusions in Clement of Alexandria and Origen, but otherwise nothing until the 4th century. To this day the Eastern Church definitely rejects the notion of any purgatorial pains after death except the pangs of conscience, and is not officially committed to any belief in P. at all. Indeed some of its leading theologians deny that there is a P. or a purification after death. (3) Although the doctrine cannot claim the authority of Scripture or of the early Church, it has seemed reasonable to many that there may be some kind of purifying process to be undergone after death by the soul, by which it becomes perfect in penitence and renunciation of every evil desire, just as (in another but correlative aspect) there is reason to suppose that the soul grows after death into a more perfect zeal for righteousness. This increased penitence and renunciation will be painful, but not such pain as is inconsistent with peace. But this is a question of opinion as to which we may well plead for individual liberty. To impose a doctrine of P. upon all men as a necessary article of Faith is an act of unjustifiable tyranny.¹

Literature. See references above; also Mason, Purgatory; Commentaries on the Arts.; Tracts for the Times 79; R. M. Benson, The Penitence and Joy of the Faithful Departed; J. H. Newman, Dream of Gerontius.—K2^o.
S. C. GAYFORD.

PURIFICATION OF BVM.—See FESTIVAL, § 13; SAINTS' DAYS (RATIONALE OF SERVICES FOR), § 7.

PURIFICATOR.—A small square of linen often used to wipe the Paten and Chalice after the ABLUTIONS.—R3.
J. W. TYRER.

PURITANS.—This name was first bestowed at the commencement of Elizabeth's reign on a number of extreme Reformers who objected to the imposition of the "cap and surplice" and to certain ceremonies, such as the sign of the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage and kneeling at the reception of the communion. They were chiefly composed of clergymen who had been in exile at Geneva during Mary's reign, and who on their return objected to what they considered as the "compromise" adopted by the Act of Uniformity of 1559, and desired to mould the discipline and ceremonies of the Ch. according to the Calvinistic model they had used abroad.

There is little doubt that the majority of the early Elizabethan clergy strongly sympathised with the Puritan scruples. The bps. expressly declared that they had used every effort with the Queen "to effect what our brethren require and what we ourselves wish" (Zürich Letters 177 and 169), and in 1562 a petition in the lower house of Convocation for the removal of Puritan grievances was only rejected by a majority of one vote in spite of the influence of the Court against it. The main body of the Reformers, however, were willing to yield to the dictation of the State in non-essential matters of ceremonies; but the Puritans, who accepted the Holy Scriptures as a perfect standard of discipline as well as doctrine, refused to conform to requirements which possessed no express scriptural sanction and which they regarded as superstitious and "idolatrous." They had, however, no quarrel with the doctrinal standard of the Ch., and, although they refused to conform to its discipline, they had no desire to separate from its communion. But, as Elizabeth was determined to enforce a uniformity of discipline, the persistent refusal of the Puritans to wear the habits soon led to the deprivation of many of them from their cures. The persecution they endured for their nonconformity at the hands of the bishops led many of them after 1570 to deny, not merely the lawfulness of the vestments, but also of the episcopal government of the Ch.; and Cartwright, in his Admonition to Parliament, advocated a Presbyterian system of Ch. polity in accordance with the rules laid down in the Holy Discipline, a book drawn up by himself and Travers, two celebrated Puritan divines. Attempts were soon made by the Puritan clergy to enforce this system in many parts of the country.

About the year 1580 some of the more extreme Puritans, under the influence of the teaching of a divine named Robert Browne, went a step further and advocated complete separation from the Ch., denying the validity of its Orders and Sacraments, and affirming each congregation to be a distinct church. These Brownists and all who refused to conform were, however, so vigorously and relentlessly persecuted that towards the close of Elizabeth's reign Puritanism greatly declined, and the Puritans who appeared at the Hampton Court Conference in 1604 were far more moderate in their demands. A rigid conformity was, however, demanded and, owing to the severely repressive ecclesiastical policy pursued by Charles I and Archbishop Laud, the Puritan ranks were increased by a large number of conforming clergymen of Calvinistic opinions, who were being driven from the Ch. by suspensions, fines, deprivations and imprisonments. During the Civil Wars the Puritan party became sufficiently powerful, with the aid of the Scots, to overthrow episcopacy and establish a Presbyterian system of worship. After the Restoration they presented their old grievances at the Savoy Conference, but on their refusal to conform to the requirements of the Act of Uniformity (1662) they were ejected from their benefices and thenceforward became merged in the general body of DISSENTERS.—A1.

C. SYDNEY CARTER.

PYX.—A small box of precious metal, in which the Blessed Sacrament was reserved in the church and carried to the sick. In mediæval England the P. was suspended above the altar.—R3.

E. HERMITAGE DAY.

QUADRAGESIMA.—See FESTIVAL, § 13; LENT, § 1, 4; ADVENT, § 1.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.—The name of a fund provided for by an Act of 1703 (2 and 3 Anne, c. 20), the administrators of which were formed into a corporation early in the following year, under the title of "The Governors of the Bounty of Queen Anne, for the Augmentation of the Maintenance of the Poor Clergy." Previous to the Reformation, the exactions of Rome from the clergy had included the FIRST FRUITS and TENTHS levied on all clerical incomes and paid over to the Pope for the time being. On abolishing the papal authority in this kingdom, Parliament under Henry VIII diverted both these sources of revenue to the Crown, by which they were retained till restored to the Ch. by the forementioned Act of Parliament. The governing body, headed by the two Abps., with a tolerably full clerical representation, embraces a strong lay element also—a Committee beyond suspicion for the impartial distribution of the fund entrusted to them. The charges are still made pro rata according to the value of the respective benefices as declared under Henry VIII, which differs considerably in many cases from the modern estimate; and more than half the benefices in England and Wales are altogether exempt, either by statute, or as having been created since the charges were imposed. There is, however, a very respectable income, averaging about £15,000 a year, from the amenable contributors, to which the interest on capital held by the Governors is added. Their grants are rarely made to livings of, or exceeding, £200 in net annual value. Otherwise they are usually directed to—(a) the augmentation of poor livings by the gift of a capital sum, say £200; (b) the foundation of new benefices by a gift supplementary to that of the private benefactor; in which case due care is taken to guard against abuses of patronage; (c) the building, or improving, of parsonage-houses; and (in special cases) the erection, or reparation, of chancels. The trustees are further empowered to lend money upon mortgage (sometimes of the benefice itself) in furtherance of objects which commend themselves to their judgment. The application of the fund has been regulated by a long series of statutory provisions, e.g., those of 1714, 1837, 1838, 1839, 1846, and 1865; and applicants for grants will be informed of the conditions on which they can be obtained at the offices of the Bounty, 3 Dean's Yard, Westminster. [The question has often been raised whether the administration of QAB. should not be amalgamated with the Eccles. Commissioners.] (For legal questions see Cripps, Laws of the Church and Clergy, and PROPERTY.)—A6. G. WORLEY.

¹ On the rejection of the belief in P., based upon the denial of an intermediate state, in the Homilies, II. 7 3, and the authority of the Book of Homilies, see CQR 10 14 ff.

QUESTMEN.—An old synonym for churchwardens, who were so called from their duty of inquiring after and presenting for censure parishioners guilty of heresy or other ecclesiastical offences (cp. canons passim and art. CHURCHWARDEN, § 1)—A3. P. V. SMITH.

QUICUNQUE VULT.—This "Confession of our Christian Faith, commonly called the Creed of Saint Athanasius," belongs to the third of the three chief classes of Creeds—Baptismal Creeds, Conciliar Creeds, and Private or Individual Theological Professions. Its early history is still obscure, and has been the battle-ground of much controversy. But it is generally agreed that it was originally written in Latin, probably in the 5th cent. All the Greek versions are plainly translations from Latin, and it is not until the 8th cent. that the name of St. Athanasius is found connected with it. This tradition of authorship however is probably older than the 8th cent., because the author of a commentary (so called the Oratorian), writing probably at the beginning of the 9th cent., says that he has seen it entitled "The Faith of St. Athanasius" even in old MSS.

The earliest definite quotations of the Creed are found in the writings of Cæsarius, who was Bishop of Arles 503-543 A.D. These quotations are not confined to the Pseudo-Augustinian Sermon 244, which is commonly ascribed to Cæsarius, and in which the preacher cites clauses 1, (2), 7, 15, 16, 33, 42. Dom G. Morin, O.S.B., has shown that Cæsarius used the Creed continually as a sort of elementary catechism, and that it reproduces both his qualities and his literary defects.¹ Moreover, Cæsarius often put some words of a distinguished writer at the head of his compositions, so that in this way he may have been responsible for the fact that the name of St. Athanasius was subsequently attached to the Creed.

The use which Cæsarius made of the QV. may, however, be explained by the suggestion that it had been taught him in his youth, so that his style had been moulded by it. Eloquent as he was, the greatest preacher of his time, and the theologian to whom the credit belongs of ending the Pelagian controversy on Free-will when he presided over the Second Council of Orange in 529 A.D., he was not an original thinker, and we must look to some other writer of the school of Lerins to which he belonged.

The famous monastery of Lerins was founded by Honoratus in the early years of the 5th cent. and sent forth into Gaul a succession of great bishops and teachers. It is from such a centre of culture and religious zeal that we should expect the author to proceed. Some writers have claimed Vincentius, one of the early monks, author of the famous Commonitorium, or warning against heresies, as the possible author. Again, we find that Honoratus, the founder, was described in the memorial sermons preached after his death by Hilary of Arles and Faustus of Riez, as renowned for his zeal for the true faith and his careful instructions. Hilary calls him "a daily witness in most sincere sermons of our confession of Father, and Son and Holy Ghost, nor has anyone easily discussed so openly, so clearly, concerning the Trinity of Divinity since thou didst distinguish the Persons and associate them in eternity and majesty of glory."²

Such quotations, of course, do not prove authorship, nor is it so important to find an author as to decide the approximate date at which the Creed was written. Dr. Waterland's argument that it was written in what he calls Apollinarian times has not always received sufficient attention. He means times when the Apollinarian error of denying that the Lord had a human soul was a pressing danger. There can be no doubt that this was the fact at the beginning of the 5th cent., when Priscillian, a Spanish bishop, who fell into heresy and founded a sect which bore his name, taught with great vehemence and under pain of damnation both this error and the error of Sabellius, confusing the persons of the Trinity; so that from beginning to end the QV. is a strong reply to his errors, which were greatly feared in France. Moreover, we find that the Council of Toledo in 633 A.D. quoted certain clauses from both parts of the QV., together with sentences from a contemporary formula known as the Creed of Damasus, which is also apparently directed against Priscillianism.

¹ Le Symbole d'Athanase et son premier témoin St. Césaire d'Arles, Rev. Bénédictine, Oct., 1901.

² Similarly Faustus writes: "Let us first follow the things which he taught. Let us first hold fast the right faith, let us believe Father and Son and Holy Ghost one God. For where there is Unity there cannot be inequality."

In the 8th cent. we begin to find MSS., one of which, the famous Ambrosian MS. at Milan (Cod. O. 212 sup.), has even been

2. Classes of MSS. ascribed to the 7th cent., and the Creed emerges from its obscurity.

The MSS. fall into two main classes: (i) Collections of creeds; (ii) Psalters. The Ambrosian MS., referred to as the earliest, also contains the Faith of Bacchiarus, which is the defence of an obscure monk against the charge of some such heresy as Priscillianism, and belongs to the 5th cent., like the QV.; and again "the Faith of Jerome." Another very interesting MS. which has only recently been discovered is a collection of creeds which was made by Bishop Leidrat and combined with a series of quotations from Cassiodorus, Jerome, Isidore and Augustine, intended as an Introduction to the Psalter. Leidrat presented this MS. with an autograph inscription to the Altar of St. Stephen in Lyons. He resigned his see in 814 A.D., so that the date of the MS. can be ascertained with confidence.

Incidentally this MS. proves how unsafe were the foundations of the Two-Portion Theory, formerly

3. Two-Portion Theory. popular in England and put forward by Professors Swainson and Lumby. They found some quotations of the first portion of the Creed in a profession of faith presented to Ethelhard, Abp. of Cant., by Denebert, Bp. elect of Worcester, in 798,¹ and (with the exception of clause 37) the whole of the second portion of the Creed quoted freely in a sermon known as the Trèves Fragment,² beginning abruptly in the middle of clause 29. They assumed that Denebert only knew the first portion, and the author of the Trèves Fragment only the second, and that the two portions were first brought together in the 9th cent. (c. 860 A.D., Swainson; after 813 A.D., Lumby). The theory involved assigning later dates to all the MSS. supposed on palæographical grounds to belong to the 8th cent. But the progress of palæographical studies during the last twenty years has proved this to be absurd, and we may now reckon that some five or six at least of the MSS. may be dated before 800 A.D. Moreover, the evidence both of MSS. and Commentaries combines to prove that the Creed existed from the earliest days precisely in the form in which we use it. The paraphrase of clauses 35, 42, in the Trèves Fragment show the licence taken by the preacher, not the original text of the form which he was quoting.

Space will not permit us to quote from other MSS., for which reference must be made to the

4. Leidrat's MS. list of books given at the end of this art. But Leidrat's MS. is the connecting link between the two classes of MSS., since the same collection of creeds and extracts relating to the Pss. is also found in the famous Golden Psalter at Vienna (Cod. 1861), which was written by command of a King Charles I for a Pope Hadrian. There can be little doubt that this was prepared by Charles the Great for Pope Hadrian I, after whose death, in 795 A.D., the MS. seems to have been given to Queen Hildegard. Leidrat may have been consulted by the King as to the preparation of the Introduction to the Psalter. From this time on we find the QV. appearing more and more frequently in an appendix to the Psalter together with the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the ordinary Canticles.

The earliest use of the QV. was, as we have seen, in sermons, and in canons on the Faith, such as the canon of Toledo, in which clauses were quoted without reference to the formulary as a whole. About the year 670 A.D. Leodgar, Bishop of Autun, directed his clergy to learn the Faith of St. Ath. by heart. Some hundred years later the author of the Oratorian Commentary, possibly Theodulf of Orleans, informs us that he has been instructed by a Synod to prepare an exposition of this work on the faith "which is up and down recited in our churches and continually made the subject of meditation by our priests."

5. Early Use.

The interest which Charles the Great took in Church music soon led to the use of the Creed as a canticle. Angilbert, Abbot of

6. Canticle and Catechism.

St. Riquier (c. 814 A.D.), records that it was sung by his school in procession on Rogation Days with the Creeds and the Lord's Prayer. Before long it was regularly introduced into the Office of PRIME, apparently first in the Monastery of Fleury, of which Theodulf had been Abbot. At the end of the 10th cent. Abbo of Fleury speaks of it as sung antiphonally both in France and England. But the earlier use as a catechism, especially for the benefit of the clergy, did not pass away. Thus Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims in 852 A.D. made his clergy learn it by heart and explain it like a catechism; and Hayto, Bishop of Basle († 836 A.D.), directed his clergy to learn it by heart and recite it on Sundays at Prime.

During the Middle Ages the Ch. of Eng. continued this use, extending it through the 7. English Use.

Sarum Brev. to daily use, according to the common custom of the Western Ch. through the 12th and 13th cents. In the Roman Brev. the use seems to have been restricted to Sundays from the end of the 13th cent. In the First PB of Ed. VI it was directed that it should be "sung or said" after the Benedictus on the greater Feasts. The Ap. Creed followed it as part of the Preces in prostratione, all kneeling. In the Second PB it was directed that the Ap. Creed should be said standing, preceded by the QV. on certain festivals, the number of which was increased. In 1662 the rubric was altered to "At Morning Prayer instead of the Apostles' Creed."

In the Eastern Church it has been introduced into the Appendix of modern additions to the Hour Offices, but in a mutilated form, the words "and the Son" having been cut out of clause 23.

8. Use in other Churches. With this correction of the doctrine of the Procession of the Son it is regarded as a good exposition of the faith, but no directions are given as to its use. In Russian Service-Books it appears at the beginning of the Psalter. In the R.C. Ch. the Sunday Office of Prime is often crowded out by the multiplication of Saints' Days with their special offices, but it survives in Adv. and Lent and on Trin. Sunday.

¹ Brit. Mus., Cleopatra, E.

² Paris, Bibl. Nat., Lat. 3836.

Thus the Ch. of Eng. alone uses the Creed in the mother tongue in a popular service, and in the present-day controversy on the use this is the starting-point of discussion. It is admitted that there were popular translations in the Middle Ages, and also that Latin was understood by all educated persons, and that Prime as a part of the series of services called Mattins was a popular service. But the fact remains that by far the greater number of the congregations must have been unable to follow the QV., and would use their private devotions in preparation for the Mass following. So that our modern use does not at all correspond to the ancient.

Without trenching on the subject of the next section and without controversy, it may suffice to say that there are those who wish for some alteration of the use, without disloyalty to the positive teaching of the Creed, only feeling that on such days as Christmas Day and Easter Day it is impossible to explain what qualifications are needed to understand clause 2 in a Scriptural sense. They do not wish for the mutilation of the Creed by the excision of a clause or clauses.

Probably the most satisfactory means of attaining this end is through a proposal which was made in 1872 that the bishops should claim as a part of their jus liturgicum a legal power of dispensing, upon application from an incumbent, with the use of the QV. as enjoined in the PB on certain days. The condition might be added that it should be used either in a revived Office of Prime, or at the Evensong preceding the Festival, so that the clergy and other teachers who can supply the necessary qualifications to the warning clauses would still at such times meditate on—to use Hooker's words—this "most divine explication of the chiefest articles of our Christian belief."¹

Some light is thrown on the teaching by the use of the new translation prepared by the Abp's. Committee, the variations

10. The Text. of which from the PB version will be found after the original Lat. text printed below.

I. THE TRINITY.

¹Quicunque vult salvus esse, ante omnia opus est ut teneat catholicam fidem: ²quam nisi quis integram inviolatamque servaverit, absque dubio in aeternum peribit.

i. (a) Divine Personality is Triune. ³Fides autem catholica haec est, ut unum deum in trinitate et trinitatem in unitate ueneremur; ⁴neque confundentes personas, neque substantiam separantes. ⁵Alia est enim persona patris, alia filii, alia spiritus sancti; ⁶sed patris et filii et spiritus sancti una est divinitas, aequalis gloria, coaeterna maiestas.

(b) Attributes of the Godhead expressed in subsidiary antitheses. ⁷Qualis pater, talis filius, talis et spiritus sanctus: ⁸increated pater, increatus filius, increatus spiritus sanctus; ⁹immensus pater, immensus filius, immensus spiritus sanctus; ¹⁰aeternus pater, aeternus filius, aeternus spiritus sanctus: ¹¹et tamen non tres aeterni, sed unus aeternus; ¹²sicut non tres increati, nec tres immensi, sed unus immensus et unus increatus. ¹³Similiter omnipotens pater, omnipotens filius, omnipotens spiritus sanctus; ¹⁴et tamen non tres omnipotentes, sed unus omnipotens.

(c) In which Christian Truth acknowledges the Trinity. ¹⁵Ita deus pater, deus filius, deus spiritus sanctus, ¹⁶et tamen non tres dii, sed unus deus. ¹⁷Ita dominus pater, dominus filius, dominus spiritus sanctus; ¹⁸et tamen non tres domini, sed unus dominus: ¹⁹quia sicut singillatim unamquamque personam et deum et dominum confiteri Christiana veritate compellimur; ²⁰ita tres deos aut tres dominos dicere catholica religione prohibemur.

ii. Divine Relationships in Scriptural Terms are unique, co-eternal, co-equal. ²¹Pater a nullo est, non factus nec creatus nec genitus: ²²filius a patre solo est, non factus nec creatus, sed genitus: ²³spiritus sanctus a patre et filio, non factus nec creatus nec genitus, sed procedens. ²⁴Unus ergo pater, non tres patres; unus filius, non tres filii; unus spiritus sanctus, non tres spiritus sancti. ²⁵Et in hac trinitate nihil prius aut posterius, nihil maius aut minus, ²⁶sed totae tres personae coaeternae sibi sunt et coaequales. ²⁷Ita ut per omnia, sicut iam supra dictum est, et trinitas in unitate et unitas in trinitate veneranda sit. ²⁸Qui vult ergo salvus esse, ita de trinitate sentiat.

II The Incarnation. ²⁹Sed necessarium est ad aeternam salutem ut incarnationem quoque domini nostri Jesu Christi fideliter credat.

i. We confess that Christ is in two Natures. ³⁰Est ergo fides recta ut credamus et confiteamur quia dominus noster Jesus Christus dei filius et deus pater et homo est:

³¹deus est ex substantia patris ante saecula genitus, et homo est ex substantia matris in saeculo natus; ³²perfectus deus, perfectus homo ex anima rationabili et humana carne subsistens; ³³aequalis patri secundum divinitatem, minor patre secundum humanitatem:

ii. Is one Person. ³⁴qui licet deus sit et homo, non duo tamen sed unus est Christus; ³⁵unus autem non conversione divinitatis in carne, sed assumptione humanitatis in deo; ³⁶unus omnino non confusione substantiae, sed unitate personae. ³⁷Nam sicut anima rationalis et caro unus est homo, ita deus et homo unus est Christus:

iii. The Redeemer, The Judge. ³⁸qui passus est pro salute nostra, descendit ad inferos, resurrexit a mortuis. ³⁹ascendit ad caelos, sedit ad dexteram patris, inde venturus iudicare vivos et mortuos. ⁴⁰Ad cuius adventum omnes homines resurgere habent cum corporibus suis, et reddituri sunt de factis propriis rationem; et qui bona egerunt ibunt in vitam aeternam, qui mala in ignem aeternum. "Haec est fides catholica: quam nisi quis fideliter firmiterque crediderit, salvus esse non poterit.

¹ Eccles. Pol., v. 42 12. This suggestion commended itself within limits to Canon Liddon, Dr. Pusey and Lord Salisbury, when they were championing the cause of the Creed.

Variants:

v. 1. "would"—"needful that he held fast." v. 2. "a man have kept"—"eternally." v. 3. "Now"—"the one God as a Trinity, and the Trinity as an Unity." v. 4. "confusing." v. 5. "a Person"—om. "and." v. 6. "Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost is one: their glory equal, their." v. 8. "uncreated" (ter)—om. "and." v. 9. "infinite" (ter)—om. "and." v. 10. om. "and." v. 12. "they are not three uncreated nor three infinities; but one infinite, and one uncreated." v. 13. om. "and." v. 15. "the Son God: the Holy Ghost God." v. 17. om. "likewise"—om. "and." v. 18. "yet they are." v. 19. "to confess each of the Persons by himself to be both." v. 20. "to speak of three." v. 21. "of none: not made, nor created, nor begotten." v. 23. "and the Son: not made." v. 24. "There is therefore." v. 25. "before or after: none is greater or less" (om. "than another"). v. 26. "all three Persons are co-eternal one with another." v. 27. "all ways, as is aforesaid: both the Trinity is to be worshipped as an Unity, and the Unity as a Trinity." v. 28. "Let him therefore that would be saved: think thus." v. 29. "eternal"—"believe faithfully." v. 30. "The right Faith therefore"—"at once both God." v. 31. "He is God"—"and he is Man." v. 32. om. "and"—"of reasoning soul and human flesh consisting." v. 33. "Godhead: less than the Father." v. 34. "is one Christ." v. 35. "One, however, not by change of Godhead into flesh: but by taking of Manhood." v. 37. "as reasoning." v. 38. "to the world below"—om. "the third day." v. 39. "Ascended" (om. "He") into heaven, sat down at the right hand of the Father: to come from thence to." v. 40. "deeds." v. 41. "will go into life eternal: they"—"eternal." v. 42. "have faithfully and steadfastly believed."

The teaching on the doctrine of the Trinity is here set forth on the lines made popular in the West by St. Augustine. It represents an important shifting of the centre of gravity, so to speak, as compared with the theology of the Nicene Creed. There the predominant interest is metaphysical, the battle of Nicaea raging round the word homoousios, "of one substance," which became a technical term in the argument for the essential Godhead of the Son. Here the predominant interest is psychological, and turns on the use of the term person, which was just the term that the Greek theologians lacked. St. Athanasius could say of the Divine Persons "another and another and another," but he lacked the term Person, which in its Latin form had been used by Tertullian, but with a legal flavour about it which somewhat spoiled it for subsequent use. In the eyes of a lawyer a person is one who has legal rights. Therefore a corporation may be a person in the eyes of the law, although only by a legal fiction. Perhaps it was in view of such legal associations that St. Augustine at first shrank from using the word, though he felt constrained to fall back on it.

11. On the Trinity.

His Confessions mark a turning-point in the history of the human mind coming to self-consciousness. Led on by his striving after self-knowledge, he was led to analyse the thought of his limited human personality and to argue from it as to the existence of the Triune Divine Personality which is complete and infinite. Thus he found in his new philosophy, which was profoundly psychological and was closely akin to the tendencies of present-day thought, complete justification of the simpler teaching of earlier theologians, who had quoted without much questioning the teaching of the Bapt. Formula. I do not suggest that the words used (person, substance, infinite) are not metaphysical. No man living fails to be a metaphysician if he uses such terms at all. But it is quite a mistake to criticise the QV. as if its author were merely propounding a series of metaphysical conundrums. That is far from his purpose.

The author's method of stating what has been handed down to him as Catholic Faith and Bible Truth is as simple as it is effective.

12. Exposition. He leads us (1) to worship, for spiritual things can only be "spiritually discerned"; (2) because the eternal distinctions in the Godhead have been made known through the teaching both of the Lord and His App. about His Father and the Holy Ghost, he uses the term Trinity which had been sanctioned by the usage of the Ch. for more than two cents., not as explaining but as expressing the mystery. We dare not confuse the Persons as if God had revealed Himself first as one, then another. Nor dare we "divide the substance" by thinking of the Son or the Spirit as in any sense "created beings." We approach the mystery with awe. We dare not be wise "above that which is written." "I and the Father are one" (John 10 30). Therefore all the attributes—uncreated, infinite, eternal, almighty—which belong to the Father as God and Lord may be ascribed to the Son, and to the Spirit as proceeding from the Father and the Son.

The Scriptural terms "Begotten" and "Proceeding," guarded by the repeated denial "not made nor created," are claimed for the Son and the Spirit as a further reason why we do right to confess each to be Lord and God, while we are forbidden to say three Gods or three Lords, worshipping the Unity in the Trinity.

On the Incarnation the teaching given is no less wise and weighty. The Incarnation must be believed loyally. There are tendencies common to the human mind everywhere and in every age which threaten to dissolve it into unreal theory. While Arians deny the true Divinity, the Eternal Generation of the Son of God, on the one side, Apollinarians take away from the perfect manhood on the other, by denial of the human soul in which the Lord touched the very heart of our nature, reasoning with human thoughts, albeit in the very effort limiting His mode of self-expression, willing to be in all points tempted like as we are, willing in that human soul to go into the unseen world while His Body lay in the grave, sharing our condition even after the moment of His willing death, not regarding His equality with the Father as a prize to be grasped at, but humbling Himself in His Manhood. But this entailed no change of the Godhead into flesh, when the manhood was thus taken into God. The union of soul and body in one man is an illustration of the union of Godhead and Manhood in the One Christ.

13. On the Incarnation.

The tone of the passage is still anti-Apollinarian. The heresies associated with the names of Nestorius and Eutyches, though in the air, had not been elaborately developed. The former, whether Nestorius himself was guilty of it or not, as taught by his followers, minimised the Divine Glory of Christ, asserting a union of the Man Jesus with the eternal Son, and therefore required a more elaborate assertion of the unity of His Person. The latter, beginning from violent reaction against such minimising, taught the virtual absorption of the Manhood in the Godhead, which was equally hostile to a balanced doctrine of the Incarnation. The clauses which guard against these errors are by no means out of date and need to be kept sounding in the Church.

The warning (or damatory) clauses are intended to teach the Scriptural principle that a man is responsible for his beliefs which must in the long run mould and colour his actions. The parable of the two ways (Matt. 7 13, 14) leading to life and to death stands at the back of clause 41 about going into eternal life or eternal fire. These are Scriptural metaphors which have been interpreted spiritually and in a materialistic sense. But the mistakes of commentators, and even the probable bias of the author of the QV. himself towards a wrong method of interpretation, need not deter us from supplying a better. The case is otherwise with clause 2, which is the great crux of the formulary as an expression of the mind of the Ch. We acknowledge that our Blessed Lord made statements which He left it to men to qualify as need required—"Give to him that asketh thee" and "Resist not evil" are well-known instances. And in the words of Professor Mozley, "Just as moral instruction requires its liberty of speech, and has modes of statement which must not be tied to the letter, so has judicial and condemnatory language."¹ So it is quite reasonable that we should agree to put a gloss on the words which urge us to preserve the faith and hold it undefiled on pain of eternally perishing. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness," and from the head proceed the evil thoughts which tempt to sin, so that any weakening of the foundations of faith at the same moment weakens the convictions of morality. But it is not possible to read within the lines of the tremendous statement, "without doubt shall perish eternally," any hope that the writer could tolerate such an explanation as that given by Canon Newbolt: "Surely they do not mean that every soul at the Last Day will have to give a strict account of his adhesion to terms such as incomprehensible, substance, Person, and the like which perhaps he does not understand." Most people agree with Canon Newbolt, but they cannot find a loophole for such an interpretation in words which seem almost chosen to exclude it. Thus weak consciences are caused to stumble, and the need for some alteration of the use becomes urgent, because we cannot be always teaching that we claim our right in this instance to qualify the statement and to bring it into harmony with the Revealed Truth that God "willeth all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth," and that when self-will rejects all the overtures of His mercy it will stand self-condemned because it has sinned against light and love. But we refer the judgment to God, and therefore shrink from all appearance of judging those who through invincible ignorance fail to accept the truth here and now.

¹ Lectures and Theological Papers, p. 194.

Further information may be obtained from the following: D. Waterland, A Critical Hist. of the Ath. Creed, Oxf. Ed., 1870; G. D. W. Ommanney, Dissertation on the Ath. Creed, 1897; Bp. E. C. S. Gibson, The Three Creeds, 1908; A. E. Burn, An Intr. to the Creeds, 1899, and Facsimiles of the Creeds (HBS), 1908.—v3. A. E. BURN.

QUIET DAY.—QDs., in their modern form, are of comparatively recent origin in the Ch., but the Table of Fastis in the PB points to one of their essential elements—the withdrawal of the mind (as much as possible) from mundane and bodily pleasures to the stricter contemplation of divine things. The spirit of the QD. has always existed among devout souls (cp. Mark 6 31) in the desire to gain spiritual refreshment and to deepen personal communion with God. One of the essentials of such a day is that it should be quiet, save for the united utterance of praise and pr., and the instructions of the conductor. Ordinary conversation is suspended until the last common meal is partaken, and even then it is restrained. The dominant feature is the contemplation of the deep things of God, and the formation of resolutions finding their outcome in greater practical obedience to the will of God.

QDs. are now held at many centres (often with direct episcopal encouragement and sometimes conducted by the bp. himself) for ordinands—immediately prior to ordination itself (usually in the Ember seasons)—and for men and women (frequently in Lent and Advent). The common desire of all who attend should be to gain deeper knowledge of God's will in their own lives and a clearer insight into their own motives and conduct, to amend their ways to the glory of God, and to develop their own usefulness as His servants and members of His Church.

The Conductor is a bp. or priest. He officiates at all the services and gives a series of addresses (based upon some of the theological mysteries or a portion of Holy Writ), his great aim being to awaken contrition in the hearts of his hearers and dispose them to the future service of God. Consequently, some portion of the time not otherwise occupied is given to private spiritual conferences between him and his hearers; such conferences being often of the nature of those prescribed in the last paragraph of Exh.¹ at HC.

All assemble at the guest-house on the previous evening, when Evensong is said, followed by the Conductor's introductory address indicating the general tenor of his instructions and emphasising the chief points upon which he will subsequently dilate. The day itself opens with a celebration of the HC, followed by breakfast, a short interval, and then Mattins with the first address. A time of quiet follows for private meditation and interviews, and then the midday meal, often preceded by the short office of Sexrt. In the early afternoon the second address follows (with or without one of the Hour offices), and, after tea, Evensong with the concluding address. An alternative Order for a Parochial QD. might be as follows: 8 a.m. HC, 10.30 a.m. MP and 1st Address, 12.30 p.m. Lit. and brief Instruction, 3 p.m. Metrical Lit. and 2nd Address, 5 p.m. EP and 3rd Address. It is well for hearers to make short notes of the addresses as they are delivered; these are useful for recalling the main topics of thought.

In an age like the present these opportunities of spiritual retreat are becoming increasingly valued (especially by the clergy) as a wholesome antidote to the many distractions of an over-busy, hurried life. Sensibly and simply used, they are an abundant help to those who in quietness and confidence desire to renew their strength by waiting upon God.—Ff.

H. E. SCOTT.

QUIGNON'S BREVIARY.—This work exercised a considerable influence on the construction of the English PB. The need of a

1. Origin. simplification and purification of the Roman Breviary had been felt by many devout members of the Roman Church in the early years of the sixteenth century; and on the mandate of Clement VII the work was undertaken by Cardinal Francisco de Quignones (known generally in this country as Quignon), a Spaniard of noble birth, a member, and formerly General, of the Franciscan Order, and a much esteemed councillor of the Emperor Charles V. He engaged on the task in 1529, and the result of his labours appeared at Rome on 1st March, 1535. By July, 1536, no fewer than six editions (Rome, Venice, two at Paris, Antwerp) had been issued. The title of the first edition was Breviarium Romanum ex sacra potissimum Scriptura et probatis sanctorum historiis constans. The sweeping character of the changes made by Q. roused violent opposition; and more particularly his omission of antiphons, and the reducing of the number of Lessons on all days alike to three, were strongly censured by the Theological Faculty of Paris. Q. yielded to pressure, and in a second form of his book he re-inserted antiphons. But the fortunes of this remarkable work, with its suppression by the Pope Paul IV in 1568, do not concern us; it is of importance to English Churchmen because of the influence of the first form on the PB and the taking over from it and embodying, in the prefatory matter of the PB, considerable parts of Q.'s Preface.

Before a PB in the English tongue had been considered, Cranmer had made preparations for a reformed Latin Breviary, much on

2. Description. the lines of Q., and his attempt is now preserved among the MSS. of the British Museum. In the document in our PB, now entitled Concerning the Service of the Church (up to 1662 entitled The Preface), free use is made of Q.'s Pref., and some of the paragraphs are little more than a slightly modified translation of the Latin. The most characteristic features of Q.'s Breviary are thus described by himself. There is a return to the practice of the "old fathers" in the reading of Holy Scripture, by omitting antiphons, capitula, responsories, many hymns, and other things of a like kind, which impeded the reading of the Scripture. Of the OT the most useful and weighty books are read. These include the greater part of the Prophets, the whole of Genesis and Deuteronomy, the greater part of Exodus, portions of Joshua, the Proverbs, and the whole of 1 Samuel. Of the NT nothing is omitted except nearly all of the Apocalypse. The first lesson is taken from the OT, the second from the NT, and the third Lesson also from the NT, unless when on a Saint's day the history of the saint is read. The histories of the saints Q. draws from approved authors, Greek as well as Latin; he frees these histories from those features which had sometimes aroused "the contempt and derision of the readers," and he claims to write them in a less rude style than that of the old Breviaries. The few hymns retained are those of greatest weight and authority. The Ps. are all said once a week, but they are distributed in such a way as to give three to each service of the canonical hours; and this he contrasts with the then prevailing practice of omitting most of the Ps. and repeating a few throughout nearly the whole year. He complains of the perplexing rules of the old Breviary, so that "there is sometimes little less labour in finding out what is to be read than in reading it when it is found out." The varying dates of Easter and the movable feasts make it impossible to dispense altogether with rules "of which the former Breviary was so full that scarce a lifetime would suffice for thoroughly mastering them" (the "Rules called the Pie, Concerning the Service of the Church in the PB), but he endeavours to make the rules so few and so clear that it will be easy to understand them. The Office of the Virgin is no longer to be said daily, but only on Saturdays (if a feast does not fall on that day), and at Matins and Vespers there is to be a daily commemoration of the Virgin in lieu of the Office. He reiterates the importance of "the continuous reading of the Holy Scriptures." He declares that he had aimed not at brevity, but at usefulness and convenience, yet as a matter of fact though the Lessons are longer there are fewer of them, and this with the omission of versicles, responsories, and antiphons, makes the recitation of the Office shorter.

Q. concludes his Pref. with words which were followed in the old Pref. of the PB and which were omitted only in 1662 (an omission which on historical grounds is to be regretted). It will be best to cite the words as they appear in the old Pref. of the PB: "And if any would judge this way more painful (laboriosum, Q.) because that all things must be read upon the book, whereas before, by the reason of so often repetition, they could say many things by heart (memoriter, Q.); if those men will weigh their labour with the profit in knowledge, which daily they shall obtain by reading upon the book, they will not refuse the pain in consideration of the great profit that shall ensue thereof."

The placing of the Conf. and Absol. (in the PB of 1552) at the opening of Matins and Evensong had been anticipated in the first form of Q.'s Breviary.

It will be seen that the English Reformers went further than Q. Not only were antiphons and responsories ("responds," PB) to the 8. Comparison with PB. Lessons omitted, but also the invitatory which Q. had retained. The third Lesson with histories of the saints disappears, and the Lessons were confined to Holy Scripture, including some parts of the Apocrypha. The weekly recitation of the Psalter was not adopted; and the Office and commemorations of the Virgin were omitted. All hymns disappear.

The first form of Q.'s Breviary has been edited by Dr. J. Wickham Legg (Cambridge, 1888), and the text of the second form, under 4. Bibliography. the same editor, was published (1908) by the HBS. The Latin text of various parts of Q.'s Pref. corresponding to parts of Concerning the Services of the Church, as it now stands, are exhibited in Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer. The whole of Q.'s Pref. is printed, together with the censure of the book by the University of Paris, in Guéranger's Institutions Liturgiques 1 397-403. See also Batiffol's Histoire du Breviaire Romain 220-227; J. M. Neale's Essays on Liturgiology, p. 3.—B1. J. DOWDEN.

QUINQUAGESIMA.—See FESTIVAL, § 15; SEPTUAGESIMA (RATONALE OF SERVICES), § 3.

QUIRE (or CHOIR).—Originally meaning a body of singers, the word came to mean the part of the church occupied by them. In the basilicas of the early Church, while the bishop and clergy occupied the apse behind the altar, it soon became the custom to provide an enclosed Q. in front of it where the chanters sang the service. In England before the Reformation, the Q. was always in the eastern part of the church in front of the altar. Western galleries for singers are first met with in the reign of Elizabeth. In many churches there was both vocal and instrumental music in the roodloft across the chancel arch, but it would seem that these pieces of music were additional to the liturgical service itself and consisted of what we should now call "voluntaries" and "anthems" (then called MOTETS), and the performers were regarded as minstrels rather than as a Choir. It may be remarked that the metrical Pss. introduced by the Reformers were equally external to the liturgical service. The service itself was sung in the chancel by the parish clerk alone, or with the assistance of such boys, men, chantry-priests, etc., as were available. In many Benedictine churches, and all Cistercian, the part east of the transepts was so short as only to afford space for the sacrum, while the Q. was placed either entirely west of the transepts (Westminster, St. Alban's, etc.), or extended across the transepts and somewhat west of them (Winchester, Gloucester, etc.); but in most churches of Canons Regular, and in almost all of Canons Secular, the Q. was east of the principal transept, and a second smaller transept sometimes came between the Q. and the SACRARIUM (Lincoln, Salisbury, Southwell, etc.). In the rubric: "InQUIRES and places where they sing," etc.—the word quire is thought by Mr. Micklethwaite to denote those large churches, cathedral or collegiate, where there is a permanent staff of trained singers: but the word is more commonly used as synonymous with CHANCEL.—R6.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

RAILS.—Altar R. were unknown in England until after the Reformation. Abp. Laud introduced them in 1636. He directed that all altar-tables should be removed from the nave where they had met with much indignity, placed in their ancient position within the chancel, and railed off for the sake of greater reverence. Altar R. were almost everywhere destroyed during the Commonwealth, and there are very few Pre-Commonwealth R. now in existence. New R. were re-erected however during the latter part of the 17th cent., and are now almost universal not only in the Church of England but also among Nonconformists. Anterior to Laud's time kneeling benches of wood were used, and are still in existence in some churches, e.g., Wimborne Minster; these, however, generally fell into disuse after the introduction of R. Altar R. are made in iron, brass and wood, with metal or wooden supports.—R5.

G. VALE OWEN.

RATES AND TAXES.—"My duty towards my neighbour" may be called to mind anent this subject.

1. Local Rates.—Local and county rates such as Poor, Highway, Sanitation, Education, Prison, Courts of Justice, Asylum Rates, etc., who does not feel the burden of them? As society becomes more complex, these various charges tend to multiply and to increase. It is important for ratepayers, and especially the clergy, to understand what purposes these various rates are intended to serve, how they are assessed, computed, notified, collected, and what are the legal allowances and deductions. It is important for a man of education, appointed by the Ch. to be a public teacher, not to weaken his influence by aimless and foolish railing against rates. The writer would advise such to work, up the subject of local taxation, mainly through his own experience supplemented by reading. He will find ample opportunities of employing his knowledge to promote peace among his people, and soothe the anxieties of the less instructed. And it will be well if his neighbours and parishioners, who have knowledge, are encouraged to share it with others.

The Poor rate dates from the time of Queen Elizabeth, and was consequent on the dissolution of the monasteries. It is an integral part of the modern social system. It aims at discouraging begging, vagrancy, idleness, want of work, and so forth. We are instructed on the highest authority that we have the poor always with us. So we have the Poor rate as a permanent claimant, but it is devoutly to be wished that the Poor Law system may have speedy and drastic improvement, and that economy may be effected in what are called "Establishment Charges."

2. Imperial Taxes.—Security of life and property, personal liberty, equal laws, respect for the rights of conscience—these and other national blessings we enjoy, as subjects of the King. In return, at the beginning of the year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer sends in his bill for Income, Property, Land and other taxes, charges which are essential in order to provide a fund for the good conduct of the country. Not every Briton loves to see the bill, but as a loyal subject he pays. He wants to maintain the national defences. Imperial, like local, taxation is a large subject, the fringe of which can be only touched in this place, but the suggestion may be offered here also that every intelligent subject should endeavour to learn what are the sources of his country's revenue.

Eccles. property and clerical incomes are subject to local and imperial charges like other property of the same class, except that Consecrated Churches are exempted from Poor rates; and that half the rates on Tithe and Glebe are provided out of the Consolidated Fund, in the same way as for other landed property; see Tithe Rent Charge (Rates) Act, 1899.—A6.

J. S. WILSDEN.

READER.—In the subapostolic Ch., side by side with the regular threefold ministry, there was a charismatic ministry of persons described as evangelists, prophets, teachers, and readers (see EVANGELIST, CATECHIST). The R.'s duties were to read the scriptures, and possibly to interpret them, and to read homilies. The R. is mentioned by Justin, and in the Apost. Ch. Order (c. 300) he ranks next to the presbyter. But in the West, in the time of Tertullian, he already ranks below the deacon, and the office was gradually depressed till it became one of the minor clerical orders, and was conferred on boys in the schola cantorum as a step towards the priesthood.

In the Middle Ages, especially in the 13th cent., the work of the parish clergy was supplemented by that of the friars, who as laymen were allowed to preach; and, from the 4th cent. onwards, the lay clericus or clerk had a recognised position. In England such laymen, the forerunners of our Parish CLERKS and Cathedral singers, often fulfilled most of the duties of the Minor Orders. Owing to the dearth of clergy in the early years of the reign of Elizabeth, an attempt was made by Parker to establish an order of Readers, but it did not prove satisfactory.

In the 19th cent. the development of church life, and of society generally, called forth a vast amount of lay help, both at home and in the mission field. This was necessitated partly by the deficiency of clergy and partly by the need of relieving them of work more suitably done by laymen. The need of defining, regulating, and recognising this work was felt; and various provincial or diocesan synods, individual bishops, and missionary societies have drawn up regulations defining conditions of appointment to, and the duties involved in, the various offices of evangelist, catechist, sub-deacon, reader. In 1904 a committee of Conv. drew up a short but exhaustive report on the whole question (Nat. Soc., No. 383), and in 1905 the Abps. and Bps. issued their Regulations respecting Rs. and other Lay Officers (SPCK), a document which, though it makes the office of R. merely diocesan or even parochial, may be said to have advanced the movement by regulating it and giving it official sanction.

The whole subject of lay work was discussed at the Pan-Anglican Conference of 1908 (cp. Pan-Anglican Papers, The Call of the Ch. to Laymen). The chief need at present is to define lay work and to differentiate it from that of the clergy, so that each may develop on its own lines and supplement the other, and that the activities of the Ch. may be neither clerical nor secular but catholic. The verdict of history shows that lay readership should not be regarded as an apprenticeship to Holy Orders, or a cheap substitute for the regular ministry, and that a priest should not be a mere lay worker in black clothes, and commanding a higher salary. With more definite development of lay work will come a more efficient training and an improvement in the status of readers. This development is being largely effected by the work of the C.E.M.S., while questions of recognition, training, organisation, etc., are considered annually at a representative Conference of Lay Readers (Reports in The Lay Reader, the quasi-official organ of the movement, Simpkin, Marshall & Co.). For literature, see MINOR ORDERS.—A3.

CLEMENT F. ROGERS.

READING.—It is difficult to over-estimate the importance of clear, distinct and impressive R. in the conduct of Divine Service. A well-known passage in Hooker sets forth that R. a lesson is the execution of the very office of preaching

1. Importance of Good Reading.

(EP v. 31), and that the efficacy which the Puritans attributed mainly to sermons, those for whom he spake attributed to R. also. In the introductory chapter to the PB, "Concerning the Service of the Church," it is shown that the Reformers exercised great care that the R. of Holy Scripture should be so set forth that all things should be done in order without breaking one piece from another, i.e., that the R. of the Bible should be continuous and regular. In the opinion of those best able to judge, the R. of the lessons has been a most effective part of Divine service. But the effect obviously depends largely upon the way in which they are read. Men were drawn to attend daily service for the sake of hearing the late F. D. Maurice read the lessons. On the other hand, it is to be feared that many have been repelled by the hurried and bad R. to be heard in some churches.

There are those who think that a good reader is born, not made; but of late years increasing attention has been paid to methods

2. Training. of training speakers and readers in voice production, distinct enunciation, good pronunciation and expression without artificial stagginess.

The first essential is to master the method of breathing correctly. Inhalation should be normally through the nose, with the mouth

3. Breathing. shut, or with the soft palate raised at the back to block the mouth passage. The abdomen should swell out and the swelling spread from the abdomen to the ribs. The shoulders should not be raised. We all breathe naturally when we are lying down, and it is well, therefore, to begin the practice of inhalation in this attitude.

Exhalation should be slow and steady, through the open mouth. The breath should not be allowed to escape hastily, but kept under control. Wrong breathing is the cause of much throat trouble.

Suitable exercises to form the habit of breathing correctly will be found in text-books (see below).

In Enunciation the reader should aim at two things: (a) that his R. should be audible, and (b) his utterance as agreeable and as free from

4. Enunciation. peculiarities as possible. There should be plenty of practice in the pure production of the different vowel sounds. The common tendency is for certain vowel sounds to be produced more faintly than others, though the reader is not aware of this.

If it is possible to make a phonograph record of our own speech we shall be surprised at our unsuspected defects, and we shall learn better than by any other means what are the faults we have to cure. The bad but common habit of dropping the voice at the end of a sentence should be guarded against. There is no reason why a lower tone should not be adopted without lessening the amount of resonance. A good reader can make a whisper audible to his audience. A candid friend at the back of the church is the best helper in this matter. Let me impress this strongly, for more of us are guilty of this fault than we generally suspect. The tone should be neither too high nor too low, but that medium tone which is most natural and easy to the reader, and from which he can rise or fall, as may be desired.

To intersperse R. or speaking with unmeaning vowel sounds is another bad habit which may be overcome by care and watchfulness. The speed of utterance should be carefully regulated. It is very difficult to follow a rapid speaker, and very few can read rapidly without losing clearness and distinct enunciation. A slow, halting delivery is the fault in the other extreme. On the other hand, the rate should not be mechanically uniform, but should vary naturally with the subject-matter, a change of speed being one of the most effective means of expression (see further below).

The correct Pronunciation of words is another element in good R. The standard of what is correct

5. Pronunciation. may be found in the usage of well-educated people, whose speech is free from provincialisms and vulgarisms.

Much may be learned by listening to good readers and observing their pronunciation of words and names. Reference to the Greek Test. would save many mis-pronunciations of proper names. It may be well to add a caution against pedantry. The received pronunciation of some proper names is doubtless incorrect, but custom and long usage have sanctioned it, and it is better to be guided by them.

Everyone will feel the importance of R. Scripture with due Expression. We do not want a monotonous chant, still less a hurried gabble. Nor

6. Expression. do we want the reader to give the impression that the passage is of no special interest to him or to anyone else. Yet these styles are not unknown in our churches. On the other hand, a highly dramatic style of R. is not suitable in Divine worship, and is apt to defeat its own end by producing irreverence and detracting from the sacred character of the Bible. The Word of God must not be treated as if it were the word of man. At the same time, we rightly desire that the reader should show a sympathetic appreciation of the passage, and should convey to his hearers the solemnity, the beauty and the depth of its meaning. To do this, it is essential that he should himself feel, as much as possible, its meaning and beauty. This implies a previous and careful study of the passage to be read. The writer believes this to be quite essential, especially for beginners, and ventures to press it strongly. He would add that a short ejaculatory pr. while walking to the lectern, that the Holy Spirit may bless what is read to the good of the hearers, has the reflex action of solemnising the reader and putting him in the right spirit for his office.

The mechanical side of expression lies in the right management of the voice. The chief elements are Inflection, Modulation, Emphasis, and Phrasing. By the variation of these expression is produced.

Inflection is the ascent or descent of the voice to a higher or lower note. It does not imply that the tone is louder or softer, but it is

7. Inflection. the variation from monotone. The Rising Inflection carries on the attention of the hearer to what is to follow, while the Falling Inflection denotes the completion of the statement; e.g., "Quit you like mén, be strong." "Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days." "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow: though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

It is not possible within the limits of this art. to specify the cases in which the Rising or Falling Inflection should be used. The reader must refer to the under-mentioned books. After all it is largely a matter of rhythm to which the ear becomes attuned by practice.

Modulation is effected by changes of Tone and of Time. For convenience sake we may speak of three

Tones: High, Medium and Low. The

8. Modulation. Medium Tone is that of habitual utterance. The Low Tone is expressive of deep feeling, and may be used with advantage in passages of pathos, solemnity and awe, e.g., the description of the Holy City (Rev. 21 22-27). The High Tone is expressive of strong emotion, joyous feelings and animated description, e.g., Is. 35. With the difference of Tone goes also the change of Time. It is natural that the High Tone should be accompanied by a quicker time and the Low by a slower.

Next we come to the very important point of Emphasis. The meaning of a passage may easily be obscured or changed by emphasis

9. Emphasis. being laid upon the wrong words.

On the other hand, there are passages the meaning of which cannot be clearly brought out unless emphasis is laid upon the right words. See Romans 4 9 ff. as a good example of this and also an instance of a passage which calls forth the skill of the best readers. It may be well to add that too much emphasis savours of the grotesque and defeats its own object. A common fault is to emphasise pronouns, which, as a rule, are not the emphatic words in a sentence. One often hears the commandments read with the emphasis on the words "Thou" and "not" instead of on the name of the sin: "Thou shalt not steal."

Lastly, careful attention is needed about Phrasing, i.e., the grouping together of related words. Smaller groups are thus readily indicated by

10. Phrasing. a slight prolongation of the last syllable, but without necessarily emphasising it. Larger groups may need an actual break in the voice. Experience and the watching of good readers will teach how this is done. But it should be noted that the punctuation, which is a purely grammatical device, is very little guide to phrasing. Many commas should be absolutely ignored in reading, and, on the other hand, good phrasing requires prolongations of syllables and pauses where there is no stop at all.

It remains to mention some of the most common faults against which the reader should guard. These are: (1) failure to sound the final consonant, especially in words ending in d and t; (2) the omission of the final g in words ending in ing; (3) the carrying on of the final consonant and prefixing it to the beginning of the next word when that word has a vowel for its first letter, e.g., "We have heard with our (r)ears." (The writer heard this clause in the Lit. read thus for some weeks in a church he attended.) An opposite blunder is to make it "our (y)ears." These may seem small matters, but they mar good Reading.

11. Some Common Faults.

Above all, it is necessary to take pains and to keep the attention fixed. But, when we consider how much R. and speaking enter into the work of the clergy, is it not worth while to spend time and trouble upon making them as good as possible?

Literature: Burrell, Plain Reading and Good Speaking; Prof. Wyld, The Teaching of Reading; Garry, Elocution, Voice and Gesture.—re.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

READING DESK.—Bp. Sparrow states that, previous to Cromwell's time, what was then termed the "reading pew" had a double purpose, as signified by the two desks with which the pew was furnished. One of these was for the reading of the Prs. and faced towards the East, and the other for the reading of the Lessons faced towards the body of the church. The Advertisements of Abp. Parker were drawn up by the command of Elizabeth expressed in a letter dated Jan. 25, 1565, and were issued in the year following. These merely ordered that "the Common Prayer be said or sung decently and distinctly, in such place as the Ordinary shall think meet for the largeness and straightness of the church and choir, so that the people may be edified." The canons of 1604 are even less definite. Canon 82, after giving directions regarding the Communion-table and other matters, adds, in almost a casual manner, "and likewise that a convenient seat be made for the Minister to read service in." The Rubric prefixed to MP (which rubric assumed its present form in 1559) directs that it shall be said "in the accustomed place of the Church, Chapel, or Chancel," but does not specify any spot in the building from which it shall be read. The only reference to the RD. in the PB is in the rubric at the beginning of the Communion Service which is to be read in "the Reading Pew or Pulpit."

The reason why the RD., which is so prominent a feature in our churches to-day, received so scant notice in earlier times is probably to be found in the fact that in Pre-Reformation days the Service of the Altar had much more prominence over all other services in both the popular and the clerical mind than subsequently. The popularisation of Matins and Evensong has invested the RD. with an importance it did not formerly enjoy.—R3.

G. VALE OWEN.

REAL PRESENCE.—See BLACK RUBRIC.

RE-BAPTISM.—The Sacrament of Bapt. may be administered only once to each individual. This directly follows (a) from its object—incorporation into the body of Christ; (b) from the figures under which it is described in the NT—new birth (John 3 5), burial with Christ (Rom. 6 4), etc.; (c) from such texts as 1 Cor.

12 13, Eph. 4 5. The above principle has always been acknowledged in the Ch., but at times difficulties have arisen as to its practical application. Christians are universally agreed that the proper matter of the Sacrament is water, and that the proper form must contain the words "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. 28 19). But is the minister of the essence of the Sacrament? Is Bapt. valid when administered (a) by a layman, (b) by a heretic? For (a), see LAY BAPTISM. With regard to (b), a great controversy arose in the 3rd cent. between Cyprian and Stephen, Bp. of Rome, the former of whom denied, the latter affirmed, the validity of heretical Bapt. The main original authorities for this controversy are Cyprian (Eps. 69-75), Eusebius (HE vii. 2-9), and the anonymous treatise De Rebaptismate. The conclusion finally arrived at was that Bapt. administered by any baptised person with the right matter and form is valid, though it may be irregular. And this conclusion has been generally accepted in the Ch. of England.

The difficulty arising from cases of doubt as to whether a person has been baptised or not has been solved by Hypothetical Bapt. (see BAPTISMAL OFFICES, § 31).—id.

J. W. TYRER.

RE-CONSECRATION.

Re-consecration is the common, though hardly appropriate, term applied to the consecration of a fresh supply of bread or wine, or of both elements, necessitated by the number of communicants being larger than had been anticipated. What was done in the early Ch. in such a case we do not know; most likely it very seldom happened, as the customs then prevailing made it needful to consecrate in very large quantities for purposes of RESERVATION. There are obviously greater objections against consecrating a large quantity of wine than a large quantity of bread, and, accordingly, it is in connection with the former that we first hear of Re-consecration. About the 8th cent., it was customary to pour fresh wine into the chalice, and this wine was believed to be consecrated at once by mixture with what was already consecrated (so Mabilon's Third Ordo Romanus). This belief was not likely to last long after the idea that the Words of Institution were the form of the Euch. had become firmly established, and with the belief the practice would naturally die out.

In the Ch. of Eng. bef. the Reformation the question of Re-consecration was of little practical importance, as communions were infrequent, and Reservation covered exceptional cases. But the cautels of the Sar. Missal provided that if, after the celebrant had communicated in one kind, he found out that he had been officiating without wine in the chalice, though it would be better for him to start again with consecrating both kinds, still, to avoid possible scandal, he might merely put wine and water into the chalice and consecrate them, beginning with the words, "Simili modo posteaquam canatum est," i.e., "Likewise after supper" (Maskell, Ancient Liturgy of the Ch. of Eng., 3rd ed., p. 243).

The principle underlying the latter part of this cautel was developed in the Order of the Communion, 1548, where communion in both kinds was restored to the laity after three cents. of disuse. The chalices of those days being small, the priest was ordered, on days of general communion, to consecrate the "biggest chalice, or some fair and convenient cup or cups," and, if necessary, re-consecrate, beginning with the words "Simili modo." The PBs of 1549 and 1552 contained no order with regard to Re-consecration, but canon 21 of 1604 provided that "no bread or wine newly brought shall be used; but first the words of Institution shall be rehearsed when the said bread and wine be present upon the communion-table." This provision was developed in the Scottish PB of 1637, and still more in the rubric of our present PB. With regard to the latter it is to be observed that:—(1) it assumes the possibility and lawfulness of bread and wine being consecrated separately; (2) it assumes either that the Words of Institution are the form of consecration, or that the previous Pr. "embraces in its intention all the bread and wine on which the Priest may afterwards lay his hand, the second supply no less than the first." On the other hand, the Scottish Communion Office and the Amer. PB, with far greater propriety, require, for a re-consecration, (1) both elements to be consecrated together, (2) the whole of the main part of the Pr. of Consecr. to be said over them.

(Scudamore, NE, pp. 707 ff., 760 ff.; DCA, art. Consecration (Eucharistic); Dowden, ASCO., pp. 222-3; Commentaries on BCP.)—H2.

J. W. TYRER.

RECTOR.—The normal title of a parish priest is R. The Bp., being the person to whom the spiritual government of the diocese belongs, devolves, always subject (under necessary conditions) to correction and oversight, the government in spiritual things of a part of the diocese, the parish, to the priest whom he institutes to the cure of Souls. Neither Bp. nor parish priest is a "lord over God's heritage," but, nevertheless, they both represent, to the souls they have to care for, the kingly, as well as the priestly and prophetic, functions of the great Head of the Church, our Lord Jesus Christ. The idea of spiritual government is that which is involved in the expression of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (13 17), "Obey them that have the rule over you"—οἱ ἡγούμενοι—one of the instances of the application in that Epistle of political terms to the Christian Society. Such government is, of course, constitutional, not in any sense arbitrary, though some details must depend upon the reasonable discretion of the person who has the grave responsibility of ruling. But he must rule in strict accord with the canons, traditions and customs of the Ch.

The words of institution express this, "We do by these presents commit unto you the Cure and Government of the Souls of the parishioners of the said Parish." (See also INCUMBENT.)—ta.
E. G. WOOD.

RED-LETTER DAYS.—See FESTIVAL, § 3.

REFRESHMENT SUNDAY.—See LENT, § 4.

REGENERATION.—(The Biblical doctrine). The word Regeneration (παλιγγενεσία) occurs only twice in the Bible; Matt.

1. Word and Mean. 19 28 ("In the regeneration . . . ye shall sit on thrones"), and Titus 3; ("the laver," or "bath," "of regeneration"). This latter alone, of the two, seems to refer to personal New Birth. But the idea occurs very frequently under various but converging phraseology. Thus we have it in connection with the word Birth. "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God . . . Except he be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter, etc. . . . That which is born of the Spirit is spirit . . . Ye must be born again . . . So is every one that is born of the Spirit" (John 3 3-8; cp. John 1 13). "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God . . . Everyone that loveth is born of God . . . Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world . . . Whosoever is born of God sinneth not" (1 John 3 9, 47, 5 1, 4, 18). "Being born again . . . of incorruptible seed, by means of the word of God" (1 Pet. 1 23). The practically identical imagery of begetting appears Jas. 1 18: "Of His own will He begat us, with the word of truth," and 1 Pet. 1 3: "He hath begotten us again to a living hope."

It appears too in the very numerous passages where a filial relation with God, above that of nature or creation, is predicated of Christians.

2. Kindred Terms. Thus, "What manner of love hath the Father bestowed upon us that we should be called the children of God! . . . Now are we children of God." "In this" (by not sinning and by sinning) "the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil" (1 John 3 1, 2, 10). "As many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God . . . The Spirit beareth witness with our Spirit that we are the children of God . . . The . . . creation waiteth for . . . the liberty of the glory of the sons of God" (Rom. 8 14, 16, 21). The same class of ideas is before us where a spiritual revolution is shown under other imagery. Thus, "A new heart . . . and a new spirit I will put within you" (Ezek. 36 26); "If any man be in Christ he is a new creation" (2 Cor. 5 17; cp. Gal. 6 15). So too, of course, where a divine gift of new life is spoken of without imagery. Thus, "The Son quickeneth (giveth life to) whom He will" (John 5 21); "You hath He quickened, who were dead in sins" (Eph. 2 1); "He that hath the Son hath the life" (the "eternal life" just mentioned), "and he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life" (1 John 5 11, 12). We may group under the same head the great range of passages which dwell on the Christian's life "in Christ," as against a previous and contrasted state; e.g., Rom. 16 7: "They were in Christ before me." Compare too the distinction, broad and deep, between the "spiritual" man and others, as in 1 Cor. 2 14, 15: "The natural (lit. psychical) man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God," etc. A like contrast appears in the words of the Lord Himself (Matt. 11 27): "No one knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him."

Viewed as a whole, this representative collection of Scriptures gives us the following main elements of a doctrine of R. First, the mysterious need that man, to be right with God, should pass through a spiritual change so great, so deep, as to demand expression in terms not of amendment but of a new vital departure, the gift of a new vitality and its issues. Adequately to weigh this element, we need to weigh with something like adequacy the Scripture doctrine of Sin, original and actual, and, yet more, to understand conviction of sin in experience. Then, we find the change in question presented as (at least ideally) critical, decisive. This is not to say that the consciousness of it must always be so; but, from the Divine side certainly, it is as true an epoch as natural begetting or natural birth can be. Further, it appears everywhere as a thing not dormant or potential but actual and with results; the "sound of the wind" is "heard" when it breathes; "the children of God are manifest"; they "love," "do righteousness," "overcome the world," "are led by the Spirit." Further, the mystery (which is thus also so operative a fact) is bound up with the work of the Spirit as Life-Giver and with Christ as Life. Vital union with Christ by the Spirit is Regeneration, is New Creation.

The relation of Regeneration thus viewed to holy BAPTISM (see John 3 5, Titus 3 5) is not our subject here. Enough to express our conviction that the relation is real and sacred, while yet it cannot be such as to obscure the magnificent directness and simplicity of such words as those of John 1 12, 1 John 5 1. And to view the Sacrs. as supremely the Divine seals to faith of the New Covenant of grace seems to us best to secure the true relation; cp. BAPTISM, §§ 10-14; RELIGION, § 8 ff.—Id.

HANDLEY MOULE.

REGISTRAR (BISHOP'S).—The R. is appointed by the Bp. by letters patent under seal, usually for the term of the R.'s life. The R.'s presence is necessary for the due performance of any judicial act done by or on behalf of the Bp.; and it is the R.'s duty to conduct the business of the CONSISTORY COURT of the diocese subject to the directions of the CHANCELLOR of the diocese, and to advise and assist the Chancellor or his deputy in legal matters. The R. also has charge of the diocesan registry, in which are kept documents relating to certain eccles. matters, e.g., conveyances of ch. and parsonage sites, and to which should be forwarded annually copies of the parochial registers of baptisms and burials. The R. issues marriage licences and prepares certain other eccles. documents. The R. is paid by fees fixed by Act of Parliament, of which he is required to make an annual return to the Home Secretary.—A3.

HUGH R. P. GAMON.

¹ Or "the Spirit"; see the alternative translations of πνεῦμα in John 3 8.

RELICS.—Special care and reverence were bestowed by the first Christians upon the remains of the departed and upon the places of their burial. This was doubtless due to the faith which was in them that the body was "the temple of the Holy Ghost" and should have its part in the Resurrection. During the age of the persecutions this feeling of reverence was especially marked and strong. The martyrs were the heroes in the fight, their burial was a matter of careful and loving attention, and their graves became meeting-places for worship, but not of the martyr or his R. There is nothing that can be complained of in sentiments so true as these.

Eusebius (HE iv. 15 41, 42), in his account of the burial at Smyrna of St. Polycarp (A.D. 155), points out with emphasis that worship is offered to Christ as the Son of God, but to the martyrs love, as His disciples and imitators. He relates how the bones of Polycarp were taken up and laid where it was fitting, and that the Christians of Smyrna assembled there and celebrated the birthday of his martyrdom, both as a memorial of those whose contest was done, and for the preparation of those who should enter upon it.

Chapels, as at the cemeteries of Rome, were built over the burial-places of saints with a communication between the chapel and the grave. Such a chapel came to be named the confessio. And sometimes the burial-place of a popular saint in a catacomb would be converted into an underground chapel, the ground being excavated that the grave might be enclosed in the building. This seems to be the origin of some of the great churches at Rome.

Later on the Pope, owing to the violation of the cemeteries at Rome, had the remains of the saints removed into the city and placed in the churches. This action was followed elsewhere, and from it there arose the custom, resulting afterwards in a law, that the R. of a saint should rest beneath the altar of every church. This brought about the collection in churches, with a view to increasing their sacredness, of as many R. as possible. Hence followed the forgery of R. and the existence of doubts as to their genuineness. Then came the revolt against the whole system.

It may be that the reputed finding of the cross by the Empress Helena in 326 stimulated the desire for R., and so the R. of martyrs and saints came to be unduly and superstitiously venerated, and miracles attributed to them.

It was during the Middle Ages that Relic worship and adoration took such hold and in the 14th cent. reached their height. R. multiplied to an extraordinary degree, fragments of the true Cross, phials containing the Sacred Blood, bones of saints, and other precious things were to be found everywhere, not always genuine, but certainly of considerable profit to those who possessed them.

The account of Erasmus of his visit with Colet to Canterbury (c. 1511) gives an insight into the condition of things as they then existed in this matter of R. The reaction soon set in, and in 1547 shrines were ordered to be taken away. It is impossible to justify the pillage which followed and the ruthless destruction of so much that was really beautiful, but that the superstitious abuses should have been got

1. Primitive Care for Remains of Martyrs.

2. Chapels over Martyrs' Graves.

3. Multiplication of Relics.

4. Veneration of Relics.

5. The Reaction.

rid of is indeed well. (For the judgment of the Church of England on the subject of R., see Art. 22.)
—OC. H. D. MACNAMARA.

RELIGION.

I. THE NATURE AND SEAT OF RELIGION.

The PB is a book of R., but its function is to promote and not to define it. The word occurs several times in it, and in several connections; but, just because R. touches man at so many points, its meaning varies from one sentence to another. It is very commonly used as a convenient term for some form or aspect or department of religious organisation, the lex credendi ("the Catholic R.," QV. 20; Christ's "true R.," 5 times), the lex orandi ("a R. to serve God . . . in the freedom of the spirit," Pref.), or the lex agendi ("Christian R. doth not prohibit . . ." Art. 39), or again the organised society ("admitted into the fellowship of Christ's R.," Easter 3 Coll.). The system of DOCTRINE, RITUAL, DISCIPLINE, or Ch. ORDER, in which a form of R. is embodied, takes the name. But R., like the sacramental rites which everywhere serve its ends, has an inward core of reality as well as an outward embodiment. And "the principles of the Christian R." (Bapt.³ rubric¹) must cover both.

1. Various Used.

Many attempts have been made to define the essence of R., and an analysis of these is not uninteresting. But it is sufficient here to note that the large number of failures is due either to a confusion between the inward and the outward or to a defective analysis of the nature of man. If the sense of R. which corresponds to its essence must be that which expresses its inward core, then the definition may be ventured, that R. is a life of reverential fellowship with the unseen Being on whom we depend. In order to justify and illustrate this definition, a series of quotations will be made from the works of an Ang. writer, who has written on R. with a rare combination of penetrating depth of thought with trenchant lucidity of expression, William Law the Non-juror. They are all taken from his later works, after his reading of the mystical writings of the German shoemaker, Jacob Böhme, had transformed his religious conceptions. Prof. Du Bose recently wrote, after making late acquaintance with these works, as contrasted with the precious but one-sided and comparatively immature Serious Call, that "to have known him would have too much forestalled the blessed labour of a lifetime." Law's conception, though not that which lies on the surface of the PB (cp. MYSTICISM), will, it is believed, be found by many to be just what is needed alike to unify the several elements of PB religion, and to relate it to other forms.¹

2. Definition.

¹ All the quotations are found in W. Scott Palmer's Liberal and Mystical Writings of William Law, 1908. Page refs. are not given, as the extracts are often pieced together from scattered paragraphs. It has been necessary to print so much of the text for this very reason. (a) The Spirit of Love and Appendix to the Spirit of Prayer; (b) Errors of a late

R., then, is the life of God in the soul of man. (a) "Every creature that is to be good and happy

3. R. and Natural Life. . . . must have the life of nature and the life of God in it. . . . Its creaturely life, which, by the creating power of God, it has in and from nature . . . has a power of understanding, willing, and desiring. . . . Whilst the soul has only its natural life, it can only be in such a state as nature, without God, is in, viz., a mere hunger, want, contrariety, and strife for it knows not what. . . . The highest life, therefore, that is natural and creaturely . . . cannot possibly be a good and happy life but by the life of God dwelling in and in union with it . . . because God is an universal all; and nature, or desire, is an universal want, viz., to be filled with God. . . . And this is the twofold life that of all necessity must be united in every good and perfect and happy creature. . . . For love is delight, and delight cannot arise in any creature till its nature is in a delightful state, or is possessed of that in which it must rejoice. . . . There are in all the possibilities of things but two states, or forms of life; the one is nature, and the other is God manifested in nature; and as God and nature are both within you, so you have it in your power to live and work with which you will, but are under a necessity of doing either the one or the other. There is no standing still; life goes on, and is ever bringing forth its realities, which way soever it goeth."

It may be noted that, of the three modes of natural life here distinguished, "understanding" answers to reason, "willing"

4. The Seat in the Heart. to will, and "desiring" to imagination (coloured by will), in the art. on MAN (§§ 18-20). The next extract, by a further undersigned coincidence, places the seat of religion in the heart (MAN, § 21, and Tables).

(b) "Every man has the fullest inward conviction that his heart is not his reason, nor his reason his heart, but that the one is as different from the other in its whole nature as pain, and joy, and desire are different from definitions of them. . . . What our heart is, that is our religion; what belongs to the heart, that belongs to our religion; which never had nor can have any other nature, power, or perfection, than that which is the nature, power, and perfection of our heart. . . . Your heart wants nothing but God, and nothing but your heart can receive Him. This is the only place and seat of religion, and of all communication between God and you."¹

But the heart can only thus receive God if it be, as the image of God in man, itself akin with the Divine.

(c) "That which is spirit in man must be godlike, before it can unite with that Spirit which is God. And was there not a Divine spirit in man truly born of, and proceeding from, the Spirit of God as His real offspring, no union of will, love, or desire could be between God and man."

It might have seemed that nature and God are contradictories, but that is only when nature, as the sphere of God's immanence, is isolated from God as eternally transcendent.

5. R. Founded on Nature.

Book; (c) Letter III; (d), (e), (f) The Spirit of Love; (g) The Way to Divine Knowledge; (h) Christian Regeneration; (i) Letter V; (h), (i) An Earnest and Serious Answer; (m) The Spirit of Love; (n) Letter V; (o) An Appeal to all who doubt; (p) A Short Confutation; (q) An Earnest and Serious Answer; (r) Some Animadversions.

¹ But see further § 13 below on R. and Truth.

(d) "A religion that is not founded in nature is all fiction and falsity. . . . Nature is the opening and manifestation of the Divine omnipotence. It is God's Power-world: and therefore that God doth is and must be done in and by the powers of nature. God, though omnipotent, can have no existence to any creature, but it must have that existence in space and time.—Time comes out of eternity, and space comes out of the infinity of God.—Yet time can only be subservient to the omnipotence of God according to the nature of time, and space can only obey His will according to the nature of space. . . . Right and wrong . . . true and false, happiness and misery, are as unchangeable in nature as time and space. Nothing therefore can be done to any creature supernaturally, or in a way that is without, or contrary to, the powers of nature. . . . And this is the true ground of all divine revelation. . . . It is not to appoint an arbitrary system of religious homage to God, but solely to point out and provide for man . . . that one only religion that, according to the nature of things, can possibly restore to him his lost perfection. . . . For a religion is not to be deemed natural because it has nothing to do with revelation; but then it is the one true religion of nature, when it has everything in it that our natural state stands in need of; everything that can help us out of our present evil, and raise and exalt us to all the happiness which our nature is capable of having. . . . The mysteries of the Gospel are so far from showing the Gospel not to be the one true religion of nature, that they are the greatest proofs of it, since they are that alone which can help man to all that good which his natural state wants to have done to it. . . . What a grossness of error is it, therefore, to blame that doctrine which asserts the incarnation of the Son of God, or the necessity of the Word being made Flesh; when, in the nature of the thing, nothing else but this very mystery can be the natural, efficacious cause of the renewal of the divine life in the human nature, or have any natural efficacy to effect our salvation!"

(e) "You might as well imagine that no particular kind of element was needed to extinguish fire, or that water can supply the place of air in kindling it, as suppose that no particular kind of religion is absolutely necessary to raise up such a divine life in the soul as can only be its salvation; for nature is the ground of all creatures, it is God's manifestation of Himself, it is His instrument in and by which He acts in the production and government of every life. . . . Therefore, all the particular doctrines, institutions, mysteries, and ordinances of a revealed religion that comes from the God of nature, must have their reason, foundation, and necessity in nature.—I speak here of eternal nature, which is the nature of the Kingdom of Heaven."

(f) "Was there no eternity, there could be no time; was there nothing infinite, there could be nothing finite. . . . Everywhere in all worlds, nature must stand between God and the creature as the foundation of all mutual intercourse; God can transact nothing with the creature, nor the creature have any communion with God, but in, and by, that nature in which it stands.—I hope no one will here ask me for Scripture proofs of this, or call these truths nostrums, because they are not to be found in the same form of expression in some particular text of Scripture. . . . And yet . . . there could be no truth in the Scripture, or anywhere else, if these things were not undeniable. . . . There is the same agreement, and the same difference, between the true religion of nature and the religion of the Gospel, that there is between the breaking of the day and the rising of the sun to its meridian height; the one is the beginning, and the other is the perfection, of the same thing."

In man's actual state, however, he does not as a matter of course, and by a merely natural process, find this life of God in the heart: he has to rise to it.

(g) "The fall of man . . . is not a thing learnt from any history, but shows itself everywhere, and every day, with such clearness as we see the sun."

(h) "All the disorder and corruption and malady of our nature lies in a certain fixedness of our own will, imagination, and desire, wherein we live to ourselves, are our own centre and circumference, act wholly from ourselves. . . . There is not the smallest degree of evil in us but what arises from that selfishness, because we are thus all in all to ourselves. It is this Self that our Saviour calls upon us to deny; it is this life of Self that we are to hate and lose, that the Kingdom of God may arise in us; that is, that God's Will may be done in us." (See, for the Divinely prompted and guided process by which redemption is apprehended and the new life begun, CONVERSION and REPENTANCE.)

On this view the statement, that morality is implicit R., and R. is implicit morality, is easily justified. If R. is fellowship with God, and God is in a man's neighbour (whether patent or latent, it matters not), then the religious man must seek fellowship with his neighbour, in a word, must love him as himself, in and under and for God. So R. is implicit morality. Again, the sense of imperative obligation, under which heroes risk life for others and ordinary people take trouble for love's sake, can only rest on some universal and eternal bond, linking all men to an unseen Divine Kinsman whose nature is love. And so morality—not of course mere prudential conformity to a social standard of morals—is implicit religion.

Accordingly (i) "You may know with the utmost certainty that if you have no inward peace, if religious comfort is still wanting, it is because you have more wills than one. . . . Give yourself up to ever so many good works, read, preach, pray, visit the sick, build hospitals, clothe the naked, etc.; yet if . . . in the doing of them you have anything else that you will and hunger after, but that God's Kingdom may come, His Will be done, they are not the works of the new-born from above, and so cannot be His life-giving food," for God's will alone was Christ's 'meat and drink.'

On the other hand, the happy and happy-making state of the surrendered soul, "willing nothing but what God wills, loving nothing but what God loves," is thus described:

10. Happiness of R.

(k) "Then the Kingdom of God is come, and His Will is done in that soul as it is done in heaven. Then heaven is in the soul, and the life and conversation of the soul is in heaven. From such a man the curse of this world is removed; he walks on consecrated ground, and everything he meets, everything that happens to him, helps forward his union and communion with God. For it is the state of our will [with or against the heart] that makes the state of our life; when we receive everything from God, and do everything for God, everything does us the same good, and helps us to the same degree of happiness."

However far from attainment the Gospel standard may be in fact, the ideal is meant to be realised on earth.

11. An Ideal Unrealised.

(f) "We pray . . . that God's Kingdom may come and His will be done by us as it is in heaven. And this, we may be sure, is not only necessary but attainable by us, or our Saviour would not have made it a part of our daily prayer. It may now justly be asked, Have we yet obtained that which we have been so long and so universally praying for? Can we look upon the Ch. of this nation as drawing near, or even tending to, this state of perfection? Can we be carried to any one parish, either in town or country, where it can with truth be said of any one Pastor and his flock that there the Kingdom of God is coming, and His Will is done on earth¹ as it is done in heaven? The Christian religion has not had its proper effect, nor obtained its intended end, till it has so set up the Kingdom of Heaven amongst us that His Will is done on earth as it is in heaven."

R. is the affair of the heart, controlling the merely natural will. But the universal experience of the conflict between heart and will is the best kind of evidence for the truth of R. as defined, for 12. Inward Evidence.

(m) Whether you consider that which is good or bad in a man, they equally prove the perpetual indwelling and operation of the Spirit of God within us, since we can only be bad by resisting, as we are good by yielding to, the Spirit of God; both which equally suppose a perpetual operation of the Spirit of God within us." (n) "Turn therefore inwards, and all that is within you will demonstrate to you the Presence and Power of God in your soul.² . . . And what is best of all, you will never be without a living sense of the immediate guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, always equal to your dependence upon it, always leading you on from strength to strength in your inward man, till all your knowledge of good and evil is become nothing else but a mere love of the one and mere aversion to the other. For the one work of the Spirit of God is to distinguish the good and evil in you, not as in notion, but by affection."

II. RELIGION IN RELATION TO DOCTRINE, RITUAL AND ORDER.

If the view stated above be accepted, that R. is a union of the life of God and of nature, that it is founded in nature, and remains dependent upon nature as "the foundation of all mutual intercourse" between the soul and God (see §§ 3a, 5d, 7f), then it follows that reason, imagination, and will, as the "natural" modes of the soul's being, must have a necessary function to discharge in R., and the only questions will be, what the function of each is, and how it may most efficiently be performed. We begin with the province of reason.

¹ Hatch, in his Hibbert Lectures, trenchantly argued that the Ch. had never recovered from the lowering of its ethical standard produced by its natural, we might almost say inevitable, use of the Hellenic educational system, with its peculiar atmosphere, which it found in possession. So W. Temple (see Christ and Human Need, 1912, p. 63), addressing the Quadrennial S.V.M.U. conference at Liverpool, said, "It is deep in our own moral and spiritual nature, it is in the pagan standards of our own consciences, that we find the root of the problems of society. Our whole way of looking at life is heathen. Apart from a passing emotion now and then, or an occasional act of self-denial, our whole morality is heathen. . . . And because of our heathenism, society is in ruins. It ought to be a glorious fabric, each part supporting and supplementing all the others; it is a chaos of competing interests. . . . And the same spirit possesses the nations."

² Cp. a similar passage in the Way to Divine Knowledge. "With the same self-evident certainty as you know that you think, and are alive, you know that there is goodness, love, benevolence, meekness, compassion, wisdom, peace, joy, etc. Now this is the self-evident God, that forces Himself to be known, and found and felt, in every man, in the same certainty of self-evidence as every man feels and finds his own thoughts and life."

13. R. and Reason.

Law himself, who so clearly enunciates the principle, fails to apply it in due proportion. In regard to reason, in particular, he is so busy in demonstrating with brilliant irony the possibility that reason may busy itself with R. and its belongings without there being a spark of true R. in the reasoner, that he forgets that his plain man, in discerning and yielding to the Spirit of God, is using reason as well as heart (for a poor idiot is shut off from R. proper), and forgets also that all his own acute writing is an exercise of reason.

When, by an act of humble and adoring faith, the Christian finds out, through trusting God in Christ, that love is duty, and duty is love, and that both are the breathing of God's Spirit in his heart, his act of faith is also, on account of the unity of man's nature, a judgment of the reason, or he could not express it in such words as those of St. Paul's confession, "I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day." But Law has courage to press the caution that those who rejoice in the brightness of the Sun of righteousness must not deny the fainter illumination of the twilight and the dawn, for

(o) "This same Jesus Christ, who came in human flesh to the Jews in a certain age, was that same Saviour who through all ages, and in all countries . . . is the common Saviour, as He is the common Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. . . . When, therefore, you look upon the Gospel as narrowing the way of salvation or limiting it to those who only know and believe in Jesus Christ since His appearance in the flesh, you mistake the whole nature of the Christian redemption." (p) "For the Spirit of Christ, or—which is the same thing—the Spirit and Power of His Process, did not begin to be but only came into outward manifestation in the Gospel age; it was, and had been invisibly, the one only possible source of goodness in man as well before, as after, His Incarnation . . . goodness cannot come into man, or belong to him two different ways, or from two different causes."

An illustration may fitly close what we have to say here about R. and reason. Few swimmers are students of hydrostatics, and not every student of hydrostatics can swim. The theorist, whose knowledge rests on indirect testimony, can only gain the intimate knowledge of practical experience by an act, and an act of faith: he must trust himself to the buoyancy of the water. In the finer element of air we are told that the secret of aeroplaning was delayed for years by two errors in theory, one about the resistance of air, and the other about the relative efficiency of the internal combustion engine. Now people can fly with little knowledge of theory. The applications are simple. We may be religious with little theology, and have much theology with little R. But if the man, whose business it is to turn people to R., makes obvious mistakes in history or theology, or makes R. consist in something which a thinking man can see is no essential, he may easily fail to win such a hearer. In a word, theology has the same sort of value as the science attached to other elements of human life. Sound and well-based theology, related to other realms of knowledge, will (1) commend R. to thoughtful men, (2) remove stumbling-blocks from the path of doubters, and (3) so far as it becomes general will free R. from irrelevant and superstitious accretions, and make it more general and more effective. It is not ignorance that makes an earnest preacher effective, but earnestness which more than neutralises the hindrance of his ignorance. (See further, TRUTH, AUTHORITY, KNOWLEDGE, DOCTRINE.)

The function of the imagination is equally vital. The world seems to be one thing—man's all in all. The Christian has learnt that it is another thing—God's footstool for man first to kneel on, and then to live and work upon, under the throne of the God of love. By the imagination, and in no other way, can he borrow from created things the lively images of better things unseen. "PRAYER is the Christian's vital breath," and Prayer is simply the willing entry of imagination into the service of the regenerate heart. Poetry, music, painting, sculpture, rhythmic motion, all modes of soul-expression may be enlisted as handmaids of R.; but none of them, nor all of them, can constitute Religion.

(g) "All ways and opinions, all forms and modes of divine worship, stand on the outside of religion. They may be, and certainly are, great and desirable helps to the Kingdom of God, when we consider them only as the gate, or guide, to that inward life which wants to be raised and brought forth in us. But this is unquestionably true, that our salvation consists wholly and solely in the birth of the Son of God and the renewal of the Holy Ghost¹ in our souls. When this begins our salvation begins; as this goes on our salvation goes on; when this is finished our salvation is finished." The purpose of Ritual is to make the worshippers better Christians. (r) "Every man, as such, has an open gate to God in his soul, he is always in that temple where he can worship God in spirit and in truth; every Christian, as such, has the first fruits of the Spirit, a seed of Life, which is his call and qualification to be always in a state of inward prayer, faith, and holy intercourse with God. All the ordinances of the Gospel, the daily sacramental service of the Ch., is to keep up, to exercise, and strengthen this faith, to raise us to such an habitual faith and dependence upon the Light and Holy Spirit of God, that by thus seeking and finding God in the institutions of the Ch. we may be habituated to seek Him and find Him, to live in His Light and walk by His Spirit, in all the actions of our ordinary life." (Cp. RITUAL, § 2.)

It is to be feared that genuine religious impressions are often dissipated because the imagination is not enlisted in this high and heavenly task. And that brings us to the part to be played in R. by that element in man which is most sharply marked off as natural, 15. R. and the Will.

All the other modes of being of which the spirit of man is capable must perforce work with the will. It is not enough that once, at some dazzling moment of clear vision, the heart should pluck the will free from all the clinging entanglements of habit, and so turn and lift the soul towards Christ and God and heaven. The emancipated heart must keep its grip upon the will, and through it harness the other powers of the soul; and of these the imagination must come first.¹ At first the very simplest expressions of penitence, praise, and prayer, regularly and often repeated, will be the best. Public worship, coming after such private devotion, will enlarge and inform the soul, till it begins to breathe a new atmosphere of faith and hope and love. Step by step with the devout imagination, the heart must also, through the will, drive the reason in search of new messages from God in Scripture, in the Creeds, in the heart, in the Ch., in nature. Only freshly fed thought can keep the religious imagination on the one side from the fatal slumber of formality, and on the other from vain fancies and idle superstitions. Lastly, the Christian who has found the image of God breathing and moving within his heart, knows that the same image is, awake or asleep, in other hearts, and yearns to see the Kingdom of God so established on earth that they may press into it, and all may do God's will as it is done in heaven. So the heart has to bend the will upon its own proper task in the service of R., the organisation of it so that it may tell adequately in the world. Money, time, and trouble have to be given, simply to prepare, equip, and maintain the machinery, the institutions, without which the Ch. cannot be fully efficient. Neither can the Christian be content with the Ch. as God's instrument. "The powers that be are ordained of God," and so far as he can aid in controlling or enabling those powers so as to Christianise society, his heart—so long as it is beating in unison with his Master's—gives the will no rest till he has done his part as a Christian citizen to make his city (or his village) and his country Christian. There was a time when the end of R. was thought to be the perfunctory preparation, by arbitrarily appointed means, for a perfect state under unknown conditions elsewhere and hereafter, and consequently most of life seemed to be unconnected with R. It is now seen that the real end of R. includes, as the proper preparation for a better state, the serious and sustained endeavour progressively to perfect society here and now, and accordingly the whole of life becomes at once relevant to R. (cp. § 11.)

¹ See BODY, §§ 6-9; ORDER, § 3; and cp. the quotation from Thorndike (ib., § 9) about the primary aim of Ch. Order. The same point is well brought out by R. R. Marett, Enc. Brit. (11), art. Ritual. "Ritual," which he defines as "the routine of worship," "is to R. what habit is to life . . . by bringing subordinate functions under an effortless rule, it permits undivided attention in regard to vital issues."

¹ Cp. Coll. for Christmas Day, and Pr.¹ in Confirm.

A few words must be added about false forms of R., all of which arise from some one-sided emphasis upon one or another element in R.

16. False Forms of R. Intellectualism either identifies R. with theology, or requires, as a prior condition to any real religious experience, advanced or elaborated knowledge or such defined views as properly belong to a later stage and are not essential to religion.

Estheticism is so absorbed in the externals of worship, that its sensuous impressions, and the grateful and soothing effect that they have, are taken as proofs or constituent elements of religious experience.

Legalism turns R. into a commercial transaction, in which the Christian earns his salvation, and the complacency and self-importance derived from prominence in Ch. work, together with the interest some temperaments take in helping to manage anything, foster the idea that all is well.

Emotionalism exaggerates the importance of the feelings which normally, but not invariably, accompany the yielding of the heart to God, and disparages the share of the mind and will in R. (cp. MAN, § 24).

Reference is necessary also to what has sometimes been diagnosed as akin, but is really foreign, to R., viz., Magic. Magic is unlike R., and like our dealing with the natural world, in that it is non-personal, and deals with things and forces, not with personal beings as such; and also in that it is supposed to constrain, and not merely to beseech or persuade. But it is unlike both religious behaviour and common-sense action, in that its power is irrational and secret, stored up in the charm or incantation, or residing in the person of the magician. R. is always liable to be adulterated with magical elements. This kind of degeneration was a principal cause of the Reformation. And even in England to-day popular Romanism is honeycombed with semi-magical superstitions, which those in authority make no adequate effort to suppress. But in all Chs. the same danger exists, though in less crude and obvious forms. The cause of this tendency to relapse into magic is that in magic outward things and forces are used which yield power and advantage without requiring any elevation or change of character or conduct.

The last topic that requires allusion here is Comparative R., the branch of inquiry which investigates all forms of R., and compares them with one another. No disciple of Him

17. Comparative R. who is the truth need fear such inquiries. Rather may we anticipate that a closer study of other faiths will bring out the needs of the heart of man more clearly, and enable the Christian missionary to present Christ more effectually as holding within Himself, to be progressively manifested as His Mystical Body grows, the summing up (ἀνακεφαλαιώσις) of all things true, honourable, just, pure, lovely, and of good report.

Cp. CHRISTIAN RELIGION, for specific embodiment of R. in the PB; see further, Liddon, Some Elements of R.; Church, Discipline of the Christian Character; Maurice, Kingdom of Christ; Myers, Catholic Thoughts; Gifford Lectures, by Gwatkin, Ziehl, E. Caird, and J. Caird; Hibbert Lectures, by Kuenen and Hatch; Jevons, The Idea of God in Early R., 1911.—KI.

G. HARFORD.

RE-OPENING OF CHURCHES.—The Irish form for use after "Restoration" (1666) appoints that, even after a complete rebuilding of a demolished Church, no repetition should be allowed of the consecration of the place, "because the place was consecrated before," and that otherwise all else should be as at the Consecration. This principle has been usually followed, and appropriate selections made (with some verbal changes) from the form of Consecration, applying especially to any extension of the fabric, particularly if this has entailed a removal or change of the altar. Unless there must be for this reason a new consecration, a priest may, and often does, take the place of the Bishop. Special features are: an acknowledgment of God's presence and our unworthiness to enter it, Ps. 118 19-29, second Coll. for Good Friday, and prayers for clergy and congregation. The Irish book of 1666 has an "Expiation and Illustration of a Church, desecrated or profaned by murder and bloodshed, or uncleanness."—S4.

J. E. SWALLOW.

RE-ORDINATION.—The question has arisen from time to time in the history of the Ch. as to whether Ordinations performed by heretics or schismatics were thereby invalidated, and whether, if those who had received them became reconciled to the Church, a second Ordination was required before they could be recognised as clergy. The controversy is very similar to that with regard to heretical and schismatical Bapts. (see RE-BAPTISM). A divergence of opinion on the latter subject existed between the East and the West; the more lenient view that the Sac. must not be repeated being generally held in the West—the opposite being frequently adopted in the East. In the East, too, it would appear that the severer line with regard to Re-ordination has usually been taken. Thus the Apostolic Canons, which are still part of the Eastern Code, forbid any Bp., priest or deacon to be re-ordained "unless he shows that he has his ordination from heretics: for those who are ordained and baptised by such can neither be members of the Church or Clergy" (canon 68, cp. canons 46 and 47). The practice of re-ordaining Monophysite clergy was common in the East, and, though it is not easy to ascertain their present doctrines and practices, it seems probable that the Easterns still reserve to themselves the right of re-ordaining those whom they consider to be heretics.

1. The Problem.

The earliest explicit statements in the West on this subject will be found in the writings of St. Augustine. At the time of the Donatist schism the custom had arisen among these heretics of re-ordaining Catholic Clergy. St.

2. St. Augustine's Dictum. Augustine's view on this practice will be found very clearly expressed in his treatise Contra Epistolam Parmeniani 2 28, written c. 400, where he says as follows:—"Each of these (i.e., Baptism and Ordination) is a Sacrament, and each of them is given to a man by a certain consecration, the one when he is baptised, the other when he is ordained. And therefore in the Catholic (Church) neither of them can be repeated." In this way St. Augustine expresses the view that the character imprinted by Holy Orders is indelible, and this view ultimately prevailed throughout the West.

The Western practice, however, from the 7th to the 12th cent. frequently contradicted this theory; and theologians of that period found divers ways of justifying the action of various popes and other prelates in this matter. It will be convenient to divide this period into two parts:—(a) 7th to 10th cents.; (b) 11th and 12th centuries.

2. Western Practice.

(a) In the first period we find a trace of the new attitude in the bearing of Pope Pelagius I (556-61) towards the schismatics of Milan and Aquileia, and his sentence, "Non est Corpus Christi quod schismaticus conficit" ("What a schismatic consecrates is not the body of Christ"), was frequently appealed to in later times for the justification of the papal practice. Possibly the earliest instance of re-ordination is that of our own Abp. Theodore, who disputed the validity of British ordinations; this was probably due to Greek influence. There is some evidence for the belief that St. Chad was re-ordained "per omnes gradus ecclesiasticos" ("through all the Church orders"), though the statement of Bede (HE 4.2) may simply mean that he received some confirmatory rite. At Rome itself, an important precedent was founded in 769 when Stephen III (IV) declared invalid the ordinations of his predecessor Constantine II, who had been deposed on the ground of irregularities. In the next cent. (853) we find the Council of Soissons pronouncing the ordinations of Ebbo, Abp. of Rheims, performed after his deposition, invalid. A few years later, John VIII, in 880, annulled a consecration performed by Ansbert, Abp. of Milan, who had been excommunicated, and required that Joseph, Bp. of Vercelli, who had been consecrated by him, should be re-ordained. At the close of this cent. we also note the case of Pope Formosus who had held the Papacy for a number of years, all of whose ordinations were decreed invalid by his successor. Finally, John XII, in 964, declared the ordinations of his rival, Leo VIII, to be invalid. The instances cited above were, for the most part, dictated rather by a spirit of political expediency than by any theological principle, and we may observe that the principle of St. Augustine was upheld by various theologians, such as Rabanus Maurus, who protested against the papal practice.

(b) The 11th and 12th cents. witnessed a widespread reaction against the prevalent practice of simony, and a view grew up which denied the "simoniacal heretics" all power of Orders. This view, which appears to have originated with Guido of Arezzo, but was subsequently ascribed to Pope Pascal I, was elaborated by Cardinal Humbert, and obtained the support of many theologians and canonists of that period. It resulted in the wholesale re-ordination of those who had been convicted of simoniacal practices.

But in the 13th cent. we note a great change, and from that time onwards the great Schoolmen set forth with sufficient clearness the doctrine which has since held the field on this head. The principles of St. Augustine, referred to above, have been very generally accepted, and the practice of re-ordinating those who had received heretical or schismatical ordination has been dropped in the West.

The doctrine and practice of the Ch. of Eng. in this respect are summarised as follows by the late Bp. of Salisbury:—
 4. The Church of England.
 "Using the word 'Sacrament' in the broader sense given to it by ancient theology, which, of course, includes under the term other efficacious signs of sacred realities than those of the two great Sacraments of the Gospel, we hold in the Church of England, quite as strongly, I think, as it is held in any part of Christendom, that the 'Sacrament of Order' requires laying on of hands, with prayer suitable to the office conferred, and with a general intention of making a man what the Church intends as a Bishop, Priest, or Deacon. We hold that such an ordination conferred by a Bishop, as sole or chief minister, who has been himself so ordained, even if he is a heretic, is valid and cannot be reiterated without sacrilege, and that it is impossible to bind the power so conferred by Church censure."

(On this subject see especially:—Saltet, L., Les Réordinations, 1907; and Wordsworth, John, Bp. of Salisbury, Ordination Problems, London, SPCK, 1909, in which a description and criticism of Saltet's work will be found.)—rd.

H. LEONARD PASS.

REPAIRS.—For R. of churches before the abolition of church rates, see Hook's Church Dictionary. The following article

1. Churches. relates to repairs in modern times and practically under the voluntary principle. With the exception of the chancel which usually falls to the Rector, lay or eccles., R. of the church are the concern of the whole parish; a wise incumbent will do well to recognise this. The way may be prepared by informal conferences. Care should be taken to allow the parish to speak its mind and offer suggestions. Parishioners cannot be expected to take an interest in, or provide money for, an enterprise in which they have no voice.

It is important to have the repairs under contemplation clearly defined, remembering that it is an advantage when men and plant and materials are on the spot to get all repairs carried out that can be reasonably attempted. Further, all present at a public meeting may be capable of giving a vote, but all have not the special experience, or technical skill, or familiarity with business ways, which are needful for delicate negotiations and arrangements. This kind of difficulty can be got over by appointing small committees to handle certain questions, and to report or make recommendations, or to suggest a way out of an impasse.

When the parish has made up its mind, the approval of the Bp. and his advisers should be sought; in other words, a

2. Procedure. FACULTY should be applied for. Before the faculty issues, all manner of information will have to be supplied to the Chancellor.

It is quite obvious that more attention should be given to heating and ventilation; if hotels can be satisfactorily dealt with, why not churches?

Given a Faculty, given the approval of the parish, given also an architect who enjoys the confidence of the Repairs Committee and can be treated as a professional friend, like a doctor or a lawyer, given also an adequate subscription list, there comes the business of submitting the "plans and specifications" to builders; at this stage nothing of the nature of personal favouritism should be found, regard should be had only to real efficiency and to the character of the selected firm.

The appointment of an architect is a crucial step. It is submitted that a Committee of Selection should recommend a man, having first visited some of his work and made confidential inquiries from previous patrons.

For his own house the parson himself is responsible. Let him (1) keep down R., (2) effect minor R. himself, (3) be content with R., without aspiring to fanciful or doubtful improvements. Paper and internal painting are his private concern, into which the diocesan surveyor does not intrude unless to order paint as a protection against decaying woodwork.—R6.

J. S. WILSDEN.

REPENTANCE.

- I. PRELIMINARY, § 1.
- II. THE MEANING OF REPENTANCE, § 2.
- III. THE PROCESS OF REPENTANCE, § 3.
- IV. THE AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH.
ABSOLUTION, §§ 4-11.
- V. THE PLACE OF REPENTANCE IN THE CHRISTIAN CHARACTER, § 12.

I. The idea of R. is interwoven with the whole texture of the PB. R. and Faith are man's response to God's Grace. They are

1. Preliminary, required of those who are baptised (Cat.) and are necessary for a right reception of HC (Cat., HC passim). By penitence we prepare for Daily Prayer. The awakening or deepening of R. is to be sought for in the discipline of sickness (VS). In every year the season of Lent calls to R. and to penitential discipline (Commin.; and Colls., Eps. and Gospels for Lent). The Ordination Service speaks of the authority given to the Ch., and within the Ch. to the Priesthood, in connection with Christ's ministry of forgiveness.

II. R. (μετάνοια) denotes a "change of mind"—a change from sin to God. It is the necessary condition of forgiveness.

2. The Meaning of Repentance. Sin is the assertion of man's will against God's: it therefore of necessity separates us from Him. In R. the sinner gives his will back to God, in heartfelt sorrow for his sin, in full confession of it to the Father, in steadfast purpose of amendment. Then and not till then can God restore the man to fellowship with Himself: that restoration is forgiveness.

It is needless to discuss whether R. comes of God's gift or of man's free-will. Certainly it is God's gift which we pray Him to bestow (Lit., Ash-W. Coll., Exh. MEP; cp. Acts 11 18). Indeed, our Saviour won for us the gift of R. on the Cross. On the other hand, strong and frequent exhortations to repent (Exhs. HC, VS, etc.; cp. Mark 1 15, Acts 2 38, 17 30) imply that we are free to choose or to reject God's gift.

There is a close connection between R. and Faith. Remorse but not R. is possible without faith: a man cannot turn from sin to God unless he believes in Him. On the other hand, a man cannot truly believe in God, so long as wilful sin stands in the way. That whole-hearted self-surrender, which should be the first movement of the regenerate life, includes both R. and faith. Thus the two great Sacraments, which mark the beginning and the renewal of our Union with Christ Who is our Life, require of necessity the presence of that Faith and R. which they, in turn, purify and strengthen.

III. When we truly repent, we make Christ's act our own. His death (a) expressed the divine hatred of sin, (b) was the full acknowledgment of guilt, (c) was the act of satisfaction for sin.

In all these cases Christ did for us what we could not have done for ourselves. Nevertheless He made possible for us that R. which expresses (a) hatred of sin in Contrition, (b) acknowledgment of guilt by Confession, (c) Satisfaction for sin by Newness of life.

(a) Contrition is spiritual sorrow for sin. A contrite sinner realises that the sin is an outrage on the God of Holiness, and is ingratitude to the God of Love. Before Contrition can be complete he must not only be convinced of the sin but assured of God's mercy (note the use of Ps. 51 in Communion).

The scholastic distinction between attrition and contrition was a real distinction, though (as we shall see below) the use made of it led to some strange doctrine. The attrite sinner is sorry for himself and afraid of the punishment: the contrite sinner thinks rather of the wrong done to God. Attrition springs from servile fear: contrition from filial love.

(b) The PB insists on the absolute necessity of Confession of our sins to God (Exhs. in HC, MEP, VS, Commn., etc.). That this Confession may be real and thorough, there must be honest self-examination.

The 1st Exh. in HC exhorts those who intend to come to the HC "to consider the dignity of that holy mystery and the great peril of the unworthy receiving thereof; and so to search and examine your own consciences (and that not lightly, and after the manner of dissemblers with God; but so) that ye may come holy and clean to such a heavenly Feast, in the marriage-garment required by God in Holy Scripture, and be received as worthy partakers of that holy Table. The way and means thereto is: First, to examine your lives and conversations by the rule of God's commandments; and whereinsoever ye shall perceive yourselves to have offended, either by will, word, or deed, there to bewail your own sinfulness, and to confess yourselves to Almighty God, with full purpose of amendment of life." The insertion of the Ten Commandments at the beginning of HC is clearly for the purpose of helping communicants in their self-examination. The quotations from Deut. 27 at the beginning of the Commn. Service evidently have the same purpose. In the office of VS the minister is directed to help the sick man in this self-examination: "Then shall the minister examine whether he repent him truly of his sins," etc.

From the insistence on thorough self-examination it is evident that the PB enjoins not only a confession of sinfulness but a particular confession of sins. We are to own them one by one in order that we may disown them. Confession of sin is made to God. Is it to be made in the presence of man? The PB provides forms of general Confession to be said by all (MEP, HC). This public acknowledgment can of course only be of a general character. Under certain circumstances the PB recommends private and particular confession in the hearing of a priest. This will be dealt with when we speak of Absolution.

(c) It is obvious that, from the PB standpoint, no sinner can make Satisfaction to God in the same sense in which our Lord "by His one oblation of Himself once offered made a full sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world." It is equally plain that every true penitent must "steadfastly purpose to lead a new life" (HC Exh. and Invit., Comm. Exh.). If the sin has been against man as well as against God, he must make "restitution and satisfaction to the uttermost of his power" (Exhs. in HC and VS).

IV. The PB insists with the utmost emphasis on the direct access of the individual soul to God. Sin is an offence against

4. Absolution. God. It is God's forgiveness that we need. God's love moves us to Contrition. To God we confess. Before God we promise amendment. Yet with equal clearness the PB teaches that the Church, and the Ministry as the organ of the Church, have a function and an authority in connection with Forgiveness, and that for two reasons. (a) We are members one of another. Therefore sin is not only a matter between God and the individual. It concerns the whole society. It is specially obvious that the presence of a notorious sinner at the Sacrament of Fellowship will be a scandal and an injury to the whole Body (see Rubric at beginning of HC and Exhs. 1 and 3). Even when the sins are secret, grave mischief may be done. Therefore it is right that, in the interest of the whole society, the Church should exercise discipline, and should be satisfied of a sinner's R. before he is restored to fellowship with the Body. (b) Our Lord has committed to His Church the Ministry of Reconciliation. The Church is privileged to bring home to its penitent members the assurance of God's forgiveness. It fulfils this work through the Ministry.

In order to understand the PB teaching about Absolution it is necessary to consider at some length (i) the Scriptural authority for the doctrine, and (ii) the history of Penitential Discipline in the Church.

(i) With regard to Scriptural authority, in Matt. 16 19, 18 18, "Our Lord is committing to His Church, the new Israel, the office which was claimed by the synagogue of acting as arbiter or judge in all questions of religious truth and error, wrong and right.

5. Scriptural Teaching on Absolution. The Church is to exercise on earth a judicial authority in spiritual things, which so far as she is true to Christ and guided by His Spirit will be ratified in Heaven. And the Church may exercise this authority either in her corporate capacity or through duly qualified officers. In John 20 23 it seems that we have a particular application of the power signified, viz., that of passing judgment in reference to the sins of men. To forgive sins is one form of loosing (Job 42 9 LXX, Rev. 1 5 RV), to retain them is one form of binding. Authority to remit and retain sins was delivered by Our Lord to the eleven and to those that were with them (Luke 24 33) when He appeared to them on the evening of the first Easter Day" (Prof. Swete, Fulham Conference on Confession, p. 4).

It is clear (a) that the Commission of John 20 23 was given to the Church as a whole. Thus the Absol. in VS says, "He hath left power to His Church to absolve," etc. But the ministry is the natural organ of the Church for the purpose, so that our Ordinal rightly repeats Our Lord's Commission to every Priest who is ordained. "The Officers of a spiritual body are charged with spiritual work, and need spiritual power to do it. To remit and to retain sins is the mission of the Church, and the Lord, who knew the extreme difficulty of this most exacting of tasks, endowed her for it with a special gift of 'Holy Spirit' (John 20 22, 23). But the Church's duty in this respect is chiefly fulfilled, at least since the end of the Apostolic age, by the three Orders of the regular ministry, and the Easter gift of the Spirit goes with this exercise of responsibility. On these grounds the Western Church was justified when it ordered the use of Accipe Spiritum sanctum at all ordinations to the diaconate, the presbyterate, and the episcopate; and the Anglican Church when it followed the Latin Church so far as to retain the words at the Ordering of Priests and the Consecration of Bishops, adding on both occasions the solemn invocation of the Holy Spirit in the hymn Veni, Creator Spiritus" (Swete, Holy Spirit, pp. 323-4).

In the case of the discipline exercised on the sinner at Corinth, St. Paul speaks with apostolic authority (1 Cor. 5 3, 2 Cor. 2 9, 10); but he is careful not to act independently of the whole Church (1 Cor. 5 4, 5, 2 Cor. 2 7).

(b) Our Lord's commission is not limited to Absol., still less to a mere release from "Church censures." The words cover all that the Church does in applying our Lord's redemptive work to sinful man. They include Bapt. and the whole "ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5 18), of which the ministry of Absol. is certainly a part. The PB evidently alludes to John 20 23 in the Absol. of MEP: "He hath given power and commandment to His ministers to declare and pronounce to His people, being penitent, the Absolution," etc.

(ii) Passing to the teaching and practice of the Church, "in the primitive Church there was a godly discipline, that, at the beginning of Lent, such persons as stood convicted of notorious sin were put to open penance, and punished in this world, that their souls might be saved in the day of the Lord; and that others, admonished by their example, might be more afraid to offend" (Commin.). The accuracy of this description may be seen by reference to Tertullian, De Pœnit. 9-11; Cyprian, Ep. 16 (9) 2; Eusebius, AE, vi. 34; and many other passages of the Fathers.

In cases where the sin was notorious, the course was clear. But it sometimes happened that Christians knew themselves to be guilty of equally heinous sins of which the Church was ignorant. In such cases they would confess their fault to the Bp. (or to some priest authorised by him), and he would decide whether a public confession and penance were requisite. Presumably, in cases where he considered public confession undesirable, the Bp., when satisfied of a person's R., would readmit him to communion by some sort of Absolution. In a letter to the Bishops of Campania (Ep. 168, Ad Episc. Camp., etc.) Leo deprecates the Public Confession: "It suffices that the guilt of the conscience be laid open to the priests alone in secret confession . . . let so undesirable a custom (as the public penitence) be done away, lest many be kept from the remedies of penitence . . . for that confession sufficeth which is made first to God, then to the priest also, who draweth near to pray for the sins of the penitents. For so at length may more be stirred up to penitence, if the sins confessed by the penitents be not published in the ears of the people."

It would seem that in the East a larger liberty was left to the individual conscience. Thus, St. Chrysostom says: "I exhort and pray and beseech you again and again to confess your faults to God. I do not wish to make you a spectacle to your fellow-servants, and to make your sins known to man. Open your conscience before God, show Him the wounds and seek the remedy of Him. Show them to Him Who heals without upbraiding." On the other hand, from the days of Origen onwards, there are frequent exhortations to sinners to confess their sins to the priests when a guilty conscience kept them from Communion. The Fathers spake with no uncertain voice as to the reality of Absol.: e.g., Chrysostom (Hom. 5 1), "Heaven receiveth the beginning of judgment from earth: the judge sitteth on earth, the Master followeth the servant."

An entirely new departure is marked by the decree of the IVth Lateran Council (A.D. 1215), which requires Confession of all persons, once in the year, under pain of excommunication in life and unhallowed burial after death.

7. Mediæval Developments.

Instead of the practice of universal and compulsory confession being based on theology, mediæval theology on penitence seems to have been based on the practice. The character of this theology is well described by Canon Moberly: "Now the Schoolmen were nothing if they were not pitilessly logical. Their method herein was a method which would have destroyed, by excess of technical definition, even a basis that was in itself unexceptionably true. But their basis was not unexceptionably true. It was vitiated by having the compulsoriness of confession as its fundamental assumption. I will ask you to notice that (whilst using a method essentially faulty in itself) they had to use it to maintain the following positions which their basal assumption involved. They had to show theologically: (1) that the sacrament of penance was, in fact, an element, by Divine necessity, in the life of every Christian; (2) what that quality was in auricular confession, as contrasted with confession in solitude, which made it adequate for contrition, and the other not; (3) what that was in private Absol. which so differentiated it as to make forgiveness ordinarily impossible without the use of it; and (4) why all this necessity was not a yoke but a blessing to the normal Christian. Working upon a basis which required theological justification of such positions as these, and working by a method of logical antithesis which would have corrupted the most evangelical truth, they were driven into a series of distinctions which sadly overlaid, even when they were based upon, the realities of spiritual experience. I may briefly mention four.

"1. Venial and Deadly Sins. This distinction is true and valuable, if not pressed. The older distinction was into levia, gravia, and gravissima, which are obviously indefinite words. But the moment words of degree are pressed into technical distinctions of kind, the definition which aimed at truth has passed into untruth.

"2. Attrition and Contrition. For contrition that was obviously imperfect a new name was invented. Then the relation between this and contrition became a bewildering controversy. It is a curious experience to plunge into its intricacies in the pages of Morinus. But the tendency is clear. It is towards the generally received belief that attrition (which is quite inadequate) becomes contrition in the sacrament of penance. Now, here again, we have something not so much false in origin as made false by over-technicality. No one who has any experience can doubt that imperfect contrition may be greatly deepened in the very act of the self-humiliation which open confession involves. But to take this up into a contrast of kind, and to say that real contrition must necessarily contain either the experience or, at least, the purpose of auricular confession, is to substitute technicality for life.

"3. The word Satisfaction is transformed in meaning. From having expressed that loving effort of the penitent 'to be good,' which is part of the necessary impulse of any loving, that is, any real contrition, it comes to mean a quantitative payment in lieu of the still outstanding temporal punishment. Here we come to what M. Boudinhon calls 'la pénitence tarifiée'—penance by tariff. And under this comes in the whole theory and system of 'indulgences.'

"4. Form and Matter is another distinction which has valuable meaning up to a certain point. In almost every sacrament it was pressed to far more technicality than it would bear. But it required a special act of force to apply it to the sacrament of penance at all. The ultimate Tridentine position laid down that the 'form' was the Ego te absolvo, etc.; and that the 'quasi-matter' was what the penitent supplied—his contrition, confession, and satisfaction. The extreme artificiality of this is obvious" (Moberly, Fulham Conference on Confession, pp. 34, 35 and 36).

The teaching of the PB is clear enough. It returns to the position of the Church before the Lateran Council of 1215. It does not abolish the penitential discipline of the Church, but it gives liberty to the individual conscience while it expresses the desire for the restoration of public penance (Commun.). The PB insists on the absolute necessity of self-examination, and confession of sins to God. With regard to Absol. the following points may be noted. (i) Absolution belongs to the whole Church. "Our Lord Jesus Christ hath left power to His Church to absolve, etc." (Absol. in VS). The priest is only the organ of the Church for this purpose. The Absolution in MEP is to be said by the priest alone, who is also empowered to say to a sick penitent, "by His authority committed to me I absolve thee . . ." (Absol. in VS). (ii) Absolution readmits to the Fellowship of the Church: in this respect it is strictly "judicial." (iii) Absolution brings home God's forgiveness to the individual penitent. So far as God's forgiveness means restoration of fellowship to God, the absolving Priest can only declare it with the authority of God's ambassador. But in so far as forgiveness implies the renewed vitality of the soul, and this vitality depends on a peaceful conscience and a strengthened faith,

Absol. may be a means of conveying grace to the penitent.¹

Absolution is of two sorts, public and private.

The penitential introduction to MEP, perhaps inserted in 1552 to remedy laxity due to the disuse of private confession now no longer compulsory, has been retained in all subsequent revisions, and, coming as it does in the forefront of the PB, seems clearly to express the deliberate judgment of the Ch. of Eng. that Public Absolution, as is provided here and in HC, is of real efficacy.¹ Private Absolution, following on special Confession, is provided for by the PB in the following two cases.

2. Private Absolution.

(a) Visitation of Sick. "Then shall the Minister examine whether he repent him truly of his sins and be in charity with all the world. . . . Here shall the sick person be moved to make a special Confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter. After which Confession, the Priest shall absolve him (if he humbly and heartily desire it) after this sort: 'Our Lord Jesus Christ who hath left power to his Church to absolve all sinners who truly repent and believe in him, of his great mercy forgive thee thine offences: and by his authority committed unto me I absolve thee from all thy sins, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.'"

(b) If it be right for a sick person with a troubled conscience to seek this ministry of Absol., it cannot be wrong for a person in health to do the same. And the PB provides for it. The 1st Exh. in HC describes the necessary preparation for every communicant—careful self-examination and immediate confession to God: it then continues: "And because it is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion but with a full trust in God's mercy and with a quiet conscience; therefore if there be any of you who by this means cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's holy word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice, to the quieting of his conscience and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness."

Some words of Hooker may here be quoted (EP vi. 62): "We labour to instruct men in such sort that every soul which is wounded with sin may learn the way how to cure itself; they (the Romans), clean contrary, would make all sores seem incurable, unless the priest have a hand in them"; and again: "To use the benefit of this help, for the better satisfaction in such cases, is so natural that it can be forbidden no man; but yet not so necessary that all men should be in case to need it" (EP vi. 617).

10. Medicine, not Food.

This ministry of private Absol., following on Confession, is obviously to be regarded as a medicine rather than a food of the soul. But who is to decide when the medicine is needed? It is left entirely to the conscience of the individual communicant to resolve when, and how often, he needs this remedy. The PB leaves us absolute liberty of conscience; any sort of compulsion to the use of private Confession and Absolution is contrary to Ch. of Eng. teaching: it is equally contrary to PB principle to deny the validity or legitimacy of this ministry, or to disparage it.

In the First PB (1549) the following words appear at the end of the first Exh. in HC: "Requiring such as shall be satisfied with a general confession not to be offended with those that do use, to their further satisfying, the auricular and secret confession to the priest; nor those also which think needful or convenient for the quietness of their own consciences particularly to open their sins to the priest, to be offended with them that are satisfied with their humble confession to God, and the general confession to the Church; but in all these things to follow and keep the rule of charity." This paragraph disappeared from subsequent editions of the PB. It must be remembered that the liberty given in the Ch. of Eng. to use or not to use private Confession and Absol. was a tremendous innovation. When men were accustomed to the change it may well have been thought unnecessary to repeat the appeal for liberty and charity.¹ It ought to be unnecessary now.

The forms of Absolution provided in the PB are: (a) in MEP, "He pardoneth and absolveth . . ."; (b) in HC, "Almighty God . . . have mercy upon you, pardon and deliver you from all your sins," etc.; (c) in VS, quoted above. The particular form used is not a matter of primary importance. In every case the Priest is exercising the "ministry of the Word," and the Absol. is based on Scriptural authority. The precatory form of ABSOLUTION (as used in HC) is certainly the oldest. The earliest instance of the form used in VS ("ego absolvo te") is in the Pontifical of Egbert (8th cent.). But, whatever form is used, the minister in Absol. is generally held to be exercising a special ministry, different from that of the preacher or the teacher.

In the First PB (1549) the Rubric preceding the Absol. in VS was worded thus: "shall absolve him after this form; and the same form of absolution shall be used in all private confessions." In subsequent editions "after this form" became "after this sort," and the last clause was omitted. Liberty was thus given to the minister to use whatever form he thought best.

¹ [The distinction between the two functions of Absol. noted above (II and III) is confirmed by the fact that, while the judicial act is assumed to be complete, the conditional character of the ambassadorial element in Absol. permits a prayer for forgiveness as the immediate sequel.—G. H.]

² [Some would go further and infer from its position that this is the ordinary and sufficient assurance of God's forgiveness; and would urge that this inference is further borne out by the general tenor of the Exhs. in MP and HC, with which may be compared the last Answer in the Catechism.—G. H.]

¹ [Another interpretation of the omission is that these words might seem to leave the systematic resort to private Confession as in the view of the Eng. Ch. an equally desirable alternative with the use of the public Absolutions after private preparation gathered up in the public Confessions; whereas the Reformers definitely adjudged the latter to be the primary and normal course, and the former to be the last resort. But the argument in either case is somewhat precarious as being essentially.—G. H.]

V. There can be no question that the PB regards R. not as a mere temporary condition, precedent to receiving God's forgiveness, but as an abiding attitude of the soul. Hooker rightly speaks of R. as "a name which noteth the habitus (ἔξῃς) and operation of a certain grace or virtue in us" (EP vi. 53). The more sure a Christian is of God's forgiveness, the deeper will his contrition become. It is for this reason that the Confession in the Communion Service, offered by those who are preparing to draw near to receive that holy Sacrament, expresses a stronger sense of sin than the Confession at MEP: "The remembrance of them is grievous unto us, the burden of them is intolerable." Thus the season of Lent is ordained in the Church not only to awaken to R. those who are sinful and forgetful of God, but to deepen the contrition of the faithful. The measure of a Christian's contrition is the measure of his peace with God, and a peaceful conscience is the indispensable condition of a life of active and loyal service.—Pe.

J. A. KEMPTHORNE.

REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH COUNCIL.—

This body grew out of the Houses of Laymen formed in 188 by the Convs., and consists of the four Houses of Conv. sitting jointly with the two Provincial Houses of Laymen. The interpretation and definition of points of faith and doctrine are beyond its scope. It is hoped by many that it may become a legislative body with large powers, but subject to the veto of Parl. (cp. ORDER, § 21). This is, however, a matter for the future. And it is a question whether it be not too unwieldy a body to "do more than express big opinions upon big questions" (Abp. Davidson, R. Com. Eccles. Disc. 3363). See further, CONVOCATION, § 7; FRANCHISE.—A2.

G. HARFORD.

REPROACHES.—A form of service used in the Lat. Ch. on Good Friday in which Christ is represented as reproaching his people, mainly in words taken from Scripture, for the insults and cruelty with which they treated him at his Passion.—sg.

J. W. TYRER.

REQUIEM.—The first word of the Introit in Mass for the departed. Hence this whole Mass came to be called R., or Mass of R.—ob.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

REDOS.—The word R., formerly also otherwise applied (N.E.D.), now signifies the ornamental wall or screen behind an altar. In early times a Baldachin surmounted the Holy Table, e.g., the magnificent silver one in

Sta. Sophia. Wren designed one for St. Paul's, and one has recently been put into Peterborough Cathedral. In English parish churches the east window was usually brought down to within a short distance of the altar slab. Underneath it (sometimes) ran an arcade of arches, e.g., Exeter and Ely Lady Chapels; or the space was filled in with panelling and sculpture, e.g., Oldham Chantry, Exeter; or a R., about the same height as the altar, consisting of a few niches with figures, or of one or more subjects, was placed above it, and was called a "Table" (English Altars and other works, Alcuin Club). Later, the R. became much loftier, either as an open screen with statues (Durham), or a Triptych (Durham), or a wall covered with niches and statues, e.g., Christchurch Priory (late decorated), Winchester, St. Albans, St. Mary's Overy, and New, All Souls, and Magdalen Colleges (Oxford). Many similar smaller ones were built; some still remain in Westminster Abbey, etc.

At the Reformation all "Tables" were ordered to be destroyed. The wall was to be repaired, and a copy of the Decalogue, etc., "imprinted for the said purpose," to be fixed upon it.

2. In Post-Reformation Times.

In Cathedrals, "the said precepts be more largely and costly painted out to the better show of the same." Rs. came back in Stuart times. Many old ones had survived, and new ones were made. The Puritans, when in power, made short work of these, but after the Restoration many "altar-pieces" were put up, like those which Wm. Law's (1727) Patronus would "go 40 miles to see." Georgian altar-pieces abounded, generally enshrining the Decalogue, etc., sometimes with Moses and Aaron as supporters. During the early Gothic Revival something more "correct" was desired. In 1843 (September) the Ecclesiologist, in a piquant article well worth reading, protested against this craze, and suggested an ancient model which "would not cost the fifth part of some that only serve to spoil a church." But the craze has continued, and more money has been wasted on bad Rs. than on any other church furniture. Yet many good ones have been built, and some ancient ones restored. The Exeter Judgments (1873-75) upheld the lawfulness of sculptured figures on the R., and the St. Paul's Judgments (1889-91) that of representations of the Crucifixion. But in Pre-Reformation times many Rs. were without the Crucifixion. It is found at Winchester, St. Albans, and All Souls, but not at Christchurch Priory (Tree of Jesse), Magdalen, or New Colleges. But statues abounded, and the motif generally seems to have been the Communion of Saints. Van Eyck's subject for the great Ghent altarpiece was the Adoration of the Lamb. The Last Supper, often represented on modern Rs., was not formerly so used. Da Vinci, Ghirlandajo and others painted the Last Supper in the Refectory, then esteemed the proper place for it.—R4. W. A. WICKHAM.

RESERVATION.—The rule to let nothing of "the body of the passover" remain over until the morning (Exod. 12 10) may be traced among Christians in Jerusalem alone (Hesych. Hieros., in Levit. 8). Early Christians used to send by the deacons, c. 155, portions of the Euch. elements to those unable to be present, and some took them home for their own subsequent use in private. In a more formal way Bps. or priests from Irenæus' time sent them to others at Easter as a sign of inter-communion (1 Cor. 10 17). This was forbidden in the East in 365, but at Rome itself Zephyrinus, c. 203, and other popes, etc., in Italy till the 8th cent. sent the "leaven" (fermentum), as it was figuratively called. This usage was derived from the primitive principle of doing "nothing without the Bishop," combined with the "sancta"—the custom of the Pope securing a material continuity in the Euch. services from day to day by reserving from each day's mass a host to be employed ceremonially in his consecrating on the day following. He also sent consecrated bread from his own mass to priests whose duty was to celebrate in the tituli or churches in the city (Duchesne, Christian Worship, and Eng. ed., 185). Thus the rite of the PRESANCTIFIED, which obviated consecration on Good Friday and Easter Even by reserving from the Euch. of Maundy Thursday, was a very simple matter in early times and grew naturally in Roman practice.

1. Primitive Usage.

It was a work of charity to extend to those whom circumstances precluded from the daily, or frequent, communion in the congregation of the faithful, which their soul desired, some part of the Apostolic usage of "breaking bread at home," Acts 2 46. Tertullian, c. 192, contemplated the possibility of his widow marrying a heathen, who would see her consume a particle of the Euch. species which she might have with her in the house (Ad uxorem, 25). In time of persecution and when some, like Cyprian, felt that to be deprived of daily participation was a spiritual danger, R. was widely practised in the case of those in prison or in hiding. In 250 Cyprian advised, for sake of caution, that only one priest and one deacon should for the future go, otherwise unattended, to "offer" the Christian Sacrifice in confessors' cells (Ep. 5 2). Indiscriminate carrying of the Euch. on the person (as Satyrus, the brother of St. Ambrose, used to carry it), or reserving it at home in casket or receptacle (arca) by persons of either sex, was sometimes attended with undesirable circumstances (Cypr., De laps. 26, De spect. 5). After persecutions ceased, it became necessary in some places (Armenia, Spain; cp. Scudamore, Notit. Euch. 905) to curtail the old liberty of R., and as a general rule restrict it for the use of the sick. When recrudescence of persecution was anticipated, e.g., in Thessalonica c. 519 (cp. Scotland c. 1688-1792, and, not improbably, England c. 1642-60, as Jer. Taylor practised R.), resort was had once more to reservation.

Reservation for the sick and dying was continued in East and West all through the Middle Ages. In the Eastern Church the Sacrament reserved for the sick has continued to be placed entirely out of the sight of persons worshipping in the nave. In W. Europe the fact of its presence outside the time of celebration and communion by priest or congregation was, from c. 1100, by various expedients made more noticeable as time went on, while the doctrine connected with Transubstantiation, a term coming into use about the time of the Norman Conquest, became familiar to the clergy through the hymns and lessons provided by Aquinas for the Corpus Christi feast in 1264. Meanwhile changes introduced in the church buildings in the 12th and 13th cents., some time before this festival was firmly established in England, prepared the layfolk to accept the use of the Sacrament for centralising their adoration. The veil which in earlier times had completed the enshrinement of the altar was removed except in Lent, and the faithful, gathered in churches built and furnished in the Gothic style, were enabled to concentrate their gaze upon the altar or upon the pyx. This receptacle (called at one time chrismale), which in England, as in some other places, was shaped like a dove, was suspended by chains or cords and pulleys just above the altar, and contained the host in readiness for being carried to the sick. It was not until the latter part of 15th cent. that in some churches in this country a niche in the reredos was provided, having lock and key; and the pyx, no longer suspended, was then constructed with a stem and foot, after the manner of a covered chalice. Although the Sacrament had been carried in procession at Canterbury on Palm Sunday and used for R. on Maundy Th. and Good Fr. from the time of Lanfranc, c. 1080, the entombment of the host in the Easter Sepulchre was a custom perhaps no earlier than the 13th cent., and was distinctly later than the burial of the rood. The use of a monstrance, or ostensorium, and a practice of benediction with the chalice are found locally, but had never become generally observed or enjoined by canon in the Church of Eng. before the parting of the ways was reached c. 1550. A generation earlier, in northern countries of western Europe, attention was drawn to the divergence between the original institution of the Euch. and its presentment in those days, both in terms of its doctrinal definition and in the furniture and arrangement of their churches. It was admitted by the fathers at the Council of Trent, 11 Oct., 1551, that the original purpose of our Saviour's institution of the most holy Sacrament was its reception, "ut sumatur" (Sess. xiii, cap. 5); but from that point they parted company with the English and German reformers. On the part of the Church of Rome the dogma of Transubstantiation was affirmed, latría to the Sacrament defended, reverent and triumphant processions of the Sacrament approved, and likewise R. thereof in sacratio and carrying in time-honoured manner to the sick (with bell and light), anathema being denounced against those who should maintain the contrary.

The Eng. clergy, on the other hand, were committed, notwithstanding, to the propositions of the 42 Articles of 1552, published in May, 1553, previously drafted in Cranmer's 45 Latin Articles, and, after some modification, included in their final form among the

2. Practical Grounds.

3. Medieval and Tridentine Use.

4. Anglican Doctrine.

Elizabethan 39:—"The Sacrs. were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should rightly (duly, 1562) use them" (Art. 25, olim 26). "Transubstantiation . . . cannot be proved by holy Writ, but . . . hath given occasion to many superstitions" (Art. 28=29, Of the Lord's Supper). "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not (commanded) by Christ's ordinance (to be) kept (reserved, 1562), carried about, lifted up, nor worshipped" (ib.). Bp. E. C. S. Gibson (Articles 664) thinks it possible that the last paragraph may be due to the promulgation of the decrees of Trent. The Council there had before it the Lutheran and Augsburg teaching as well as the opinion of the Franciscans (Darwell Stone, Hist. Euch. 2 141 ff.). The introduction of the Declaration on kneeling (BLACK RUBRIC) by the King's Council in 1552, its presumable purpose, its omission in 1559, and subsequent reissue as altered by authority in 1662, are narrated by Stone (2 144, 204, 318). Art. 28 does not in so many words declare that reservation is a thing unlawful in itself, but it draws attention to the truth that the practice in question, among others, was not by Christ's ordinance so done or established. Further, some results of the practice were declared to be superstitious.

Shortly before the Arts. were imposed, the rubric of the 1549 PB had limited the use of R. to days when there was a celebration of the Lord's Supper and "open Communion" in church. It prescribed the use of Gen. Conf., Absol., and Comfortable Words before the curate (having himself received in church) should distribute HC in the sick person's house; and the Thanksgiving to be said aft. On days when there was no HC in church, on warning received by him, he was to "visit the sick person afore noon," and, after short VS when requisite, celebrate in the house, using Introit, Kyrie, etc., and Canon of 1549. If there were other sick in the parish to receive HC the same day, he was to "reserve so much of the Sacr." in both kinds as should suffice for all, and after the 1st private Communion, at which he himself also was to partake, he was immediately to carry what remained on to the other house or houses to administer to expectant sick and their friends. A short form of Anointing was also provided. The thought of spiritual Communion, found in St. Augustine In Jo. Evang. iv. 25, was already familiar in Eng., through Sar. and York Manuals, and was addressed particularly to those too ill to swallow. Alex. Aless in his Latin PB introduced another consideration, lateness of hour. The recitation of the Canon or Consecr. in presence of the sick, and priest's Communion with them, were in 1549 a novelty in Eng., but were a return to primitive and perhaps apostolic custom. They had been recently suggested by German Ch. Orders, and were an expedient advocated by Hermann von Wied in 1543. The Abp. of Cologne forbade carrying the reserved Sacr., and encouraged private celebration even for men in health living far from "temples." At the rising in Devon, July, 1549, it was demanded to "have the Sacrament hang over the high altar and to be worshipped as it was wont to be." This demand was resisted. According to inventories taken 10 Apr. only 27 pyxes remained in Lincs. In Bucks, in 1552, 45, besides 1 monstrance, remained among 122 churches. Instances are found here and there where a local authority allowed the pyx to be kept, presumably for clinical Communion, in July (6 Edw. VI), 1552 (Hierurg. Anglic. 2138). Many more parishes had sold it, and where this had not been done Edwardian Commissioners inventoried this ornament to the king's use. After Mary's accession Card. Pole, 10 Feb., 1556, required parishes to have tabernaculum decens, etc., and pyxes were replaced in 1554 under Marian Injunc. 13.

After the death of Queen and Primate, pyx and tabernacle were sold or done away with everywhere, and Easter Sepulchres commonly "defaced" or "broken," between taking of inventories under Injunc. 47 in 1559 and Elizabeth's 8th year, 1566. Whereas Bonner in 1554 had required clergy to "preserve" the Sacr. in a pyx, or otherwise, week by week, Abp. Grindal visiting his provinces (York, 1571; Cantuar, 1576) inquired whether among "monuments of superstition and idolatry" any "pixes" remained undefaced. He required the silver chalice with "a cover of silver for the same, which may serve also for the ministration of the Communion bread," to be everywhere provided (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 1 148, 151, 399).

"From 1549 to 1552 reservation in the Ch. of Eng. was in its purpose limited to communicating the sick. In no case was the Sacr. to be kept beyond the day on which it was consecrated" (J. Dowden, Further Studies on PB 249). In 1552 the PB dropped all provision for even a limited reservation.

Winchester and Eton joined Oxford and Cambridge in petitioning Q. Eliz. to authorise prayers in Latin, for educational purposes. Her patent, 6 Apr., 1560, does not seem to have been continued by her successors, though Latin PBs were sometimes introduced in colleges (Ch. Ch., 1615; Peterhouse, 1633). The majority of colleges at Cam., c. 1568, refused Latin prayers (Mullinger 2 203). It is questioned whether Walter Haddon's appendix, Communio Infermorum (Liturg. Services Q. Eliz. 404), was ever used. It did not represent the PB of 1552 or 1559 accurately, and was largely derived from Aless, 1549. Though never reprinted till 1847, and superseded as it was by corrected eds. 1572, 1574, etc., it may yet have tended to keep alive the thought or practice of R. among English students, and possibly in Ireland, where Latin was allowed long after the pyx had been confiscated at Winton¹ and the tabernacle destroyed at Eton where Haddon had been a scholar and, in 1560, visiting commissioner.

So long as the rubrics continued vague, 1552-1661, as to what amount of the Order of HC was to be said in the sick house, a priest here and there might naturally be found to consider himself at liberty to reserve, particularly in times of persecution, as under the Puritan Directory, or in danger and isolation such as attended Jacobite Episcopalians in parts of Scotland. Writing while the PB was proscribed, Ant. Sparrow used the liberty of the press to publish his Rationals (1657). In one passage, 279, he says, citing Gratian, etc., that what is consecrated and remains "is all to be spent with fear and reverence by the communicants in the Church": but, 349-50, he recommends following "the former directions in time past" (1549), on the ground that the rubric then in force from (1552 and) 1559 was not sufficiently explicit as to the rite of Communion of Sick. In 1662 the direction to consecrate the Euch. in the sick man's house was definitely supplied, but the permission or direction to make reservation in the Ch., which Bp. Sparrow had mentioned and which it is presumed he wished to see widely and by express authority restored, was not re-instated (though he reprinted his Rationale unaltered), while, on the contrary, in the Order for Administration in churches a new rubric was added, to require that, "if any remain of that which was consecrated, it shall not be carried out of the church; but the Priest" with others "shall, immediately after the Blessing, reverently eat and drink the same." This, like the somewhat similar rubric of the Scottish liturgy of 1637, was probably intended by some of the revisers to prevent desecration (cp. 3 Decretum, De consec. 2 23). At the same time its effect and, as our Archbishops, 1 May, 1900, have judged, one of its objects were prohibitive of such reservation as Cosin before 1640 and Thorndike, another of the revisers of 1661, had in mind, and which Jer. Taylor practised, presumably in time of persecution, and, as the inscription on his pyxis seems to imply, continued as a bishop of the Restoration, c. 1661-7. Those Non-jurors who practised R. for the sick among minor "usages" put their practice into form. They composed a rubric in 1718 (cp. Alcuin Club Collection 17 90) which would in the opinion of the present writer hardly have been sanctioned by authorities in England in 1661-2.

¹ Three Communion service-books in Latin (and 3 Litaney books and a calendar) were bought for Winton Coll. Chapel in 1561 (Kirby, Annals 281). Possibly these were separate portions of PB, as B. Mus. C. 25 b. 3, Ordo Distributionis, 1548; cp. B. Mus. 221 a. 5, A.D. 1551, in the case of Aless.

In recent years, when many Eng. priests have scrupled to receive HC unless they are fasting, and in some cases have been distressed by the surroundings in crowded slums, they have resorted to R. for the sick with or without their Bp's cognisance. The attempt made in some quarters to introduce the "Salutation of the B. Sacrament" and other devotions never authorised in the Ch. of Eng. has discouraged any movement towards securing authority for definite authorisation of a practice which is a relief to sundry consciences, but which has been held by highest Eng. authority in 1900 to be illegal at present. There is some hesitation also about taking a step which would tend to withdraw after 350 years the privilege which sick and bedridden people have enjoyed according to the use of the Ch. of Eng., in having the Euch. consecrated with their friends around them: much as the totally different custom in Scotland has become endeared to generations of Episcopalians across the border.

In the Scottish Episcopal Church, R. for the sick, though practised in Celtic and mediæval times, went generally out of use from 1560 until c. 1718, when the "usage" party among the English Non-jurors published their HC office in London, deriving it in part from the 1549 PB (J. Dowden, G., 15 Nov. 1889). It was in fact forbidden already by the Scottish canon of 1636:—"In the ministrations he," the Presbyter, "shall have care that the elements are circumspectly handled; and what is reserved thereof be distributed to the poorer sort, which receive that day; to be eaten and drunken by them before they goe out of the church." In the next year the PB issued for Scotland contained a Rubric (Keeling, Liturg. Brit. 230) which in the opinion of Bp. Dowden and Dr. W. Bright distinctly excluded R., until a change was made for the Episc. Ch. of Scotland by the Scottish office of 1735 which has no rubric corresponding to the Eng. one, "And if any of the bread and wine." Accordingly, for the last 1½ centuries and more, the clergy who have used the Scotch office have not uncommonly reserved the Sac. for communicating the sick. "There was nothing that even seemed to forbid them so to do" (Bp. Dowden, G.). Early 18th cent. eds. of the Scottish office (previous to the new order of 1735 and 1764), printed in Edinburgh and professing to be "authorised by K. Charles I. anno 1636," were apt to omit the rubric, "In the ministrations . . . out of the church." The Non-jurors' office of 1718 (Ja. Bettenham, Pater-noster-Row) has the post-comm. rubric recognising clinical reservation (Dowden, Annotated Scotch Comm. Office 321). No special form is used at communicating with the reserved Sac. in Scotland (F. C. Eeles, Alcuin Club Coll. 17 90 n., 1910).—HC.

CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH.

RESPOND.—A peculiar species of antiphon, sung at each lesson at Nocturns, and, for the most part, in earlier times at the short chapters at the other Hours of Pr. as well. It consists of a text, which generally, in the more ancient Responds, is rather founded on Scripture than expressed in its actual words, and which is always divided into two or more clauses. This is followed by a second text, called the Vers, and then the latter of the above clauses is repeated, the verse being usually contrived with some ingenuity to join on to the clause and make one continuous sentence with it. For instance: "God did tempt Abraham, and said unto him: Take now thy son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and offer him to Me for a burnt offering* upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of. Vers: Offer unto God thanksgiving, and pay thy vows unto the most Highest* upon one of the mountains," etc. The Respond, like the Antiphon, is one of the most ancient features of the Divine Service in the Western Church. Responds were frequently lengthened by having additional verses. One such verse in constant use was the first half of the Gloria Patri—without "As it was," etc. At the last verse in every case came the repetition of the last clause of the text with which the Respond began.—B2.

A. M. Y. BAYLAY.

RESPONSE.—See VERSICLE.

RESTITUTION.—The restoring of what has been misappropriated, wherever this is possible, is the necessary evidence of a genuine repentance. As such it is prescribed as a part of the preparation for HC (1st Exh.): "If ye shall perceive your offences to be such as are not only against God, but also against your neighbours; then ye shall reconcile yourselves unto them; being ready to make restitution and satisfaction,¹ according to the uttermost of your powers, for all injuries and wrongs done by you to any other." The Jewish law of R. is given in Ex. 22 1-9; cp. Num. 5 7. David fixed the extreme of R. in the case of the offender whose transgression was described in Nathan's story (2 Sam. 12 6); and Zacchæus was willing to make like amends for any extortion of which he might have been guilty (Luke 19 8).—PE. E. HOBSON.

¹ Perhaps the word satisfaction is used to indicate equitable compensation in cases where actual restitution is impossible.

RESTORATION OF THE ROYAL FAMILY.— SEE STATE HOLY-DAYS.

RESURRECTION.—I. The Resurrection of Christ is, and always has been, a principal article of the Creeds. The starting-point of Christian belief is the conviction that Jesus Christ is living, that His ministry did not end at the cross, but that it is still continued on earth and in heaven. The apostles' assurance of this did not rest solely on a general belief in the future existence of the good; it rested on the assertion of those who said that they had seen Jesus alive after He had been committed to the tomb. They believed that "Jesus lives" because they believed that "Jesus rose." For them the Easter Faith depended on the Easter Message. No one now challenges the sincerity of those who bore this witness. So axiomatic for the early Christians was the R. of Christ that it is continually used as the ground of symbolic language about the possibilities of the Christian life (Rom. 6 4, Phil. 3 10, Col. 3 1), and incidentally it is alleged as the guarantee of His sovereignty and redeeming power (Rom. 4 25, 8 34, 14 9, 2 Cor. 5 15).

Not even in 1 Cor. 15 does St. Paul aim at proving Christ's R.; rather does he presuppose it and adduce it that he may convince those who doubted their own Resurrection. He reminds his correspondents that it is part of the Christian tradition which he had received and preached that Christ "rose the third day" and was seen by various witnesses. His enumeration of these does not pretend to be exhaustive; he merely rehearses the main facts in the form already stereotyped by use. This was the Christian tradition when the Church of Corinth was founded (A.D. 50); and even earlier, for St. Paul had "received" it after his conversion (A.D. 35). The position and quality of the witnesses in this statement are noteworthy:—(1) Peter, the leader of the Twelve; cp. Lk. 24 34; (2) the Twelve, i.e., the Lord's most intimate companions; cp. Lk. 24 36, Jn. 20 19, (Mk.) 16 14; (3) the Five Hundred, ἑκκατὸν, i.e., "once for all"; it did not happen again to this large company to have such an experience (this is probably the appearance recorded Matt. 28 16, as being observed in Galilee; there were, apparently, only 120 disciples in Jerusalem, Acts 1 15); (4) James, i.e., James the Lord's brother, afterwards head of the Jerusalem Ch. (the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews gives an apocryphal account of this); (5) all the Apostles, the term "apostle" being here used in its widest sense; cp. Lk. 24 50, Acts 1 4. The witness of these leading individuals and well-recognised groups was the rock on which the Christian Gospel rested; the other recorded appearances of the Risen Christ to (a) the women (Matt. 28 9, Jn. 20 14); (b) the Travellers to Emmaus (Lk. 24 13); (c) the Seven in Galilee (Jn. 21 1), were rather of a private character, and so were not recounted in the traditional form of words (1 Cor. 15 4 ff.).

2. NT Evidence.

How could these witnesses have been mistaken? Men, sometimes, see visions when there is no objective reality corresponding to the mental picture; but in such cases there is a pre-disposition to see them, and here there was no expectation of the kind. To all seeming, the cross was the end. Nor were these apparitions observed only by individuals; they were seen by companies of persons. A plurality of witnesses increases greatly the difficulty of explaining, as the creation of subjective fancy, the fact to which they testify. It is further impossible, on the "visions" theory, to suggest a reason why these wonderful experiences ceased when they did, and why the last took shape in the story of the Ascension or final departure of the Master from sight. There must have been an objective reality behind the conviction of the apostles, which was so strong that, in the face of all obstacles, the Church was built upon it.

3. Proof of an Objective Event.

Christ, then, was seen (εἶδον). He was objectively present to the organs of sight (although none, apparently, saw Him save those whose vision was quickened by devotion and faith). But, if so, there is no difficulty in the details of the Gospel narratives which tell that He was heard and touched. The act of vision is as intimately associated with material processes as are touch and hearing; the true visibility of the Christ would demand a materialisation (so to speak) of His Personality quite as much as speech or even the act of eating.

According to the Pauline tradition—of which the Christian Sunday is a perpetual reminder—Christ rose on "the third day."

4. Its Time and Place.

There is no evidence that the first Christians found any prophetic forecast of this in their Scriptures (Hos. 6 2 is irrelevant, nor is it quoted of the R. in the apostolic age), so that it cannot be regarded as evolved from exegesis of the OT. And the predictions of His R. by Jesus (Mk. 8 31, 9 9, 31, 10 34) were not understood by those who heard them. Thus the tradition of "the third day" rests on fact, and at this time Peter and the rest were at Jerusalem, where, therefore, the first "appearances" of the Risen Christ were observed.

With this conclusion Lk. 24 and Jn. 20 are in complete agreement; these Gospels (as well as the Appx. to Mk.) follow what may be called the "Jerusalem tradition" of the R. Lk. 24 is a much-compressed narrative, for it cannot be supposed that the Ascension, which is described in the concluding verses, took place on the first Easter Day; and hence it is not inconsistent with the chronological data of Acts 13, which leave "40 days" between the Resurrection and the Ascension. Thus there is nothing in Lk. which forbids us to accept additional evidence for "appearances" in Galilee, although this Evangelist does not mention them. And of these we have accounts in Jn. 21 and Matt. 28, the latter story probably being based on what was contained in the lost conclusion of Mark. Mk. 16:8 breaks off in the middle of a sentence, and what followed in the original Gospel we can only guess at; but the parallelism between Matt. 28:1-8 and Mk. 16:1-8 is so close that we may reasonably infer that the end of Matt. 28 was derived from the same source as the beginning. We have, then, two traditions as to the R. preserved in the Gospels, that of Jerusalem and that of Galilee, distinct from, but consistent with, each other; and the Pauline tradition, set down in writing before either of them, suggests that the Risen Christ was seen in both localities, but first at Jerusalem. The variations in detail of the several reports are not greater than might be expected.

II. The "Resurrection of the body" is as much a part of Christian belief as is the "Life Everlasting." It is emphatically asserted in the Apostles' and Athanasian Creeds, the version of the former in the Baptismal Office literally translating the phrase of the Old Roman Creed carnis resurrectionem. But "the resurrection of the flesh" is not a NT phrase, and it has offended many thoughtful minds. That the material elements of the body of flesh are to be re-collected and revived at the Last Day is a doctrine which taxes faith seriously. But the phrase "carnis resurrectio," while useful as suggesting continuity between the present and future modes of our being, need not be taken so crudely; and it is with a wise instinct that the Anglican Church has preferred the rendering "resurrection of the body," as nearer to the apostolic words (cp. Rom. 8:11, 1 Cor. 15:44).

Belief in the "resurrection of the body" rests upon belief in the fact of Christ's bodily R., and St. Paul's discussion of this (1 Cor. 15) demands the closest scrutiny. We must distinguish two momenta in his argument. (1) There is a sense in which Christ's R. only proves the possibility of ours (1 Cor. 15:12-13). His epiphanies after His Passion show that, at any rate, He survived death. There is, at least, one great exception to the negative "dead men do not rise." He survived; why should not we? Death is not the inevitable end, the terminus ad quem of human life. But (2) St. Paul's main argument goes beyond this. It rests, not upon the likeness of Christ's R. to ours, but upon its unlikeness. It was a unique event, and it carries with it and guarantees the R. of all who are "in Him." He is not only "the first fruits of them that sleep," but "in Christ shall all be made alive" (1 Cor. 15:22). He is the ζωοποιός, the Life-giver. Bearing this in mind, we approach St. Paul's illustration of the sowing of the seed. Many commentators¹ have interpreted the "sowing" of 1 Cor. 15:36 as if it signified the burial of the corpse, and the choice of 1 Cor. 15 for the Lesson in the Burial Office has done much to confirm this perverse interpretation. But, in truth, the act of sepulture is not in St. Paul's thoughts anywhere in this chapter (except at v. 4), and his argument forbids us to equate sowing with burial. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die" (v. 36); that is, there are three stages in the transformation of a seed, viz., Sowing, Dying, Quickening, and they succeed each other in this order. The seed is sown before it dies. But the burial of a corpse comes after death. There is no analogy between the sowing of a seed which precedes the death of the seed, and the burial of a human body which follows the death of that body. What, then, does the sowing of the seed stand for in St. Paul's thought? The answer is that it stands for our birth, not our burial. And to describe the "sowing" of this human seed, the apostle adopts the imagery of Gen. 1, 2, where the story of the Creation is told. Man's birth is the time when the seed is sown—in corruption, weakness and frailty during this mortal life—to blossom out after death into the perfect fruit. Birth and R. are the crises; death is but an incident, a change through which emancipation comes. The σῶμα ψυχικόν, the body of earth, can only reach its highest, like all other living organisms, through the passage of death. It is not quickened except it die. Of Christ this was also true. Even His Life-giving powers could not find full scope except through death's release. He "became a Life-giving Spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45) at His R., and not in fullest measure until then.

The unlikeness between Christ's R. and ours becomes thus apparent. After death His σῶμα ψυχικόν was quickened into 7. Unlike as well as like the σῶμα πνευματικόν, "the body of His glory," the action of the Divine Spirit being so overmasteringly efficacious that no sensuous or fleshly element was left behind in the sepulchre. It was transfigured, the body of earth being in His case—for He was sinless—a fit habitation for the πνεῦμα. But that is not true of His disciples. For them the fleshly body has the taint of sin, and sin has the seed of death. Its "redemption" must involve the abandonment of what is tainted and corruptible, in order that the worthier elements of the σῶμα ψυχικόν may be transformed into a fit abode for the spirit. The σῶμα πνευματικόν does not, then, bear exactly the same relation to the σῶμα ψυχικόν in the case of the Christian, that it bore in the case of Christ. In our case there is no question of the "empty tomb." Our bodies of flesh will be resolved into their original elements. But, for all that, there will be a "something" which will persist, which can be quickened into a larger life only through the passage of death. This "something" is the seed of the spiritual body of the hereafter, and it will be quickened into life by the action of the life-giving Spirit of Christ upon the πνεῦμα which has assimilated and attracted it, and used it as its appropriate organ.

¹ Dr. Findlay's commentary in the Expositor's Greek Testament is free from this common mistake.

The Christian doctrine of the R. of the body rests, then, not upon unassisted logic, but upon the revelation of the issues of Christ's R. Yet it meets the demand of reason for the continuance of earthly friendships and affections, whose progress has been interrupted by death. It expresses our belief in a future where intercourse and communion may be conceived as natural, or even as inevitable. The R. body will, we need not doubt, present sufficient resemblance (if that is the right word) to the earthly body to make identification possible. But men ask "With what body will they come"? Is it with the body of youth, of manhood, or of old age? We have no certain information. A curious speculation (based on Eph. 4:13) is given by Thomas Aquinas,¹ "Christus in juvenili aetate pati voluit . . . ut futuram resurgentium qualitatem in seipso praemonstraret." There is no means of testing such a theory, but the idea is a noble one, however faulty the exegesis, that our spiritual bodies shall all possess that state which corresponds to the perfect humanity in which Christ rose from the dead; for He, as the Head of the human race, is the ideal of youth, of manhood, and of old age alike.

The argument of 1 Cor. 15 is discussed at length by the present writer in the Exp., May and June, 1908, and he has examined the evidence for the R. of Christ in CQR, Jan., 1906; both of which essays have been drawn on for this brief article. The bibliography of the subject is inexhaustible; but those who use this Dictionary will find Sparrow Simpson's Our Lord's Resurrection and Latham's The Risen Master useful. The most considerable destructive essay is that by Schmiedel in Encyclopaedia Biblica. The works of Westcott, Swete, Milligan and Orr on the subject will repay examination.²—K2.³ J. H. BERNARD.

8. Literature.

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.—To the modern mind belief in Christ's Sinlessness seems easier than belief in His Resurrection. Hermann (e.g.) in his Communion with God holds that God communes with us not so much through nature as through the historical phenomenon of Jesus Christ. Christ, unquestionably, as the Last Supper shows, thought Himself sinless. He "could not have spoken as He then did if He had been conscious of guilt within Himself." We see in Jesus the Almighty God: "God makes Himself known to us as the power that is with Jesus." This is a Gospel indeed. But R. is not a Gospel. It is in the sphere of the miraculous, not of the moral; and therefore a hindrance to accepting Christ. "It is no Gospel, be it never so impressively delivered."

¹ Summa, Pars 3a, Quæst., xlii, art. ix, § 4.

² [C. H. Robinson adopts an independent attitude; E. A. Abbott, The Kernel and the Husk, etc., and K. Lake contend for an objective, but not a physical, Resurrection.—G. H.]

i. This distinctly modern objection is open to the following criticisms. 1. Both Sinlessness and R. are parts of the impression made by the Personality of Jesus upon His disciples. A personality which makes the first impression only is not the same personality as one which does both. We are here dealing with a religious experience. It can be taken as a whole or rejected as a whole, but it cannot consistently be treated eclectically and still assumed to be the same religious experience.

2. Both hang together as a matter of historical religious belief. It is true that some moderns believe in the Sinlessness without believing in the R. : 2. Both Beliefs need Explanation.

but religious history shows that this separation does not permanently continue. Those who deny Christ's R. always tend to deny His Sinlessness also. And the reason is that Sinlessness is just as much a miracle in the moral sphere as R. is in the physical. It requires an explanation. If the personality in Christ was really Divine, then His Sinlessness is explained. And at the same time His R. is rendered reasonable.

Moreover Sinlessness is unique. If Christ is unique in moral experience, so He may be, for anything we know to the contrary, in physical experience also. There may be an inner relation between Sinlessness and R., unless we are prepared to argue that the moral and the physical are unrelated. And if there is no parallel to Christ's R., neither is there to His Sinlessness. And we cannot recognise His uniqueness and then instantly demand a parallel.

ii. The modern mind requires carefully to realise what R. means, in the Christian idea of it. Christ's R. does not mean His mere survival of death. The contemporary Jews believed in survival apart from R. It is not a mere equivalent to immortality of the soul. Nor does it merely mean the triumph of the soul. The Jews knew that the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God. The disciples meant more when they affirmed that Christ was risen.

1. Resurrection means the triumph of the spiritual over the material. Popular religion regards man as a dualistic temporary combination of spirit and matter, which is to terminate in a permanent division at death. This is exactly what Christianity does not teach. Christianity holds that Body is the self-expression of Spirit; that the present body is an inadequate self-expression; but that ultimately the Spirit shall pervade the material and entirely subjugate it to the purposes of Spirit. Thus R. means the transmutation of our physical constitution into a perfect instrument for the expression of personality. This is not a doctrine to be lightly set aside as superfluous, or no Gospel at all.

2. Resurrection also signifies Redemption.

Christ died for our sins and rose again for our Justification. [See also RESURRECTION.]—K2⁴.

W. J. SPARROW SIMPSON.

REUNION.—The word "reunion" does not occur in the PB, but the evils of disunion are plainly acknowledged in the Prayer for Unity, which was added to the Accession Service when George I came to the throne. In this beautiful Collect, based in part on Eph. 4 4-6, there is an acknowledgment of the evils which arise from "our unhappy divisions," a petition for the removal of "all hatred and prejudice, and whatsoever else may hinder us from godly Union and Concord," and an expression of the desire that henceforth we may be "all of one heart and of one soul, united in one holy bond of Truth and Peace, of Faith and Charity, and may with one mind and one mouth glorify Thee." It is much to be desired that this prayer should be transferred to some more conspicuous place in our public services. A more familiar but less emphatic petition for unity is found in the Prayer for the Church Militant—"beseeching Thee to inspire continually the universal Church with the spirit of truth, unity and concord."

The principle and obligation of Unity are dealt with in other articles (see CHURCH, HERESY, SCHISM): the object of the present article is to describe (1) the present state of religious disunion, (a) in Christendom generally, (b) in England especially; (2) the evils arising from religious dissension and chaos; (3) the attempts made toward Reunion in the past; (4) the nature of the proposals that are put forward at the present time; (5) some considerations which in the judgment of the present writer are essential to any fruitful negotiations.

(1) The Present State of Religious Disunion. A glance at the present condition of Christendom reveals the existence of great bodies of Christians which are not only not united for common action in a single organisation, but are estranged by differences of doctrine, by want of mutual understanding, and, to a large degree, by a spirit of jealousy and by conflicting claims to authority. In the first place there is the great schism of East and West, which has existed now for some nine centuries, and which for more than four centuries there has been no serious attempt to heal. In its origin the schism was due far less to doctrinal causes than to political and racial differences, to the rival ambitions of Rome and Constantinople, and to the extreme claims of Papal absolutism. And so to-day it is not so much the question of doctrine that perpetuates the gulf as the question of government; but centuries of interrupted communion have widened the breach by emphasising differences of inherited tradition and atmosphere, and by familiarising men with the idea of separation as a permanent condition. Eastern Christianity has remained stationary and immobile, while the Church of Rome has developed fresh claims and new dogmas, and Western Christendom has been rent asunder by the effect of the Reformation. And the existence in some countries of "Uniate"

Churches, which combine obedience to Rome with an admixture of Oriental rites and of customs elsewhere forbidden by Rome, has not acted as a bridge between the two communions, but has rather been a source of strife.

When we turn to Western Europe, we find the Church of Rome nominally in possession of Italy, France, Austria, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, and about one-third of Germany, although in several instances the great majority of the population appear to be hostile or indifferent to any definite form of Christianity. In Northern Europe the principles of the Continental Reformation have prevailed, and some form of Protestantism is professed by the great majority of the people, Lutheranism being the most widespread type. In some countries—e.g., Germany and Switzerland—episcopacy has been altogether discarded; in Scandinavian countries there are bps., but the succession has been broken, except (probably) in Sweden, where it is not so highly regarded as in Eng. Speaking generally, the Protestants of the Continent are separated from Rome not only by their repudiation of the authority of the Pope, but by wide theological differences, by divergences of custom and discipline (e.g., clerical marriage), and also of worship and ceremonial. The OLD CATHOLICS represent an important principle, and their divergence from Rome is less considerable, but numerically they are weak. The Ch. of Eng., or rather the Ang. Communion, occupies a place apart. It differs from the Continental Reformation in its greater care to preserve the principle of continuity both in the episcopal succession and in its Creeds and public worship. It has claimed the rights and privileges of a national or particular Ch. without any intention of violating the principles of Catholic Unity; but in fact it is denied recognition and intercommunion by Rome, while it is in large measure isolated from Continental Protestants owing to their greater laxity as to questions of Ch. order and their disregard of continuity.

Lastly, we have in Eng. and in English-speaking countries all over the world the extreme development of particularism, which shows itself in the multiplication of "Dissenting" or "Separatist" bodies. This is a peculiarity of the Anglo-Saxon race; in Continental Protestantism this fissiparous tendency is not nearly so marked. In England and Wales sixteen different denominations are represented in the "Free Church Council," the largest bodies being the Wesleyan Methodists, the Congregationalists and the Baptists; and this by no means exhausts the list of Christian denominations. In the United States it is said that 150 different religious bodies have an organised existence. And in addition to the organised denominations it must be remembered that there are a very large number of baptised Christians whose position is eclectic and undenominational; they are influenced by Christian morality and to some extent by Christian theology, but they do not acknowledge Ch. membership or authority in any form. In view of such facts it is plain that in the Christendom of to-day we have a state of extreme religious diversity and disorder, which it is hardly an exaggeration to describe as "chaos."

(2) The evil results of this religious diversity are manifest to all thoughtful minds. They have become most evident in the mission field, where rival Christian organisations are competing for converts among heathen peoples, to whom the significance of the doctrines or principles which divide them is often unintelligible, under conditions in which the original causes of strife in some cases no longer exist. Yet the evils are plain enough in any country. Waste and overlapping are perhaps the least of them, but they are very real evils. An English village or a Canadian township, for which under conditions of unity one clergyman and one place of worship would amply suffice, may have three or four half-empty churches or chapels and three or four half-starved ministers of religion, while there is a scarcity of men and money for carrying on the work which is needed elsewhere among heathen at home and abroad. The consequent waste of labour, machinery and funds is incalculable. But far more serious than the waste is the spirit of jealousy, rivalry and ill-will which almost inevitably springs up when different Christian bodies are at work in the same area. This may be, and sometimes is, mitigated by the cultivation of charity and mutual understanding. Yet it is almost impossible for human nature to avoid jealousy and rivalry under conditions which provoke competition. And this rivalry not only produces spiritual deterioration in the religious bodies themselves, but is a scandal and a cause of alienation to those who are outside. Experience both in the mission field and at home shows that religious diversity and competition are a great obstacle in the way of winning converts. At best they cause perplexity and bewilderment and doubt; when they degenerate into ill-will, they discredit Christianity altogether. "See how these Christians hate one another!" is often the excuse for, indeed the real cause of, aloofness from Christianity. Nearly 400 years ago Cranmer declared that we might easily convert even the Turks if we were agreed among ourselves, and the intervening centuries have only multiplied proofs that the task of the Ch. is made tenfold more difficult by her disunion. Nor need this be wondered at, if unity, external as well as internal, was the intention of our Lord and a fundamental principle of the Primitive Church.

4. Evils of Disunion.

(3) Before entering on the discussion of any proposals that are now suggested for Reunion,

5. Past Movements for Reunion.

it may be useful to glance at some of the attempts which have been made in the past in that direction. Before the Reformation the one great breach of external unity was the schism between the Eastern Ch. and Rome. Two chief attempts were made to heal this division, the first at the Council of Lyons in 1274, and the second at the Council of Florence in 1439. In both cases union was actually proclaimed and a Te Deum was sung, but in both cases the scheme entirely failed. The project of conciliation was in each case urged by the Eastern Emperor, under the growing pressure of Turkish attack, without any real support from the bps. or the general public opinion of the Eastern Ch. At the Councils there was no adequate discussion of the real points of difference, and the agreement arrived at was instantly repudiated by both clergy and people in the East. The failure is instructive. Since the Council of Florence there has been no serious attempt at reunion between Rome and the East, although in the 18th cent. some doctors of the Sorbonne took advantage of Peter the Great's visit to Paris to interest him in a scheme of conciliation. As regards the relations between the Ch. of Eng. and the Eastern Ch., some correspondence took place in the 17th cent. between Abps. Abbot and Laud and Cyril Lucar, but Cyril became a Calvinist, and perished under Jesuit intrigues.

The Reformation broke up the religious unity of Western Christendom; but this was not the intention of the first generation of Reformers. They had demanded reform, and had not intended to set up a rival Ch.; and in Germany, long after the deaths of Luther and Calvin, conferences were held with the hope of re-establishing communion; but Luther's abandonment of Episcopacy was a grave obstacle, and the Jesuit influence was strong against conciliation. Cassander, Wicelius, Pareus, Grotius, Calixtus, and John Durie (who obtained help from many English bishops, including Laud and Davenant), all in different ways worked at the problems of reunion. If Gustavus Adolphus had lived longer, something might have been effected, especially in conciliating Lutherans and Calvinists. In a later generation negotiations took place between Bossuet, the champion of Gallicanism, and the German philosopher, Leibnitz. The most obvious issue of these movements was the establishment of the United Ch. of Prussia by Frederick William III, from 1814 onwards.

In England the feeling against Rome was intensified by the cruelties of Mary's reign and by Romanist plots afterwards; but in the time of Charles I a Papal agent sounded Bp. Mountague, and reported favourably on the tenets and worship of the English Ch. The great English divines of the 17th cent. were more in sympathy with reunion than those who had preceded them, but the most definite negotiations took place in the 18th cent., when Abp. Wake entered into correspondence with Dupin and other theologians of the Sorbonne, with a view to uniting the Ch. of Eng. with the Gallican Ch. The proceedings, however, had no sanction from Rome. The French representatives were ready to recognise Eng. Orders, and Wake held that Transubstantiation need cause no difficulty. The death of Dupin and the opposition of the Jesuits brought the matter to an end. The correspondence showed an admirable spirit on both sides, but in neither country was the general feeling ripe for such a movement.

As between the Eng. Ch. and Presbyterian or other dissenting bodies, attempts at conciliation have not been wholly wanting. In 1610 James I brought about the consecration of Presbyterian ministers, or titular bishops, to restore a modified episcopacy in Scotland. Thirty years later Abp. Ussher's book, The Reduction of Episcopacie, had a similar aim. After the Restoration, Richard Baxter and Jeremy Taylor were prominent champions of conciliation. Baxter and his friends submitted a scheme, based on Ussher's plan, according to which the bps. were to become presidents of diocesan boards of presbyters; and Jeremy Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying—a noble plea for toleration—pointed in the direction of comprehension. It was natural that when William of Orange came to Eng. he should wish, for political as well as for religious reasons, to fuse the Protestant Dissenters with the Ch. of Eng. The attempt was made, but without any sufficient knowledge of the principles at stake, and the failure of the scheme of comprehension can hardly be regretted.

(4) For the understanding of the present state of the question and the proposals now suggested, we must resume the history of

6. Recent Attempts towards Reunion with Rome.

R. from 1850 onwards, limiting ourselves to those aspects which specially concern the Ch. of Eng. Two influences combined to reopen the question in the middle of last century. (a) The rapid growth of infidelity caused in many minds a sense of the need of uniting all Christians against a common enemy. (b) The Oxford Movement laid stress on the unity of the Visible Ch. as a fundamental principle: its adherents could not acquiesce in disunion, but their convictions on the subject of Orders and Apostolical Succession led them to look towards union with Rome or the Orthodox Eastern Church rather than with Nonconformist bodies at home. Tract XC was itself in the nature of a "bridge" between England and Rome, since it denied any fundamental incompatibility between the 39 Arts. and the Tridentine doctrines. In 1853 the Anglo-Continental Society (now the Anglican and Foreign Church Society) was founded, and it has done useful work in spreading knowledge and promoting friendly relations. In 1857 the Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom was formed, to bring about Corporate R. between the Roman, Orthodox Eastern, and Anglican Communions. In 1863 the Union Review was started, and in 1865 Dr Pusey published the first part of his Eirenicon (The Truth and Office of the English Church), in which he urged that the chief obstacle to R. with Rome lay not in her de fide doctrines, but in her popular system of worship. Dr. Pusey followed up his Eirenicon by interviews with many of the French bps., and received some encouragement, but his hopes were dashed by the triumph of the Ultramontane party at the Vatican Council, and the promulgation of Papal Infallibility in 1870. Undoubtedly this event interposed a fresh and formidable barrier against union with Rome. Nevertheless, an attempt at rapprochement was made some twenty-five years later, when Lord Halifax and the Abbé Portal endeavoured to secure the recognition of Anglican Orders by Leo XIII. In spite of the favourable opinion of the Abbé Duchesne, hostile influences prevailed at the Vatican, and in 1896 the Bull Apostolicae Curae pronounced English Orders to be invalid (see T. A. Lacey, A Roman Diary). Under these circumstances it is generally recognised that proposals for R. or inter-communion are at present useless, and all that can be done is to encourage prayer, mutual courtesy and charity, and deeper study of the principles which are in question.

Our relations with the Orthodox Eastern Church are of a more hopeful kind, though progress is slow. The Report of the Committee of the Lambeth Conference of 1908 records a steady growth of friendly intercourse between the two Communions. At the Bonn Conferences of 1874-5 Eastern theologians joined in discussing the Filioque clause and other points of difference from the West, and, though those Conferences were not continued, there have since that time been repeated efforts to make the principles of the Eng. Ch. clearer to the Orientals; there has been frequent interchange of courtesies between Eastern and Ang. bps.; Ang. clergy have ministered to Orthodox Easterns in cases of emergency, and vice versa. No definite proposals for R. can be formulated at present, but real progress has been made towards mutual recognition and a certain measure of inter-communion. The Lambeth Conference of 1908 recommended the establishment of a permanent Committee to deal with all that concerned our relations with the Orthodox Eastern Churches, and of Commissions to ascertain the precise doctrinal position of the ancient separate Churches of the East.

7. Relations with the Eastern Ch.

Among the Old Catholics of Germany, Austria and Switzerland a friendly feeling has always existed towards the Ch. of Eng., and invitations to Holy Communion have been mutually given; but the (Jansenist) Church of Holland has stood aloof, and the consecration of an Old Catholic bishop for the British Isles in 1908 was an unjustifiable act which is likely to impede the growth of friendly relations. As regards the Moravian Unitas Fratrum, some definite proposals for the participation of Anglican Bps. in the consecration of Bishops and ordination of Presbyters of the Unitas, and for the recognition of such Bishops and Presbyters, were sanctioned by the Lambeth Conference in 1908, but have not hitherto been fully accepted by the Unitas.

8. With Old Catholics, etc.

At the same Conference the Bishop of Kalmar in Sweden came to confer on the subject of an "alliance" between the Swedish and Anglican Churches, and produced strong evidence that the Swedish Episcopal Succession was unbroken. Further correspondence and investigation were thought desirable, and in 1909 the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Marquette, with others, visited Sweden with a view of promoting closer relations (cp. The National Church of Sweden, by Bp. J. Wordsworth, 1911).¹

It is, however, with regard to non-episcopal bodies at home that the need of R. is most urgently felt. Perhaps the most definite pronouncement on the subject on the side of the Ch. is the "Lambeth Quadrilateral" of 1888, which laid down as the necessary basis of R. (a) the Holy Scriptures as the rule of faith, (b) the Apostles' Creed and Nicene Creed as the statement of faith, (c) the two Sacraments ordained by Christ Himself, (d) the Historic Episcopate, locally adapted in the methods of its administration to varying needs. This was reaffirmed at Lambeth in 1897, while in 1908 the Conference suggested that, in the case of orthodox non-episcopal Churches which had been careful as to the form and intention of Ordination, an approach might be made to R. on the basis of consecrations to the episcopate on lines suggested by such precedents as those of 1610 in Scotland. It is indeed in Scotland that the greatest efforts towards unity have been made, by such men as Bps. Charles Wordsworth and G. H. Wilkinson, through conferences and united prayer; and a Christian Unity Association has been founded. In England a joint letter was issued in 1905, asking for united prayer for R. on Whit-Sunday, and acknowledging that "our Lord meant us to be one in visible fellowship," and that "our existing divisions hinder or even paralyse His work"; this letter was signed by the two Abps. and by the Presidents of the chief Dissenting bodies. In Australia suggestions for terms of R. were made by the Presbyterians, and have been discussed by the Bps. and the General Synod; in the United States a Committee to discuss the holding of a World Conference on matters of Faith and Order was appointed in 1910 by the Convention of the American Church.

9. Home Reunion.

Meanwhile the separated bodies have been taking steps towards union among themselves. The establishment of the "Free Church Council" facilitates common action on many questions; in 1907 three Methodist bodies were fused into "The United Methodist Church," and in 1909 the Established Ch. of Scotland consented to an unrestricted Conference with the United Free Ch., the latter being itself an union of two Chs. The non-episcopal bodies have awakened to the waste and unseemliness of rivalry; they no longer regard disunion as an advantage or a sign of vitality: but their view is often utilitarian rather than based on a conviction that unity is a sacred principle, and they sometimes seem to aim at intercommunion or federation rather than at a closer unity, while the questions of episcopacy and succession are stumbling-blocks which have hitherto proved fatal to any definite proposals for Reunion.

(5) It remains to mention some points which appear to be of primary importance in attempts towards R. The process of removing deep-seated prejudices and misunderstandings must necessarily be slow. Perhaps for some time the work must be of a preliminary nature—prayer for guidance and for charity, personal intercourse and acquaintance, historical study of the divisions of Christendom and of the principles which those divisions represent, deeper realisation of the obligation of unity and of the practical evils which disunion involves, the clearing away of cant, and the discarding of party watchwords. It has been pointed out not only by Anglicans but by members of other communions (e.g., Dr. Döllinger and Dr. Newman Smyth) that in some ways the Church of England is specially qualified to take a lead in the R. of Christendom, since she stands somewhat nearer to the Protestant non-episcopal bodies than does the Church of Rome or the Orthodox Eastern Church. Yet this very fact makes her position very difficult; if she assimilated herself to those ancient Churches she would be in danger of alienating Dissenters at home, whereas if she were to neglect the principles of succession and continuity she would (apart from the sacrifice of principle) most certainly alienate those Roman Catholics and Easterns who care for R., and make any complete R. on Catholic lines impossible. It has been observed that the evils of disunion are most keenly felt in the Foreign Mission Field, and it may be hoped that workers in that field will make many contributions to the solution of the problem. The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh in 1910 encourages that hope. In all discussions it is essential that both sides should have a clear idea of what kind of unity they are seeking. The word is ambiguous, and it is sometimes used to denote not an actual unity in a single organised body, but a loose federation, or a state of intercommunion with "interchange of pulpits." To the present writer it seems that there can be no true unity unless there is complete union of organisation and government in each area, and a central meeting-point and council in the Episcopate of the whole of Christendom. Thus, complete unity would not demand the universal acknowledgment of a centralised supremacy, like that of Rome, or absolute uniformity of ritual and discipline (or even of doctrine, except in fundamentals) among Roman Catholics, Easterns and Anglicans. But it would involve the elimination of all rival organisations in any national area such as England, and the possibility of a General Council or of machinery for the settlement of questions arising between the great Communions of Christendom. Such unity, he believes, could only be attained on the basis of the Historic Episcopate and the principle of continuity, without which (as experience seems to show) the solidarity of Catholicism must yield to separatism and disintegration. He does not underrate the difficulty of convincing men of the essential character of episcopacy, nor can it be wondered at that those who reject the principle should regard insistence on it as a great and gratuitous obstacle to the progress of the cause of R. (see EPISCOPACY, APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION).

10. Conclusions.

¹ Their report, issued in 1911, recommends the offer of communion to properly qualified Swedish Churchmen by the Lambeth Conference or by a meeting of English Bishops.

I. von Döllinger, Reunion of the Churches (Eng. Transl., 1872); A. J. Mason, The Principles of Ecclesiastical Unity; Bp. Gore, Orders

11. Liturgica and Unity; J. Armitage Robinson, The Vision of Unity; Newman Smyth, Passing Protestantism and Coming Catholicism; C. A. Briggs, Church Unity; Reports of Conferences of Bishops of the Anglican Communion, 1888, 1897, 1908 (S.P.C.K.); The Reunion Conference at Bonn, 1874; do., 1875 (with preface by H. P. Liddon); Life of Dr. Pusey, vol. iv. The Reunion Magazine (founded in 1909) is edited from an Anglican standpoint, but welcomes contributions from all quarters.—K⁶.

WALTER HOBHOUSE.¹

REVERENCE.—R. is rightly described as "fear arising from high respect." In relation to worship we may recall the derivation of the Latin word, "worthy approach to God." The directions of PB rubrics are conclusive as to attitude: "all kneeling," "all devoutly kneeling." The rubric dealing with kneeling at HC emphasises the point. The gifts of the faithful are to be "reverently" offered. The words of the Pr. of Humble Access also indicate the true spirit of reverent prayer. The confession of sin guides the expression to a real sense of divine nearness. Bodily postures, such as bowing the head when the Holy Name is mentioned, are indications of a desire to carry out the natural feeling of R. "The Lord is in His holy temple." It is prescribed in the 18th canon (1604) and in Q. Elizabeth's Injunctions (1559) that "When in time of Divine service the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly R. shall be done by all persons present." The authority of Phil. 2:10, which deals with pr. in the name of Jesus, cannot be quoted in support, but the feeling which prompts the R. is absolutely correct, as George Herbert's lines testify:

"When once thy foot enters the church, be bare;

God is more there than thou; for thou art
there

Only by His permission."

—R2. G. J. HOWSON.

REVISION OF PB.—Liturgical history is, for the Pre-Reformation period, concerned with the successive products of a series [of waves of revising activity, modifying by changes, additions and subtractions the earlier forms of Christian worship. In England the Sarum and other

¹ The late Bp. of Salisbury (Dr. J. Wordsworth) most kindly read through this art. in proof not long before his lamented death, and made several valuable suggestions and additions. No one in recent times has laboured more unceasingly in the cause of R. or has had a more profound knowledge of the problems connected with it.

1. The Principle.

Uses were so many revised recensions of common archetypes. Cardinal QUIGNON's work is a proof that in the early 16th cent. a fresh impulse towards revision was already strongly at work within the Western Ch., and the outstanding fact about the First PB of 1549 is that it embodies the momentous decision by which, of the three alternatives of change, (1) the abandonment of liturgical worship, (2) the construction of new forms, and (3) the reconstruction of the old, the last was the method adopted in the Eng. Ch. That the alterations were so many and so considerable as to require the term reconstruction rather than revision was due to well-known causes, of which the classical account is to be found in Pref.² (Concerning the Service of the Church), and Pref.³ (Of Ceremonies . . .), both forming part of the First PB (see further, HISTORY OF PB). But the principle underlying the process is best expressed in The Preface of 1661 (cp. RITUAL, §§ 5, 17-19).

The First PB had not been long in use before "weighty and important considerations," as the Revisers of 1661 judged in looking back, called for revision to follow reconstruction. It is always difficult, and sometimes impossible, accurately to forecast the effect of liturgical and ceremonial changes—so many subtle and obscure currents of thought and feeling affect men's judgment in such matters. It was only natural, then, that the first revision of 1552, when the experience of the practical working of the new Service-Book was fresh, was a more extensive one than was thought necessary in 1559, when the Second PB was re-introduced practically in its entirety. When, after its second suppression under the Commonwealth, the PB came once more under discussion with a definite purpose of revision, the time was again ripe for thoroughgoing treatment, and, accordingly, the whole book was carefully overhauled, not a few additions being made and a large number of minute corrections introduced (see ART. HISTORY OF THE PB, § 20). In 1689 it seemed as if the trial of the changes of 1662 had already proved the need for further alterations. A Royal Commission was issued, and detailed proposals were made. But the moment was not opportune for such a work, and the secession of the Non-jurors had deprived the Church of some of its most devout and learned liturgical scholars. So the proposals¹ were dropped, after being thrown out by the Lower House of Convocation. The Gorham and Essays and Reviews controversies produced an immense crop of pamphlets,² most of them calling for revision to guard against Tractarian and Rationalistic doctrine; but nothing came of the agitation.

2. Actual Revisions.

¹ Reprinted as a Blue Book in 1854.

² The Association for promoting a Revision of the PB, of which Lord Ebury was president, printed the titles of 66 issued from 1857 to 1863.

Some twenty years later the matter was handled in Conv., and an ed. of the PB with suggested alterations was printed in 1879 as the Convocation PB. But the only authorised changes have been those covered by the SHORTENED SERVICES ACT, 1872, the substitution of the new lectionary in 1871 (both results of the Ritual Commission), and certain other alterations introduced under the authority of the Crown, e.g., the excision of the special services for Gunpowder Plot, etc.

The sister Churches of Scotland (1764), the United States (in 1789 and again in 1892), and Ireland (1877), have used their powers of self-government to carry through more or less comprehensive revisions. The Report of the Royal Commission on Eccles. Discipline, followed by the issue of Letters of Business, in 1906, has given to the Convs. an opportunity of making proposals for alteration under exceptionally favourable circumstances. Committees were appointed at once, and have been twice reappointed, to deal both with the question of a new ORNAMENTS RUBRIC,¹ and the modification of the PB by way of enrichment or adaptation. It remains to be seen what success their labours will have.

It is widely recognised that, in any alterations proposed, the general doctrinal standard of the PB and its principles of ceremonial should be loyally maintained, and that the actual substance of the book and its main lines of liturgical structure should be reverently adhered to (see DOCTRINE, RITUAL, §§ 2 ff., 54 ff., 67 ff.). How safeguards can be provided against the overstepping of these limits, will be discussed later. Perhaps those in authority might formulate some statement of the limits they accept which would conduce to reassurance.

For many objections are raised to the policy of R. at the present juncture. The most formidable have been judiciously handled by Bp. Chase (Charge, 1910, pp. 68-78), whose statement may be summarised briefly.

1. The Dislike of Change. . . . "Conservative adaptation and conservative reform are . . . the only way to prevent ultimate revolution and disaster. . . . Remember that the Ch. of Christ is the home of the Spirit of Christ." The distrust of the competence of revisers, which many feel, and which Dr. Wickham Legg has expressed with characteristic vigour (in his Shall we Revise the PB? 1911), is natural enough, and is dealt with below."

2. Convocation is Unreformed. "But the practical difficulties of solving the problem of the reform of Convocation are very great, far greater than they appear when we first take the problem in hand. It may be that for years to come they will prove insuperable. And, if a reformed Convocation would be a fitter machine for doing this or any other work, is Convocation, as it is to-day, a machine which can be rightly called unfit? It is not given to rash and sudden changes. Its action is controlled and modified by many practical checks. It is profoundly conscious of, and sensitive to, outside Church opinion."

3. The PB alone keeps the Ch. together. But no one desires to meddle with that in the PB which makes it a bond of union. And between Conv. and Parl. there is little danger of overmuch change. (See further, § 10.)

4. The Concurrence of Parliament. "This in my judgment," writes Bp. Chase, "is the one really formidable argument. No one desires, no one thinks it well, that such questions should be debated in detail in the House of Commons, nor, I imagine, does the House of Commons desire to debate them. It does not seem certain that application for Parliamentary sanction could not be made in such a way as to preclude those dangers and difficulties of which we are all aware. Convocation can be trusted to consider the question of procedure with the utmost care."

On the other side, the same witness presents positive reasons for Revision.

1. The Duty of Adaptation. "A living Church, if her life is to continue sound and strong, must adapt her rules to the teaching of experience and to the circumstances of the present. To have a system of rules and yet not to obey some of them because they are antiquated or ambiguous undermines the sense of the sovereignty of law; and the loss of a feeling for the sacredness of law means deterioration of character whether in an individual or in a society. I am sure that we must not exclude moral considerations from the arguments which determine our convictions in this matter."

2. The Administrative Necessity. "Some of those who strongly deprecate an authoritative revision of the Rubrics cut the knot by the expedient of a private revision of the Rubrics. But one who is called to the work of administration cannot to-day sanction disobedience to Rubrics and to-morrow enforce obedience to Rubrics. If the rule of a Bishop is to commend itself, as it should, to every man's conscience, it must be consistent; if his rule is to be consistent, the directions of the Prayer Book, which it is his duty to see carried out, and which his people rightly expect him to see carried out, must be clear in meaning and possible of observance¹."

3. The Special Urgency. English Disestablishment may, by some turn of circumstance, become the lesser of two evils. The Ch. would "be able to meet all the dangers and perplexities and demands of that time . . . more calmly, more unitedly, more safely, if the question (of R.) had been already settled."

Two thorny questions, more than any other

¹ It is obvious that the phrase "possible of observance" is to be taken with reasonable qualification. It would be hard to say that any rubric is literally impossible of observance. But not a few are so inexpedient now that no authority could compel earnest and sensible ministers to obey them.

¹ See, in that art., especially § 15; cp. also § 6 below.

difficulties, block the way. And first there is the question about the ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER. The legal and historical aspects are discussed in that art., and also (from a different standpoint and with a full summary of the relevant facts) under ORNAMENTS RUBRIC and RITUAL LAW. The general principles involved are indicated under RITUAL, vii (Ornaments). Here it is only necessary in a few words to state the issues on which a decision depends. The moderates say that what the minister wears is purely a point of decency and order: and so it would be, if a new dress were being designed. In the present case, plain men of the Right and Left wings agree in this, that by association the Euch. vestments have come to be significant of doctrine. Now uniformity is no longer in this matter a practical policy. By no coercive procedure can vestments be universally imposed or universally banished without disruption. As things are, each side—with all variations of temper from the coolness of Gallio to the zeal of Luther or Loyola—can with a show of authority and reason describe the other as composed of law-breakers. Either side can only persuade, and not coerce the other. Neither is likely to convert the other within less than a generation. The question is therefore narrowed down to the two alternatives: (1) that the process of peaceful persuasion shall go on, with the unhealed sore of imputed illegality to hinder it, and with the increased scandal to the Ch. that an opportunity of healing it has been let slip; or (2) that some compromise shall be legalised by general consent (whether in one of the forms noted under OR., § 15, or in some new shape), under shelter of which a better understanding may later be arrived at. In a word, the Ch. must tacitly condone an illegal compromise, or take steps to legalise one. (See further, ORDER for the practical, and not logical, nature of ritual rules.)

6. The Ornaments Rubric.

The second difficulty arises in regard to the liturgical use of QV. The Irish Ch. no longer recites it, and the Amer. Ch. omits it from the PB, and has dropped the reference in Art. 8 (cp. QVICUNQUE VULT). Those who oppose any change claim to be the defenders of the Catholic Faith against those who wish to break down all doctrinal restrictions. Those who desire a change reply that they are not proposing to alter the Art., which deals with the doctrinal status of the QV., but only to modify or discontinue the liturgical use of it as a whole, in consequence of those warning clauses which have been admitted by high authority to be gravely misleading. And again the same dilemma presents itself. In many chs. the recitation has been discontinued for very many years, and it is practically impossible to enforce it universally. So the Ch. must continue tacitly to condone an illegal compromise, or must legalise one. It may be said, and it is said, that to alter a law because it is broken is to reduce law to an absurdity. If, however, law be, in its essence, a working compromise based on general consent (cp. ORDER, §§ 23-25), then the conclusion may merely be that the law is, for the present at least, unworkable, and should therefore be repealed or amended. The inviolable sanctity of rubrics is not an article of the Catholic Religion.

The alterations proposed were conveniently classified in Resolution 27 of the Lambeth Conference of 1908.¹

"In any revision of the BCP which may hereafter be undertaken the following principles should be held in view. (a) The adaptation of rubrics in a large number of cases to present customs as generally accepted, "except where the deviation arises from negligence, or is in other respects hurtful" (e.g., in regard to discretion as to the use of exhs., and of the versicles bef. and aft. the Gospel).

8. Proposals Classified.

(b) "The omission of parts of the services to obviate repetition or redundancy," "without breach of ancient liturgical precedent."

(c) "The framing of additions to the present services in the way of enrichment," "much valuable guidance" being 'available from the American, Scottish, and Irish Service Books.'

(d) "The fuller provision of alternatives in our forms of public worship," e.g., 'additional Proper Prefaces,' and 'alternative endings to the Litany.'

(e) "The provision for greater elasticity in public worship," e.g., 'a shortened form of MEP for use when another Service is combined therewith,' and, for 'the Administration of HC,' 'alternative uses of the prescribed words when the number of communicants is large . . .'

(f) "The change of words obscure or commonly misunderstood," e.g., 'hell, wealth, damnation, indifferently.'

(g) "The revision of the Calendar and other Tables prefixed to the BCP," including 'the insertion of some national Saints.'

The Committee further suggested that a better or more elastic order for the recitation of the Psalter might obviate the 'difficulty and distress' caused 'to many devout and thoughtful persons' by 'the use of the Commenary Pss.,' and the inconvenience of reciting Pss. 'inappropriate to the day or season, or to the particular occasion'; and, moreover, in regard to the Lectionary, that 'further revision would be of advantage.'² "A Book containing special forms of service, which might be authorised by particular bps." was also recognised as a desideratum, the supply of which the Abp. of Cant. was requested to further.

¹ Double or single inverted commas in the text mark quotations from Resolutions of the Conference or the Report of the Conference Committee.

² It may be noted that Pope Pius X has instituted a new Order of Psalter recitation, to begin Jan. 1, 1913, and is about to deal with the Lectionary. The adaptation of the Daily Lessons to the Christian year is desired by many Eng. Churchmen.

A comparison of the amendments recorded under RITUAL, § 20-54, as introduced in the Irish and American PBs, together

8. Rubrics. with the notes on interpretation, will prove the necessity for a careful overhauling of the rubrics. Those that are ambiguous need to be made plain, discretion for varying uses being clearly allowed or disallowed. Those that are impracticable, or so burdensome as to be unedifying, need to be relaxed or removed. And directions need to be supplied where an unnecessary and undesirable licence of variation is now left.

Whether PB R. can be successful depends more upon procedure than upon anything else.

Four stages can be more or less clearly traced in regard to previous

10. Procedure. Rs.: (1) a preliminary period of criticism and trial prolonged over years; (2) an initiatory public or semi-public debate or conference, where points of dispute were discussed; (3) a constructive process of private deliberation by a limited body of divines, forming a R. Committee, and usually keeping in touch with the Government so as to avoid making impracticable proposals; (4) a legislative enactment by Parl. (as 1549, 1552, and 1559), or Conv. (as 1604 ex post facto), or by both in concert (as 1661-2).

At the present juncture, stages (1) and (2) have received ample development. For 250 years the 1662 PB has been under trial and criticism, and the last fifty years have been marked by a wide variety of practical experiments, along with an unprecedented growth of interest in liturgical studies. The R. Com. on Eccles. Disc., together with the discussions at the Pan-Anglican and Ch. Congresses, the debates in Conv., and the deliberations and proposals of Conv. committees, have been amply sufficient to initiate a R. movement. The third stage is (Feb. 20, 1912) at last being reached, the constitution of a R. Committee.¹

Only some single body of manageable size can hope to grapple effectively with the problems involved. Yet such are the complications, that one liturgical scholar has been able forcibly to urge that without careful elaboration of procedure such a committee cannot safely get to work. His suggestions demand consideration, and will bear extension.² There are four distinct provinces within which it is necessary to take care lest, in seeking to amend, the Revisers make matters worse, or fail to reach the highest attainable standard. And the same persons can hardly be expected to be equally well qualified for all; so that the work of the committee will hardly be adequately done unless it includes among its members, or calls to its aid, groups with special qualification in each of these provinces.

(1) Liturgical scholars, who, by long familiarity with many orders of service of many types, have learnt to recognise intuitively the lines of sound liturgical structure, are needed to advise in regard to additions or re-arrangements. But they will need to do more than pronounce whether proposals are or are not formally in accord with ancient precedents. To carry weight their judgment will need to indicate intrinsic merits or defects. And the proper course would appear to be to call upon such men to construct or reconstruct, with some general instructions from the committee as to the length, character, and contents of the services to be dealt with. Their drafts would then be submitted to the other groups.

(2) Men of trained literary capacity, and with ears attuned to the balance and rhythm of the best English prose, are needed to ensure that the PB shall not be disfigured by such halting, ill-jointed, and commonplace productions as have sometimes been issued "by authority." The verbal forms of any new or altered prs., etc., should be regarded as only provisional till reviewed for style and, if necessary, revised by acknowledged masters in English letters.

(3) Men with a wide range of pastoral and administrative experience and knowledge of ceremonial practice are needed to revise the rubrics from the practical and executive side, and to indicate phrases to be modified, directions to be adapted to changed customs, gaps to be filled, and relaxations to be granted. They would also criticise any drafts from the standpoint of use and convenience.

(4) Lastly, theologians of the three main schools of thought are needed in order to ensure that, under cover of convenience, or beauty, or edification, the balance of doctrine shall not be disturbed. This group should not be constituted in proportion to numerical preponderance in the Ch., but should contain (say) three of each, and each sub-group if unanimous might have power to veto the addition, subtraction, or alteration of any clause, phrase, or word, on the ground that the change proposed was regarded as out of harmony with the general tenor of the PB. By some such arrangement for blackballing suspected changes, security would be given to all parties.

A valuable discussion of the whole question will be found in Frere's Some Principles of Liturgical Reform, 1911: the author's distinction between matters which can properly be treated now, and others which may be kept in view, in case some more thoroughgoing R. be feasible at a later time, should be carefully noted, or his suggestions will be put aside at once as impracticable. Cp. W. C. Bishop, CQR, Oct., 1910, and Rubrical Revision, 1910; also pamphlets ed. H. C. Beeching; a series against R. issued by the E.C.U.; and CCR, 1908-11, as well as many earlier years. The proposals of Conv. committees are obtainable in pamphlet form (SPCK).

—BT.

G. HARFORD.

RING.—The wearing of rings, the most prominent and important of which is the finger ring, reaches back to the earliest civilised period. The finger ring bore the signet of the wearer. In Gen. 38] 17, 18 Judah gives his daughter-in-law his signet as a pledge, and in Gen. 41 42 Pharaoh puts his ring on Joseph's hand as a token of authority. With the same object in Esther 3 10 Ahasuerus gives his ring to Haman. The ring was worn on the right hand (Jer. 22 24), and from Exod. 28 11 it may be inferred that it was engraved with some device or with the name of the possessor. Jewish signet rings, with names upon them, have at different times been discovered, some as old as the 7th or 8th century, B.C.

¹ At present the sixteen persons nominated by the Abp. of Cant. are a purely advisory body, have no power of initiative, and have received no authorisation from York Conv. (March 12).

² See art. by W. C. Bishop in CQR, Oct., 1910.

1. Antiquity of Rings.

Universally and in all ages the ring has been worn: (a) as a symbol of authority; (b) as an ornament. In the Christian

2. The Marriage Ring.

Church the ring most familiar to us is the Marriage Ring, and various explanations have been given of it in this connection. The early Church probably adopted its use from customs which existed among the Jews and heathen. Tertullian (Apol. 6, De Idol. 16) speaks of the "one finger, on which her husband had placed the pledge of the nuptial ring," and St. Ambrose (Ep. 34) mentions the ring in connection with the ceremony of espousal. In the Marriage Service of the PB the form used at the giving of the ring by the man is, "With this ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow"; in the Pr. which follows occur the words, "So these persons may surely perform and keep the vow and covenant betwixt them made, whereof this ring given and received is a token and pledge." It is clear from the above what object is prominent in the mind of the Church with regard to the Marriage Ring. It symbolises the marriage tie or bond, in virtue of which the husband gives to the wife, as the "weaker vessel," the right to cling to him as the stronger; it is a pledge of the due maintenance of the wife by the husband in "worldly goods"; and a sign of the wife's being admitted to the "nearest friendship and highest trust" which the husband can give.

The Marriage Ring is ordered to be placed on the fourth finger of the left hand. In the Sar. Manual the direction is to place the ring first on the thumb at the invocation of the First Person of the Holy Trinity, on the next finger at the Name of the Second Person, on the third finger at the Name of the Third Person, and on the fourth finger at the word Amen. In an old rubric (Hereford Missal) the reason given for the ring remaining on the fourth finger is, "because a vein reaches from that finger to the heart, and signifies the union and perfection of love."

The ring is also given at Investitures. (a) The episcopal ring, very commonly worn by Bps. of the Anglican Communion, though not ceremonially conferred in our Order of Investiture. Consecration, signifies the espousal of the Bp. to his church. It is most frequently worn on the middle finger of the right hand. (b) The King at his Coronation is invested with the ring, which is placed by the Abp. on the fourth finger of his right hand, and is "the ensign of Kingly Dignity, and of Defence of the Catholic Faith" (see Maskell, Mon. Rit. 2 33, and the Order of the Coronation of King Edward VII).—23. H. D. MACNAMARA.

RIOTOUS BEHAVIOUR on the part of clerks was specifically condemned by canon 75. No "Eccles. Person" was to give himself to drinking or riot (crapulae), to spend time idly or in unlawful games, under pain of ecclesiastical censures. Immorality, BRAWLING and drunkenness of clerks are dealt with under the CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT, 1840. See Phillimore, Eccl. Law 2 841.—A4.

R. J. WHITWELL.

RITUAL.

- I. INTRODUCTORY, 1.
- II. RITUAL PRINCIPLES, 2-5.
- III. RITUAL POLICY, 6-14.
- IV. VARIORUM SYNOPSIS OF PBS, 15-53.
- V. "RITUAL" PROPER, 54-66.
- VI. CEREMONIAL, 67-89.
- VII. ORNAMENTS, 90-106.
- VIII. TIMES AND SEASONS, 107-115.

I. INTRODUCTORY.

RITUAL is a prescribed order of outward corporate approach to God. It is the concerted response of the Ch. to the apostolic counsel, "Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you."

The R. of each several branch of the Historic Catholic Communion within the Ch. of Christ provides a series of rites or liturgical forms, with accompanying ceremonies and ornaments, and with due provision for sacred seasons and times of worship. The purpose of R. is the external expression by a congregation of internal states of soul with a view to mutual edification. All four elements of R.—liturgical forms, ceremonies, ornaments and places, times and seasons—should combine to aid the worshippers to re-create or represent imaginatively, and so to reproduce and refresh within themselves simultaneously, the normal phases of the religious life. The range of religious experience is so infinitely varied, and its nature so individual, that the practical problem of constructing a system of R., which by definition is to be for corporate use, is both complex and delicate. It is not surprising, therefore, that mistakes have been made in the attempts at its solution, and that acute differences arise in judging either actual systems or proposals for solution. Only by starting from a platform of admitted principles can such mistakes be avoided and such differences resolved. Accordingly, this art. begins with an enunciation of such principles as may command general agreement. The points common to all the elements of R., or at least to the first three, are so many and important that they demand exposition first. Points of contrast or characteristic function and regulation will follow in order.

II. RITUAL PRINCIPLES.

i. The primary function of R. is the expression of RELIGION (see that art.). It follows from this that it is a form of Art, for the all-inclusive function of Art is expression. It follows

2. Its Nature—Art.

also that it makes its appeal to the spirit through the imagination which creates the world of Art. All this has been obscured by the groundless prejudice which relegates Art to a place apart from common life, where artists and leisured amateurs indulge their peculiar tastes, and which associates the imagination only with what is remote, far-fetched, or purely fictitious. The truth is that the imagination is vitally concerned in every activity which is properly human (see further, MAN, §§ 18-25), and finds continual outlet in speech, song and gesture, as well as in the commonly recognised art forms. The first test of R. will then be, whether it expresses in some natural order the main realities with which religion deals, and represents in a convincing and satisfying manner the right response of the soul to the present action of those realities. Words and music, movements and postures, dress and accessories, and the sacred time-series in which these find their places, ought to impress prepared worshippers as true aesthetically, i.e., as reflecting the real spiritual experience of souls like their own, so being suited to move them also to kindred soul-activities, it may be of penitence, joy, or aspiration. So the framers of the PB speak of being content with such ceremonies "as be apt to stir up the dull mind of man to the remembrance of his duty to God."

ii. R., just because it is expression, is not directly concerned with the proving of truth or the discovery or definition of spiritual realities. But all R. must express more than man's strivings and desires. In fact, the mere existence of desire is a witness to some system of believed fact from which the desire starts. Christian R. is not then strange in having an intimate relation to truth. But it is its peculiar boast that the system of truth which underlies it rests upon a supreme Divine revelation, and authenticates itself to the reverent learner as true and as sufficient for soul-life and growth. Further, the R. of the Eng. Ch. not only preserves the close connection of Catholic worship with the central truths of the Christian religion, but has been jealously revised so as to remove whatever might have crept in of unfounded legend or unwarranted doctrinal development or misleading ceremony or perverted ornament or superstitious festival. To take one example, there can be little doubt that the elimination from the PB of every clause or sentence necessarily implying Prayer for the DEAD was due to the fact that it is not clear from Holy Scripture that God desires or approves such prayer. Another example would be the prohibition of the ceremony of ELEVATION at the consecration of the bread and wine in HC. The second test of R. will then be whether it is based on Christian truth as revealed in the NT, or at least is in full harmony with such TRUTH.

3. Its Basis—Truth.

The PB Pref.¹ claims that "the (Elizabethan) Book, as it stood before established by law, doth not contain in it anything contrary to the word of God, or to sound doctrine." Pref.² adds that "nothing is ordained to be read, but the very pure Word of God, the Holy Scriptures, or that which is agreeable to the same." So it is forbidden by canon 4 to affirm that the R. of the PB "is a corrupt, superstitious, or unlawful worship of God, or containeth anything in it that is repugnant to the Scriptures."

It should be noted how radically this position differs from the unworkable and unwarrantable claim of the Puritans, whose view may be taken from the Adm. to Parl., 1572 (Frere, PM, p. 14), which pleads "that nothing be done in this (i.e., the ministration of sacraments, etc.) or in any other thing, but that which you have the express warrant of God's word for."

iii. If the Christian Ch., especially as represented by the Eng. branch of it, is careful that its R. should rest on a basis of truth, it is even more sharply distinguished from other organised religions in demanding that outward religion shall be the true expression of the soul within, and that religion and morality shall be a close-knit unity. We cannot stay to draw this out at length. Under RELIGION it is shown how this unity, which is a necessary outcome of the spiritual nature of MAN, is constantly liable to become weakened or broken in the historical development of religious and moral ideas, practices and institutions. Here we can only note that this postulate of edification gives the third test of Christian R., Does it call forth, quicken, and nourish the spiritual and moral life? Is the worshipper a better man for his worship? Does it store his memory and impress his imagination with what is wholesome and uplifting? Does it so clothe truth with circumstance, attribute, and occasion, that it passes unconsciously into the life, moulding motives, and prompting deeds?

4. Its End—Edification.¹

So the PB Pref.¹ sets forth as the aims of the revisers, "the preservation of Peace and Unity in the Ch., the procuring of Reverence, and exciting of Piety and Devotion in the publick Worship of God." "Divine Service," according to Pref.², was ordained "of a good purpose and for a great advancement of godliness . . . that the people . . . might continually profit more and more in the knowledge of God, and be the more inflamed with the love of his true Religion." Pref.² declares that ceremonies should serve "to the setting forth of God's honour and glory, and to the reducing of the people to a most perfect and godly living, without error or superstition."

It will not, of course, be a valid objection to a system of R. that this or that member of a body of worshippers is not edified by it. But there ought not to be in such a system any considerable elements which jar the moral sense or lower the spiritual vitality of reverent and instructed

¹ The word "edify" is used rather widely in the PB Prefaces, and often includes convenience, here distinguished from edification.

Christians, or which are obvious irrelevancies from the point of view of edification. A Church is not a concert room, a lecture-hall, or a theatre. The art of R. may not follow the law of art for art's sake: its art must always be for religion's sake. So balanced sentences, exquisite music, convincing argument, stately processions, gorgeous dresses, imposing ceremonial, splendid architecture, if used at all must be so used as to serve some properly religious end. All this may sound commonplace and unnecessary. But those who have had long, wide and varied experience of Ch. circles in which liturgical and ceremonial elaboration is usual know well the inevitable risk of degradation of Ritual. In a large congregation it is hard to keep watch over all, and so a certain proportion misuse the beauty of the R. by finding in it a purely æsthetic pleasure, or turn worship into formalism by a mere punctilious performance of the external order. Again, where some devout and zealous clergyman has introduced an elaborate ritual with due explanation, it may happen that he is succeeded by one who is neither devout nor zealous, or who only continues the usages he finds from disinclination or inability to make new changes. In such cases the danger is intensified. It is proper to point out that even the most informal religious services have kindred risks of superstition and unreality. The only way to guard against these risks is to allow no rite, ceremony, ornament or sacred day to be introduced or maintained in use unless it can be justified by the principles and practice of the Eng. Ch., and, further, without giving frequent clear and concise explanations of its meaning and purpose. R. can only be made edifying by interpretation in sermons, instructions, and class lessons. In other words R. is only one method of edification: it cannot take the place of other modes (see RELIGION).

iv. It follows from the nature of MAN, a spiritual being set down to live his life in a material world, with a body of flesh and blood as his primary means of communication with that world, that all kinds of practical considerations control his activity. His power of expression, and therefore his capacity for worthily taking his part in R., depends upon his experience. Again, since R. is for a congregation, it must in the main be adapted to the experience of the least favoured worshippers, who can fairly be regarded as having a right to be considered. If some parts of the worship are beyond the reach of children or uneducated people, its general drift and meaning, and most of its constituent parts, should be within their comprehension when suitably explained. The same principle of practical "convenience" or utility comes into play at every turn. A religious service must respect the average capacity of nerve-response and endurance, which varies at different periods and with different races. The general artistic, intellectual, spiritual and economic level of the population must affect the expediency of many degrees and details of Ritual. For example, costly or numerous ornaments will be unsuitable or impossible in poor countries or districts. The fourth test of R. is, therefore, whether it embodies a convenient order. Assuming it to be æsthetically fitting, sound as to doctrine, and devotional in tendency, is it also reasonably practical? Will it work well and easily? Does it fit the persons, occasions and circumstances for which it is designed? Is it reasonably simple and intelligible?

This fundamental principle of the Ch. of Eng. that R. is not a cast-iron system, but the free adaptation of varied outward means to high spiritual ends, is finely expressed in the classical sentence of Pref.³: "Christ's Gospel is not a Ceremonial Law (as much of Moses' Law was), but it is a Religion to serve God, not in bondage of the figure or shadow, but in the freedom of the Spirit, being content only with those Ceremonies which do serve to a decent Order and godly Discipline, and such as be apt to stir up the dull mind of man to the remembrance of his duty to God by some notable and special signification, whereby he might be edified." The same practical end is recognised in the reference at an earlier stage of the Reformation (28 Henry 8, c. 10) in 1536 to the "ceremonies, uses and other laudable and politic ordinances, for a tranquillity, discipline, concord, devotion, unity and decent order heretofore in the Ch. of Eng. used instituted taken and accepted," the last words indicating perhaps the construction placed upon the papal decrees in the Roman Canon Law recognised as valid in England. In the same year, in H. 8's first Injns., the clergy were expressly ordered, in regard to the ten Arts drawn up in the Conv. of that year, that they should "plainly show and discern which of them be necessary to be believed and observed for their salvation, and which of them be not necessary, but only do concern the decent and politic order of the said Ch.," or "certain laudable ceremonies, rites, and usages of the Ch. meet and convenient to be kept and used."

In this connection Pref.⁴ asserts that the ceremonies retained "be neither dark nor dumb ceremonies, but are so set forth that every man may understand what they do mean, and to what use they do serve"; on the other hand, Pref.⁵ states that "the number and hardness of the Rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the service was the cause, that to turn the Book only was so hard and intricate a matter, that many times there was more business to find out what should be read, than to read it after it was found out." The same Pref.⁶ adds that the whole is now "in such a Language and Order as is most easy and plain for the understanding both of the Readers and Hearers. It is also more commodious, both for the shortness thereof. . . . and for that the Rules be few and easy."

III. RITUAL POLICY.

i. The application of the above principles belongs to the department of Ch. ORDER, and, as they have been applied in the construction and revision of the PB, they have given rise to certain working rules of R. policy which now demand attention. The first is a corollary from the principle of freedom in the outward routine of worship, and is carefully expressed in the last clause of Art. 34: "Every particular or national Ch. hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the Ch. ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying" (see the full text under ARTICLES OF RELIGION, § 7).

So earlier in Pref.² it was explained that the ceremonies "that remain are retained for a discipline and order, which (upon just causes) may be altered and changed and therefore are not to be esteemed equal with God's Law. . . . And in these our doings we condemn no other Nations" (the ritual changes of Germany and Switzerland, as well as the conservatism of Italy and Spain, being covered by this caution), "nor prescribe anything but to our own people only: For we think it convenient that every country should use such Ceremonies as they shall think best." Moreover, that this claim to a right of local adaptation of R. was no insular peculiarity, but a genuine Catholic element of Ch. life, is proved by Gregory's well-known direction to Augustine of Canterbury to collect into an English R. whatever he should find to be most pious, religious, righteous, and most likely to be pleasing to God from the Ch. of Rome, the Ch. of Gaul, or any other Church (Bede, HE 1 27). Again (Pref.³) "the appointment of (this) order pertaineth not to private men; therefore no man ought to take in hand, nor presume to appoint or alter any publick or Common Order in Christ's Ch., except he be lawfully called and authorised thereunto." Similarly in Pref.¹ it is laid down with the greatest generality that "the particular forms of Divine worship, and the Rites and Ceremonies appointed to be used therein, being things in their own nature indifferent, and alterable, and so acknowledged; it is but reasonable, that upon weighty and important considerations, according to the various exigency of times and occasions, such changes and alterations should be made therein, as to those that are in place of Authority should from time to time seem either necessary or expedient."

None of these references in any way defines the constitutional methods by which the authority of the Ch. is expressed, or the organ or organs in which that authority is conceived as resident. The discussion of this point must be sought elsewhere (see ORDER). It has been held by some recent Anglican ritualists that these definitions of authority are indefinitely limited by an alleged obligation to follow Catholic usage and tradition. But it is as difficult to point to any admission in the Anglican formularies of such an absolute obligation in regard to matters not laid down in Scripture, as it is to draw any line between matters which may or may not, on this view, be altered. This question is of such importance in relation to present difficulties that it will be useful here to quote at some length from the Memorandum drawn up in 1898 by W. C. E. Newbolt, Darwell Stone, and Montagu Villiers, and numerously signed by a group of clergy generally in favour of what is known as advanced ritual (quoted R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. 1 185 f.).

7. Relation to Tradition.

"Practices which were explicitly or by implication abolished at the Reformation, or . . . foreign developments which never had any footing in the Eng. Ch., cannot be rightly introduced except by or under the sanction of authority . . . The immediate authority with which, as Eng. Churchmen, we have to do is that of the Eng. Ch., not that of the Roman, or the Gallican, or any other Ch. . . . It follows that nothing can have valid eccles. authority for Eng. Churchmen which the Eng. Ch. has never received or authorised. It follows also that, while confessedly the Ch. of Eng. is bound, in respect of doctrine, by continuous Catholic consent and Ecumenic decrees, no variable rite or ceremony can have valid authority for Eng. Churchmen which the Eng. Ch. has definitely repudiated, whether explicitly or by implication, even though it may at one time have had the authority of that Church. Nor can it be claimed that disciplinary rules or usages, merely because they have for a time obtained in other parts of the Ch., or in all the Churches of the West, or even throughout the whole Ch., have thereby acquired for themselves the authority of the Catholic Ch. in such a sense that a national Ch. cannot set them aside for her own members." Further, "we pledge ourselves to the use of the rites and ceremonies prescribed in the PB as opposed to the omission of them. We pledge ourselves to the use of them as the positive and sufficient rule and order of the ministrations of the Ch. for which they are provided, as opposed to modifications of them, whether by change, addition, or omission, except in so far as such modifications may be enjoined or allowed by lawful authority. . . . In so interpreting the obligation we have accepted we are only acknowledging that we stand in the same position as the clergy in other parts of the Catholic Ch., since nowhere, so far as we are aware, is it allowed to the clergy to depart from the formularies of worship imposed by authority."

ii. The second rule is that the preference should always be given to what is old and accustomed. "Common experience showeth," we read in Pref.¹, "that where a change hath been made of things advisedly established (no evident necessity so requiring) sundry inconveniences have thereupon ensued; and those many times more and greater than the evils that were intended to be remedied by such change." And to those who objected to the retention of "some of the old Ceremonies" it was replied that "if they think much that any of the old do remain and would rather have all devised anew: then such men granting some ceremonies convenient to be had, surely where the old may be well used, there they cannot reasonably reprove the old only for their age, without bewraying of their own folly. For in such a case they ought rather to have reverence unto them for their antiquity" (Pref.³). Accordingly, in the 1st Act of Unif. (1549) it was stated that the compilers of the PB had had "as well eye and respect to the most sincere and pure Christian religion taught by the Scripture, as to the usages in the primitive Ch."; and the last Act of Unif. (1662) in its opening words asserted that the Elizabethan PB was "agreeable to the word of God, and usage of the Primitive Church." At the same time this does not imply that even primitive usage imposes a perpetual obligation, as some writers seem to contend.¹ Neither the Feet washing, nor the Agape, nor the Kiss of peace, can be admitted to have "an authority so high that they cannot be forbidden and ought to be restored, or at least permitted as far as is practicable, and as opportunity offers." As Bp. Creighton, historian and statesman, once said (CCR, 1899, p. 33): "The great work of the Ch. of Christ is to mould the future . . . Its eyes are turned to the past for warning and instruction, not for imitation" (cp. Hooker, Preface to EP 4: "In the apostles' time that was harmless, which, being revived now, would be scandalous"). The Revisers of 1662 rejected all proposed alterations which secretly struck at "some established doctrine or laudable practice of the Ch. of Eng., or indeed of the whole Catholick Ch. of Christ." Leave out the adjectives italicised, and the sentence is revolutionised and made absurd. If the practice was never "laudable," or has ceased, by incrustation with wrong associations, or from change of circumstances, to be so, the obligation to retain or restore it is gone. All that can be safely deduced from the formularies is that what is old, and especially what is primitive, can claim to be favourably considered, but that the final verdict must be by intrinsic worth. The view which regards us as still bound, not merely reverently to weigh, but blindly to accept, all items of doctrine or practice, which were generally adopted in the Primitive Ch., not only gives to that stage of the Christian religion a place of infallibility which cannot be supported from the NT or from the Anglican formularies, but ignores the time-element in human life. A prayer-sentence, a ceremony, an ornament is not a dead, fixed entity. It is an element in religious life, and varies in value and meaning with the development and history of individual Christians and of the Divine-human Society of which they are members.¹ So it is laid down clearly in Pref.² that "some (ceremonies) at the first were of godly intent and purpose devised, and yet at length turned to vanity and superstition," being "so far abused, partly by the superstitious blindness of the rude and unlearned, and partly by the unsatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre, than the Glory of God, that the abuses could not well be taken away, the thing remaining still." Accordingly, Ch. authorities "should put away. . . things which from time to time they perceive to be most abused, as in men's ordinances it often chanceth diversely in divers countries."

8. Continuity.

¹ Cp. W. C. Bishop, Rubrical Revision: an Appeal to Principle (1910, p. 29).

Moreover, it must be pointed out that the rule of continuity is second in order to the rule of authority. It cannot be left to private judgment to set aside the authority of the Eng. Church. Yet it has been contended, not merely, as by some writers, that primitive usage should be decisive in authoritative PB revision, but that it of itself confers authority upon individual incumbents to set aside in its favour the usage, and even the clear orders, of their Church. On this matter a double weight attaches to the following passage from Newbolt and Stone's The Ch. of Eng., an Appeal to Facts and Principles, since it was quoted by Abp. Davidson before the R. Com. on Eccles. Disc. (2 373 f.) as the conclusion of his long historical review of modern R. problems.

"The Eng. Ch. voices to us the Catholic Ch., appeals to us in clear tones, emphasising a definite position, claims to have made such alterations, as were made with a certain end in view, with her eye on the Primitive Ch., and with a determination to preserve all laudable practices of the whole Catholic Church. It can hardly be disputed that this represented not only the teaching of the great Caroline Divines but also of the Tractarian leaders of the last century. Our difficulties arise now from the fact that this attitude is not accepted, and that in its place has arisen the dangerous and anomalous contention that the Eng. Ch., or rather the Ch. in England, is committed to an untenable position; that she only represents so many dioceses of the Western Ch., and may well be arraigned on the charge of schism; that she parted with certain things at the Reformation which she had no right to part with, and betrays generally stiffness in accepting certain foreign developments which are of a missionary value and are branded with the Catholic stamp; and therefore it is the duty of all those who owe allegiance to the Catholic Ch. to ignore all the peculiarities and crotchets of a pseudo-Anglicanism and to take advantage of troublous times to make a series of expeditions into the regions of pure Catholicism and annex privately such portions of the heritage as those who live in England seem to have been deprived of, to dwell in them, to obtain "squatters' rights," and then at last, by persistence and threats, to obtain episcopal recognition and public toleration for their annexations. The result of this policy has been and must be disastrous; in grasping at the shadow of 'catholic privileges,' we have lost the essential principle of catholicism, 'obedience to authority.' If it be true, and it may be true, that the Ch. of Eng. in asserting her independence, allowed herself to be severed too completely from the rest of Western Christendom, the way towards a better understanding is not the way of individual desertion, or actions which are barely distinguishable from profound distrust of, and dislike to, the body in which the individual finds himself placed. . . .

The PB in the Preface practically says that the Ch. of Eng. has abolished no Ecumenical custom. If A or B thinks that she has so abolished a laudable practice, it is not open to him to correct the Ch. of Eng. in that particular, any more than a Roman priest who conscientiously objected to refuse the chalice to the laity could supplement his defective catholicity from the Anglican and Eastern Churches, and yet remain in the Roman obedience. It is the Church in the exercise of her collective authority who must decide these things. And that is the point to which all effort should be directed, how to secure the expression of the living voice of the Ch., instead of in the direction of individual reformation. It may, however, be contended that we owe nearly all the advantages we have gained to individual enterprise, often undertaken in the teeth of constituted authority. To which it may be answered, that in the first place there was no conception in the minds of the Oxford leaders that it was competent to them to take over any doctrine or practice which was not to be found in the authorised system of the

¹ Cp. the destruction of the Brazen Serpent, 2 Kings 18 2, with John 3 14.

Eng. Church. Their advance was not in the face of authority, but in the face of the holders and representatives of authority, who ignored or repudiated the authority which they unquestionably possess. The Tractarian objective was the assertion of, and the securing, those Catholic rights and privileges which the Ch. of Eng. claimed never to have parted with, and most firmly to maintain, not the right to hold as individuals that which the Ch. had once repudiated, or to develop in regions where the Ch. gave no lead. It may, further, be doubted whether the advantages secured by private enterprise have been so conspicuous as they are asserted to be. English people have learnt to tolerate certain things which once roused them to frenzy and riot, from the surplice in the pulpit to the Eucharistic vestments; but, correspondingly, they have not learnt to desire instruction but to despise sermons; neither as a body do they appreciate the Eucharistic sacrifice, however much many of them may rejoice in the accessories which symbolise that doctrine. It is quite open to anyone to say that the victories won in persistent opposition to the bps. have been dearly won, and that the fault has been by no means all of it on the side of the bishops. Certainly no one can say that the course of the Catholic movement, as it is called, has been a happy one; the positions have been carried at tremendous loss, a party has been pushed through like a wedge driven broadside foremost, and in some cases hopeless indifference has been mistaken for acquiescence, and a chasuble and Eucharistic lights accepted as compensation for an attenuated flock which has been either starved or over-driven. Can anyone say that the education and spiritual attainments of the people, even when they are not actively hostile, are up to the same level as the outward symbols of advance? Restored ritual and restored Catholicity have not gone hand in hand, and the reason is that the sense of authority has been weakened by opposition to the bishops, and that ritual and doctrinal changes have been accepted in too many cases, out of deference to the wishes of a popular priest, as part of 'his way,' which, with many other things, must be put up with; while, in other cases, a violent outbreak of Protestant fanaticism merely means that the unpopular 'ways' of a priest generally disliked have been assailed at the point of least resistance. The whole of the later developments of the Catholic revival are characterised by the weakness which always waits on individualism. It would surely seem to be of the most vital importance to recall men's minds to a truer and more dignified conception of the Eng. Ch. as such, not as something to be apologised for, minimised, or even ridiculed, but in the spirit of those who would say Σκόρπον ἔλαξες, ταύραν κόσμι."

iii. Another fundamental rule explicitly laid down in the PB is that in the interests of unity

10. there shall be uniformity of R.,
Uniformity. for "whereas heretofore there hath been great diversity in saying and singing in Churches within this realm, some following Salisbury Use, some Hersford Use, and some the use of Bangor, some of York, some of Lincoln; now from henceforth all the whole Realm shall have but one Use" (Pref.³; cp. art. US).

The preamble to the 1549 Act of Uniformity, which ordered the First PB in which Pref.³ first appeared, adds that "besides the same (Uses) now of late much more divers and sundry forms and fashions have been used in the cathedral and parish churches of England and Wales, as well concerning the Mattins or Morning Prayer and the Evensong, as concerning the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass, with divers and sundry rites and ceremonies concerning the same." It goes on to state that the Crown had "appointed the Abp. of Cant. and certain of the most learned and discreet bps., and other learned men of this realm" (a Ritual Committee, in fact) "to . . . draw and make one convenient and meet order, rite, and fashion of common and open prayer and administration of sacraments, to be had and used in his majesty's realm of England and in Wales." Similarly, the Elizabethan Act, after stating that "at the death of . . . King Edward VI there remained one uniform order . . . which was set forth in one Book . . ." went on to enact "that all . . . Ministers . . . shall . . . use the Mattins, Evensong, Celebration of the Lord's Supper, and Administration of each of the Sacraments, and all their common and open prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the said Book" (four alterations in the Lessons, Litany, and Words of Administration being excepted) "and none other, or otherwise." And penalties are provided "if any . . . Minister . . . shall wilfully . . . use any other Rite, Ceremony, Order, Form, or Manner of Celebrating the Lord's Supper, openly or privily, or Mattins, or Evensong . . . than is mentioned and set forth in the said Book." Moreover, these terms carry the more weight, in that this Act was at the last revision incorporated in the PB, becoming No. 1 of its contents (see below, §§ 15, 16), and was subscribed as such by the Convocations, as well as re-enacted by Parliament. It is here noted as evidence of Ch. policy. (For its legal aspect see RITUAL LAW, §§ 2-4.) The Preface to the Advertisements of 1566 states that the Queen considered it "necessary . . . for all her loving subjects . . . to be knit together in one godly unity of doctrine and to be conjoined in one uniformity of rites and manners . . . as also to be of one decent behaviour in their outward apparel," and had "by her letters directed . . . that . . . some orders might be taken whereby all diversities and varieties among them of the clergy and the people (as breeding nothing but contention, offence and breach of common charity, and be against the laws, good usage and ordinances of the realm) might be reformed and repressed and brought to one manner of uniformity throughout the whole realm." A stronger statement still is found in one of the canons of 1571, which were not indeed submitted to the Lower House but were signed by "all the Bishops of both Provinces in Synod, in their own persons, or by proxy" (Strype's Parker 45), and put in force by them, thus affording the surest contemporary evidence of the views of the eccles. authorities. The canon on Chancellors, etc., requires that the clergy "observe the order and customs presented in the Book of Common Prayers as well in reading the Holy Scripture, and saying of prayers, as in ministration of the sacraments: that they neither diminish nor add anything, neither of the matter, nor of the manner." Finally, canon 14 of 1604, which won full authority, requires that "all ministers shall observe the Orders, Rites and Ceremonies prescribed in the PB as well in reading the Holy Scriptures, and saying of Prayers, as in Administration of the Sacraments, without either diminishing in regard of preaching, or in any other respect, or adding anything in the matter or form thereof."

It is quite clear therefore that the principle of utility (§ 5 above) was in the 16th and 17th cents. understood to require a rule of all-round uniformity in Ritual. But uniformity is not identity. No two services can ever be exactly alike. Even lumps of clay though forced

11. Meaning of Uniformity. into the same mould will come out different. And the service of free worshippers, however carefully ordered, cannot even approach the mechanical precision of a regiment at drill, and ought not to be expected even to aim at such a standard. Moreover a glance at the PB makes it clear that this was never intended. So much is left without explicit ordering that the word 'uniformity' cannot possibly to be taken as an exact term, to be interpreted with scientific rigidity. It is a term of general description, to be qualified in application as the occasion and circumstances require. (a) Express alternatives, for example, are provided. This canticle or that psalm is to be said or sung, and a choice of prayers is occasionally given. In 1549 alternative vestures were allowed at HC, and the Advertisements and Canons forbade the use of cathedral and collegiate churches to be uniform with that of parish churches. (b) Similar alternatives may be inferred with reasonable certainty in not a few cases, e.g., the right to sing the other Psalms by analogy of l'enite. (c) There are many elements in the PB services the manner of performing which is left unprescribed. Moreover, the Act of Unif. Amendment Act, 1872, whatever liturgical defects may be found in its provisions, was approved by Convocation at the time, and therefore carries with it due Ch. authorisation for the considerable relaxations of uniformity which it sanctions (cp. SHORTENED SERVICES ACT). (d) Further, the large amount of discretion left to the minister naturally tempts him to take discretion where it is not legally open to him; and the area of the PB is so considerable, and the real or apparent ambiguity of its rubrical directions so great, that it is only natural, and it has actually happened, that wide deviations have by custom established themselves. The difficulty also of enforcing conformity (see below) has greatly helped this tendency to variation.

iv. The fourth working rule of R. policy requires the enforcement of the prescribed

12. Enforcement. uniform order. That there shall be an authoritative ordering of public worship, recognisably the same in all parishes, is not a mere counsel of perfection, or an urgent recommendation, but an express requirement, binding upon ministers and people. The intention of the Bps. and divines who prepared the First PB is expressed in the words already quoted: "Now from henceforth all the realm shall have one Use." And the ground of obligation is set down in Pref.³: "Although the keeping or omitting of a ceremony"—the principle obviously applies to any R. order—"in itself considered is but a small thing; yet the wilful and contemptuous transgression and breaking of a common order and discipline is no small offence before God, 'Let all things be done among you,' saith St. Paul, 'in a seemly and due order.'" The appointment of the which order pertaineth not to private men." It is obvious that individuals are not intended to be given the option of disobedience. What was new in 1549 was (1) the systematic regulation of R. by statute, and (2) the co-ordination of secular and spiritual courts for the purpose of its enforcement (see further, ACTS OF UNIFORMITY, § 2). The older service-books had rested upon the jus liturgicum of the bps., subject to any valid regulations of Canon Law, and had depended for enforcement solely upon the eccles. courts. It was nothing less than a revolution, none the less so because in the circumstances inevitable, to make the PB practically, what later it actually became, a schedule to an Act of Parliament.¹ The way had been prepared for this by a late ordinance of Convocation in the previous reign which had imposed the Use of Sarum upon the Province of Canterbury. The second Act of Unif. in 1552 only altered the PB, but left it on the same footing as regards enforcement. The third Act, that of Elizabeth in 1559, embodied the same policy, and—as has already been noted—is the one Act of Parliament which is also a duly Synodical ordinance of the Ch. of Eng. Moreover, the fourth Act in 1662 expressly confirms or revives the previous Acts, which are to this day in full force, except that the statutory obligations of the laity no longer, by an Act of 1846, carry any civil penalty for breach. It is easy, in these easy-going days of general toleration, to criticise this policy of compulsory uniformity. But those who have read history with any measure of imaginative sympathy will be slow to pass judgment. Froude, for example, says of the Puritans that "at the heart of the matter it was they who were giving importance to what was of no importance . . . They would have created with all their hearts a despotism as hard, as remorseless, as blighting, as the Romanist" (Hist. 5 23, 80). During the Reformation period hardly any saw that there was an alternative. The Marian Reaction, the Knox regime in Scotland, and the administration of the Long Parliament, were at least as much associated with coercion as the Edwardian, Elizabethan and Restoration settlements. The Anabaptists and Congregationalists had an alternative, indeed; but so impracticable did it seem for general adoption that it was no wonder the Christian world was not persuaded. The exigencies of national politics, under pressure of international factors such as France and Spain, the Papacy and the Lutheran States, Scotland and the Netherlands, made internal unity a necessity, and in those days this was inconceivable and impossible without external union in matters of religion, which required that a measure of uniformity should be enforced.

Hardly was the last Act of Unif. placed upon the statute book than its fundamental policy was proved unworkable. The NONCONFORMISTS, i.e., the Puritans who had under

¹ See further RITUAL LAW, §§ 1-2.

Charles I remained within the Ch. of Eng. without conforming to its R., now became DISSENTERS. National unity in matters of religion was thenceforth outside the region of practical politics. The Toleration Act of 1688 only gave legal sanction to a nonconformity of practice which was already a permanent factor in English religious life. But the violent contrast between the requirements of the law and the defiance of the law by the Dissenters made it all the more difficult to insist upon rubrical precision among conformist ministers, many of whom were Puritan in sympathies, and all of whom had succeeded to their cures after the almost total disuse of liturgical worship during the Revolution.

13. Failure of Enforcement.

Neither was the 18th cent., which the Ch. entered upon weakened by the secession of the Non-jurors who knew and cared most for R., a likely period for establishing, what had never yet obtained, a state of uniformity. Elizabeth had indeed succeeded in securing a large and general measure of agreement in doctrine, and the resolute administration of Abp. Whitgift had produced at least the appearance of ritual conformity. But Laud's "new broom" found disorder so general and so serious that the attempt to deal with it cost him his life. It has been shown that there were periods of alternation, stagnation following development, in regard to Ceremonial. Here we just record the fact, pointedly expressed by Abp. Davidson before the R. Comm. on Eccl. Disc., that there has never been at any time generally enforced even as much uniformity as an elastic interpretation of the laws would require. He said that "there have been always from the days at least of Q. Eliz. to our own, notwithstanding very definite rubrics and stern Acts of Uniformity and searching episcopal injunctions and visitations and repressions and other similar utterances and actions, wide varieties prevalent in the mode of conducting Divine worship." Yet he adds: "Looking back across the last two cents, it is hard to exaggerate the good we have secured from our rule of uniformity in public worship." His meaning, no doubt, was that all persons and parties held by the PB as their directory of Ritual. They might take its rubrics rigidly or loosely, interpret them in this way or in that, claim the freedom of the spirit or feel bound by the terms of the letter, but for all the PB expressed an accepted ideal, and their current ways of using it would be defended, so far as coming short of its requirements, as necessary concessions to circumstances. As Thomas Hancock claimed,¹ the Acts of Unif. were at least a great safeguard to the laity that, in the matter of psalms, lessons, and prayers, the ministration of the Sacraments, and the forms of marriage, burial, and so forth, they were sure of a "decent Order," to use the phrase which recurs so often in Tudor documents, and were delivered from the tender mercies of an unfettered individualism.

¹ The Act of Unif. a measure of Liberation (CHS Tract).

And so long as the variations from strict conformity were generally of the same type, the result was to produce a new uniformity in the shape of a uniform diversity. But whenever a school of "rubricians" arose, and set about revising neglected usages, the situation changed. The last instance of such a movement has been, of course, that which began in Oxford with the Tractarians, and which has produced the problems which press acutely for solution still. In its bearing on R., as distinct from Doctrine, this movement has been reviewed at length in Abp. Davidson's evidence before the R. Comm. on Eccl. Disc., summarised in the Report. But the outcome has been that, while in the immense majority of churches there is now a more consistent and loyal observance of the rubrics as a whole than perhaps ever before, on either side of the central body represented in these churches there is a considerable minority who diverge so widely, by defect or by excess, from the plain requirements of the PB in the types of service which they conduct, that an outsider going from one to the other would hardly recognise that they belonged to the same Ch. or could both be professedly based on the same PB. The significance of the Report, which carried special weight in that it was unanimous, was twofold. It frankly recognised that there had arisen a real need for "such modifications in the existing law relating to the conduct of Divine Service and to the ornaments and fittings of Churches as may tend to secure the greater elasticity which a reasonable recognition of the comprehensiveness of the Ch. of Eng. and of its present needs seems to demand." But with equal clearness the Commissioners demand that "obedience to the law so altered shall be required, and, if necessary, enforced, by those who bear rule in the Ch. of England." (For the proposals under discussion for modifying the law, see REVISION OF PB, and, for methods of enforcement, see ORDER, COURTS.)

IV. VARIORUM SYNOPSIS OF PB RITUAL.

It has been claimed above that the four primary and essential principles of R. are Art, Truth, Edification and Utility.

14. Scheme of Synopsis.

Because R. is the expression of religion, its nature is Art. Because it is the expression of religion, it must be based on Truth and it must aim at Edification. And, just because it is genuinely human, R. must pay constant regard to the practical requirements of Utility. It is further claimed that the Ch. of Eng. has, more or less explicitly, discerned and approved these principles, and, in execution of them, has framed four rules of policy, represented by the words Authority, Continuity, Uniformity, and Enforcement. As mistress in her own house, she claims authority over the whole sphere of R., limited only by clear prescriptions of Holy Scripture. As the child of her past, yet now full grown, she respectfully studies and is predisposed to follow the usages of the past, and especially of the purest ages of the Christian Ch., but she ever controls her policy of continuity by a critical application of the primary principles. As director of the worship of a nation, she prescribes a Uniformity of Ritual. And, as a Society which cannot be efficient without discipline, she seeks to enforce her rules by laws, canons, visitations, injunctions, and judicial processes (see RITUAL LAW).

In further support and illustration of these claims, it might be thought enough to refer simply to the PB, as being in every one's hands. But (1) in the PB the statements of principle and policy are isolated from the parts in use by many pages of tabular matter, often buried in the obscurity of microscopic type, and unfurnished with those clues to their aim and structure which can be given by paragraph headings; (2) the familiar text by its mere quantity occupies so much room that the rubrical directions, often again relegated to very small type, are difficult to grasp as a whole and in relation to one another; and (3) no ordinary PB presents the instructive variations of the successive revisions of the PB. Accordingly, the task has been undertaken of presenting all the explanatory and directive contents of the PB in a variorum edition, exhibiting not only the changes introduced by the Eng. Ch. itself, but also the important alterations made in the Irish and American editions, with only such inserted titles and headings and appended notes, as are necessary to display the meaning and structure of the several sections. The main divisions of the PB are indicated in the due order of its contents by letters in alphabetical sequence.¹ The larger divisions and smaller sections are marked by large and small numerals, following the letters (e.g., D2⁴ = Daily Morning Pr., Praise division, 4th Section Te Deum).

The three main English revisions are identified as sources by inverted commas thus:

'1549 but not 1552'; '1552 but not 1549'; '1549 and 1552.' 1559 and 1604, Ir. and Am., are indicated by notes. Words not otherwise marked or noted were inserted in 1662.²

By this means it will be an easier task to find out quickly what the PB requires, to trace and estimate the nature and extent of the successive revisions of the PB, and to test the truth of the claim (B1¹ last clause) that "the main Body and Essentials of it (as well in the chiefest materials as in the frame and order thereof) have still continued the same unto this day." At the same time, it should be readily possible, both to ascertain afresh the principles and policy of the Eng. Ch. as to R., and to trace their working out in the actual details as introduced, omitted, retained or modified in the process of revision. (See further, HISTORY OF PB.)

"The Book of 'Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies' 'of the Church' 15. Title Page 'according to 'the use of' 'the Church of England' together with the Psalter or Psalms of David pointed as they are to be sung or said in Churches: and the Form or manner of Making Ordaining and Consecrating of Bishops, Priests and Deacons.

1 'the' 2 'after' 3 'in'.

THE CONTENTS OF THE BOOK.

(The numerals in the side columns indicate the numerical positions of the corresponding titles in 1549 and 1552 respectively.)

	'49	'52
1. An Act for the Uniformity of Common Prayer. ¹ A ⁴ .	0	0
2. The Preface. B1.	0	0
3. "Concerning the Service of the Church. B2.	7	1
4. "Concerning " Ceremonies." A ⁴ B3.	14	2
5. 'The Order how the Psalter is appointed to be read.' B ⁴ B4.	2 ⁵	3 ⁴
6. 'The Order how the rest of the holy Scripture is appointed to be read.' B5	2	5
7. A Table of 'proper Lessons and Psalms.' C1	4	6
8. "Tables and Rules for the Feasts and Fasts through the whole year. C2-4	0	7
9. "The" "Calendar," with the "Table" of "Lessons." C5.	2	8
10. The Order for 'Morning Prayer.' D1-3.	3	9
11. The Order for 'Evening Prayer.' D1-3.	3	9
12. The Creed of St. Athanasius. E4.	3	9
13. "The Litany." F1-9.	6	10
14. Prayers and Thanksgiving upon several occasions. F10-26.	0	10
15. "The "Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, to be used at the" "Ministration" "of the holy Communion throughout the year." G1-83.	4	11
16. "The Order of the Ministration of the" "holy Communion." H1-6	5	12
17. The Order 'of' "Baptism, both publick and private." J1-19	7	13
18. The Order of Baptism for those of riper years. II-9	0	0

¹ A mnemonic connection is either obvious or easily found. Thus, A = Acts of Unif. B = (Basis of principle and policy) Prefaces. C = Calendar and Tables. D = Daily Morning Pr. E = Evening Pr. F = (Forms of Pr. and Th.) Lit., Prs. and Ths. G = Gospels (Collects, Epistles, etc.). H = Holy Comm. I = Infant and Private Baptism. J = (Joining the Ch.) Adult Bapt. K = Catechism. L = Laying on of hands (Confirm.). M = Matrimony, Churching. N = (Nursing souls) Vis. and Comm. of Sick. O = (Obsequies) Burial. P = (Penitential office) Communion. Q = (Quires) Psalter. S = Sea. T = (Three Orders) Ordinal.

² The text is taken from the Sealed Book for the Chancery, as printed in Stephens' BCP with Notes, 1849. The variations of earlier books are taken from Jas. H. Parker's First PB of Ed. VI., 1877, or the Parker Society's reprints. The variations of the 1548 OHC are noted in their place. J. H. Parker's book also gives the variations of the abortive Scottish PB of 1637 (cp. SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE).

19. ¹⁵ The "Catechism," with the Order for "Confirmation" of "children." KI-7, LI-6.	49	52
20. "Matrimony." (10, 16) M1-9	8	14
21. "Visitation of the Sick, and Communion of the " Sick." ¹⁸ NI-9	9	15
	10	16
22. "Burial." OI-9.	10	17
23. ¹⁷ "Thanksgiving" for "Women" 'after child'-bearing. M10-15.	11	18
24. ¹⁸ A Communion 'or Denouncing of Gods anger and judgments' against sinners. ¹⁹ PI-9.	12	19
25. ²⁰ The Psalter. q.	13	20
26. The Order of Prayers to be used at Sea. s.	0	0
27. A 'Form and Manner of' ²¹ Ordaining 'Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.' TI-3.	0	0
	0	21

¹ (The 1552 Act was prefixed to the book which it enforced.)
² "A Preface." ³ "Of" ⁴ "omitted or retained." ⁵ "why some be abolished and some retained." ⁶ "The Table for the order of the Psalms to be said at M and E Pr." (2, 4). ⁷ "at M and EP for certain feasts and days." ⁸ "an almanack." ⁹ "A" (The) "Table and Calendar for Pss. and Lessons with necessary rules pertaining to the same." ¹⁰ "Matins and Evensong." ¹¹ "Introits." ¹² "celebration of the Lord's Supper and HC." ¹³ "with proper Lessons and Pss. for divers feasts and days." ¹⁴ "The Supper of the Lord and HC, commonly called the Mass." ¹⁵ "Of" (and so for next three items) "Confirmation, where also is a Catechism for children." ¹⁶ "same." ¹⁷ "The purification of women." ¹⁸ "The Th. of women after child-birth." ¹⁹ "A Declaration of Scripture" ²⁰ "with certain pss. to be used" "the first day of Lent, commonly called Ashwednesday" "divers times in the year." ²¹ "Certain Notes for the more plain explication and decent ministration of things contained in this book." ²² "making and consecrating"

16. Uniformity Act of 1559.

A. An Act for the Uniformity of Common Prayer and Service in the Church, and Administration of the Sacraments, Primo Elisabethæ.

(1) ¹ Where at the death of our late Sovereign Lord King Edward the Sixth, there remained one uniform order of Common Service, and Prayer, and of the administration of Sacraments, Rites, and Ceremonies in the Church of England, which was set forth in one Book, intituled, The Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies in the Church of England, Authorized by Act of Parliament holden in the 5th and 6th years of our said late Sovereign Lord King Edward VI. . . .
 (2) Be it therefore enacted [repeal of Mary's repealing Act] . . . (3) That all . . . Ministers in any Cathedral, or Parish-Church, or other place . . . shall from and after the Feast of the Nativity of Saint John Baptist next coming, be bounden to say and use the Mattens, Evensong, celebration of the Lords Supper, and administration of each of the Sacraments, and all other Common and open Prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the said Book, . . . with one alteration, or addition of certain Lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, and the form of the Letany altered, and corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the Sacrament to the Communicants, and none other, or otherwise: (4) and, That if any . . . Minister . . . refuse to use the said Common Prayers, or to minister the Sacraments . . . in such order and form, as they be mentioned, and set forth in the said Book, or shall wilfully . . . use any other Rite, Ceremony, Order, form, or manner of celebrating of the Lords Supper openly, or privily, or Mattens, Even song, administration of the Sacraments, or other open Prayers, than is mentioned, and set forth in the said Book,—Open Prayer in, and through this Act, is meant that Prayer, which is for other to come unto, or hear, either in Common Churches or private Chappels, or Oratories, commonly called the Service of the Church—or shall preach . . . or speak any thing in the derogation . . . of the said Book . . . and shall be thereof lawfully convicted, according to the Laws of this Realm, by verdict of twelve men, or by his own confession, or by the notorious evidence of the fact; shall . . . [forfeit one year's income and suffer 6 months' imprisonment for the first offence, see further Acts of Univ. . . . (5, 6.) Second and third convictions. (7, 8.) Penalties for first and second convictions of unbenefticed offenders imprisonment for one year, and for life. (9-13.) Penalties for lay depravers or hinderers.]

¹ The numbering of the sections is not from the official ed., but from the more convenient arrangement of Stephens, Eccles. Stat.

(14) and, That . . . all . . . persons . . . shall . . . having no lawful, or reasonable excuse to be absent, endeavour themselves to resort to their Parish-Church, or Chappel accustomed. . . . upon every Sunday, and other days ordained and used to be kept as holy days, and then, and there to abide orderly and soberly, during the time of Common Prayer, Preachings, or other Service of God there to be used and ministered, upon pain of punishment by the censures of the Church; and also upon pain, that every person so offending shall forfeit for every such offence twelve pence, to be levied by the Church-wardens of the Parish. . . . [(15-18.) Jurisdiction Eccles., civil, and conjoined. (19.) Books to be obtained. (20.) Limit of time for indictment. (21.) Third offence of a Peer to be judged by Peers. (22.) Mayors to have certain jurisdiction. (23.) Eccles. jurisdiction to carry penalties. (24.) No offence to be twice punished.]

(25.) Provided always, and be it Enacted, That such ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained, and be in use, as was in this Church of England by the Authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth, until other order shall be therein taken by Authority of the Queens Majesty, with the advice of Her Commissioners, appointed and Authorised under the great seal of England for causes Ecclesiastical, or of the Metropolitan of this Realm: (26) And also, That if there shall happen any contempt, or irreverence to be used in the Ceremonies, or Rites of the Church, by the misusing of the Orders appointed in this Book; the Queens Majesty may by the like advice of the said Commissioners, or Metropolitan, ordain and publish such further Ceremonies, or Rites, as may be most for the advancement of Gods glory, the edifying of his Church, and the due reverence of Christs holy Mysteries and Sacraments.

(27.) And be it further Enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That all Laws, Statutes, and Ordinances, wherein, or whereby any other Service, Administration of Sacraments, or Common Prayer is limited, established, so set forth to be used within this Realm, or any other the Queens Dominions, and Countries, shall from henceforth utterly be void, and of none effect.¹

B1—The Preface.²

¹ The Act of Chas. II and the Edwardian Acts will be found digested under Acts of Uniformity.

² It adds Prefixed at the Revision of 1662, and prints in full, after a new Pref. justifying the Revision and explaining serialism the reasons for altering or retaining the successive portions of the service. Cp. Irish PB.—Am. replaces by a new Preface summarised below.

B1¹—Principle and Practice of Revision. It hath been the Wisdom of the Church of England, ever since the first compiling of her Publick

17. Preface of 1662. Liturgy, to keep the Mean between the two Extreams, of too much Stiffness in refusing, and of too much Easiness in admitting any variation from it. For, as on the one side common Experience sheweth, that where a change hath been made of things advisedly established (no evident necessity so requiring) sundry inconveniences have thereupon ensued; and those many times more, and greater than the evils, that were intended to be remedied by such change: So on the other side, the particular Forms of Divine Worship, and the Rites, and Ceremonies appointed to be used therein, being things in their own nature Indifferent, and alterable, and so acknowledged; it is but reasonable, that upon weighty and important considerations, according to the various exigency of times and occasions, such changes and alterations should be made therein, as to those that are in place of Authority should from time to time seem either necessary or expedient. Accordingly we find, that in the Reigns of several Princes of blessed memory since the Reformation, the Church upon just and weighty considerations her thereunto moving, hath yielded to make such alterations in some particulars, as in their respective times were thought convenient: Yet so, as that the main Body and Essentials of it (as well in the chiefest materials, as in the frame and order thereof) have still continued the same unto this day, and do yet stand firm and unshaken, notwithstanding all the vain attempts and impetuous assaults made against it by such men as are given to change, and have always discovered a greater regard to their own private fancies and interests, than to that duty they owe to the publick.

B1²—Puritan demands. By what undue means, and for what mischievous purposes the use of the Liturgy (though enjoined by the Laws of the Land, and those Laws never yet repealed) came, during the late unhappy confusions, to be discontinued, is too well known to the World, and we are not willing here to remember. But when, upon His Majesties happy Restauration it seemed probable, that, amongst other things, the use of the Liturgy also would return of course (the same having never been legally abolished) unless some timely means were used to prevent it; those men who under the late usurped powers had made it a great part of their business to render the people disaffected thereunto, saw themselves in point of reputation and interest concerned (unless they would freely acknowledge themselves to have erred, which such men are very hardly brought to do) with their utmost endeavours to hinder the restitution thereof. In order whereunto divers Pamphlets were published against the Book of Common Prayer, the old Objections mustered up, with the addition of some new ones more than formerly had been made, to make the number swell. In fine great importunities were used to His Sacred Majesty, that the said Book might be Revised, and such Alterations therein, and Additions thereunto made, as should be thought requisite for the ease of tender Consciences: Whereunto His Majesty out of His pious Inclination to give satisfaction (so far as could be reasonably expected) to all His Subjects of what perswasion soever, did graciously condescend.

B1³—Moderation of Revisers. In which Review we have endeavoured to observe the like Moderation, as we finde to have been used in the like case in former times. And therefore of the sundry Alterations proposed unto us, we have rejected all such as were either of dangerous consequence (as secretly striking at some established Doctrine, or laudable Practise of the Church of England, or indeed of the whole Catholick Church of Christ) or else of no consequence at all, but utterly frivolous and vain. But such Alterations as were tendred to us (by what persons, under what pretenses, or to what purpose soever so tendred) as seemed to us in any degree requisite or expedient, we have willingly, and of our own accord assented unto: Not enforced so to do by any strength of Argument, convincing us of the necessity of making the said alterations: For we are fully perswaded in our judgments (and we here profess it to the World) that the Book, as it stood before established by Law, doth not contain in it any thing contrary to the Word of God, or to sound Doctrine, or which a godly man may not with a good Conscience use and submit unto, or which is not fairly defensible against any that shall oppose the same; if it shall be allowed such just and favourable construction as in Common Equity ought to be allowed to all Humane Writings, especially such as are set forth by Authority, and even to the very best Translation of the holy Scripture itself.

B1⁴—General and particular causes of Alterations. Our general aim therefore in this undertaking was, not to gratifie this or that party in any their unreasonable demands; but to do that, which to our best understanding we conceived might most tend to the preservation of Peace and Unity in the Church; the procuring of Reverence, and exciting of Piety, and Devotion in the Publick Worship of God; and the cutting off occasion from them that seek occasion of cavil, or quarrel against the Liturgy of the Church. And as to the several variations from the former Book, whether by Alteration, Addition, or otherwise, it shall suffice to give this general account, That most of the Alterations were made, either first, for the better direction of them that are to officiate in any part of Divine Service; which is chiefly done in the Calendars and Rubricks: Or secondly, for the more proper expressing of some words or phrases of ancient usage in terms more suitable to the language of the present times, and the clearer explanation of some other words and phrases, that were either of doubtful signification, or otherwise liable to misconstruction: Or thirdly, for a more perfect rendring of such portions of holy Scripture, as are inserted into the Liturgy; which, in the Epistles and Gospels especially, and in sundry other places are now ordered to be read according to the last Translation: And that it was thought convenient, that some Prayers and Thanksgivings, fitted to special occasions, should be added in their due places; particularly for those at Sea, together with an Office for the Baptism of such as are of riper years; which, although not so necessary when the former Book was compiled, yet by the growth of Anabaptism, through the licentiousness of the late times crept in amongst us, is now become necessary, and may be always useful for the Baptising of Natives in our Plantations, and others converted to the Faith. If any man, who shall desire a more particular account of the several Alterations in any part of the Liturgy, shall take the pains to compare the present Book with the former; we doubt not but the reason of the change may easily appear.

B1⁵—Commendation of Book. And having thus endeavoured to discharge our duties in this weighty affair, as in the sight of God, and to approve our sincerity therein (so far as lay in us) to the consciences of all men; although we know it impossible (in such variety of apprehensions, humours, and interests, as are in the world) to please all; nor can expect that men of factious, peevish, and perverse spirits should be satisfied with anything that can be done in this kind by any other than themselves: Yet we have good hope, that what is here presented, and hath been by the Convocations of both Provinces with great diligence examined and approved, will be also well accepted and approved by all sober, peaceable, and truly conscientious sons of the Church of England.

[B1¹—American Preface. The Protestant Episcopal Ch. in the United States of America prefixed to the revised PB of 1789 a preface which was retained in 1892. After setting forth that it is an "invaluable part of that blessed liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, that in his worship different forms and usages may without offence be allowed, provided the substance of the Faith be kept entire; and that, in every Ch., what cannot be clearly determined to belong to doctrine must be referred to Discipline," it goes on to quote Pref.¹ in support of revision (see B1¹ above, "The particular forms of Divine worship. . . expedient"), and in description of the conservative character of the process (see same section). Next the Revisers quote the first sentence of B1⁴ and the last of B1³ for the aims of the revision and the general excellence of the existing PB. Then, after referring to the occasion offered by the Independence of America, and the need for modifying the prayers for civil Rulers, they add that "they could not but, with gratitude to God, embrace the happy occasion which was offered them (uninfluenced and unrestrained by any worldly authority whatsoever) to take a further review of the Public Service, and to establish such other alterations and amendments therein as might be deemed expedient." A caution is added that "this Ch. is far from intending to depart from the Ch. of Eng. in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship; or further than local circumstances require." Finally, they hope that all will receive and examine their work "with a meek, candid, and charitable frame of mind; without prejudice or prepossessions; seriously considering what Christianity is, and what the truths of the Gospel are; and earnestly beseeching Almighty God to accompany with his blessing every endeavour for promulgating them to mankind in the clearest, plainest, most affecting and majestic manner."]

B2¹ Concerning the Service of the Church.

B2¹—Aim of Common Prayer. "There was never any thing by the wit of man so well devised, or so sure established, which, in continuance of time, hath not been corrupted:

18. Original Preface.

As, among other things, it may plainly appear by the Common Prayers in the Church, commonly called Divine Service. The first original and ground whereof if a man would search out by the ancient Fathers, he shall find, that the same was not ordained, but of a good purpose, and for a great advancement of godliness. For they so ordered the matter, that all the whole Bible, (or the greatest part thereof) should be read over once every year; intending thereby, that the Clergy, and especially such as were Ministers in the Congregation, should (by often reading, and meditation in God's word) be stirred up to godliness themselves, and be more able to exhort others by wholesome doctrine, and to confute them that were Adversaries to the Truth; and further, that the people (by daily hearing of holy Scripture read in the Church) might continually profit more and more in the knowledge of God, and be the more inflamed with the love of his true Religion."

B2¹—Elaborations and corruptions. "But these many years passed, this godly and decent Order of the ancient Fathers, hath been so altered, broken, and neglected, by planting in uncertain Stories, and Legends, with multitude of Responds, Verses, vain Repetitions, Commemorations, and Synodals; that commonly, when any Book of the Bible was begun, after three or four Chapters were read out all the rest were unread. And in this sort the Book of Isaiah was begun in Advent, and the Book of Genesis in Septuagesima; but they were only begun, and never read through: After like sort were other Books of holy Scripture used. And moreover, whereas St. Paul would have such language spoken to the people in the Church, as they might understand, and have profit by hearing the same; The Service in this Church of England these many years, hath been read in Latin to the people, which they understand not; so that they have heard with their ears only, and their heart, spirit, and mind have not been edified thereby. And furthermore, notwithstanding that the ancient Fathers have divided the Psalms into seven Portions, whereof every one was called a Nocturn: Now of late time, a few of them have been daily said, and the rest utterly omitted. Moreover, the number and hardness of the Rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the Service was the cause, that to turn the Book only was so hard and intricate a matter, that many times there was more business to find out what should be read, than to read it when it was found out."

¹ "The Preface." Ir. prefixes The Original Preface (1549). Altered in 1552 and 1662. Am. keeps the heading but omits all the old text, replacing it with directions generally equivalent to those specified under B2⁹ n. 4 and B1¹ n. 3.

B2¹—Revised Order. "These inconveniences therefore considered, here is set forth such an Order, whereby the same shall be redressed. And for a readiness in this matter, here is drawn out a Calendar for that purpose, which is plain and easie to be understood; wherein (so much as may be) the reading of holy Scripture is so set forth, that all things shall be done in order, without breaking one piece from another. For this cause be cut off Anthems, Responds, Invitatories, and such like things as did break the continual course of the reading of the Scripture."

B2¹—Rules few and easy. "Yet, because there is no remedy, but that of necessity there must be some Rules; therefore certain Rules are here set forth; which, as they are few in number, so they are plain and easie to be understood. So that here you have an Order for Prayer, and for the reading of the holy Scripture, much agreeable to the mind and purpose of the old Fathers, and a great deal more profitable and commodious, than that which of late was used. It is more profitable, because here are left out many things, whereof some are untrue, some uncertain, some vain and superstitious; and nothing is ordained to be read, but the very pure Word of God, the holy Scriptures, or that which is agreeable to the same; and that in such a language and order, as is most easie and plain for the understanding both of the readers and hearers. It is also more commodious, both for the shortness thereof, and for the plainness of the Order, and for that the Rules be few and easie."¹

B2¹—One Use for the Realm. "And whereas heretofore there hath been great diversity in saying and singing in Churches within this Realm; some following Salisbury Use, some Hereford Use, and some the Use of Bangor, some of York, some of Lincoln; now from henceforth all the whole Realm shall have but one Use."²

¹ "Furthermore, by this order, the curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book and the Bible: by the means whereof, the people shall not be at so great charge for books, as in time past they have been."

² Need for careful reading (par. omitted in 1662). "And if any would judge this way more painful, because that all things must be read upon the book, whereas before, by the reason of so often repetition, they could say many things by heart: if those men will weigh their labour with the profit and knowledge, which daily they shall obtain by reading upon the book, they will not refuse the pain, in consideration of the great profit that shall ensue thereof."

B2⁴—Provision for diversity or doubts. "And for as much, as nothing can be so plainly set forth, but doubts may arise in the use and practise of the same; to appease all such diversity (if any arise) and for the resolution of all doubts, concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this Book; the parties that so doubt, or diversly take any thing, shall always resort to the Bishop of the Diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same; so that the same order be not contrary to any thing contained in this Book." "And if the Bishop of the Diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop."

¹ "almost"

B2¹—*Leave for other languages in private use.*¹ "Though it be appointed, That all things shall be read and sung in the Church in the English tongue, to the end, that the Congregation may be thereby edified; yet it is not meant, but that when men say Morning and Evening Prayer privately, they may say the same in any language that they themselves do understand."²

B2²—Daily recitation.—"And all Priests and Deacons" are "to say daily the Morning and Evening Prayer, either privately or openly,"³ not being let by sickness, or "some other urgent cause."

¹ "Neither that any man shall be bound to the saying of them, but such as from time to time, in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, Parish Churches, and Chapels to the same annexed, shall serve the congregation." ² "shall be bound" ³ "except they be letted by preaching, studying of divinity, or by]"

B2³—Public ministration. "And the Curate that ministrereth in every Parish-Church or Chappel, being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably" ¹ hindered, "shall say the same in the Parish-Church or Chappel where he ministrereth, and shall" ² cause a Bell to be tolled thereunto "a convenient time before he begin, that" ³ the people "may come to hear Gods Word, and to pray with him."⁴

¹ "letted" ² "toll a bell thereto" ³ "such as be disposed" ⁴ The Act of Unif. Amendment Act, 1872, qualified B2³ as specified below under D1¹ n. 3. It also sanctions, where the prescribed services for the day are duly performed, an additional form of service varying from any form prescribed by the PB; but all except Anthems and Hymns must be taken from the Bible or PB, the Order for HC not being available for selection; and the form of service and the mode in which it is used must be approved by the Ordinary. The Act also declares and enacts that MP, BP, Lit. and HC may all be used as separate services; that the Lit. may be used alternatively or additionally at EP; that a sermon or lecture may accompany any of these; and that a separate sermon or lecture need only be prefaced by the Bidding Pr. or a Collect. Am., in addition to directions equivalent to the above, gives the Bp. power to set forth and require special forms for Days of Fasting and Thanksgiving, etc. Ir., in addition to such directions as above, provides that whenever it is found that the use of all the prescribed services in any ch. upon Sundays and holy-days is attended with serious inconvenience, the Ordinary shall have power to dispense with one or more of them. Cp. also the 1549 rules, D⁶,⁷ below, and see further B5 and D1¹ n. 3.]

¹ "Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained."

[¹ Ir. Concerning Ceremonies (1549) [Text in full]. Am. om.]

B3¹—Ceremonies classified. "Of such Ceremonies as be used in the Church, and have had their beginning by the institution of man, some at the first were of godly intent and purpose devised, and yet at length turned to vanity and superstition: Some entered into the Church by indiscreet devotion, and such a zeal as was without knowledge; and for because they were winked at in the beginning, they grew daily to more and more abuses, which not only for their unprofitableness, but also because they have much blinded the people, and obscured the glory of God, are worthy to be cut away, and clean rejected: Other there be, which although they have been devised by man, yet it is thought good to reserve them still, as well for a decent order in the Church (for the which they were first devised) as because they pertain to edification, whereunto all things done in the Church (as the Apostle teacheth) ought to be referred."

[¹ B2¹,² are in roman type in the sealed books, the earlier parts being italic.]

[² Ir. provides for public use at the discretion of the Min. and with the consent of the ordinary. . . in Irish or any other language that is better understood by the people.]

B3²—Church Authority. "And although the keeping or omitting of a Ceremony, in itself considered, is but a small thing; yet the wilful and contemptuous transgression and breaking of a common order and discipline, is no small offence before God. Let all things be done among you, saith St. Paul, in a seemly and due order; The appointment of the which order pertaineth not to private men; therefore no man ought to take in hand, nor presume to appoint or alter any publick or common Order in Christs Church, except he be lawfully called and authorized thereunto."

B3³—Party feeling. "And whereas in this our time, the mindes of men are so divers, that something it a great matter of conscience to depart from a piece of the least of their Ceremonies, they be so addicted to their old customs; and again on the other side, some be so new-fangled, that they would innovate all things, and so despise the old, that nothing can like them, but that is new: It was thought expedient not so much to have respect how to please and satisfy either of these parties, as how to please God, and profit them both. And yet lest any man should be offended, whom good reason might satisfie, here be certain causes readred, why some of the accustomed Ceremonies be put away, and some retained and kept still."

B3⁴—Tests of Ceremonies. "Some are put away, because the great excess and multitude of them hath so increased in these latter days, that the burthen of them was intolerable; whereof St. Augustine in his time complained, that they were grown to such a number, that the estate of Christian people was in worse case concerning that matter, than were the Jews. And he counselled, that such yoke and burthen should be taken away, as time would serve quietly to do it. But what would St. Augustine have said, if he had seen the Ceremonies of late days used among us; whereunto the multitude used in his time was not to be compared? This our excessive multitude of Ceremonies was so great, and many of them so dark that they did more confound and darken, than declare and set forth Christs benefits unto us. And besides this, Christs Gospel is not a Ceremonial Law (as much of Moses Law was), but it is a Religion to serve God, not in bondage of the figure or shadow, but in the freedom of the spirit; being content only with those Ceremonies which do serve to a decent Order, and godly Discipline, and such as be apt to stir up the dull minde of man to the remembrance of his duty to God, by some notable and special signification, whereby he might be edified. Furthermore, the most weighty cause of the abolishment of certain Ceremonies was, That they were so far abused; partly by the superstitious blindness of the rude and unlearned, and partly by the unsatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre, than the glory of God, that the abuses could not well be taken away, the thing remaining still."

B3⁵—Use and local prescription of ceremonies "But now as concerning those persons, which peradventure will be offended, for that some of the old Ceremonies are retained still: If they consider, that without some Ceremonies it is not possible to keep any Order, or quiet Discipline in the Church they shall easily perceive just cause to reform their judgments. And if they think much, that any of the old do remain, and would rather have all devised anew: Then such men granting some Ceremonies convenient to be had, surely where the old may be well used, there they cannot reasonably reprove the old only for their age, without bewraying of their own folly. For in such a case they ought rather to have reverence unto them for their antiquity, if they will declare themselves to be more studious of unity and concord, than of innovations and new-fangleness, which (as much as may be with true setting forth of Christs Religion) is always to be eschewed. Furthermore, such shall have no just cause with the Ceremonies reserved to be offended. For as those be taken away which were most abused, and did burden mens consciences without any cause; so the other that remain, are retained for a Discipline and Order, which (upon just causes) may be altered and changed, and therefore are not to be esteemed equal with Gods Law. And moreover, they be neither dark nor dumb Ceremonies, but are so set forth, that every man may understand what they do mean, and to what use they do serve. So that it is not like that they in time to come should be abused as other have been. And in these our doings we condemn no other Nations, nor prescribe any thing but to our own people only: For we think it convenient, that every Countrey should use such Ceremonies as they shall think best to the setting forth of Gods honour and glory, and to the reducing of the people to a most perfect and godly living, without error or superstition; and that they should put away other things, which from time to time they perceive to be most abused, as in mens ordinances it often chanceth diversly in divers Countreys."

B4¹—"The Order How the Psalter is appointed to be read."

B4¹—"The Psalter shall be read through once every month," as it is there appointed, both for M and EP. ¹But in ^{20. Psalter} ^{Cycle.} February it shall be read only to the 28th, or 29th day of the month.

[1 Add "The Table and Calendar, expressing the Order of the Pss. and Lessons, to be said at "' Matins and Evensong' ['M & EP'] " throughout the year, except certain proper feasts, as the rules following more plainly declare." 2 (A more clumsy arrangement obtained before 1662, reckoning Jan. 31 and Mar. 1 with Feb.) Am. om.]

B4²—"And, ¹whereas" January, March, May, July, August, October, and December have One and thirty days apiece; ¹ It is ordered, that the same Pss. shall be read the last day of the said months, which ²were read³ the day before: ³ So that the Psalter may begin again the first day of the next month ensuing."

[1 Am. (cp. Ir.) when a month hath 31 days 2 Am. are appointed for 3 Am. om. 4 (A double ref. to the Cal. and Table of Pss. came here before 1662). Am. om. the rest, but adds, The Min. shall, on the days for which they are appointed, use the Proper Pss., as set forth in the Table of Proper Pss. But Note, that, on other days, instead of reading from the Psalter as divided for Daily M and EP, he may read one of the Selections set out by this Church. Table of Selections of Pss.—(1) Pss. 1, 15, 91. (2) 4, 31, 17, 91, 134. (3) 19, 24, 103. (4) 23, 34, 65. (5) 26, 43, 141. (6) 32, 130, 121. (7) 37. (8) 51, 42. (9) 72, 96. (10) 77. (11) 80, 81. (12) 84, 122, 134. (13) 85, 93, 97. (14) 102. (15) 107. (16) 118. (17) 123, 124, 125. (18) 139, 145. (19) 147. (20) 148, 149, 150.

B4³—"And where" 'as' "the CXIX Ps. is divided into 22 Portions, and is overlong to be read at one time; It is so ordered, that at one time shall not be read above four or five of the said Portions."

[1 Ir. om. B4³ but retains B4⁴ placing all before the Psalter.]

B4⁴—"And at the end of every Ps., and of every such part of the CXIX Ps. shall be repeated this Hymn, Gloria be to the Father, and to the Son: and to the Holy Ghost: As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

B4⁵—"Note, that the Psalter followeth the Division of the Hebrews, and the Translation of "the Great English Bible," set forth and used in the time of King Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth."³

[1 (Before 1662 the corresponding note merely called attention to the variant numbering of the Pss.) 2 The 1871 Lectiary and Ir. add, Upon occasions to be approved by the Ordinary, other Pss. may, with his consent, be substituted for those appointed in the Psalter 3 'A' ('The') "Table for the Order of the Pss. to be said at "' Matins and Evensong" ('M and EP'). This was needed when the Psalter was not printed with the PB.

B5—"The Order How the rest of Holy Scripture¹ is appointed to be read.

[1 "beside the Psalter"]

B5¹—"The Old Testament is appointed for the first Lessons¹ at "' Morning and Evening Prayer"; ² so as the most part thereof will be read every year once, as in the Calendar is appointed.

[1 Am. and the NT for the 2nd Lessons at M and EP throughout the year. 2 Matins and Evensong 3 "and shall be read through every year once, except certain books and chapters, which be least edifying, and might best be spared, and therefore are left unread."]

B5²—"The New Testament is appointed for the second Lessons at "' Morning and Evening Prayer," and shall be read over orderly every year ¹ thrice, besides the Epistles and Gospels; Except the Apocalypse, out of which there are only certain proper Lessons appointed upon divers Feasts."

[1 The 1871 Lectiary twice; Ir. as appointed in the Table of Lessons. (Ends.)]

B5³—"And to know what Lessons shall be read every day, ¹ look for the day of the month in the Calendar following, and there ye shall ² find the Chapters that shall be read for the Lessons both at "' Morning and Evening Prayer"; Except only the Movable Feasts which are not in the Calendar, and the Immoveable, where there is a blank left in the Column of Lessons; the proper Lessons for all which days are to be found in the Table of proper Lessons.²

[1 "find" 2 "perceive the books and" 31871 Lectiary and Ir. add. If EP be said at two different times in the same place of worship on any Sunday (except a Sunday for which alternative 2nd Lessons are specially appointed in the Table), the 2nd Lesson at the second time may, at the discretion of the Min., be any chap. from the four Gospels, or any lesson appointed in the Table of Lessons from the four Gospels. Upon occasions to be approved by the ordinary, other lessons from the Canonical Scriptures may, with his consent, be substituted for those which are appointed in the Calendar. (Ir. also provides that the Sunday lessons on Adv. Sunday, Easter Day, Whitsunday, or Trinity Sunday shall displace the Proper Lessons of any coincident holy-day, but on other Sundays shall be alternatives.)]

B5—"And" 1 note. "that whensoever proper Psalms or Lessons are appointed²; then the Psalms and Lessons" of ordinary course "appointed in the" Psalter and "Calendar" (if they be different) "shall be omitted for that time."

[1 "here is to be noted" 2 "for any feast, moveable or immoveable"]

B5—"Note also, that the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel appointed for the Sunday shall serve all the week after,"² where it is not in this Book otherwise ordered.³

[1 "Ye must" Am. and Ir. place this note before Collects, see c3 n. 4 2 "except there fall some feast that hath his proper." (Two sentences about Leap Year and the beginning of chapters stood here till 1662.)]

c1—"¶ 1 Proper Lessons to be read at Morning and Evening Prayer on the Sundays, and other Holidays throughout the year. ¶ Lessons proper for Sundays. Sundays of Advent. Mattins. Evensong. . . ."

22. Proper Lessons and Psalms.

[1 (Title mainly from Elizabethan lectionary.) 'Proper Pss. and Lessons for divers feasts and days at M and EP' (only greater Sundays and holy-days).]

c1—"¶ Lessons proper for Holidays. S. Andrew. Mattins. Evensong. . . ."

c1—"¶ Proper Psalms on certain days. ¶ Christmas-day. Mattins. Evensong. . . ."

c2—"Tables and Rules for the Movable, and Immoveable Feasts; Together with the days of Fasting and Abstinence, through the whole year."

23. Calendar
Tables.

c2—"Rules to know when the Movable Feasts, and Holidays begin."

Easter-day (on which the rest depend) is always the first Sunday after the first full Moon, which happens next after the One and twentieth day of March. And, if the Full Moon happens upon a Sunday, Easter-day is the Sunday after. Advent-Sunday is always the nearest Sunday to the Feast of S. Andrew, whether before or after. Septuagesima Sunday is Nine, Sexagesima Eight, Quinquagesima Seven, Quadragesima Six, weeks before Easter. Rogation-Sunday is Five weeks, Ascension-day Forty days, Whitsunday Seven weeks, Trinity-Sunday Eight weeks, after Easter.

c2—"A Table of all the Feasts that are to be observed in the Church of England through the year.

All Sundays in the year.—The Circumcision of our Lord JESUS CHRIST; The Epiphany; [and all Red-Letter days: list not reprinted here].

C2—"A Table of the Vigils, Fasts, and days of Abstinence, to be observed in the year."

The Evens or Vigils before The Nativity of our Lord, The Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, The Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin, Easter-day, Ascension-day, Pentecost, S. Matthias, S. John Baptist, S. Peter, S. James, S. Bartholomew, S. Matthew, S. Simon and S. Jude, S. Andrew, S. Thomas, All Saints.—Note, that if any of these Feast-days fall upon a Munday, then the Vigil or Fast-day shall be kept upon the Sat., and not upon the Sunday next before it.²

² Days of Fasting⁴ or Abstinence.—I. The Forty days of Lent. II. The Ember-days at the four Seasons, being the Wed., Fri., and Sat. after the First Sunday in Lent, the Feast of Pentecost, September 14, December 13. III. The three Rogation-days, being the Munday, Tues., and Wed. before Holy Thursday, or the Ascension of our Lord. IV. All the Fridays in the year, except Christmas-day.

[1 Am. replaces this paragraph by A Table of Fasts: Ash-Wednesday; Good Friday. 2 Ir. adds, The Abps. and Bps. may appoint Days of Humiliation and Days of Thanksgiving, to be observed by the Ch. of Ireland; and may prescribe special services for the same. 3 Am. prefixes Other 4 Am. on which the Ch. requires such a measure of Abstinence as is more especially suited to extraordinary acts and exercises of devotion.]

c2—" [A] Certain Solemn day[s], for which [a] particular Service[s] are [is] appointed.¹ 1. The Fifth day of November, being the day of the Papists Conspiracy. 2. The Thirtieth day of January, being the day of the Martyrdom of King Charles the First. 3. The Nine and twentieth day of May, being the day of the Birth and Return of King Charles the Second."

[1 (These three were discontinued by Royal Proclamation in 1800, and their place is taken by the Accession Day of the reigning Sovereign.) Insert, The eleventh day of May, being the day on which his Majesty began his happy reign.]

c3.—Five Tables to find Easter; c4.—Three Tables to find the Sunday Letter or Golden Number; c5.—The Calendar¹, with the table of Lessons. [See further, for c3-5, CALENDAR, LECTONARY. Note printers' customary but unauthorised omission of the three Red-letter Days, K. Charles Martyr, K. Charles II Nat. and Red., and Papists' Conspiracy.]

p¹—"The order¹ for 'Morning and Evening Prayer'² daily to be said and used throughout the year.³

[1 'Where' 2 'shall be used and said.' 3 In 1552 D¹⁻³ came after D1¹: in 1559 they were removed, altered, and prominently placed before D1¹ by the Queen or Privy Council without warrant from the Act (cp. HISTORY OF PB, § 13). Am. om. D¹⁻³.]

D¹—"The Morning and Evening Prayer shall be used in' 1559 the accustomed 'place of the Church, Chappel, or Chancel'²; 1559 Except it shall be otherwise determined by the Ordinary of the place. 'And the Chancels shall remain³ as they have done in times past'.

[1 'such' (Text as altered in 1559 printed PBs without statutory authority) 2', and the Min. shall so turn him, as the people may best hear. And if there be any controversy therein, the matter shall be referred to the ordinary, and he or his deputy shall appoint the place, and' (Text as under n. 1) 3 'remain, as']

D²—'And here is to be noted, that' 1² such-Ornaments-of-the-Church-and-of-the-Ministers-thereof at all times of their Ministration, shall-be-retained-and-be-in-use,-as were -in- this Church-of-England,-by the Authority-of-Parliament, -in -the -second -year -of -the-Reign-of-King-Edward-the-Sixth.³

[1 'the Min. at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministrations, shall use neither alb, vestment, nor cope, but being Abp., or Bp., he shall have and wear a rochet; and being a Priest or Deacon, he shall have and wear a surplice only.' 1559 (cp. D¹ n. 3) 'the Min. at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministration, shall use' such ornaments in the Ch. as were in use by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI, according to the Act of Parliament set in the beginning of this book." (Cp. 1 Eliz. c. 2 s. 25: Provided always, and be it enacted, that such ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use, as was in the Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI., until other order shall be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's Majesty, with the advice of the Commissioners appointed and authorised under the Great Seal of England, for causes ecclesiastical, or of the Metropolitan.) 2 Words hyphenated are quoted from the proviso given in the last note. 3 The 1552 rubric replaced the rubric of 1549 placed at the end of the book (followed by D⁴⁻⁷) under the title 'Certain Notes for the more plain explication and decent ministration of things contained in this book:—In the saying or singing of matins and evensong, baptising and burying, the Min. in parish churches or chapels annexed to the same shall use a surplice. And in all cathedral churches and colleges the Archdeacons, Dean Provosts, Masters, Prebendaries and Fellows, being graduates, may use in the quire beside their surplices such hood as pertaineth to their several degrees which they have taken in any university within this realm. But in all other places every Min. shall be at liberty to use any surplice or no. It is also seemly that graduates, when they do preach, shall use such hoods as pertaineth to their several degrees.' Cp. also for 1549 rules for ministerial dress H⁴ n., H⁵ 1 n.]

D⁴—1549 only. ¶ 'And whensoever the Bp. shall celebrate the HC in the Ch., or execute any other public ministration, he shall have upon him, beside his rochet, a surplice or alb, and a cope or vestment, and also his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or holden by his Chaplain.' Cp. § 81 n.

D⁵—1549 only. ¶ 'As touching kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures: they may be used or left as every man's devotion serveth without blame.'

D⁶—1549 only. ¶ 'also upon Christmas Day, Easter Day, the Ascension day, Whitsunday, and the feast of the Trinity, may be used any part of Holy Scripture hereafter to be certainly limited and appointed, in the stead of the Litany.'

(D⁷—1549 only. ¶ 'If there be a sermon, or for any greater cause, the Curate by his discretion may leave out the Lit., Gloria in excelsis, the Homily, and the exh. to the communion.')

D¹—The "Order for" 1² 'MORNING PRAYER,' "Daily through" 'out' "the Year."³

[1 "An" 2 'Matins' Am. daily MP. 3 (The ensuing Order is modified by the Act of Unif. Amendment Act, 1872, in the following manner. Leave is given at all additional services, and in churches other than Cath. and Collegiate churches, on any weekday except Christmas Day, Ash-Wed., Good Friday, and Ascension Day, to omit any or all of the portions next specified:—Exh., Venite, all Pss. but one, either Lesson (unless Proper), either Canticle or alternative, Lesser Lit. and Lord's Pr., any or all prs. aft. 3rd Coll. except the last two. Also upon any special occasion approved by the ordinary there may be used in any cath. or ch. a special form of service [i.e., presumably a form of M or EP with varying lessons, pss., prs., etc.] approved by the ordinary, so that there be not introduced into such service anything, except anthems and hymns, which does not form part of the Holy Scriptures or PB.) Ir. contains similar provisions. Am. relaxes the actual rubrics, see below.]

¶ [The Order for MP] Here and onwards consult App. for relevant illustrative arts., as guided by the ref. mark of the paragraph.

D¹—¶ 'At the beginning' 1 of MP' 2 'the Min. shall read with a loud voice some one, or more of these Sentences of the 22. Mattins, 1. Scriptures, that follow. And then he shall say that which is written after the said Sentences.'³

[1 'both' 2', and likewise of Evening Prayer' 3 Am. has three different rubrics here. ¶ The Min. shall always begin the MP by reading one or more of the following sentences of Scripture. ¶ On any day not a Sunday, he may omit the Exh. following saying instead thereof, Let us humbly confess our sins to Almighty God, and may end the MP with the Collect for grace and 2 Cor. 14 14. ¶ On any day when the HC is immediately to follow, the Min. may, at his discretion, pass at once from the Sentences to the Lord's Pr., first pronouncing, The Lord be with you. Ans. And with thy spirit. Minister. Let us pray.]

¶ [At the beginning of MP.] The people, entering, shall make their humble adoration, and, then kneeling . . . say some short private prs.; and after, sit down (Cor. Service, 1911). The Ministers, duly vested (D²), and the choir, after vestry prs. (brief, said quietly rather than sung, and not anticipating Praise versicles), enter, for order's sake in informal procession (best not in step, and at a medium pace), while the organ plays, and pass severally to the accustomed place (D², cp. canon 14). The people usually rise, and the service begins with, or (perhaps better) without, some or all kneeling for further private pr. The singing of a processional or other opening hymn is a recent innovation. In any case, except perhaps on festivals, the words should fit the Sentences, etc., which follow (cp. HYMNS).

¶ [The Min.] who may be a DRACON (by 1662 Act of Unif. s. 18).

¶ [shall read] In Cath. and many other chs. it is usual to monotone, but the intention of the PB seems to be to use the speaking voice to end of 1st Lord's Pr. (PH, p. 213). Except at shortened MP in parish chs. on weekdays, the Min. and people stand.

¶ [with a loud voice] To arrest the people's attention. ¶ say] See § 87.

Dr¹—When the wicked man turneth away. . . .

[1 (In 1552 taken from Great Bible, replaced in 1662 by AV. Am. prefixes 16 sentences proper to the Seasons, and so gives up the uniform penitential note.)]

¶ When the wicked man] The choice of the Sentence may vary with the day or season. Those which address the people, and can, therefore, be said facing them, are suitable to a full ch. (e.g., Adv. 8; Lent 1, 5, 9; other Suns., 6, 11). At shortened weekday MEP, one of the others can be said kneeling.

Dr¹—Dearly beloved brethren, the Scripture'

[1 Am. prefixes: ¶ Then the Min. shall say.]

¶ Dearly beloved. . .] For lawful omission, see Dr¹ n. 3. Sometimes shortened (without statutory sanction) by using only 1st and last clauses. Should be said facing the people.

Dr¹—¶ A general Confession to be said of the whole Congregation after the Minister, all 'kneeling.' 'Almighty, and most merciful Father. . . .

[1 Am. To be said by]

¶ after the Min.] Cp. § 88 for manner of repetition.

Dr¹—¶ 'The Absolution' or Remission of sins 'to be pronounced by the 'Priest 'alone,' standing; the people still kneeling. 'Almighty God, the Father of our Lord. . . .

[1 Am. Declaration of 2 'Minister' 3 Am. Or this, [absol. from HC].]

¶ The Priest] The bps. forbid a DEACON to say this. ¶ standing and turning himself to the people (124).

Dr¹—¶ 'The people shall answer' here, and at the end of all other prayers, 'Amen.'

[1 Am. Every.]

D2—¶ 'Then the Minister' shall kneel, and say "the Lord's Prayer" with "an audible "voice"; the People 'also kneeling, and repeating it with him, both here, and where-soever else it is used in Divine Service. "Our Father. . . from evil": For thine is. . . the Glory, For ever and ever. "Amen."

¶ Then likewise he shall say, O Lord, open. . . Ans.: And our mouth. . . Priest. O God, make speed to save "us." Ans.

26. Mattins. ¶ Praise. O Lord, make haste to help "us."

¶ Here all standing up, the "Priest" shall say, "Glory be. . . Ans. As it was. . . Priest. "Praise ye the Lord." Ans. The Lord's name be praised.

[1 'The Priest being in the quire shall begin' 2 'Shall' 3 'called the Pater Noster' 4 "a loud" Am. om., with—voice 5 Am. still 6 Am. om. Priest—help us. 7 'me' 8 'And from Easter to Trinity Sunday, Alleluia.'

¶ an audible voice] The change from "loud" (necessary in 1549, as the Lord's Pr. began the service) to audible would favour the Lord's Pr. being said quietly (and, if monotoned, on a low note without organ) as part of the Preparation; but see COMMON PR., § 4.

¶ O Lord, open. . .] The musical part of the service begins here when MP is sung, and the ORGAN may give the note, and accompany the responses if desired.

¶ Praise ye the Lord]. Said facing the people.

D2—¶ 'Then shall be said, or sung 'this Psalm "following': Except on Easter day, upon which another Anthem is appointed: and on the Nineteenth day of every month it is not to be read here, but in the ordinary course of the Psalms. "Venite, exultemus Domino.

Psal. 95. O come, let us sing unto the Lord: let us. . . .

¶ Then shall follow "the "Psalms in order as they be appointed." And at the end of every Psalm "throughout the year, and likewise in the end of "Benedicite, Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis, shall be repeated, Glory be. . . . Ans.: As it was. . . .

[1 'without any Invitatory' Am. the following Anthem [Pss. 95 1-7, 96 9, 13]; except on those days for which other Anthems are appointed, and except also when it is used in the course of the Pss., on the 19th day of the month. 2 "certain" Am., a portion of the Pss. as they are appointed, or one of the Selections of Pss. 3 "in a table made for that purpose, except there be Proper Pss. appointed for that day." 4 Am. om.—year. 5 Am., the Venite, 6 Am. Jubilate, may be, and at the end of the whole Portion, or Selection from the Psalter, shall be sung or said the Gloria Patri. 7 Am. ¶ At the end of the whole portion of the Pss. or Selection from the Psalter, the Gloria in excelsis may be sung or said instead of the Gloria Patri.]

¶ Then shall be said or sung] (For leave to omit Venite or Pss. on weekdays, see Dr¹ n. 3.) No method is prescribed. Min. and clerk or people may read or monotone verses or half-verses in turn (the colon, in any case, by old usage, being marked by a pause), or a choir may lead the singing, all singing all, or the sides alternating by verses or half-verses (cp. ANTIPHONAL SINGING; § 87).

¶ Then shall follow the Pss.] A hymn seems excluded here, though recommended by some writers. All but Ps. 136 are best said or sung (as above) by half-verses, to fit the Hebrew parallelism.

¶ And at the end of every Pr. and of every part of the. . . cxix. Pr. (124). The insertion of "Ans." in Gloria Patri suggests that it should always be taken responsively, and when so taken the Min. usually begins it, if said.

D2—¶ 'Then shall be read 'distinctly with' "an audible "voice" the First' Lesson, "taken out "of the Old Testament," "as is "appointed" "in "the Calendar, (except there be proper Lessons assigned for that day:)" "He, "that readeth," "so "standing, and turning him"self, "as he may best be heard of all such as are present." "And "after "that, "shall "be said, or sung "in English" the Hymn, called "Te Deum Laudamus, daily throughout the year."

¶ Note that "before every Lesson the Min. shall say," "Here beginneth such a Chapter, or Verse of such a Chapter of such a Book: And after every Lesson, Here endeth the First, or the Second Lesson.

[1 "two lessons" Am. om.—voice 2 "a loud" 3 "that the people may hear"; 1r. by the Min. or other fit person appointed by him. 4 Am. acc. to the Table or Calendar. 5 "the second of the New, like as they be" 6 "by" 7 "the Min." 8 "the lesson" 9 "so" 10 Am. After which shall be said or sung the following Hymn. 11 "the first lesson" 12 "follow" 13 "except in Lent, all the which time in the place of Te Deum shall be used Benedicite omnia Opera Domini Domino, in English as followeth." 14 "And" 15 "thus. The 1st, 2nd, 3rd, or 4th chap. of Gen. or Ex., Matt., Mk., or other like as is appointed in the Calendar. And in the end of every chap., he shall say, Here endeth such a chap. of such a book. And (to the end the people may the better hear) in such places where they do sing, there shall the lessons be sung in a plain tune after the manner of distinct reading: and likewise the Epistle and Gospel."]

¶ Then shall be read] The use of the RV has episcopal approval, and is increasingly common. For certain lessons (e.g., 1st at MP on Christmas Day) it is very desirable to use it. The movement of the reader to the lectern (in Cath. chs. a formal procession) is a subsidiary ceremony not required by the rubric, but agreeable with it, and is sanctioned by unbroken custom.

¶ So standing] in such a place, and turning himself, as he may best be heard of all such as are present. The people, by a like obviously convenient custom, sit.

¶ He that readeth] may be a layman, who must be invited by the Min., and may be licensed by the bp. as a READER (cp. CLERK, § 1. ii). Whether ordained or not, he should be proficient, if not specially trained, in READING. (For leave to omit, cp. D1¹, n. 3.)

¶ Here beginneth] The formula should be strictly followed, and the titles of books cited as in both AV and RV. The direction in n. 15 being now omitted, it is doubtful if the practice of singing Scripture lections is lawful anywhere.

D2⁴—¶ Te Deum Laudamus. ¹ We praise thee, O God : we acknowledge. . . ²

¹ Till 1662 there were no colons. ² Am. v. 12a adorable : v. 16b thou didst humble thyself to be born of a Virgin.

¶ Te Deum] should be said or sung, if antiphonally, by whole verses (cp. n. 1 above). For leave to omit, see D1¹, n. 3.

D2⁵—¶ 'Or this Canticle, 'Benedicite, omnia Opera.' ¹ "O all ye Works of the Lord," ² 'bless ye 'the Lord : praise him, and 'magnify him 'for ever.' ³

[¹ "Domini Domino" Am., Domini ² 'speak good of' ³ 'set him up' ⁴ Ir. Or this Ps., Laudate Dominum, Psalm 148.]

¶ Or this Canticle] On this option, see BENEDICTUS, § 3, and COMMON PR., § 4 d; and so for Jubilate.

D2⁶—¶ Then shall be read in like manner the Second Lesson, taken out of the New Testament. ¹ 'And after 'that, 'the Hymn following 'except when that shall happen to be read in the 'Chapter for the day, or for the Gospel on St. John Baptist's day.

[¹ Am. acc. to the Table or Calendar. ² "the 2nd Lesson" ³ 'throughout the whole year, shall be used' 'shall be used and said'; Am. shall be sung or said ⁴ "Benedictus" 'Dominus Deus Israel, etc.' "in English, as followeth:" ⁵ Am. but Note, That, save on the Sundays in Advent, the latter portion [vv. 5-12] may be omitted. ⁶ Ir. Lesson.]

¶ in like manner] If the lessons are read by different Mins., the 2nd is usually assigned to the higher in rank or senior.

¶ And after that] See Banns, § 2, for publication. Bapt. may be administered here, 1st.

¶ except when] The wording is clumsy, but is probably not intended to restrict the option as to Jubilate.

D2⁷—¹ Benedictus "S. Luke 1 68. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel : for he hath visited, and redeemed his people ; And hath 'raised up a mighty salvation for 'us. . ."

[¹ In two eds., 'The Song of Zachary ; Benedictus : and Thanksgiving for the performance of God's promises.' ² 'lifted up an horn of salvation to' : also in vv. 5, 6, 'fathers' 'father']

¶ Benedictus] For leave to omit, see D1¹ n. 3; and for option, cp. COMMON PR., § 4 d.

D2⁸—¶ 'Or 'this Psalm, Jubilate' Deo. ¹ O be joyful in the Lord all ye lands :

[¹ 'the c' ² Not printed here till 1559.]

D2⁹—¶ 'Then shall be 'sung, or 'said the 'Apostles' Creed by the Min., and the people standing.' ² Except only such daies as the Creed of St. Athanasius is appointed to be read. 'I Believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth : . . .

[¹ Am. om. sung or ² Am. And any churches may, instead of the words, He descended into hell, use the words, He went into the place of departed spirits, which are considered as words of the same meaning in the Creed. Am. and Ir. om. Except. . . read. ³ Am. ¶ Or this [Nicene Creed]. (For 1549 use see D3¹ n. 7).]

¶ Then shall be . . .] In some chs. the liberty is taken of proceeding at this point to HC. on Sun. mornings, on the ground that Creed, Lord's Pr., and Coll. have their equivalents there, and that hurrying is thus more easily avoided.

¶ sung or said, cp. § 87.

¶ by the Min. and the people, cp. § 88.

¶ the Creed of St. Ath.] In not a few chs. the Am. and Ir. use of omitting QV. is followed without authority, sometimes with Trin. Sun. as the sole exception.

D3¹—¶ 'And after that, 'these Prayers following,' ² "all devoutly kneeling," 'the Min. first pronouncing 'with a loud voice,'

27. Mattins. 'The Lord be with you. Ans. III. Prayer. And with thy Spirit. 'Min. ¶ Let us pray.' 'Lord have. . .

'Christ have. . . Lord have. . . ¶ "Then the Minister," 'Clerks, and people 'shall say' the Lords Prayer' with a loud voice." ³ 'Our Father. . . temptation.' ⁴ "But deliver us from evil. Amen."

¶ 'Then the 'Priest' standing up shall say, "O Lord, shew. . . Ans. : And grant. . . ⁵ Priest. O Lord, save the King. . . holy Spirit from us."

[¹ 'then shall be said daily through the year' ² "as well at" 'Evensong' ('EP') "as at" 'Matins' ('MP') ³ Am. om.—voice. ⁴ 'The' ⁵ Am. om. down to O Lord, shew thy mercy. . . Ir. When the Lit. is said, the Min. may omit the LP and the three Versicles preceding it. ⁶ no variation of type till 1604. ⁷ 'the Creed and' ⁸ "in English" ⁹ '&c.' (text of Creed and LP. not given.) ¹⁰ 'Answer.' ¹¹ 'Min.' ¹² Am. om. down to O God, make clean. . .]

¶ and after that, these Pra.] For leave to omit Lesser Lit. and Lord's Pr., cp. D1¹, n. 3.

¶ The Lord be with you] Always said facing the people.

¶ standing up] Shortened service, remaining standing.

D3²—¶ "Then shall follow' three Collects : The first of the day, which shall be the same that is appointed at the Communion ; The second for Peace ; The third for grace to live well. And the two last Collects shall never alter, but daily be said at " 'Morning Prayer' " throughout all the year, as followeth " ; all kneeling.

[¹ 'daily' Am. the Collect for the day, except when the Communion Service is read ; and then the Collect for the day shall be omitted here. [Ends.] ² 'Matins' ³ 'the Priest standing up, and saying, Let us Pray. Then the Collect of the day']

¶ three Collects] In Adv. and Lent four Colls. are appointed (cp. c28). It is also common, without clearly lawful authority, to add the Coll. of a festival during its octave, or some Pr. which has episcopal sanction.

¶ all kneeling] It is widely held that this only applies to the people (cp. n29), and that the Min. should stand, as ordered in 1549. The words are not in EP (cp. n. 3, and POSITION, etc., § 4).

D3¹—¶ "The second¹ Coll. for Peace. O God, who art the author of peace and. . ."

[1 Am. A.]

D3¹—¶ "The third¹ Coll. for Grace. O Lord our heavenly Father, Almighty and" . . .

[1 Am. A.]

D3¹—¶ ¹In Quires and Places where they sing, here followeth the Anthem.

¶ Then these ²five Prs. following are to be read here, except when the Lit. is read; ³and then only the two last are to be read, as they are there placed.

¶ ⁴A Pr. for the ⁵Kings Majesty. O Lord our heavenly Father, high and. . .

[1 Am. om. these two rubrics and D3¹, but see D3⁷ n. 1r. Here may follow an Anthem or Hymn. 2 Ir. om. five. 3 Ir. in which case the Pr. for the Chief Governour or Governours of Ireland is to be read aft. the Pr. commencing, We humbly beseech thee, O Father, mercifully to look upon our infirmities. 4 (First in Lit. used in the Queen's chapel Jan. 1, 1559; then in appendix to Lit. of 1559 PB). 5 Am. President of the United States, and all in civil Authority. O Lord, our heavenly Father, the high and mighty ruler of the universe, who dost from thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth; most heartily we beseech thee, with thy favour to behold and bless thy servant the President of the United States, and all others in authority; and so replenish them. . .]

1 In Quires . . . In the Cath. and collegiate chs. here referred to, the ANTHEM would seem to be prescribed; elsewhere custom shows that it is at least lawful. The people may sit, as for the sermon, since they are being sung to; but standing is customary, to mark an act of worship. Custom, recognised as lawful, admits a Hymn here. The names of any for whom pr. or thanksgiving is asked may be announced before the people kneel again (but cp. p. 18, 20).

¶ Then these five Prs. Prescribed on Mon., Tues., Th., and Sat. (unless the view be accepted which restricts their prescription along with the anthem to Quires, etc.), and customary on Sun. when the Lit. is omitted or said at another time; often omitted when HC follows. For leave to omit on weekdays, see D1¹, n. 3. For other Prs. at discretion, see COMMON PR., § 56.

D3¹—¶ ¹A Pr. for the Royal Family. Almighty God, the fountain of all goodness. . .²

[1 (First in 1604 at end of Lit.) 2 Ir. A Pr. for the Chief Governour or Governours of Ireland. ¶ No chief Governour is to be prayed for until he be Sworn. ¶ When there is a Lord-Lieutenant, and also a Lord Deputy, or Lord Justices, then both shall be prayed for.]

D3¹—¶ ¹A Pr. for the Clergy and People. Almighty and everlasting God, ²who alone workest great marvels. . .³

[1 1559, cp. D3¹ n. 4. Am. The following Prs. shall be omitted here when the Lit. is said, and may be omitted when the HC is immediately to follow. 2 Am. from whom cometh every good and perfect gift; 3 Am. A Pr. for all Conditions of Men. A General Thanksgiving.]

D3¹ ¶ A Pr. of Saint Chrysostom. Almighty God, who hast given us grace. . .

D3¹—2 Cor. xiii.¹ The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. . . evermore. Amen.

Here endeth the Order of Morning Prayer ²throughout the year.

[1 Am. adds 14. 2 Am. om.]

¶ Here endeth. But a hymn, or sermon, may follow (B2¹, n. 4). A collection may also be made, at the doors, or through the seats with presentation at the Lord's Table by what seems to most the seemly and helpful analogy of HC.

E1¹—The "Order for" ²'EVENING PRAYER,' Daily "throughout the Year."³

[1 "An" 2 'Evensong' Am. daily EP. 3 (Like liberty of omission was given in 1872 for EP as is specified for MP under D1¹ n. 3 above.)

¶ The order for EP] For notes on equivalent rubrics, see corr. ref. nos. under D above.

E1¹—¶ ²At the beginning of Evening Prayer the Minister shall read with ²⁸ Evensong, a loud voice some one, or more ¹ Preparation, of these Sentences of the Scriptures, that follow. And then he shall say that which is written after the said Sentences.

[1 (E1¹ first printed here in 1662). 2 Am. The Min. shall begin the EP by reading one or more of the following Sentences of Scripture; and then he shall say that which is written after them.]

E1¹—D1¹.

E2¹—¶ ¹Then the Minister shall kneel, and say the Lords Prayer; the People ²also kneeling, and repeating it with him. "Our Father," ³which, art in Heaven. . . For ever and ever. Amen.

¶ Then likewise he shall say, O Lord, open. . . Ans. And our mouth. . . ²Priest O God, make speed to save "us."

28. Evening. Ans. O Lord, make haste to help" ¹ Praise. "us." ¶ Here all standing up, the Priest shall say, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son: and to the Holy Ghost; Ans. As it was. . ." Priest. "Praise ye the Lord." Ans. The Lords name be praised.

[1 "The Priest shall say, Our Father" 'which' &c." 2 Am. still. 3 Am. om.—help us. 4 'me' 5 And from Easter to Trinity Sunday, Alleluia. As before is appointed at Matins.]

E2¹—¶ "Then" shall ¹be said or sung the "Pss. in order as they be appointed."

[1 Am. follow a Portion of the Pss., as they are appointed, or one of the Selections, as they are set forth by this Ch. And at the end of every Ps., and likewise at the end of the Magnificat [&c.] may be sung or said the Gloria Patri; and at the end of the whole Portion or selection of Pss. for the day, shall be sung or said the Gloria Patri, or else the Gloria in excelsis, as followeth. Gloria in excelsis. Glory be to God on high. . . [in full]. 2 "in the table for Pss., except there be proper Pss. appointed for that day."]

E2¹ "Then ¹a Lesson of the Old Testament, as is appointed"²: ³And "after that, Magnificat"⁴ (or the Song of the blessed Virgin Mary)⁵ "in English as followeth."

[1 Am. shall be read the First Lesson, according to the Table or Calendar. 2 "likewise in the Calendar, except there be proper Lessons appointed for that day." 3 Am. After which shall be sung or said the Hymn called Magnificat, as followeth. 4 'anima mea Dominum' 5 Ir. om. in English. 6 Ir. except when that shall happen to be read in the Lesson for the day.]

¶ Magnificat] The absence of any direction, as D2¹, to omit, when read in Lesson or Gospel, may be deliberate or more prob. inadvertent. And so of Nunc Dimittis.

E2⁴—“Magnificat” S. “Luke 1. My soul doth magnifie the Lord”¹: “and my” . . .

[1 No colons in 1st 4 vv. till 1662.]

E2⁴—¶ “Or” else this ‘Psalm’; Except² it be on the nineteenth day of the month, when it is read in the ordinary course of the Pss. Cantate Domino. Psal. 98. ‘O Sing unto the Lord a new song: for he. . .’³

[1 ‘the xcviijth Am. om. else. 2 Am. om. it be and tr. on. . . month to end. 3 Am. Or this. Bonum est confiteri. Ps. xcii. (vv. 1-4 in full).]

E2⁷—¶ “Then a Lesson of the New Testament, as it is appointed: And after that, Nunc dimittis”¹ (or the Song of Simeon)² “in English, as followeth.”⁴ ‘Nunc dimittis’, S. ‘Luke 2’ 29. “Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in. . .”

[1 ‘servum tuum’ 2 Am. shall be sung or said the Hymn called Nunc Dimittis, as followeth. 3 Ir. om. in English 4 Ir. except when that shall happen to be read in the Lesson for the day.]

¶ And after that Before Nunc Dimittis it is proper, upon occasion, to publish Banns, baptise (1st, 2^d), and catechise (x6th).

¶ Nunc Dimittis As followeth, but with option E2⁷.

E2⁸—¶ “Or else this Psalm”;¹ Except it be on the Twelfth day of the month. Deus miseratur. Psal. 67. ‘God be merciful unto us, and bless us. . .’²

[1 ‘Deus miseratur nostri, in English.’ 2 Am. Or this, Benedic, anima mea. Psalm 103 (vv. 1-4, 20-23 in full).]

E2⁴—¶ “Then”¹ ‘shall’² be said³ or sung ‘the’ Apostles’ Creed’ by the Minister and the people standing.⁴ I Believe in God. . .

[1 ‘the suffrages before assigned at Matins, the Clerks kneeling likewise’. 2 ‘follow the Creed, with other prs. as is before appointed at the MP after Benedictus’. 3 Am. om. or sung; Ir. sung or said. 4 Am. as D2⁹ n. 2, 3.

E3¹ = D3¹ text (not printed here till 1662; see n. 1, 2 above.)

E3⁴—¶ Then shall¹ follow² “three Collects”; The “first of the day”; ‘The’ “second”³ for “Peace”; The “third”

30. Evensong. ii. Prayer. for aid against all perils, ‘as here’ “after” followeth: Which two last Collects shall be daily said at “⁴ ‘Evening Prayer’ “without alteration.”

[1 Am. be said the Collect for the day, and after that the Collects and Prs. following. 2 ‘And’ “with” (after E2⁹ n. 1, 2). 3 “of” 4 Ir. or that for Grace and Protection. 5 ‘Evensong’]

¶ The omission of all kneeling (D3³) is prob. inadvertent, but leaves the Min. at least free, if not required, to stand.

E3¹—¶ “The second Collect at”¹ “² ‘Evening Prayer.’ “O God, from whom all holy. . .”

[1 Am. A collect for Peace. 2 ‘Evensong.’]

E3⁴—¶ “The third Collect for aid against all perils. Lighten our darkness. . .”¹

[1 Ir. Or this, For Grace and Protection. O alm. and everlasting God, (as H4⁹).]

E3⁴—¶ “In” Quires and places where they sing, here followeth the Anthem.

¶ A prayer for the “King’s Majesty. O Lord our heavenly Father, high and mighty. . .

[1 Ir. Here may follow an anthem or Hymn. 2 Am. places where it may be convenient. 3 Am. (see D3⁴ n. 2).]

E3⁴—D3⁴ (EP for MP in last rubric.)

E4¹—At Morning Prayer. ¶ “Upon these Feasts; “Christmas”-day, “the Epiphany,”

31. Quinquagesima “Saint Matthias,” “Easter-day,”

Val. “Ascension”-day, “Whitsun-day,”

“Saint John Baptist, Saint James, Saint Bartholomew, Saint Matthew, Saint Simon, and Saint Jude, Saint Andrew,” “and” “upon”

“Trinity Sunday shall be sung or said”⁴ at Morning Prayer, instead of the Apostles’ Creed,

“this Confession of our Christian Faith,” commonly called The Creed of Saint Athanasius, by the Minister and People standing. QUICUNQUE VULT. Whosoever will be saved: before all . . .

[1 “In the feasts of” Ir. the Creed (commonly called) of St. Athanasius [Ends]. 2 “the” 3 “Pentecost” 4 “immediately after Benedictus” (i.e., without displacing the Apostles’ Creed) 5 “Thus endeth the order of” “Matins and Evensong” [“M and EP”] “through the whole year.”]

¶ sung or said Best antiphonally like a Ps., and—if sung—to a plainsong melody or other unison chant. A selection of verses, including those relating to the Trinity or the Incarnation, is sometimes, without authority, sung as an anthem in place of the prescribed recitation; or the QV. is by custom omitted altogether, or except upon Trinity Sunday.

E1—“THE LITANY.” ¶ “Here followeth” the Litany’ or General Supplication to be

22. The sung or said after Morning

Litany. Prayer ‘upon Sundays, Wednesdays and Fridays,’ and at other times, when it shall be commanded by the Ordinary.⁶

[1 ‘and Suffrages’ (cp. also below H5¹ n. 1). 2 Am. The 3 Am. ‘used’ 4 Am. Service on 5 Am. ends; Ir. and on such other days, and at such times as shall 6 Ir. ¶ When the Lit. is used as a separate service, it may be preceded by a Hymn and one of the Lessons of the Day; or when used in combination with the Communion Service the Min. may, instead of a Lesson, use one or more of the sentences appointed to be used at the commencement of the Order for MP, and then say, Let us Pray. ¶ When any desire the Prs. of the Congregation, the following words may, at the discretion of the Min., be added in the proper place of any of the petitions, especially him or her or those for whom our prs. are desired.

¶ Here followeth Neither place nor posture is prescribed by rubric or statute, but the 18th Injn. of 1559 prescribed in parish chs. that “the priests with other of the quire shall kneel in the midst of the ch. and sing or say the Lit, but the R. visitors might in Cath. and collegiate chs. sanction the old processional mode [“in such places and in such sort as (they) shall appoint”]. In 1662 a proposed direction to kneel was rejected, possibly because of the known variation in the greater chs. Canon 15 lets the Ordinary decide the place where the Lit. is accustomed to be said (24). Cosin, in 1627, asked, “Have you a little FALDSTOOL, or desk, with some decent carpet over it, in the middle alley of the ch., whereat the Lit. may be said?” But the desk was often in the middle of the choir or chancel, and many bps. dispensed with a special place. Moreover, up to the Lord’s Pr. there is no direction as to the Min., and custom sanctions the saying or singing of all up to this point by two laymen or clerics. Deacons used to take this office, and at coronations two bps. officiate. The solemnity of the petitions supports the usual restriction to ordained mins., with kneeling for the posture, the processional mode being reserved for great occasions in the greater chs. kneeling being prescribed for the Lit. in canon 18.

F1¹⁻⁴—[The Invocations.] "O God the Father of heaven: have mercy. . ."

¶ O God the Father . . . Meant to be repeated as response.

F2¹⁻⁴—[The Deprecations.] "Remember not Lord our offences, nor. . ."

F2²—"From all sedition,¹ privy conspiracy, and rebellion²: "from all false doctrine, heresie, and schism; from hardness of heart, and contempt of thy Word and Commandment, Good Lord, deliver us."

[1 "and" 2 "From the tyranny of the bp. of Rome and all his detestable enormities" (omitted in 1559 under the Act 1 Eliz. c. 2.)]

F3¹⁻²—[The 'Obsecrations.] "By the mystery of thy holy Incarnation; . . ."

F4¹⁻¹⁰—[Intercessions for Church and State.] "We sinners do beseech thee to hear us, O Lord God, and that it may please thee to rule and govern thy holy Church universal in the right way; We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord."¹

[1 In F4⁶ "Bishops, pastors and ministers of the Church."]

F5¹⁻¹¹—[Supplication for spiritual and bodily needs.] "That it may please thee to give us an heart. . ."

F6¹—[Versicles and Lord's Pr.] "Son of God: we. . . Son of God: we. . ."

F6²—"O Lamb of God: that. . . Grant us thy peace."

F6³—"O Lamb of God: that. . . Have mercy upon us."

F6⁴—"O Christ, hear us. O Christ, hear us."

¶ O Christ, hear us Meant to be repeated as response.

F6⁵—"Lord, have mercy upon us. Lord, have mercy upon us. . ."

F6⁶—"¶ Then shall the Priest, and the people with him, say the Lords Prayer. "Our Father, which art in heaven,"¹ Hallowed be. . . "And lead us not into temptation; ²But deliver us from evil." Amen.

[1 'with the residue of the Paternoster.' ' &c.' 2 Till 1662 with change of type to mark response of people in last clause.]

¶ Then shall the Priest If a deacon or lay chanters have officiated so far, the Priest should here take the lead (cp. F7), and it has been suggested that he may and should stand at this point.

F7—[Versicles and Collect.] ¹Priest. "O Lord, deal not. . . Ans. Neither reward us. . . " ¶ Let us pray. "O God merciful Father, that despiseth not. . . through Jesus Christ our Lord."²

[1 "The Versicle." 2 It has been conjectured that Amen has been accidentally omitted in all edns. of the Lit.]

¶ . . . through Jesus Christ Our Lord Amen should properly be added here according to Dr. In the Book annexed a space divides the Pr. from the Anthem following.

F8—[The Anthem and Suffrages.] "O Lord, arise. . . O God, we have heard. . . O Lord, arise. . . Glory be. . . Ans. As it was. . . From our enemies. . . Graciously look. . . ¹Priest. "O Lord, let thy mercy. . . ²Ans. As we do put. . ."

[1 "The Versicle." 2 "The"]

¶ O Lord, arise . . . The Anthem and Suffrages, it is suggested, may be sung by lay chanters and choir up to the last Versicle, assigned to the Priest, who may again stand, as at MF.

F9—"Let us pray. We humbly beseech thee, O Father. . ."

¶ A Prayer of Saint Chrysostom. "Almighty God, who hast given us grace. . ."

²2 Corinthians, 13. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. . . Here endeth the Litany.

[1 'And the Litany shall ever end with this collect following.' 2 (Added in 1559.)]

F10—Prayers and Thanksgivings upon several occasions, to be used before the two final Prayers of the Litany, or of Morning and Evening Prayer.

¶ [to be used] at the discretion of the officiant or curate (except F15^{1,2}, 17, and 18). See COMMON PR., § 5 g.

F10¹—PRAYERS. ¶ ¹"For 33. Occasional Rain. O God heavenly Father, who by thy Son. . ."

[1 (In 1549 after HC.)]

F11—¶ ¹"For fair weather. O Almighty Lord God, who for the sin of. . ."

1 [(In 1549 after HC.) Am. modifies.]

F12¹—¶ "In the time of dearth and famine. O God heavenly Father, whose gift it is. . ."

F12²—¶ ¹"Or this. O God merciful Father, who in the time. . ."

[1 Wording modified in 1662. Am. om. 2 Ir. adds (so Am.) A Pr. for Unity from Accession Service.]

F13—¶ ¹"In the time of war' and tumults. 'O Almighty God, king of all kings, and. . ."

[1 Am. revises.]

F14—¶ "In the time of any common plague or sickness. ¹O Almighty God, who in thy wrath didst. . ."

[1 (Expanded 1662 by adding reference to Moses and Aaron. Rewritten in Am.) Ir. substitutes a long new pr., and adds a pr. For a sick person, a conflation of two in Vis. of Sick.]

F15¹—¶ ¹In the Ember weeks to be said every day, for those that are to be admitted into holy Orders. Almighty God our heavenly Father, who. . .

[1 Am. To be used in the weeks preceding the stated times of ordination.]

F15²—¶ Or this. "¹Almighty God, the giver of all good gifts. . ."

[1 First in Ordinal, 1550; placed here 1662. 2 Ir. adds three prs., On the Rogation days, On New Year's Day, and For Christian Missions. Am. adds a pr. For Missions, two prs. For Fruitful Seasons; To be used on Rogation-Sunday and the Rogation-days; also two prs. (abridged from Vis. of Sick), For a Sick Person (see N6²) and For a Sick Child (N6¹); others For a Person or Persons going to Sea, For a Person under affliction, For Malefactors, after Condemnation (or else the Pr. in the Vis. of Prisoners, beginning, O Father of mercies, etc., may be used.)]

F16—¶ A Prayer that may be said after any of the former. ¹O God, whose nature and property is ever. . .

[1 (Printed with Lit. used Jan. 1, 1559, and found in appendix to Lit. in 1559 PB.)]

F17—¶ A Prayer for the High Court of Parliament, to be read during their Session. *Most gracious God, we humbly beseech. . . .*³

[1 Am. Congress (adapted). 2 Ir. adds A Pr. for the General Synod of the Ch. of Ireland, to be used in all Churches and Chapels in Ireland on the day preceding the meeting of the General Synod, and during the Session of the Synod; also a pr. To be used in colleges and Schools. Am. adds A Pr. to be used at the meetings of Convention with directions to adapt it for general use.]

F18—¶ A Collect or Prayer for all conditions of men, to be used at such times when the Litany is not appointed to be said. O God the creator and preserver of all. . . .

¶ Pr. for all conditions. . . . Only prescribed for Mon., Tues., Th., and Sat. at MP, and even for these days at discretion in parish chs. (cp. D1¹, n. 3). Not ordered at EP, though customary.

F20—THANKSGIVINGS.—¶ A General Thanksgiving.¹ Almighty God, Father of all mercies. . . .

[1 Ir. adds Which may be said of the whole congregation, after the Min.]

¶ A General Thanksgiving Not clearly prescribed for regular use, and not intended for joint recitation, though many find this common practice edifying.

¶ The Collects. . . . On the use of additional Colls., etc., cp. § 65.

F21—¶ For Rain (1604). O God our heavenly Father, who by thy. . . .

F22—¶ For fair weather (1604). O Lord God, who hast justly humbled us. . . .

F23—¶ For Plenty (1604). O Most merciful Father, who of thy gracious goodness. . . .

F24—¶ For peace and deliverance from our enemies (1604). O Almighty God, who art a strong tower. . . .

F25—¶ For restoring publick peace at home. O Eternal God our heavenly Father. . . .

F26—¶¹ For deliverance from the Plague, or other common sickness. O Lord God, who hast wounded us for. . . .

[1 1604 (when title ended at Plague.)]

F26²—¶¹ Or this. We humbly acknowledge before thee, O. . . .

[1 1604 (with noisome pestilence for contagious sickness.)]

G1—¶ The COLLECTS, EPISTLES AND GOSPELS to be used² throughout "the year."³ 4.

¶ Note, that⁵ the Collect appointed for every Sunday, or for any Holiday that hath a Vigil or Eve, shall be said at the Evening Service next before.

[1 'Introits' 2 "at the celebration of the Lord's Supper and Holy Communion" 3 "with proper ps. and lessons for divers feasts and days." 4 Am. Ir. The Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, appointed for the Sunday, shall serve all the week after, when it is not in this book otherwise ordered (verbatim from B5¹). 5 Am. The Collect appointed for any Sunday or other Feast may be used at the Evening Service of the day before.]

¶ at the Evening Service next before See EVX.

G1—"The first Sunday in Advent."¹ "The Collect. Almighty God, give us grace. . . ."

¶ This Collect is to be repeated every day with the other Collects in Advent,² until Christmas-Eve. "The Epistle. Rom. xiii." 8. "The Gospel. S. Mat. xxi." 1.

[1 'Beatus Vir. Ps. i [ending with Gloria Patri] and so must every Introit be ended'. 2 Am. unto Christmas-day.]

(For variations in collects, etc., under G2-4, and later days passed over here, see COLLECTS.)

¶ with the other Collects Following them, by analogy of G6 and 20. These express directions (added in 1662) weigh against the not infrequent practice of repeating seasonal colls. when not directed (cp. G28, n. 3; H4¹).

¶ until Christmas-Eve Hardly as Am., since at EP the Christmas Coll. would surely supersede the Adv. Coll.

G5—The Nativity of our Lord, or the Birthday of Christ, commonly called¹ "Christmas-day."² "The Collect." "The Epistle. Heb. i." 1. "The Gospel." S. John i." 1.

[1 'Proper Ps. and Lessons on' 2 '¶ At Matins. Ps. 19, 45, 85. The 1st lesson, Esai. ix. unto the end. The 2nd lesson, Math. i. unto the end. ¶ At the first Communion. Cantate Domino. Ps. 98: The collect. God, which maketh us glad with the yearly remembrance. . . . The Epistle Tit. ii. [11]. The Gospel. Luc. ii. [to 15]. ¶ At the second Communion. Domine Dominus noster. Ps. 8. 3 'Proper Ps. and lessons at Evensong. Ps. 89, 110, 132. The 1st Lesson, Esai. vii. God spake once to Ahas, etc. unto the end. The second lesson, Tit. iii. The kindness and love of our Saviour, etc. unto foolish questions.' Am. If in any ch. the HC be twice celebrated on Christmas-day, the following Coll., Ep., and Gospel may be used at the first communion (as under n. 2 from 1st PB); Ir. has similar rubric, except that the Gospel is Matt. i 18-25.]

G6—"S. Stephens day." The Collect.¹ ¶ "Then shall follow" 'the' "Collect of the Nativity," which shall be said continually unto New-years' Eve.

For "the Epistle. Acts vii." 55.

"The Gospel." S. "Matth. xxiii." 34.

[1 '(2nd less. and introit)' 2 'a'. 3 'day.']

¶ unto New-year's Eve Prob. till MP on that day, as last note. (Observe that the phrase by implication gives eccl. sanction to the title New-year's Day.)

G9—The Circumcision of Christ. ¶¹ The same Collect, Epistle and Gospel² shall serve for every day after unto the Epiphany.

[1 'If there be a Sunday between the Epiphany, and the Circumcision, then shall be used the same' 2 'at the Communion, which was used upon the day of Circumcision.']

G10—"The Epiphany," or the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles. . . .¹

[1 Am. The same Coll., Ep., and Gospel shall serve for every day after, unto the next Sunday.]

¶ The Epiphany Strictly the Epiph. Coll. seems restricted to the day and its Eve. But the Am. usage is prob. a correct gloss.

G16—"The sixth Sunday"¹ after the Epiphany. . . .

1 ["(if there be so many) shall have the same" 'Psalm,' "Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, that was upon the fifth."]

G17—"The Sunday called Septuagesima," or the third Sunday before Lent.

G20—"The first day of Lent, commonly called Ashwednesday."¹ The Collect.

¶ This Collect is to be read every day in Lent, after the Collect appointed for the day. For the Epistle. Joel ii." 12. "The Gospel." S. "Mat. vi." 16.

[1 Printed heading Ashwednesday crossed out by 1662 revisers, and The First Day of Lent substituted.]

¶ every day in Lent] The letter of the rubric seems to require the Quinquagesima Coll., Ep., and Gospel for Th. to Sat. aft. Ash-Wed.; but it is doubtful whether this was intended. The Ash-Wed. Coll. should not be used at EP on Shrove Tuesday. See further, p.

G28—"Good Friday." The "Collect"—s' "Almighty God, we beseech thee graciously. . . . " "Almighty and everlasting God, by whose Spirit. . . . " "Merciful God, who hast made. . . . "

[1 "On" 2 'At Matins. The first lesson, Gen. 22 unto the end'. 3 'At the Communion, Deus, Deus. Psalm 22. ¶ After the two Collects at the Communion, shall be said these two Collects following', (the endings being left incomplete).]

¶ The Collects] It may be doubted whether the Ash-Wed. Coll. is meant to be repeated on Good Friday and Easter-Eve, though the rubric (c20), strictly read, requires it. The two Colls. at the Communion (n. 3) were for the Day and for the King (H¹, n. 2, 3).

G30—Easter Day. ¶ 1 'At MP, instead of the Psalm, O come let us, &c., these Anthems shall be sung or said.' 1 Cor. v. 7. Christ our passover. . . . Rom. vi. 9. Christ being raised . . . alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. 1 Cor. xv. 20. Christ is risen. . . . all be made alive' 3 Glory be. . . . Ans. As it was . . .

[1 'In the morning afore Matins, the people being assembled in the ch.: these Anthems shall be first solemnly sung or said'. 2 'Alleluia, Alleluia'. 3 'Alleluia. The Priest. Shew forth to all nations the glory of God. The Ans. And among all people his wonderful works. Let us Pray. O God, who for our redemption didst give. . . . ¶ Proper Pss. and Lessons. At Matins: Pss. 2, 57, 111. The 1st Less., Ex. xii. unto the end. The 2nd less., Rom. vi. unto the end. At the first Communion. Conserva me. Ps. 16.]

G30—"The Collect." Almighty God, who through. . . . "The Epistle. Col. iii." 1. "The Gospel. S. John xx." 1¹, 2.

[1 'At the second Communion. Domine quid. Ps. 3. The Collect (same as for 1st S. aft. Easter). The Epistle, 1 Cor. v. (6-9). The Gospel. Mar. xvi. (to v. 6). At Evensong. ¶ Proper Pss. and Lessons. Pss. 113, 114, 118. The second lesson. Acts ii. unto the end. 2 Am. If in any ch. the HC be twice celebrated on Easter-day, the following Coll., Ep., and Gospel may be used at the First Communion (as under n. 1, but Coll. as in G30¹ n. 3); Ir. has similar rubric, except that the Ep. is Heb. 13²⁰, 21.]

G30—"Munday in Easter Week. The Collect [as Easter]."

G30—"Tuesday in Easter week. The Collect" [as Easter].

[1 (Till 1662 the same as 1st Sun. aft. Easter.)]

G65—"The 'twentyfifth Sunday' after Trinity. . . . ¶ 'If there be³ any moe Sundaies before Advent-Sunday,³ the service of some of those Sundaies that were omitted after the Epiphany', shall be taken in to supply so many as are here wanting. And if there be fewer,⁴ the overplus may be omitted: Provided that this last Collect, Epistle, and Gospel shall always be used upon the Sunday next before Advent.

[1 Am. Sunday next before Advent. 2 Am. more than 25 Sundays aft. Trinity, 3 'to supply the same shall be taken' 4 Am. than 25, the overplus shall be omitted. (Ends.)]

H—1 'THE Order For the Administration of "the" "Lords" "Supper," 28. H¹. 1. Ante-Communion. "or" "Holy COMMUNION." 2

[1 'The Supper of the Lord, and the 2 'commonly called the Mass'.]

H—¶ 1 So many as intend to be partakers of the holy Communion shall signifie their names to the Curate at least sometime the day before.

[1 Am. om.]

¶ shall signifie their names] No penalty for non-compliance is stated. It has been suggested (cp. COMMUNICANT) that the rule may be properly pressed at Easter, and that compliance may be a condition of the FRANCHISE.

H²—¶ 1 "And if any of those be an open and notorious evil liver," "or have done any wrong to his neighbours by word or deed," "so that the Congregation" be thereby³ "offended"; the "Curate" having knowledge thereof, "shall call him and advertise him," that "in any wise" he "presume not" to come "to the Lords table, until he hath openly declared himself to have truly repented and amended his former naughty life, that the Congregation may thereby be satisfied, which before were offended; and that he hath recompensed the parties to whom he hath done wrong, or at least" declare himself to "be in full purpose so to do, as soon as he conveniently may."

[1 Am. If among those who come to be partakers of the HC, the Min. shall know any to be. Ir. If the Min. shall have knowledge or reasonable ground to believe that any person who is living in open and notorious sin intends to come to the HC, so that scandal would thereby arise, he shall privately admonish him not to presume to come to the Lord's Table till the cause of offence shall have been removed; and in every such case the Min. shall have regard to the canons relating thereto. 2 "by him is"]

H³—¶ 1 "The same order shall the Curate use with those betwixt whom³ he perceiveth malice and hatred to reign: not suffering them to be partakers of the Lords Table, until he know them to be reconciled. And if one of the parties so at variance be content to forgive from the bottom of his heart all that the other hath trespassed against him, and to make amends for that he himself hath offended; and the other party will not be persuaded to a godly unity, but remain still in his frowardness and malice: the Minister in that case ought to admit the penitent person to the holy Communion, and not him that is obstinate." Provided that every Minister so repelling any, as is³ specified² in this, or the next precedent Paragraph of this Rubrick,³ shall be obliged to give an account of the same to the Ordinary within fourteen dayes after at the farthest. 2 And the Ordinary shall proceed against the offending person according to the Canon.²

[1 Ir. om. 2 Am. herein. 3 Am. om.]

[shall be obliged] The curate has thus no power of EXCOMMUNICATION, only of repelling temporarily the offenders specified, reporting the case to the Ordinary, who shall proceed in his court with the judicial determination of the case (cp. canons 109, 113).

H¹—¶ ‘The Table’ ‘at the Communion-time’ ‘having’ ‘a fair white linen cloth upon it, shall stand in the body of the Church, or in the Chancel,’ ‘where Morning and Evening Prayer are appointed to be said. And’ ‘the Priest standing’ ‘at the north side of the Table’ ‘shall say the Lords Prayer, with’ ‘the Collect’ ‘following,’ ‘the people kneeling.’

[1 ‘Upon the day and at the time appointed for the ministration of the Holy Communion, the Priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white alb plain with a vestment or cope. And where there be many Priests or Deacons, there so many shall be ready to help the Priest in the ministration as shall be requisite, and shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, albs with tunicles. Then shall the Clerks sing in English for the office, or Introit (as they call it) a Ps. appointed for the day’. 2 Am. and Ir. om. to said. 3 Am. Minister. 4 ‘humbly afore the midst of the Altar’ 5 Am. right 6 Am. or where M and EP are appointed to be said. 7 “this” 8 Am. But the Lord’s Pr. may be omitted, if MP hath been said immediately before. Ir. The Min. shall say the Service following in a distinct and audible voice.]

[The Table] For its form, material, and position, see LORD’S TABLE; for its covering, see CARPET and FAIR LINEN CLOTH.

[And the Priest standing] A pause for prayerful recollection is usual and in order, whether kneeling or standing.

[at the north side] Diversely interpreted, cp. EASTWARD POSITION and NORTH SIDE. It is usual to place the Bread and Wine (see also MIXED CHALICE) in a niche, or on a ledge or CARNEDIE Table, within the sacristy, before the service, so as to avoid having to fetch them from the vestry at H¹. Similarly, the sacred vessels may be placed ready on the Holy Table. These acts should be performed by or under the supervision of one of the Mins. If the service begins with HC., the Min. or Mins. usually bring in elements and vessels on entrance. Reverence, and care for order and symmetry, are needed for these and similar acts.

H¹—Our Father. . . . But deliver us from evil. Amen. The Collect. “Almighty God, unto whom all hearts be. . . .”

[Our Father] By the rubric (n²) this should be repeated by the people, but by custom it is said, including Amen, by the Priest alone. When there is no choir the words are usually read not monotoned. With a choir the organ may give a note to suit the key of the music.

H¹—¶ “Then shall” ‘the Priest,’ turning to the people, ‘rehearse distinctly all the TEN COMMANDMENTS; and the people’ still ‘kneeling, shall after every Commandment ask God mercy for their transgression’ ‘thereof for the time past, and grace to keep the same for the time to come,’ as followeth. ‘Minister. God spake these words and said, I am the Lord. . . none other Gods but me. People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law. . . . we beseech thee.’³

[1 ‘he say a Ps. appointed for the Introit : which

Ps. ended, the Priest shall say, or else the Clerks shall sing, iii. Lord have mercy upon us. iii. Christ have mercy upon us. iii. Lord have mercy upon us. 2 Am. Minister. 3 Am. transgressions om. thereof. 4 ‘of the same, after this sort’ 5 Am. om., but adds, ¶ The Decalogue may be omitted, provided it be said once on each Sunday. But Note, that whenever it is omitted, the Min. shall say the Summary of the Law, beginning, Hear what our Lord Jesus Christ saith. 6 Am. Then the Min. may say, Hear also what our Lord Jesus Christ saith, (Matt. 22 37-40 recited). Here, if the Decalogue hath been omitted, shall be said, Lord, . . . Christ, . . . Lord, have mercy upon us. Then the Min. may say, Let us Pray. (Post-Com. Coll. n⁴). 7 ‘Then the Priest standing at God’s board shall begin’ (here follows Gloria in excelsis, see n³). ‘Then the priest shall turn him to the people and say, The Lord be with you. The Ans. And with thy spirit. The Priest. Let us pray.]

[the people . . . shall . . . ask] Young Communicants may be trained to take part aloud and, when there is no choir, to time their words by the assistant min. or clerk, who should speak clearly here and elsewhere.

H¹—¶ “Then shall follow” one of these two Collects³ for the King.” ‘the’ ‘Priest’ ‘standing’ ‘as before,’ ‘and saying,’ “Let us pray. Almighty God, whose kingdom is everlasting. . . .” ¶ Or “Almighty and everlasting God, we are. . . .”

[1 Am. om. H¹. 2 “the Collect of the day, with” 3 “following” 4 ‘up’]

[one of these two Colls.] The first, as asking graces needed by both King and people, is suited for most frequent use.

H¹—¶ Then shall be said the Collect of the day. 1 And ‘immediately after the Collect’ ‘the’ Priest ‘shall read the Epistle,’ ‘saying,’ “The Epistle” ‘[or, The portion of Scripture appointed for the Epistle] is “written in the Chapter of—” beginning at the—verse. ‘And’ “the Epistle ended,” ‘he’ “shall say,” Here endeth the Epistle. Then shall he ‘read’ “the Gospel” (the people all standing up) saying, “The holy Gospel” is “written in the Chapter of—” beginning at the—verse. 1 ‘And’ “the Gospel ended,” ‘he’ “shall be sung or ‘said the Creed’” following, the people still standing, as before. “I Believe in one God” the Father Almighty. . . .”

[1 ‘The collects ended’ 2 Am. Minister 3 ‘or he that is appointed’ 4 ‘in a place assigned for the purpose’ 5 ‘beginning thus’ 6 ‘of Saint Paul’ 7 ‘to the—’ The Min. then shall read the Epistle. Immediately after’ 8 ‘the priest, or one appointed to read the Gospel’ “Shall say, The Holy Gospel. . . .” 9 ‘The Clerks and people shall answer, Gloria be to thee, O Lord. The Priest or Deacon shall then read the Gospel : After’ Am. and Ir. Here shall (Ir. may) be said or sung, Gloria. . . . (Ir. adds, And after the Gospel ended, Thanks be to thee, O Lord, or Hallelujah. Then) 10 ‘the Priest shall begin’ 11 Am. commonly called the Nicene, or else the Apostles’ Creed; but the Creed may be omitted, if it hath been said immediately before in MP; Provided that the Nicene Creed shall be said on (the 5 greater festivals). 12 ‘The Clerks shall sing the rest. The Father.’]

[immediately after the Coll], i.e., without interpolation of hymn or anthem, or the like; but additional colls. ordered by the PB or lawful authority should be duly inserted (61 n. 11).

¶ the Priest shall read the Epistle If alone, he may read it on the north (or—by custom—the south) side, facing the people, or he may step forward or go to a lectern so as to be better heard; but an assistant Min. (by old custom, even the clerk) may read it (the south side being usual). The celebrant (and gospeller), as well as the people, should sit (cp. Sirttmo).

¶ Ep. and Gospel, prior to 1662, were to be sung in cath. and collegiate, but not in parish, chs.; but the rubric (p2 n. 15) is now omitted.

¶ The Ep. is written The Bible titles are usually regarded as alone authorised, but scripture may be properly inserted by PB analogy (St. Paul instead of Paul the Ap.).

¶ Then shall be read the Gospel. The 1549 response has been continued by custom, and in some chs. a grill or hymn is interpolated here (cp. § 64 for these interpolations).

¶ sung or said Cp. § 87.

H1—¶ Then 'the 'Curate shall declare unto the people' what 'holy-days, or fasting-days' are in 'the week following' to be observed. And then also (if occasion be) shall notice be given of the Communion; and 'the banns of Matrimony published; and 'Briefs, Citations and Excommunications read. And nothing shall be proclaimed or published in the Church, during the time of Divine Service, but by the Minister: Nor by him any thing, but what is prescribed in the Rules of this Book, or enjoined by the 'King, or by the Ordinary of the place.

¶ Then ' "shall follow" 'the' "Sermon," 'or' ' "one of the Homilies" ' 'already set forth, or hereafter to be set forth by 'Authority.'

[I See H1 n. 2 Am. Minister 3 Am. of the Banns of Matr., and other matters to be published [ends]. 4 Ir. such other matters as may be directed by the Ordinary. 5 Ir. General Synod of the Ch. of Ireland, or permitted by 6 "After the Creed" 'ended' Ir. Here followeth the Sermon. 7 'if there be no' "Sermon" 8 Am. ends. 9 'some portion of' 10 'as they shall be hereafter divided' (See H2 n. for continuation). 11 'common'

¶ what holy-days or fasting-days Notification omitted without authority in many chs.

¶ Banns, etc. See art. BANNs, § 2.

¶ prescribed . . . or enjoined . . . The development of Ch. life has made almost inevitable a relaxation of these limits, which is, however, often abused by incongruous announcements.

¶ Then shall follow the sermon, or . . . On a strict reading a sermon is always ordered at HC, or at least at the principal celebration; otherwise the words are read as implying, "if there be one." But this requirement was relaxed in 1872 by the SHORTENED SERVICES ACT. Canons 45 and 46 requiring sermon or homily every Sunday specify no time, but are naturally connected with this rubric.

¶ by authority Some bps. have restricted the number of sermons by deacons and less qualified priests, and approved volumes of printed sermons for use at other times.

H1—¶ Then shall the Priest return to the Lords Table, and begin "the Offertory," 'saying' "one or more of these Sentences" 'following, as he thinketh most convenient' 'in his discretion.'

S. Matt. V.—"Let your light so shine before men, that . . ." [Refs. to chap. not verse.]

¶ Whilst these Sentences are in reading, the Deacons, 'Churchwardens, or' 'other' fit 'person' 'appointed' for that purpose, shall receive the alms for the poor, and other 'devotion'-s 'of the people,' 'in a decent basin, to be provided by the Parish for that purpose; and reverently bring' it to the Priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the holy Table.¹⁰

[1 'After such sermon, homily, or exh., the Curate shall declare unto the people whether there be any holy days or fasting days the week following; and earnestly exhort them to remember the poor.' Am. After which, when there is a Communion, the Min. shall return. . . . 2 'Then shall follow for' 3 'of holy scripture, to be sung whiles the people do offer, or else one of them to be said by the Min. immediately afore the offering.' 4 Am. om. and adds other sentences, Acts 20 35 [put first] and Ex. 25 2, Deut. 16 16-17, 1 Chron. 29 11, 1 Chron. 29 14 [at end]. 5 'Where there be Clerks, they shall sing one, or many of the sentences above written, according to the length and shortness of the time, that the people be offering. In the mean time, whiles the Clerks do sing the Offertory, so many as are disposed shall offer unto the poor mens box every one according to his ability- and charitable mind'. 6 'Then shall the Churchwardens or some other by them appointed gather the devotion of the people, and put the same into' "the poor men's box." 7 Am. and Ir. persons 8 Ir. om. to purpose 9 Ir. them 10 "and" 'at' ('upon') "the offering days appointed, every man and woman shall pay to the Curate the due and accustomed offerings" (cp. H5⁸). 'Then so many as shall be partakers of the HC shall tarry still in the quire, or in some convenient place nigh the quire, the men on the one side, and the women on the other side. All other (that mind not to receive the same HC) shall depart out of the quire except the Ministers and Clerks.' (Cp. H2¹).]

¶ return to the Lord's Table His position, at north side or centre, is not specified, and varies in practice, the centre being most convenient.

¶ saying one or more A sentence should always be said when alms are collected, but perhaps not necessarily otherwise. The sentences chosen should fit the object of the gifts.

¶ Whilst these sentences are in reading This direction is by custom read as a minimum, and not as excluding the singing of one or more sentences (cp. Coron., 1911, "Then shall the organ play, and the choir sing the offertory"), or a hymn.

¶ shall receive . . . in a decent basin . . . and reverently bring The actual collection in smaller plates or bags is sufficiently covered by the rubric, as a convenient elaboration, and the reverence ordered can best be shown by the collectors standing (facing the Lord's Table) after the oblations have been received in the basin, till they have been presented. The clerk, vergor, or collector may intimate the number of communicants by word of mouth or by chalked figures on a slate.

¶ humbly presents and place it The head may be bowed and the basin slightly raised, but not ostentatiously elevated, with a short pause before the basin is placed on the south end of the Table, leaving space for ordering the Bread and Wine; and there it must be left until the end of the service, or at least of the Pr. for the Ch. (Note that in some cath. and collegiate chs., bps. and dignitaries by custom offer singly, kneeling at the Table.)

H1'—¶ And 'when there is a Communion,' the Priest shall then place upon the Table 'so much Bread and Wine, as' 'he shall think sufficient.' After which done 'the Priest shall say, "'Let us pray for the whole state of Christs Church" 'militant 'here in earth', "Almighty and everliving God, who by. . . ."

[1 Cp. 1548. The time of the Communion shall be immediately after that the Priest himself hath received the sacrament, without the varying of any other rite or ceremony in the Mass (until other order shall be provided), but as heretofore usually the Priest hath done with the sacrament of the body, to prepare, bless and consecrate so much as will serve the people: so it shall continue still after the same manner and form, save that he shall bless and consecrate the biggest chalice or some fair and convenient cup or cups full of wine with some water put unto it; and that day, not drink it up all himself, but taking one only sup or draught, leave the rest upon the altar covered, and turn to them that are disposed to be partakers of the Communion, and shall thus exhort them as followeth. (The longer Exh. H1³ came here in OHC.) 2 Am. om. 3 'Then the min. shall take' 4 'shall suffice for the persons appointed to receive the HC, laying the bread upon the corporas or else in the paten, or in some other comely thing prepared for that purpose: and putting the wine into the Chalice, or else in some fair or convenient cup, prepared for that use (if the Chalice will not serve), putting thereto a little pure and clean water: and setting both the bread and wine upon the altar. Then the Priest shall say, The Lord be Ans. And with. . . . Priest'. "Lift up your hearts" (as H2⁴). 5 Ir. if this have not been already done. Am. And when the Alms and Oblations are presented, there may be sung a Hymn, or an Offertory Anthem in the words of Holy Scripture or of the PB, under the direction of the Min. 6 Am. & Ir. Then 7 (In 1549 after Sandus H2⁴) 8 Am. om. 9 (For changes see art. CHURCH MILITANT.)]

[shall then place upon the Table] This rule admits of no excusable exception. No special ceremony is prescribed, or words ordered, but the Order of Canon, 1911, may be taken as a guide, the Bread upon the Paten and the Wine in the Chalice(s) shall by the Priest be received from the assistant Min. (or taken from the Credence), and reverently placed upon the Altar, and decently covered with a fair linen cloth, the Priest first saying this Pr. (secretly): Bless, O Lord, we beseech thee, these thy gifts, and sanctify them unto this holy use, that by them we may be made partakers of the Body and Blood of thine only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, and fed unto everlasting life of soul and body. (In some chs. them is loosely interpreted to cover the meaning during the offertory. But, though the elements may be prepared, they should not be placed on the Table before the alms.)

[so much . . . convenient] Some place Flagon and Ciborium upon the Table, but more commonly and conveniently the older use suggested by the rubric, is followed.

[After which done] Either NORTH SIDE or EASTWARD Position are pronounced lawful here. The omission of the Pr. is inexcusable. The deacon may, perhaps, say the introductory 'bidding,' during which the Min. faces the people. Slight pauses may mark special petitions or commemorations. The practice of interpolating the Levitical Benediction after the pr. in chs. where it is customary for non-communicants to withdraw, though censured by some, is lawful (§ 63), and is justified on the ground that children, and communicants receiving at other times, may properly use so much of the service (as forming a whole, see ANTI-COMMUNION), and should not be deprived of their blessing (cp. M6⁴, M8⁵, for two successive benedictions before the Pax).

H1³—¶ 'When the Minister giveth warning for the celebration of the holy Communion, (³ which he shall alwayes do upon the Sunday or some holy-day immediately preceding) After the Sermon, or Homily ended,³ he³ shall read this exhortation following.⁴ Dearly beloved, on — — day next I purpose. . . . Wherefore it is "our duty to render. . . ."

[1 In 1548 First the Parson, Vicar, or Curate, the next Sunday, or Holy day, or, at the least, one day before he shall minister the Communion, shall give warning to his Parishioners, or those which be present, that they prepare themselves thereto, saying to them openly and plainly as hereafter followeth, or such like:—Dear Friends, and you especially upon whose souls I have cure and charge upon day next. . . . 'And if upon the Sunday or holy-day the people be negligent to come to the Communion: Then shall the Priest earnestly exhort his parishioners to dispose themselves to the receiving of the HC more diligently, saying these or like words unto them . . . (as 1548)' ¶ 'And some time shall be said this also at the discretion of the Curate.' Am. places H1³ at end of HC. 2 Ir. om. (Am. om. from After) 3 Ir. may 4 Ir. or such part as he thinketh most convenient. Am. or so much thereof as, in his discretion, he may think convenient. 5 (For changes in these exhs. see EXHORTATION. This first clause was prefixed in 1662.)]

[After the sermon] This exh., though clearly ordered, is by some bps. dispensed with on ordinary Sundays, if not wholly disused. The convenient practice of using the first sentence has no authority, and the latter part no less needs periodical announcement.

H1³—¶ 'Or in case he 'shall see the people negligent to come to the holy Communion', in stead of the former, he shall use this exhortation. 'Dearly beloved brethren, on — — I intend, by God's grace, to celebrate. . . .'

[1 'Then shall follow this Exh. at certain times when the Curate']

H2¹—¶ 'At the time of the Celebration of the Communion³ the Communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the holy Sacrament, the Priest shall say "this exhortation."³ *"Dearly beloved in the Lord, ye that mind. . . ."*⁴

[1 (continuation of H1³ nn. 6, 9, 10) 'wherein (i.e., in the Sermon or homily) if the people be not exhortated to the worthy receiving of the holy Sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Christ, then shall the Curate give this exhortation to those that be minded to receive the same. 2 Ir. (those who do not intend to communicate having had opportunity to withdraw) Am. om. to Sacrament. 3 (In 1548 introduced by last words of H1³ n. 1.) 4 'In Cath. Churches, or other places, where there is daily communion, it shall be sufficient to read this exh. above written, once in a month. And in parish churches upon the week days it may be left unsaid'. Ir. Note—This exh. may be omitted at the discretion of the Min., the consent of the Ordinary having been first obtained: provided that it shall be read once in the month at least, and on all great Festivals. Am. But note that the exh. may be omitted if it hath been already said on one Lord's Day in that same month.]

[conveniently placed] Forward in the centre of the ch., if not in the chancel.

[this exh.] Discretion is commonly taken to omit this, but cp. n. 4.

H2¹—¶ 'Then shall the Priest say'³ 'to them' "that come to" 'receive' "the" 'holy' "Communion,"

"Ye that do truly and earnestly repent you. . . . confession to Almighty God,³ meekly kneeling upon your knees.

[1 (H2^{2,5} followed the Consecration in 1548 and 1549). 1548 Here the Priest shall pause awhile, to see if any man will withdraw himself; and if he perceive any so to do, then let him commune with him privily at convenient leisure, and see whether he can with good exhortation bring him to grace: and after a little pause, the Priest shall say. 2 (After the Consecration, Pr. of Oblation, and Lord's Pr.) 'The Peace of the Lord be alway with you. The Clerks. And with thy spirit. The Priest. Christ our paschal Lamb is offered up for us, once for all, when he bare our sins on his body upon the cross; for he is the Very Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world; wherefore let us keep a joyful and holy feast unto the Lord. Here the Priest shall turn him toward those that come to the communion and say, 3 and to his holy church 'before this congregation' "here gathered together in his name."

H2^s—¶ "Then shall this general confession be made, in the name of all those that are minded to receive the holy Communion, 1 by one of the Ministers," 2 both he and "all" the people "kneeling humbly upon their knees," and saying, "Almighty God, Father of our Lord Jesus. . ."

[1 (1548 is here as 1549 throughout H2^s, 7 except where noted otherwise) "Either by one of them, or" 2 "or by the Priest himself"]

¶ one of the ministers, who may be the clerk. and saying] Cp. § 88.

H2^s—¶ "Then shall the Priest" (or the Bishop being present) "stand up, and turning himself to the people," 1 pronounce this absolution. "Almighty God our heavenly Father, who. . ."

[1 "say thus." 2 1548 hath left power to his ch. to absolve penitent sinners from their sins, and to restore to the grace of the heavenly Father such as truly believe in Christ]

¶ (or the bp. being present) Not if only among the congregation.

